SHEBNA (שֶׁבְנָא, § 51 [but שֶׁבְנָה, 2 K. 18 18 26, where RV has SHEBNAH], possibly Aramaic [Di., Ki., etc.], or rather for שבניה=שבנה [Del.]; σομνας, but σοβνας [B] in Is. 36 3]), a chief secretary or chancellor under Hezekiah (2 K. 18 18 19 2 Is. 36 3 22 37 2). Tradition identified him with the sōkēn, or 'high officer'[2] (AV 'treasurer,' RV 'steward'—both renderings are guesses), whose arrogance is so severely denounced by Isaiah in the only passage of personal invective which has come down to us (Is. 22 15-19 cp Am. 7 16 17). The fact that the last five words of Is. 22 15 have demonstrably been inserted by a later hand renders this identification doubtful. So at least Duhm puts the matter. But the strong probability is that שבנה (so read) or שבניה and סכן both come from כֻּשִׁי, 'Cushanite.' Shebna was certainly a foreigner, and most likely a N. Arabian. Hezekiah seems to have sent an embassy to Pir'u, king of the N. Arabian Muṣri, to whom Ḥanunu, king of Gaza, had fled for refuge. It may be conjectured that הַכֻּשִׁי הַזֶּה, 'this Cushanite,' as Isaiah disparagingly calls him, came to Jerusalem in connection with these negotiations. Isaiah predicts his punishment. He was bound to fall at last; but, according to the traditional theory, he only fell to a lower post in the king's service—that of chief secretary. This is certainly not inconceivable. Though the man had no family connections at Jerusalem, he may have been too useful to his party to be neglected, and the Arabian party may have been still powerful enough to dictate the choice of a chancellor. (See, however,

[1] This story has scarcely a mythological basis in spite of Winckler (GI 2 240) and Stucken (Astralmythen, 67); cp Winckler's theory (above) of the meaning of 'Sheba.'

[2] Winckler also (GI 2 240) thinks it strange that Sheba should flee as far as Abel-beth-maacah.

[3] 𝔊^L in v. 7 (καὶ παρήγγειλεν ὀπίσω αὐτοῦ A. τῷ λαῷ) might suggest that Amasa, when ordered to collect the warriors of Judah, took a number of men, and threw in his lot with Sheba. Otherwise we might assume that his death was simply the result of a private feud between him and Joab. The wording of vv. 10 12 reminds us of that of 2 S. 2 23 (murder of Asahel). For a criticism of the whole narrative see AJSL 16 166-169 (1900).

[4] On the name cp WMM, 'Die Sabäer in hieroglyph. Texten,' MVG(3), 1898, pp. 35 ff.

[5] 𝔊 and Pesh., however, find no proper name here (αἰχμαλωτεύοντες [BA], αἰχμαλωτεύσαντες [N], [illegible]); cp above on Joel 3 8.

[1] In this case one would expect the Hiphil הֲשִׁיבַנִי.

[2] A Phœnician inscription (CIS 1 5, p. 25) speaks of a sōkēn of the new city—i.e., Tyre.

AJSL 5 443.) The next point to mention is one on which, until quite lately, critics have been agreed. If Is. 22 20-25 is the work of Isaiah, it follows that the prophet hoped great things from a change in the grand viziership. The day when a king would reign righteously and princes would rule justly (Is. 32 1)[1] seemed, if we accept this view, about to dawn. 'Hence the strong language, almost Messianic in its tone, with which Isaiah hails in spirit the elevation of his disciple Eliakim.'[2]

Further criticism has convinced the present writer that Is. 22 20-25 is a late addition, or rather, vv. 20-23 form an additional passage, and vv. 24 25 another. The second of these insertions is in the highest decree prosaic, and even the first is both in tone and in style un-Isaianic. The writer of vv. 20-23 probably knew no more than we know; he built upon the very scanty material contained in Is. 36 3 and the related passages. That Isaiah presumed to nominate a grand vizier is improbable; that he would have expected great things from a change in the viziership is, to those who have followed recent criticism of other parts of Is. 1-33, still more improbable. Lastly, that Eliakim's career was cut short in the way described in the second insertion, is, though possible enough (cp Che. Proph. Is., on Is. 22 25), neither affirmed nor contradicted by any evidence such as a historian can receive. Cp Nowack, Heb. Arch. 1 308 n. 3, and on the Shebna question, Kamphausen, 'Isaiah's Prophecy against the Major Domo,' AJSL, Jan. 1901; Cheyne, ibid., July 1901. T. K. C.

SHEBUEL (שְׁבוּאֵל, § 31; ϹΟΥΒΑΗΛ), a Gershonite (1 Ch. 23 16, σουβιηλ [L]: 26 24, ιωηλ [B], σωβἱηλ [L]); also a son of Heman (1 Ch. 25 4). 𝔊 reads σουβαηλ—i.e., שׁוּבָאֵל, SHUBAEL (q.v.).

SHECANIAH (so RV; and AV in 1 Ch. 24 11 2 Ch. 31 15, שְׁכַנְיָה, and twice שְׁכַנְיָהוּ, perhaps [see § 35] 'Yahwè dwells [among his worshippers],' or, if ה [whence incorrectly הו] is formative, a gentilic, by transposition from כשני[3] [Cushanite], so Che. [see SHEBNA]; ϹΕΧΕΝΙΑ[Ϲ] generally).

1. A priestly clan in post-exilic times (Neh. 12 3 σεvια [ℵ*], εχεν. [ℵ c.a]), whose name appears incorrectly as SHEBANIAH, v. 14 (om. Bℵ*A, σεχελιου [ℵ c.a mg. inf.] cp 10 4), with Joseph at its head. The Chronicler transfers him to the times of David, when he holds the tenth priestly course (1 Ch. 24 11, ισχανια [B], σεκενια [A]); he appears again in the times of Hezekiah (2 Ch. 31 15: שכניהו, σεχονιας [BA]). It is noticeable that the three names Shecaniah, Mijamin, and Jeshua are common to the three lists in 1 Ch. 24 7-18 2 Ch. 31 15, and Neh. 12 1-7. His name should probably be read in Neh. 10 1, in place of ZEDEKIAH (q.v. 5).

2. A descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3 21 f. cp Ezra 8 3 [σαναχια B, σαχανια A] 1 Esd. 8 29 [B om.], SECHENIAS); see HATTUSH.

3. b. JAHAZIEL (5), of the sons of ZATTU (Ezra 8 5, om. B, σεχονιας [A], σεχενιου [L] = 1 Esd. 8 32, SECHENIAS).

4. b. Jehiel, of the b'ne Elam, who encouraged Ezra in his marriage reforms (Ezra 10 2); in 1 Esd. 8 92 [89], his name is given as JECHONIAS (ιεχονιας [BA], σεχενιας [L]). The difference in the readings rests on a substitution of י for שׁ, which is conceivable in an older alphabet.

5. The father of SHEMAIAH [q.v.] (Neh. 3 29, εχενια [B]).

6. b. Arah (2), father-in-law of TOBIAH (Neh. 6 18).

SHECHEM (שְׁכֶם; ϹΥΧΕΜ [esp. in B] ϹΙΚΙΜΑ [esp. in AL]; Sichem), now Nāblus, a city of Palestine.

1. Identification and Site. Eleven hours from Jerusalem on the great north road the traveller finds himself in the broad upland plain of Maḫna (1600 feet above the sea), with Mount Gerizim on his left; skirting the base of the mountain he reaches the traditional well of Jacob (see SYCHAR). Here the road divides: the caravan route to Damascus continues northward by the village of 'Askar (Sychar), and so to Beisān (Beth-shan) and Tiberias; but the way to Samaria turns westward into a fertile and well-watered side-valley between Gerizim (2849 ft.) on the S. and Ebal (3077 ft.) on the N. This is the Vale of Shechem or Nāblus; it is in fact an easy pass between the Mediterranean and Jordan basins, and at the watershed (1870 ft.), where the city stands, 1¼ m. from Jacob's Well, is not more than 100 yds. wide. Thus Shechem commands both branches of the great north road, and several routes from the coast also converge here and connect with the ancient road from Shechem eastward to Ḳerāwā (Archelais) and es-Salṭ, the capital of the Belḳā. Cp EPHRAIM, § 4. The name of Shechem (shoulder, back) accords with the position of the town on the watershed, and the native name in Josephus's time. (Mabortha [Naber] or Mabartha [Niese] BJ iv. 8 1; [Pliny, HN 5 61, has Mamortha] means simply 'the pass.') The situation of Shechem at the crossing of so many great roads must have given it importance at a very early date, and it is still a busy town of some 20,000 inhabitants, with soap manufactures and considerable trade. On the other hand, the position is equally favourable under weak governments for brigandage. It was about their practice of brigandage that the Shechemites fell out with ABIMELECH (Judg. 9 25), who, however, with his own mercenaries proved too strong for his adversaries (cp GAAL). Canaanite Shechem was utterly destroyed; its place was taken by a Hebrew city, and the Canaanite sanctuary of El-berīth was transformed into a holy place of the God of Israel. The great stone under the famous sacred tree[1] at the sanctuary (see MOREH, MEONENIM) was said to have been set up by Joshua (Josh. 24 26; in Josh. 24 25 𝔊 BA has Σηλω), and Joseph's grave was shown there.[2] All this indicates that Shechem was once the chief sanctuary of Joseph, and so we understand why Rehoboam went to Shechem to be crowned king of Northern Israel and why [if the traditional text is correct—see § 2] Jeroboam at first made it his royal residence (1 K. 12 25, 𝔊 τὴν σικιμα). Politically Shechem was supplanted by Samaria; but it appears to have been still a sanctuary in the time of Hosea (6 9). It survived the fall of Ephraim (Jer. 41 5) and ultimately became the religious centre of the SAMARITANS (q.v.); cp Ecclus. 50 26, which runs, according to the Hebrew text, 'The inhabitants of Seir and Philistia, and the foolish nation that dwelleth in Shechem.'

The Greek name Neapolis, known to Josephus, indicates the building of a new town, which, according to Eusebius and Jerome, was a little way from the old Shechem, or at least did not include the traditional holy sites. The coins give the form Flavia Neapolis. Neapolis was the birth-place of Justin Martyr, and became the seat of a bishopric. Five Christian churches destroyed by the Samaritans in the time of Anastasius were rebuilt by Justinian (Procop. De Æd. v. 7). Remains of one of these seem to survive in the crusaders' church of the Passion and Resurrection (1167), now the great mosque. Neapolis had much to suffer in the crusades; it was finally lost to the Christians soon after Saladin's great victory at Ḥaṭṭīn.

Shechem (Nāblus) is highly favoured by nature. Nestling between the two sacred mountains, EBAL and GERIZIM, and embowered in luxuriant vegetation, it cannot fail to charm the traveller approaching it from the S. The atmosphere too is more pleasant; all forms of life rejoice in the best natural 'gift of God' in the East—running water. Truly it was not in search of fountains that any woman of Shechem would come to Jacob's well, for 'fountains seem to break out in all directions, and water from some of them runs through the streets of the city' (Robinson, Later Researches, 131). A map of the Shechem valley, with topographical details, etc., will be found in PEFM, vol. ii.

There has been much resultless discussion of that singular narrative in Gen. 34, which usually serves as

2. Discussion of Gen. 34. an authority for the early history of Shechem. The whole story (even if distributed between two writers) is so improbable that to extract a historical element from it is just as difficult as to suppose it to be a pure fiction. The problems raised by critics (see DINAH) are, however,

[1] On the authorship of this prophecy, see ISAIAH [BOOK], § 10.

[2] Che. Proph. Is.(3) 1 138; cp GASm. Isaiah, 1 318.

[3] [A study of the names with which Shecaniah is connected in the lists will confirm this.]

[1] Eus. gives the tree (terebinthus) of Gen. 35 4 (σηκίμοις [E]) a place in Onom.; and from it probably the bishop Terebinthius in Procop. De Æd. 5 7 had his name.

[2] In Josh. 24 32 Kue. and Di. read ויתנה for the difficult ויהין.

not insoluble; they settle themselves as soon as we apply a methodical criticism to the text. The whole story of the circumcision has arisen, as in the case of the Gibeath hā-'ărālōth[1] (Josh. 5 3), from an early corruption of the text. That a city was attacked and plundered by the Simeon and Levi clans, may be admitted; but the name of the city was probably not Shechem but Cusham-Jerahmeel, i.e.—it was one of the chief cities of the Jeraḥmeelite portion of the N. Arabian territory called CUSH or CUSHAN (=CUSHAM)—not improbably Ḥalūṣah (see ZIKLAG), if it is right to identify this city with the 'Laish' of Judg. 18 27, which afterwards (for a time) went by the name of Dan.[2]

We can now explain two obscure passages in Genesis, viz., (a) Gen. 48 22, where Jacob says, 'I have given to thee one portion (שכם אחד; 𝔊 σίκιμα ἐξαίρετον, cp Jn. 4 5) above thy brethren, which I took out of the hand of the Amorite with my sword and with my bow.' This should almost certainly be, 'I give thee Cusham-jeraḥmeel, which thou shalt take from the hand of the Jeraḥmeelite.' Here we have a divine promise of success (to Simeon and Levi) in the war against the Jeraḥmeelites, for which no place could be found in the transformed story now found in Gen. 34.[3] (b) 49 5, where אחים probably means 'hyænas,' and the second line should run, 'They have rent (אכלו, cp Ass. akâlu) Cushan-jeraḥmeel.' Cp SWORD.

It is true, there was another form of the legend of the acquisition of Cusham-jeraḥmeel. It is preserved in Gen. 33 18-20, where it is possible that v. 18 originally ran, 'and Jacob came to Ḥalūṣah (corrupted into לישה, and then into שלם=לשם), a city of Cusham, which is in the land of the Kenizzite, [when he came from Ḥarran,] and encamped before the city, and bought the piece of ground, etc., of Cusham-jeraḥmeel for a mina of Carchemish; and he erected a maṣṣebah there, and called it Bethel of the Jeraḥmeelites.' Cp KESITAH, LUZ, ZIKLAG. For a slightly different form of the emendation see Crit. Bib.

3. Other supposed references.

There are yet two other cases in which Shechem has increased its reputation at the expense of the almost forgotten city of Ḥalūṣah in 'Cusham.' The first is in the history of Rehoboam's accession (see REHOBOAM). The second, in that of Jeroboam, who, as MT suggests (see § 1), made Shechem his royal residence. There is evidence, however (see JEROBOAM, § 1), that his usual residence was at 'Tirzah' (see TIRZAH), and it does not seem likely that he moved for a time to Shechem. In fact, 1 K. 12 25 does not fit in at all well with vv. 26-33.

Probably (see Crit. Bib.) the original reading was as follows,—'And Jeroboam built Cusham in the highlands of Jeraḥmeel, and offered sacrifices, and the children of Israel presented themselves (there). And he made two golden calves, and said, Enough of your going up to Jerusalem: behold thy deity, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Miṣrim. And he set them in Bethel of the Jeraḥmeelites [in Dan of the Jeraḥmeelites]. And this thing became a sin, for the people went to commit adultery (לְנָאֵף) even to Dan.' Cp Am. 8 14, 'Those that swear by the sin of Shimron (בְּאַשְׁמַת שִׁמְרוֹן), and say, As thy god, O Dan, liveth; and, As thy numen (either דודך or פַּחְדְּךָ), O Beersheba, liveth,' etc., and see further Crit. Bib.

It was not with Shechem, therefore, but with Cusham that Jeroboam's name is linked in true history, and

[1] The true name was doubtless Gibeath-jĕraḥmĕēlīm. The second part of this compound name became 'ărēlīm, owing to the effacement of part of the original word. Parallels are the erroneous reading 'uncircumcised ('ărēlīm) Philistines' (for 'Jeraḥmeelites Philistines,' where one of the two words is a gloss on the other), and the strange stories in Ex. 4 24-26 and 1 S. 18 25-27 (see MOSES, § 7, with n. 2).

[2] The theory is that Ḥalūṣah was first attacked by the Danites, who, however, sank into the condition of a protected clan (Gen. 34 31, 'as a harlot'; cp Josh. 2 1*b*, Rahab the harlot), and ultimately became extinct. The disappearance of the Danites is thus expressed in the most probable form of the text of Gen. 35 8, 'And Dinah, Jacob's eldest daughter, died, and was buried below Bethel'; the southern Bethel is meant, another name for which was Dan (this supplies the key to 1 K. 12 29, see ZIKLAG). 'Dinah' is a collateral fem. form to Dan.

[3] 'I took' (לקחתי) is clearly wrong, for how could Jacob say that he had conquered the city in the persons of his sons Simeon and Levi? Holzinger (Gen. 255) acutely remarks that v. 22 'refers to a lost version of the legend, of which E gives a transformation in Gen. 34.'

Cusham may mean Ḥalūṣah (or Dan) and Bethel, Bethel with its sanctuary and citadel being of course adjacent to the city of Ḥalūṣah. The Negeb, therefore, or at any rate the greater part of it, cannot either in Jeroboam's time or in that of Amos have been in the possession of the kingdom of Judah.

Nor can we even venture to assert that Shechem was the place where the great national assembly was held which determined the fate of the people of Israel for all time. It was only afterwards through the Samaritans that it advanced a claim to be the religious centre of the land. We may regret these results; but at least the reader will admit that if the fame of Shechem has here been curtailed, an almost forgotten place in the true Holy Land of the Israelites (see PROPHET, § 6) has been restored to its ancient dignity.

SHECHEM, TOWER OF (מִגְדַּל שְׁכֶם, Migdal-shechem). As the story of Abimelech now stands, Migdal-shechem was an unwalled town in the neighbourhood of Shechem, which owed its name perhaps to a tower (migdal) that stood there, and would appear to have had a temple dedicated to El-berith (Judg. 9 46 f. 49). But the original story, in which Abimelech's city was probably not Shechem but Cusham, may, it seems, very possibly have had, not בַּעֲלֵי מִגְדַּל שְׁכֶם but יְרַחְמְאֵלִים [כּוּשִׁים]—i.e., 'Jeraḥmeelites [gloss, Cushites].' Observe that in the MT of vv. 6 and 20 the 'men of Shechem' and the 'house of Millo' (see MILLO) are co-ordinated.

The original story probably had in lieu of these corrupt phrases 'the men of Cusham' and 'the house of Jeraḥmeel'; the latter phrase is equivalent to 'Jeraḥmeelites' in Judg. 9 46 f. 49. 'The house of El-berith' (=Baal-berith) has perhaps come from 'the house of El-reḥoboth' (i.e., of the divinity of Rehoboth); it was probably very near Cusham or Ḥalūṣah, just as Penuel was close to Succoth (GIDEON, § 2). See SHECHEM.

SHEDEUR (שְׁדֵיאוּר; ϲεδιουρ [BFL], εδιουρ [A]), father of the Reubenite 'prince' Elizur: Nu. 1 5 2 10 7 30 (εδιϲουρ [B*], ϲεδιϲουρ [B^ab], εδιϲουρ [A]), 35 (ϲεδιουρ [A and in 10 18]); all P. See PEDAHZUR.

Apparently compounded of the divine name שדי (Shaddai?) and אור, 'fire' (§ 43; Nöld. ZDMG 15 [1860] 809, n. 1; Nestle, Eigenn. 46); Frd. Delitzsch (Prol. 96) explains 'daybreak,' from Ass. šad uri, but improbably. Rather perhaps miswritten for שׁוּרִיאֵל, 'Šuriel,' a variant to צוּרִיאֵל, 'Ṣuriel' (see ZUR, NAMES WITH).

SHEEP. The large part played by this animal in the life of the people of Palestine is evinced by the very many references to it contained in their literature. The sheep was domesticated later than the ox. Mariette found no trace of sheep amongst the Egyptians during the fifth dynasty, when oxen were common. The avenue of rams at Karnak is attributed to the eighteenth dynasty, about 1700 B.C., by which time they were probably domesticated.[1] The origin of the domestic variety of sheep, usually known as Ovis aries, whether 'from any one of the existing wild species, or from the crossing of several, or from some now extinct species, is quite a matter of conjecture.' The sheep of Palestine at the present day are, according to Tristram, usually pie-bald or skew-bald.[2] They fall into two different breeds, of which by far the commonest and in many places the only one, is the broad-tailed sheep (var. laticaudata). This remarkable animal is distinguished by an enormous deposit of fat in the tail (אַלְיָה, Ex. 29 22 Lev. 3 9 etc.; for 1 S. 9 24 see Dr.), which sometimes accumulates to such an extent that the appendage has to be provided with a small sledge on which it is borne. Such tails have been known to exceed 50 lbs. in weight, and are esteemed a delicacy by the Arabs.[1] In N. Palestine a horned variety similar to the Merino is now found; but it is not certain whether it was there in the time of the Israelites. On the sheep of Arabia see Palgrave, EB(9) 2 242*b*, Doughty, Ar. Des. 1 426.

1. Species.

[1] The question of the introduction of sheep into Egypt has been recently advanced through the researches of Thilenius (Maspero, Rec. de Travaux, 22 199-212), and, more especially, of Dürst and Gaillard (op. cit. 24 44-76)

[2] White as snow, e.g. Ps. 147 16; brown, Gen. 30 33 (cp COLOURS, § 8); flecked and speckled, v. 32 (ib. § 12).

From a consideration of the various names for sheep (cp below, § 2), Hommel (Säugethiere b. d. Sem. Völk. 250 f.) concludes that among the earliest Semites the sheep did not occupy so important a position as the goat, that it does not belong to their oldest domesticated animals, and that it came to them from Central Asia by way of Mesopotamia. In this connection it is interesting to observe that among the Indo-Germanic races, on the other hand, the sheep appears to have been the first animal to be domesticated, and that its position is more important than that held by other cattle (O. Schrader, Indogerm. Altertumsk. s.v. 'Schaf').

The Hebrew words which have to be recorded are:

2. Terms.

1. ṣōn (צֹאן), coll. for small cattle, sheep, and goats: 𝔊 ποίμνιον, cp below no. 16.

2. seh (שֶׂה), Dt. 14 4 etc., any single member of the above. The Egyptian derivative appears to be used of the fat-tailed sheep, ZDMG 41 629.

3. áyil (אַיִל), 'ram,' as opposed to ayyāl HART (q.v.); on the two words see esp. OLZ, 1900, col. 208 f.

4. rāhēl (רחל), Gen. 31 38 32 15 Is. 53 7, Cant. 6 6†, 'ewe,' the Ar. rakhil, rikhl (mod. rôkhal, Doughty, Ar. Des. 1 429) is used of the lamb.

5. kar (כַּר), Dt. 32 14, Is. 16 1 etc. (𝔊 ἀρνός, ἔριφος), 'young lamb,' perhaps from idea of skipping or dancing. Also 'battering-ram,' see SIEGE?

6. kéśeb (כֶּשֶׂב, כִּשְׂבָּה, also כֶּבֶשׂ, כִּבְשָׂה, כַּבּ), a lamb of one or two years, esp. used with reference to sacrifices. On the Heb. words see Hommel, op. cit. 235 n. 2 433.

7. ṭāleh (טָלֶה), Is. 40 11 65 25 (𝔊 ἀρνός), an older lamb (mod. tully, a yearling, see Doughty, 1 429 2 269); see TALITHA.

For the sake of completeness we should add—

8. נקד, whence nōḳēd, a sheep-raiser or dealer, 2 K. 3 4 Am. 1 1 (also 7 14 with We., Now., Dr.). Cp Ar. naḳad, 'a kind of small sheep with very abundant wool' (BDB), and see MESHA, col. 3042, n. 7.

9. אמר, 'lamb,' known in B. Aram. (Ezra 7 17), Ar., Ass., and Phœn. (CIS 1 165, e.g.—the Marseilles sacrificial tariff)—not in Heb. Phœn. also is—

10. צרב (CIS ib.), the Canaanite equivalent of the common Aram. 'erbā 'sheep, lamb.'

11. 'lambs of the flock,' Ecclus. 47 3 בני בשן, lit. 'sons of Bashan' (ἄρνασι προβάτων [BℵA]); cp Dt. 32 14, and see BASHAN, § 2 end.

12. ḳĕśīṭāh, Gen. 33 19 (AVmg. 'lamb'); see KESITAH.

The Greek words are familiar:

13. ἀμνός, Jn. 1 29, etc.; used in 𝔊 esp. for nos. 4, 6.
14. ἀρήν*, Lk. 10 3, etc.
15. ἀρνίον, Rev. 5 6 etc.; used in 𝔊 for no. 6.
16. πρόβατον, Mt. 9 36, etc.; in 𝔊 esp. for nos. 1 and 2.

3. Details.

The wealth of a pastoral and nomadic people consists largely of their flocks, and the very large number of sheep which the ancient Hebrews possessed is shown by the numbers, perhaps exaggerated, which the Hagrites (1 Ch. 5 21) and Midianites (Nu. 31 32) are reported to have lost in their contests with Israel, and by the prodigious numbers which were sacrificed at the dedication of the Temple and on other occasions (1 K. 8 63, etc.). See SACRIFICE, §§ 33, etc. Except on such occasions the sheep were seldom slaughtered to provide food, though a lamb or kid was the usual dish offered for the entertainment of a stranger (cp FOOD, §§ 8, 14 f., CATTLE, § 8). The best pastures were in S. Palestine (the Negeb, Carmel [1 S. 25], Gerar [Gen. 10 14], Timnath [ib. 38 13], and the plain to the E. of Jordan; see CATTLE, § 3, and cp GOLAN, col. 1748).[2] The sheep were valued chiefly for the wool, the shearing of which was the occasion of an annual festival (see WOOL).[3] The ewe's milk was also consumed (see MILK). The horns of the Syrian ram are as a rule large and curved backward; they were used as musical instruments (Josh. 6 4) and as receptacles for oil, etc. (1 S. 16 1); cp HORN. The skins were also used as coverings for tents, etc. (see TENT) and probably for clothing (Heb. 11 37).[1] The sheep were constantly moved about in search for new pasture, and it is customary in the East for the shepherd to lead his flock (Jn. 10 3 f.) and to know, and often name, every member of it.[2] At night the sheep are gathered into natural or roughly-made folds (see CATTLE, § 5 f., GOAT, § 3). Sheep-dogs are used less for herding than as a protection against wild animals (DOG, § 1).

The name may mean either 'Yahwè is the dawn' (§§ 35, 44) or 'the Shaḥrite.' Parallel is ZERAHIAH [q.v.]. שחר occurs as a place-name in Josh. 13 3, etc. (see SHIHOR), and, with א prefixed, as a clan-name in 1 Ch. 2 24 4 5. Of the latter form (Ashḥur) AHISHAHAR may be a late and artificial expansion, just as Sheḥariah is a late and artificial expansion of Shaḥri. Cp also HODESH (= Shahar, Ashḥur) in 1 Ch. 8 9, and the non-biblical Hebrew name Sheḥarḥor (see ZEPHANIAH, 2-4). All these names are southern.

SHEKEL[3] (שֶׁקֶל, cp šāḳal, 'to weigh'; CIKΛOC, CIΓΛOC) signifies either a weight or a coin. As the invention of coinage dates from the seventh century B.C., and no coins were issued in districts from which they would be likely to penetrate to Palestine before the time of Darius Hystaspis (522-485 B.C.), all biblical references to shekels or any kind of money before the return from the exile must be understood of uncoined metal, for which the scales were used (cp Gen. 23 16). The metal was usually cast in ingots (cp the meaning of kikkār, a round, cake-like disc) or bars, of a fixed weight (cp 1 S. 9 8), or may have taken the form of ornaments of which the weight was known (e.g., Rebekah's ornaments, Gen. 24 22). Any such piece of metal, if stamped with the recognised mark of the government, guaranteeing its quality and weight, so that the scales could be dispensed with, would rightly be called a coin; but the custom of stamping the smaller pieces of precious metal in this way and for purposes of exchange was not, so far as we know, systematised before the date mentioned.

2. Palestinian weight-systems.

Of the many weight-systems employed in antiquity, only three can seriously claim to have been in use in Palestine in early times (see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 4). These are known as the gold-shekel standard (Ridgeway's ox-standard), the Babylonian, and the Phœnician respectively, the Phœnician being a [1] Cp Doughty, Ar. Des. 1 502, Herod. 3 113, with Rawlinson's notes, and above, col. 1514, n. 2. According to Thilenius (op. cit. 203), it was introduced into Upper Egypt from Asia by the twelfth dynasty.

[2] Other references are to Shechem (Gen. 34 28), the 'sons of the East' (ib. 29 2 ff.), Uz (Job 1 3, 42 12), and Egypt (Gen. 12 16 Ex. 9 3).

[3] Sheep-shearing, it may be noted, does not go back to primitive times; the earlier custom is to pluck the wool with the hands (O. Schrader, s.v. 'Schaf,' Hehn, Kulturpflanzen und Hausthiere,(6) 515).

[1] Gr. μηλωτή, which in OT renders אַדֶּרֶת, see DRESS, § 8.

[2] On the shepherd's life cp also Doughty, 1 428; 'there is none will take up the herdsman's life, but it be of bare necessity.' The statement in Gen. 46 34 is not directly supported by the evidence of the monuments, 'but the keepers of oxen and swine were considered in Egypt to follow a degrading occupation. They are depicted as dirty, unshaven, poorly clad, and even as dwarfs and deformed' (Driver, Authority and Archæology, 50 f.).

derivative of the Babylonian. The chief denominations were the talent (τάλαντον, כִּכָּר, κίγχαρ, Jos. Ant. iii. 6 7), the mina (μνᾶ, מָנֶה, MANEH [q.v.], cp Ezek. 45 12; translated 'pound' in 1 K. 10 17 Ezra 2 69 Neh. 7 71 f.; the word 'pound' is also used for λίτρα, the Roman libra of 5053.3 grs. troy, in Jn. 12 3 19 39), and the shekel.[1] For ordinary purposes the talent was divided into 60 minas, and the mina into 60 shekels; but for weighing gold a mina of only 50 shekels and a talent of 3000 instead of 3600 shekels were used. The shekel was the same in both. Further, payments to the royal treasury in Babylonia were calculated on a slightly higher scale (the 'royal norm') than ordinary payments (for which the 'common norm' was used). (This difference is probably alluded to in 2 S. 14 26: Absalom's hair weighed 'two hundred shekels after the king's weight.' Schrader [KAT(2) 142] supposes that the trade-shekel weighed more than the money-shekel, and that the heavier is here referred to; but there seems to be no reason for identifying the trade-norm with the royal-norm.) Next, since it was desirable to be able to exchange a round number of shekels (minas, talents) of silver against a shekel (mina, talent) of gold, and since the ratio of value between gold and silver was inconveniently 13⅓ : 1, a new shekel (mina, talent) had to be established for the weighing of the less precious metal. Finally, there were two systems, the heavy and the light, in the former of which the denominations weighed twice as much as in the latter.

The evidence of extant Babylonian weights, checked by the weights of coins struck in later times on derived standards, enables us to obtain the following series of weights used for the precious metals:—

	ROYAL NORM.		COMMON NORM.
	Heavy.	Light.	Heavy.	Light.
	grs. troy.	grs. troy.	grs. troy.	grs. troy.
Talent . .	777,780 a	388,890 b	757,380 c	378,690 d
Mina . . .	12,963 e	6,481.5 f	12,623 g	6,311.5 h
Shekel . .	259.3 i	129.63 k	252.5 l	126.23 m
Value of the gold shekel in silver	3,457.3	1,728.4	3,366.6	1,684.3
I.e. ten pieces of silver of	345.73 n	172.8 o	336.6 p	168.4 q
Or fifteen pieces of silver of	230.5 r	115.2 s	224.4 t	112.2 u

By adopting silver units of the weights given in the last two rows, a round number of units of silver (10 or 15) could always be exchanged against a single unit of gold, provided the two belonged to the same norm and system. The standard according to which ten pieces of silver corresponded to one of gold is known as the Babylonian or Persic, because silver coins which agree with this standard were struck by the Persian kings (who adopted it from its Babylonian source) and by their immediate subordinates; the standard reached the Greeks overland through districts, such as Lydia, which were under Persian influence. On the other hand, the standard equating fifteen pieces of silver to one of gold was adopted by the great Phœnician trading cities, and reached the Greeks directly by sea; hence it is known as the Phœnician standard.

What evidence, then, have we for the use of either or both of these systems in Palestine? A certain number of extant weights (see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 4) seem to suggest that a low form of the Babylonian shekel was in use in Palestine. On the other hand, the literary and numismatic evidence points to the Phœnician standard having been used, at least in post-exilic times, side by side with the other system.

3. Evidence for Palestine.

1 [See also, KESITAH.]

In the first place, we know (by calculation) from Ex. 38 25 f. [P] that the Hebrew talent contained 3000 shekels. Again, Josephus (Ant. xiv. 7 1) equates the mina used for weighing gold to 2½ Roman pounds—i.e., 12,633.3 grs. troy—which is very near to the heavy gold mina of the common norm (g). The same writer (op. cit. iii. 6 7) speaks of a sum of '100 minas, which the Hebrews call κίγχαρ, which being translated into Greek means τάλαντον.' If we take the mina here mentioned to be the gold mina (g) of 12,623 grs. (heavy) or 6,311.5 grs. light (h), we obtain a talent of 1,262,300 grs. (heavy) or 631,150 grs. (light). The $\frac{1}{3000}$ part, or shekel, of this talent would be 420.73 grs. (heavy) or 210.36 grs. (light). These weights are somewhat lighter than the normal weights of the heavy double shekel and shekel (t) of the Phœnician standard (common norm); but it is noticeable that the earliest coins (double staters and staters) of Sidon and Tyre (issued in the 5th cent. B.C.) seldom rise to the normal weight of 448.8 grs. and 224.4 grs., the effective weight being usually much nearer the amounts just arrived at, and rarely rising above 426 grs. (213 grs.). Again, various metrological authorities of ancient though late date (see Hultsch, Metrolog. Script. Rel., Index, under τάλαντον, 17) equate the Hebrew talent to 125 Roman lbs.—i.e., 631,665.3 grs. The shekel of this talent would be 210.55 grs. Finally, Josephus (Ant. iii. 8 2) equates the Hebrew coin called σίκλος—i.e., the silver shekel—to four 'Attic drachms.' 'Attic drachm' in his day was equivalent to the Roman denarius, which was fixed by Nero at $\frac{1}{96}$ lb.—i.e., 52.62 grs.; the Hebrew σίκλος was therefore 210.48 grs. in weight.

We thus see that the Hebrew shekel weighed from 210 to 210.55 grs., or, on the heavy system, 420 to 421 grs. It can be nothing else than the shekel of 224.4 grs. (t), or its double, in a slightly degraded form. It is clear, therefore, that the shekel of the Phœnician standard was in use in Palestine at a comparatively early period. The weight of the heavy gold shekel of the common norm (l) being taken at 252.5 grs. troy, its value (at the present rate of £3 : 17 : 10½ per oz. of 480 grs. paid by the Mint for gold) would be very nearly £2 : 1 : 0, and the light shekel would be worth about £1 : 0 : 6. The Hebrew-Phœnician silver shekel and the Babylonic-Persic silver shekel, being reckoned as $\frac{1}{15}$ and $\frac{1}{10}$ of the gold shekel respectively, work out as follows:

	Heavy.	Light.
Phœnician . . .	£0 : 2 : 9	£0 : 1 : 4½
Babylonian . . .	£0 : 4 : 1	£0 : 2 : 0½

The values of the talent and mina of gold and silver in all these systems are:

	HEAVY.		LIGHT.
	Talent.	Mina.	Talent.	Mina.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
Gold . . .	6150 0 0	102 10 0	3075 0 0	51 5 0
Phœnician silver .	410 0 0	6 16 8	205 0 0	3 8 4
Babylonian silver .	615 0 0	10 5 0	307 10 0	5 2 6

It is curious that, although the mina was known as a weight, it does not occur in any pre-exilic writings, and large sums are expressed in talents and shekels (Kennedy, 420). A parallel is afforded by the Attic method of reckoning in talents and drachms.

Early in the (conventional) post-exilic period the Persian coinage of gold and silver was introduced by Darius

4. Early post-exilic period.

Hystaspis. His gold shekel, struck on the royal norm (k), was known to the Greeks as daric (δαρεικός). The derivation of this word from the king's name has been disputed, on the ground that it could not be formed from the Persian Dārayavaush; but there is no reason why it should not be formed in Greek fashion from Δαρεῖος. Of other derivations, the only plausible one is from the Assyrian dariku, a word found in contract-tablets of the time of Nabonidus and Nebuchadrezzar. But the evidence that this word is the name of a weight or measure is not satisfactory; Tallquist (Die Spr. der Contr. Nabû-nâ'ids, 66) with more probability regards it as an agricultural product. The word darkemōn (see DRAM) has until recently been connected by many writers with the word daric; but there can be little doubt that the darkemōn is a weight, and possibly the same word is found in the Greek δραχμή (see DRAM, and with the spelling דרכנים of the Piræeus inscription cp the Cretan dialectical form δαρκνά).

The Greek derivation of δραχμή from δράσσομαι is probably a popular etymology. What, however, are these 'drams' of gold mentioned in Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah? Remembering that in the Greek system the drachma was as a rule the $\frac{1}{6000}$ part of the talent, we should suppose that half-shekels were meant by darkemōnim. Now the weight of the daric (k) is as a matter of fact the half-shekel of the heavy system (i), and since the Hebrews, in weighing both gold and silver, used the heavy system (see the quotations from Josephus discussed above, § 3), they would naturally regard the gold daric as a half-shekel of the heavy system. It follows that although the words darkemōn and daric have in all probability no etymological connection, the actual pieces of gold meant by darkemōnīm were as a matter of fact darics, or pieces of the same weight as the daric.

The silver coin of Darius was known to the Greeks as the σίγλος (σίκλος) Μηδικός, and weighed 86.4 grs., being really a half-shekel of the light Babylonian system (royal norm). The gold daric was worth twenty of these silver coins. The value of the daric in modern money works out at about one guinea, and that of the siglos, accordingly, at a little over one shilling.

The Persian governors who preceded Nehemiah in his office exacted from the people 40 shekels of silver (Neh. 5 15). It is hardly possible to decide whether these were σίγλοι Μηδικοί (which as we have seen were really half-shekels) or whole shekels of 172.8 grs.; but the probability is in favour of the former, as being the official coins of the Persian Empire at the time.

FIG. a.

Both daric (Fig. a) and siglos (Fig. b) are alike in types. On the obverse is a figure of the Great King, wearing the Persian head-dress (kidaris) and robe (kandys), and holding in his right hand a spear, in the left a bow; the half-kneeling posture is meant, according to the convention of early art, to represent running. The reverse bears only the impression made by the irregular punch used in striking the coin.

5. Phœnician standard.

The phrase 'shekel of the sanctuary,' or rather sacred shekel' (σίκλος ὁ ἅγιος, σταθμὸς ὁ ἅγιος) is used in P in connection with gold, silver, copper (?), and spices. (For this subject, besides Kennedy 422, see Zuckermann, Talmud. Gewichte, 4 f. 15.) In spite of the fact that the sacred shekel was used for gold, as well as silver, there are serious difficulties in the way of accepting Ridgeway's theory (Origin of Metallic Currency, 273*f.*) that it was the shekel of 130-135 grs. We know from the Mishna that sums of silver money mentioned in the Pentateuch are to be regarded as reckoned in 'Tyrian money'—i.e., in money of the Phœnician standard. We know further that the temple tax was half a shekel, and the tax for two persons could be paid by a tetradrachm or stater (q.v.) of the Phœnician standard (Mt. 17 24 f., where the collectors of the tax are called οἱ τὰ δίδραχμα λαμβάνοντες). It follows that the sacred shekel was a shekel of the heavy Phœnician standard (common norm) of 224.4 grs. (t). This conclusion is confirmed by the statement (Ex. 30 13, etc.) that the shekel was twenty gerahs, which 𝔊 translates '20 obols.' The obol meant by 𝔊 was presumably the Attic obol of the time ($\frac{1}{6}$ of the drachm of 67.28 grs.—i.e., 11.21 grs.); and twenty of these make a weight of 224.2 grs. Any shekel of this weight, whether struck by a foreign king, or struck by a city like Tyre, could therefore be used for the payment of the tax for two persons; or the corresponding half-shekel (Phœnician didrachm of 112.2 grs.) for a single person. The half-shekel here illustrated (Fig. c) was struck at Tyre in the year 102 B.C. On the obverse is the head of Melkarth, the Tyrian Heracles, crowned with laurel; on the reverse an eagle standing with one foot on the prow of a galley, and a palm-branch over its shoulder; in the field are a club (the symbol of Melkarth), the numerals ΔΚ (the year 24 of the local era), and the monogram of the official of the mint responsible for the coin; around is the inscription ΤΥΡΟΥ ΙΕΡΑΣ ΚΑΙ ΑΣΥΛΟΥ—i.e., '(coin) of Tyre, the sacred (city) and inviolable.' The weight of this specimen (106.9 grs.) is a little under the normal (u). The name 'sacred' applied to the shekel of this standard is due presumably to its being used for the temple tax, for which shekels of any other standard were not accepted. Hence the presence of money-changers in the outer court of the temple. The third part of the shekel of Neh. 10 32 is probably the third of the Phœnician shekel; the third is indeed a more usual denomination, both in the Phœnician and in the Babylonian standards, than the half.

6. Silver coins.

The Jews were, as a rule, content or obliged to use silver coins of foreign origin, and the two series of silver coins issued by them belong to periods of revolt against their rulers. A famous series of shekels and half-shekels issued during a period of five years has been most usually ascribed to the time of Simon the Hasmonæan; the tendency of recent criticism, however, is to give them to the time of the first revolt against Rome (66-70 A.D.).

FIG. d.

The best summary of recent arguments about this question, which does not properly concern us here, is given by Kennedy, 429; still more recently, however, Th. Reinach has stated his inclination to revert to the older view (Rev. des études grecques, 13 213). A specimen of the shekel of the fourth year is given in fig. d. On the obverse is a chalice, above which is the date שד (for שנת ד, 'year 4'); around is the inscription שקל ישראל ('Shekel of Israel'). On the reverse is a flowering lily and the inscription ירושלים הקדושה ('Jerusalem the Holy'). The weight of this specimen is 220 grs.

The second series of silver coins of the Jews belongs to the second revolt; they are shekels and quarter-shekels issued by Simon Barcochba and 'Eleazar the High Priest' from 132-135 A.D. These coins are really Roman denarii, or tetradrachms or drachms of the mints of Cæsarea (in Cappadocia) and Antioch (in Syria), which have been used as blanks on which to impress Jewish types (Kennedy, 430 f.).

Both these series are, as we have said, exceptional, and the ordinary coinage of the Jews, from the time of John Hyrcanus, if not from that of Simon the Hasmonæan, onwards, consists merely of bronze.

SHELAH. 1. שֵׁלָה, a name closely resembling SHILOH (σηλωμ [BADEF], σιλ. [L]), the youngest of Judah's sons by the daughter of the Canaanite Shua (cp Stade GVI 1 158, and see JUDAH i., § 2; Gen. 38 5 11 14 26 [J], 46 12 [P]; Nu. 26 20 σηλων [BAL, but -ωμ L. v. 19], 1 Ch. 2 3 σηλων [BL]). The clan is associated with Chezib in the Shephelah of Judah (cp Cozeba below, and see ACHZIB [i.]), and, apart from Gen. 38, occurs only in post-exilic writings. The further divisions of this clan are given in 1 Ch. 4 21-23 (σηλων [L]). The passage is extremely obscure and appears to represent the attempt of a scribe to get some meaning out of an already corrupt genealogy.

Lecah in v. 21*a* may be a corruption for Lachish, but the latter half of the verse is unintelligible. A reference to Bethlehem in v. 22*a* is not improbable, see JASHUBI-LEHEM. The reading, 'men of Cozeba . . . had dominion in Moab,' is doubtful; that of 𝔊BA, οἳ κατῴκησαν . . . ('who dwelt . . .'), is much more reasonable. Netaim (נטעים) and Gederah, v. 23, seem to have arisen from Etam (עֵיטָם) and Gedor; and the recurrence of both names in v. 3 f.—a list which in its present condition is fragmentary—makes it probable that in v. 3*a* we should read 'Shelah, the father of Etam' (correcting the difficult 'אלה אבי ע').[1] See ETAM, 2. A pre-exilic reference may safely be rejected; the 'ancient' matters spoken of need not, from the Chronicler's point of view, be pre-exilic. The patronymic is Shelanite (הַשֵּׁלָנִי, Nu. 26 20, ὁ σηλων[ε]ι [BAFL]), which in a list of Judahite inhabitants of Jerusalem is twice written Shilonite (Neh. 11 5, δηλωνε [B], δ-ει [ℵ], ηλ-ι [A], σ-ει [L]; AV SHILONI, 1 Ch. 9 5; הַשִּׁי[ל]לֹנִי; τῶν σηλων[ε]ι, see EZRA ii., § 5 [6], § 15 [1]a). The former pointing with ā seems better (cp Be. Ke.). Maaseiah or Asaiah, to whom the patronymic is here applied, appears as the representative of Shelah b. Judah, just as Athaiah (Neh. 11 4) represents the Perezite division. [Cp Crit. Bib.] S. A. C.

2. (שֶׁלַח). SALAH AV in Gen. and SALA AV Lk. 3 35, the son of Arpachshad and father of Eber in the old genealogy of the Hebrews (Gen. 10 24 [R?], 11 13 f. [P], 1 Ch. 1 18 [B om.] 24, σαλα, σαλας [L in Gen. 10]). The key to 'Shelah' is of course Arpachshad. If the latter name contains Chaldæa, Knobel may be excused for seeking 'Shelah' in NE. Mesopotamia. If, however, Arpachshad comes from 'Arāb-Ḳadesh or -Cush [see UR OF THE CHALDEES], we must suppose 'Shelah' to represent some clan in the Negeb. In accordance with JUDAH, § 2, we may assume the existence of a Jeraḥmeelite clan called Shelaḥ (see SHELAH, 1), of Kenizzite (not Canaanite) affinities, and related to Sha'ul, of which Shelaḥ is a modification. The name Methusèlah is similarly related to Methushael; both these names are probably modifications of Mishael = Ishmael. It now becomes not impossible that Eber (עֵבֶר) in Gen. 10 24 may be miswritten for 'Arāb (עֲרָב).

To derive Shelah from 'to send,' and suppose it to refer to the departure of a portion of the tribe of Arpachshad previous to their 'passing over' (see EBER) the Tigris, is absurd. 𝔊 (in Gen.), on which Lk. 3 35 is based, inserts Cainan before Shelah to make Abram the tenth after Shem (see Di. Gen. 208). T. K. C.

SHELESH (שֵׁלֶשׁ; ζεμη [B], σελλης [A], σελεμ [L]), a name in a genealogy of ASHER (q.v., § 4 ii.), 1 Ch. 7 35†.

SHELOMI (שְׁלֹמִי), father of Ahihud, a 'prince' of Asher (Nu. 34 27; σελεμ(ε)ι [BAFL]). See SHELUMIEL, and cp ASHER, § 1.

SHELOMITH (שְׁלֹמִית, interchangeable with שלמות [see below 5]; cp the fluctuations between Meshillemith and Meshillemoth. The vocalisation is doubtful [cp SOLOMON, § 1], and the name being evidently southern, a connection with either Ishmael or Salmah may be assumed [Che.]).

1. bath DIBRI [q.v.], who had married an Egyptian (or, perhaps, rather Miṣrite, i.e., N. Arabian woman), and whose son was stoned for blasphemy (Lev. 24 11: σαλωμειθ [BAF], σαλαμειθ [Bab], σαλμιθ [L]).

2. Daughter of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3 19; σαλωμεθει [B], -θι [A], -μιθ [L]).

3. A son of Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11 20; εμμωθ [B], σαλημωθ [A], σαλωμιθ [L]).

4. b. Josiphiah one of the b'ne BANI [q.v., 2]: read in Ezra 8 10 'And of the sons of Bani; Shelomith, son of Josiphiah' (υἱῶν σαλειμουθ [B], υἱ. βαανι σελειμμουθ [A], τῶν υἱ. σαλιμωθ [L]), cp 1 Esd. 8 36, which gives ASSALIMOTH, RV SALIMOTH (ασσαλιμωθ [A, the ας belongs to the preceding βανι], [υἱῶν] σαλιμωθ [L], [βανιας] σαλειμωθ [B]).

Among the Levites we find (5) a Shelomith b. Shimei, a Gershonite Levite (1 Ch. 23 9, Kt. שְׁלֹמוֹת, RV Shelomoth, αλωθειμ [B], σαλωμειθ [A], -μιθ [L]); (6) a chief of the b'ne Izhar, a Kohathite Levite (1 Ch. 23 18, σαλωμωθ [B], -ιθ [L], σαλουμωθ [A]), whose son was JAHATH (q.v.) (1 Ch. 24 22, שְׁלֹמוֹת, EV SHELOMOTH, σαλωμωθ [BA], -ιθ [L]); and (7) a Levite descended from Eliezer b. Moses (1 Ch. 26 25 ff., RV SHELOMOTH, σαλωμωθ [BA], -ιθ and σαλαμιθ [L] v. 25, Kt. שלמות, and MT in v. 26).

SHELUMIEL (שְׁלֻמִיאֵל; σαλαμιηλ [BAFL]), b. ZURISHADDAI, a 'prince' of SIMEON (§ 9 ii. n.; Nu. 1 6 2 12 7 36 (σαμαλιηλ [F]) 41 10 19 † [all P]. In Judith 81 his name appears as SAMAEL, RV SALAMIEL (σαλαμιηλ [BA], σαμαμιηλ [א]).

Apparently the name means 'El is my health' (§§ 37, 50); really, however, it may come from שלמי; שלמא Shalamu is the name of a N. Arabian tribe allied to the Nabatæans (see SALMAH, SHALMAI). T. K. C.

SHEM (שֵׁם; CHM; sem), the eldest of the three sons of Noah, and therefore always mentioned first (Gen. 5 32 6 10 7 13 9 18 10 1 1 Ch. 1 4); the rendering of Gen. 10 21 in AV and RVmg. is certainly wrong (cp JAPHETH).

1. Name. If an appellative, Shem will mean 'name'—i.e., renown. In this case, if in Gen. 9 it is really equivalent to Israel, it may conceivably denote the ruling or noble class (cp Gen. 6 4 Nu. 16 2 1 Ch. 5 24) in antithesis to the aborigines, who are called in Job 30 8, 'sons of the impious, yea, sons of the nameless, beaten out of the land' (so We. CH(3) 13, Bu. Urgesch. 328 f.). There is a strong presumption, however, that the name of this important patriarch has a longer history and a more recondite meaning. In short, the legends in the early part of Genesis being, according to the most plausible view, Jerahmeelite (see PARADISE, §§ 6, 9), and 'Ishmael' being used as a synonym for Jerahmeel, it is very probable that 'Shem' is a modified fragment of the ethnic name Ishmael.

To derive (with Goldziher) from שמה 'to be high,' and explain 'the high one' or even the 'Heaven-god,' has no indication in its favour. More probably, Shem is a shortened form of a name like SHEMUEL (q.v.), or rather, if we suppose that חם (Ham) is a fragment of ירחמאל (Jerahmeel), שם (Shem) has arisen out of a fragment of ישמעאל (Ishmael).

That the redactor, who here as elsewhere emended קנז (Kenaz) into כנען (Canaan) supposed שם to mean 'Israel' is possible enough. But critically, such a view is highly improbable. See Gunkel (Gen.(2) 74 f. [1902]), whose attempt, however, to bring what is said on Canaan in Noah's oracles into connection with the historical situation in the second millennium B.C. seems on the whole premature, in the absence of a thorough textual criticism.

2. Traditions. The special blessing by which Shem was rewarded is now often read thus:[1] 'Bless, O Yahwè, the tents of Shem (בָּרֵךְ י׳ אָהֳלֵי שֵׁם); let Canaan be his servant' (Gen. 9 26 J_1).

It is more plausible, however, to think that v. 26 a should run, ברוך י׳ ישמעאל. The Jerahmeelites were, in fact, (see MOSES, § 14) the early tutors of the Israelites in religion. Here and in v. 27 the underlying original text apparently spoke of Noah's eldest son as 'Ishmael.' The subjugation of Kenaz (not 'Canaan,' as the traditional text) refers to matters beyond our ken (cp KENAZ). Another writer thinks to explain 'Shem' to his readers by identifying 'Shem' with 'Eber' (Gen. 10 21). Here it is necessary to transpose b and r, and read 'Arāb: in fact, Ishmael (Shem) and 'Arāb are nearly synonymous. On all these subjects, as well as on the use of 'Shem' in P (Gen. 10 22 11 10, cp 1 Ch. 1 17 24) see Crit. Bib. The reference in Ecclus. 49 19 is no doubt to Shem's important genealogical position. A late Jewish tradition (adopted by Selden and Lightfoot) identified Shem with MELCHIZEDEK (q.v.). Cp SETHITES. T. K. C.

SHEM, NAMES WITH. Two Hebrew names have been brought under this head—Šemu'el (Samuel) and Šemida' (Shemida). The former of these is compared by Winckler (GI 1 130, n. 3) with Šumu-abi and Šumu-la-ilu, the names of two Babylonian kings of the third millennium B.C., whom this scholar considers to belong to a dynasty of western Semitic or rather Canaanitish conquerors. According to Hommel, Šumu-abi means 'Šumu is my father,' and šumu is a contraction of šumhu (šumuhu)—i.e., 'his name,' a periphrasis for 'God' (AHT 85 f. 88 f.). He considers that Šemu'el and Šemida' may safely be explained as containing this element šumhu. It seems very improbable, however, that the periphrasis 'name' for 'God' should have been of such remote antiquity among the Israelites, when we recall that (see NAME, § 7) it is specially characteristic of the latest biblical Hebrew writing, and we may venture to follow Jastrow (JBL 19 105), who is of opinion that šumu in the names quoted by Winckler and Hommel is an entirely different word from the Hebrew šem.

Perhaps a sober criticism of these ancient names, the Babylonian as well as the Hebrew, may lead to the conclusion that etymologies which have the most superficial plausibility are generally fallacious. See, further, SHEMUEL, SHEMIDA. T. K. C.

[1] So Schorr, Grätz, and recently Ball, Holzinger, Gunkel.

SHEMA (שְׁמַע; CAM[A]A [BAL]), one of the cities in the extreme S. of Judah towards Edom (Josh. 15 26: CAΛMAA [B]). Cp the clan-name SHEMA, 1. It is not included in the list of Simeonite towns either in Josh. 19 1-6 or in MT of 1 Ch. 4 28-31 (but see v. 28 𝔊), but in the former of these passages (Josh. 19 2) we find SHEBA, plainly a mere variant (σαμαα [B]; but σαβ[ε]ε [AL]), and in 𝔊 1 Ch. 4 28 we find σαμα [BL], -αα [A]. The connection of Shema with Simeon seems obvious. The Sheba in Josh. 19 2 was probably introduced as a supplement from 15 26 after the calculation 'thirteen cities' (v. 6) had been made; RV's 'or Sheba' is too bold. See further JESHUA, SIMEON, § 10.

SHEMA (שֶׁמַע, § 50). 1. A Calebite clan which, like Ḳoraḥ, Tappuaḥ, and Reḳem, traced itself to Ḥebron, and is represented as the 'father' of Raḥam, the 'father' of Jorḳeam, 1 Ch. 2 43 f. (σεμαα [BA, the latter omits in v. 43], σαμα [L]). Note the accumulation of 'Jeraḥmeelite' names, and the place-name SHEMA.

2. A clan of REUBEN (§ 13); 1 Ch. 5 8 (σαμα [BA], σεμεει [L]).

3. b. Hushim in a genealogy of BENJAMIN [q.v., § 9 ii. β]; 1 Ch. 8 13 (σαμα [BA], σαμαα [L]), obviously the same as Shimei in v. 21. See JQR xi. 103 1. See SHIMEI (8).

4. In list of Ezra's supporters (see EZRA ii., § 13 [f.]); Neh. 8 4 (σαμαιας [BאAL]).

SHEMAAH (הַשְּׁמָעָה, whence AVmg. HASMAAH), a Gibeathite, father of AHIEZER (1 Ch. 12 3; AMA [Bא], CAMAA [A], ACMA [L]), see DAVID, § 11 c. The Pesh. presupposes here the name of a separate hero, שמעיה הגבעתי 'Shemaiah the Gibeathite.'

SHEMAIAH (שְׁמַעְיָה, also שְׁמַעְיָהוּ, see below, either a religious name='Yahwè hears,' or a late (?) expansion of the old clan-name שִׁמְעִי, SHIMEI [Che.]; note the frequency of the name among priests, Levites, and prophets, whose historical connection with the southern border-land is certain; CAMAIA[C]). It is impossible always to differentiate accurately or (as the case may be) to identify the various bearers of this name.

1. A prophet temp. Rehoboam, who deprecated war with Israel (1 K. 12 22=2 Ch. 11 2 [ib. שמעיהו]), and prophesied at the invasion of Judah by Shishak (2 Ch. 12 5 7, σαμμαιας [B]). He is mentioned as the writer of the history of Rehoboam (ib. v. 15), cp also in 𝔊B 1 K. 12 (24 o, ed. Sw.).

2. A false prophet who for endeavouring to hinder his work was sternly rebuked by Jeremiah (Jer. 29 [𝔊 36] 24-32 [σαμεας א vv. 24, 31 f.]; cp JEREMIAH [BOOK], § 17; in v. 24 שמעיהו).

He is styled the Nehelamite (הַנֶּחֱלָמִי, αιλαμειτην [B], ελαμιτην [אAQ]), which reminds us of τον ενλαμει applied to SHEMAIAH (1) in 𝔊's [B, in L ελαμιτην] addition to 1 K. 12 (v. 24 o). Probably both αιλαμειτην and ενλαμει point to חילמי = ירחמאלי 'Jeraḥmeelite' [Che.] (cp ירחמאל=חילם, 2 S. 10 16 [Che.]; see also SIBRAIM). The prophet Ahijah the Shilonite in 1 K. 11 29, it has elsewhere (see SHILOH, 2) been suggested by Cheyne, is most probably a man from the Negeb. So, to, in the intention of the writer, is this Shemaiah.

3. Father of Urijah of Kirjath-jearim, a prophet (Jer. 26 [𝔊 33] 20, שמעיהו, μασαιου [א]).

4. Father of Delaiah, a prince temp. Jehoiakim (Jer. 36 [𝔊 43] 12, σελεμιου [BAQ], σεδεκιου [א]).

5. b. Shechaniah, a descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3 22 σαμαα [B* once], σεμεα [L]). This is also the name of one of those who repaired the temple (Neh. 3 29, σεμεια [א]).

6 b. Joel, of REUBEN (§ 13) (1 Ch. 5 4, σεμεει [BL], σεμειν [A]).
7 b. Hasshub, a Merarite Levite (1 Ch. 9 14 cp Neh. 11 15, σεμεειας [L]). See 13.
8. Father of Obadiah, a Levite belonging to Jeduthun (1 Ch. 9 16, σαμεια [B] σαμιου [A], cp Neh. 11 17 b). See 13.
9. Chief of the b'ne Elizaphan, temp. David (1 Ch. 15 8 σαμεας [ℵ], σεμαια [A], v. 11 σαμαι [ℵ], σεμειαν [A]).
10. b. Nathaneel, a Levite scribe (1 Ch. 24 6, σαμμαιας [A]).
11. b. Obed-edom (1 Ch. 26 4, σαμειας [A], vv. 6 f., σαμαι [B v. 7], σαμεια, σεμεια [A]). See 13.
12. A Levite, temp. Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. 17 8, σαμουας [B], σαμουιας [A]).
13. A son of Jeduthun (2 Ch. 29 14, σαμειας [A]). Cp 7, 8, 11, and see GENEALOGIES i., § 7 (ii. d).
14. A Levite house temp. Hezekiah (2 Ch. 31 15, σεμεει [BAL]), probably the same as the name in Neh. 10 8 12 6 (Bℵ*A om., σεμειας, ℵ^c.a mg. sup.L), ib. 18 (Bℵ*A om., σεμεια, ℵ^c.a mg. inf.L) where Jehonathan is the head, 12 35 (where one Jonathan b. Shemaiah is named).
15. A Levite of the time of Josiah (2 Ch. 35 9, cp perhaps SHIMEI, 31 12; in both cases Cononiah precedes as the name of a brother). In 1 Esd. 1 9 SAMAIAS (σαμαιας).
16. One of the b'ne Adonikam, a post-exilic family who came up to Jerusalem with Ezra, Ezra 8 13 (σαμαεια [A]), in 1 Esd. 8 39 SAMAIAS.
17. A teacher, Ezra 8 16 (σεμεια [A], σεμεειδ [L]), in 1 Esd. 8 43 MASMAN, RV MAASMAS (μαασμαν [BA], σεμεια [L]), repeated in v. 44 MAMAIAS, RV SAMAIAS (om. L).
18. One of the b'ne Harim, the priestly family of Ezra 10 21, in 1 Esd. 9 21 SAMEIUS, RV SAMEUS (θαμαιος [B], σαμαιος [A]).
19. One of the sons of HARIM 'of Israel' (Ezra 10 31 σεμεα [ℵ], σαμειας [L]), in 1 Esd. 9 32 SABBEUS (σαββαιας [BA], σαμειας [L]).
20. b. Delaiah b. Mehetabeel, a prophet temp. Neh., bribed by Sanballat to hinder the Jews from building the wall (Neh. 6 10 σεμεει [Bℵ], σεμει [A]).
21, 22, two men present at Ezra's dedication of the wall (Neh. 12 34, σαραια [Bℵ], σααμαιας [A] 36).
23. RV but AV SAMAIAS, 'the great,' kinsman of Tobit (Tob. 5 12 f., σεμεον [B], σεμελιου [ℵ], σεμειου [A], the Heb. Vs. ed. Neubauer has שלומית).

SHEMARIAH (שְׁמַרְיָה and [1 Ch. 12 5] שְׁמַרְיָהוּ; usually [§ 30] explained 'whom Yahwè guards,' but probably rather a modification of the ethnic SHIMRI [q.v.]; ϲαμαριά[c]). 2 Ch. 11 19 AV [by printer's error?] gives SHAMARIAH). All the occurrences suggest N. Arabian origin. T. K. C.

1. One of David's heroes, 1 Ch. 12 5 (σαμαραια [B]). See DAVID, § 11, (a) (iii.), col. 1030 f.
2. A son of Rehoboam, by Mahalath (= Jeraḥmeelith [Che.]), 2 Ch. 11 19.
3, 4. Contemporaries of Ezra, who had taken foreign wives, Ezra 10 32 (-εια [B], -ια [ℵA]); v. 41 (-εια [Bℵ], -ειας [A]).

SHEMEBER (שֶׁמְאֵבֶר), Gen. 14 2. See SHINAB.

SHEMED (שֶׁמֶד), 1 Ch. 8 12 RV, AV SHAMED.

SHEMER. 1. (שֶׁמֶר; ϲεμηρ, ϲαμηρ [B], ϲε. [A], ϲεμμηρ [L]). According to 1 K. 16 24 Shemer was the owner of the hill which Omri bought, whence the place received the name of Samaria (שֹׁמְרוֹן). See SAMARIA.

2 and 3. AV SHAMER (שֶׁמֶר), properly a clan-name (see Stade, ZATW 5 166), but applied to real or supposed persons: a Levite, 1 Ch. 6 46 [31] (σεμμηρ); and ben Heber in a genealogy of ASHER [q.v., § 4 ii.], 1 Ch. 7 34 (σεμμηρ [B], σωμηρ [AL]); in v. 32 he is called SHOMER [q.v.].

SHEMIDA (שְׁמִידָע), a Gileadite clan belonging to MANASSEH (§ 9) (Nu. 26 32, ϲυμαερ; Josh. 17 2, ϲυμαρειμ [B], ϲεμιραε [A], ϲαμιδαε [L]; 1 Ch. 7 19 AV Shemidah: ϲεμειρα [BA], ϲαμειδα [L]), after whom the Shemidaites were called (Nu. l.c. הַשְּׁמִידָעִי; ϲυμαερ[ε]ι [BAFL]).

May we venture to hold that שם here is a divine appellation? See NAMES, § 43, SHEM [NAMES WITH]. The alternative is to suppose a corruption ישמעאל.

SHEMINITH, UPON, RV 'set to the Sheminith' (עַל־הַשְּׁמִינִית; 𝔊^BNARU in Pss. υπερ τηϲ ογδοηϲ 𝔊^BNA in 1 Ch., αμαϲενειθ; Jer. super octava [Ps. 6 1], pro octava [Ps. 12 1]; επι τηϲ ογδοηϲ [Aq., Ps. 6 1], περι τηϲ ογδοηϲ [𝔊^L in 1 Ch., Sym.]; Tg. 'on the lyre with eight strings'), a technical phrase relative (according to the ordinary view) to the musical performance of certain psalms (Pss. 6 12; cp 1 Ch. 15 21). Ewald, Olshausen, Winckler, explain 'in the eighth mode, or key'; Gesenius and Delitzsch, 'for the bass'; Grätz agrees with the Targum. It is admitted, however, that these explanations are pure guesses, and the most plausible view of other psalm titles favours the assumption that the text is corrupt. Most probably על־השמינית is a corruption of לְאֵיתָנִים, 'of the Ethanites,' or better of לישמעאלים 'of the Ishmaelites.'[1] We thus obtain an adequate explanation of Sheminith in the titles of Pss. 6 and 12, and probably too of Gittith, Neginath, and Shoshannim (see PSALMS, BOOK OF, § 26, but cp MUSIC, § 9). We also find על־השמינית in 1 Ch. 15 21 where it seems to correspond to על־עלמות at the end of v. 20. Here, however, it is in all probability a corruption of the name SHEMIRAMOTH (q.v.), just as 'Azaziah,' which Benzinger (KHC ad loc.) rightly pronounces suspicious, is virtually a misplaced repetition of the name 'Aziel.' These two proper names occur close by, in v. 20.

It may also be noticed, since the commentaries give no very defensible explanations, that לְנַצֵּחַ (𝔊 τοῦ [ἐν]ισχῦσαι; RV 'to lead'), which follows עַל־הַשְּׁמִינִית in 1 Ch. 15 21 should be pointed לָנֶצַח; it is a synonym of תָּמִיד, 'continually,' which occurs in a similar context; see PSALMS, BOOK OF, § 26, col. 3945, n. 4. The other mysterious phrase על־עלמות (RV 'set to Alamoth') in 15 20 comes from לאמים, a mutilated and corrupt form of נבלים 'psalteries.' Cp Ps. 26 4*b*, where נאלמים is a corruption of נְבָלִים, 'impious.' T. K. C.

SHEMIRAMOTH (שְׁמִירָמוֹת), a Levite name, 1 Ch. 15 18 20 16 5 2 Ch. 17 8 (here Kt. שְׁמְרִימוֹת; variously ϲεμειραμωθ, ϲαμαρ[ε]ιμ., ϲαμειραμ., ϲεμιρ., ϲιμιρ.). According to Schrader (KAT^(2) 366) equivalent to the Ass. name Sammuramat, which occurs as a woman's name on the monuments, especially on the statues of Nebo from Nimrûd. G. Hoffm., however (Syrische Acten, 137), thinks that Shemiramoth was originally a place-name meaning 'images of Shemiram' (= Name of Ram or 'the Exalted One'), just as Anathoth may mean 'images of Anath.'

'Shem-ba'al' (name of Baal) was a name or form of Astarte (see Inscr. of Eshmun'azar, l. 48) and the story of the conquests of Semiramis in Upper Asia is 'a translation into the language of political history of the diffusion and victories of her worship in that region.' The main centre of this diffusion was Bambyce or Hierapolis (WRS, 'Ctesias and the Semiramis legend,' Eng. Hist. Rev., April 1887, p. 317).

But what probability is there in either of the above explanations? None at all, if the analogy of other Levitical names in Ch. is to be trusted. In 2 Ch. 17 8 it is specially plain that the names among which this strange form occurs are ethnics (cp GENEALOGIES i., § 7 5). It so happens too that the form which appears in that passage suggests the true explanation. It is not שמירמות (Shemiramoth?), but שְׁמְרִימוֹת, where (מת)מות is presumably a corruption of a dittographed מרי, and may safely be disregarded. SHIMRI (q.v.) is a good Levitical name, according to the Chronicler; in 2 Ch. 29 13 it occurs just before Je'uel or Je'iel, which name (i.e., Je'iel) is apparently a mutilated form of Ja'aziel (see 1 Ch. 15 18 16 5). שמירמות, too is, in 2 Ch. 31 13, worn down into 'Jerimoth' (= Jeraḥmeel). On 'Shemiramoth' in 1 Ch. 15 20 f. see further SHEMINITH. T. K. C.

SHEMUEL (שְׁמוּאֵל, ϲαμουηλ). 1. 1 Ch. 6 33 [18] RV SAMUEL, the prophet (see SAMUEL).
2. b. Ammihud, a chief of SIMEON (§ 8 iii., last note), Nu. 34 20; (σαλαμιηλ).
3. b. Tola, of ISSACHAR (§ 7) (1 Ch. 7 2; ισαμουηλ [B, a dittographed ι]).

The name is difficult. For discussions see NAMES, § 39, where 'bearing the name of God' is suggested; Driver, TBS 13 ff. (on 1 S. 1 20, where Gesenius's explanation, 'name of God' is pronounced 'as obvious as it is natural'); Hommel, [1] עמן is several times (e.g. Ps. 92 11) miswritten for ישמעאל.

AHT, 100 ('his name is God'); Jastrow, JBL 19 [1900] 82 ff. ('name [=son] of God'). But is the final -el really = אֵל, 'God'? See SAUL, § 1, SHEBUEL, where the possibility of a connection between Šā'ūl and Šĕmū'ēl, and between Šĕmūēl and Šĕbū'ēl is referred to, and two other names are indicated, belonging perhaps to the same group, Ishmael and SHOBAL (q.v.). 𝔊's form, however, in 2 (also = MT's SHELUMIEL [q.v.]) suggests a comparison with SALMAH [q.v.]. Note that 'Ammihud' (see 2), or rather Ammiḥur, very possibly, like the shorter form Ḥur, comes from Jeraḥmeel. Father and son both seem to have ethnic names. T. K. C.

SHEN (הַשֵּׁן), a locality, between which and Mizpeh Samuel set up the stone Eben-ezer (1 S. 7 12). But הַשֵּׁן means merely 'the rock' and one expects to find some known and specific place mentioned. 𝔊BAL (τῆς παλαιᾶς) and Pesh. point to the reading יְשָׁנָה (cp 2 Ch. 13 19), which is accepted by Wellhausen, Driver, H. P. Smith, and others. See JESHANAH.

SHENAZZAR [RV], or [AV] SHENAZAR (שֶׁנְאַצַּר), a son of Jeconiah (Jehoiachin), and uncle of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3 18; σανεσαρ [BA], σανασαρ [L], sennaser, senneser [Vg.]). His name is variously explained as a mutilation of שושבלאצר (so Marq., see SHESHBAZZAR) and as = Sin-uṣur, 'Sin (the moon-god), protect!' cp on an Ass. seal שנסרצר, Sin-šar-uṣur, 'Sin, protect the king!'[1] CIS 2 88, where the same incorrect Assyrian pronunciation [ש for ס, see SANBALLAT] is presupposed. He was plausibly identified by Howorth (Acad., 1893, p. 175), and then by Kosters (Herstel, 47), Ed. Meyer (Ent. des Jud. 77), Marquart (Fund. 55), with Sheshbazzar. Neither of the Assyriological combinations, however, is quite satisfactory, and the other names of sons of Jeconiah are explained elsewhere as representing gentilics of the Negeb. This suggests that שנאצר may be a corruption of שנער (see SHINAR), which is itself possibly a corruption of גשור—i.e., the S. Geshur. See SHESHBAZZAR. T. K. C.

SHENIR (שְׂנִיר), Dt. 3 9 AV, RV SENIR.

SHEOL (שְׁאוֹל). The origin of the Hebrew term for the world of the dead is not a mere question of archæology; we cannot but expect it to throw light on the early religion, or superstition, of the Hebrews. Possibly, if not probably, it has an Assyrian origin. According to Frd. Delitzsch formerly (Par. 121; Prol. 47 145; Heb. Lang. 20) the Assyrian word corresponding to Šĕōl is Šu'âlu; he was followed by A. Jeremias (Bab.-ass. Vorstell. 62) and Gunkel (Schöpf. 154). Jensen, however (Kosmol. 222 ff.), denies the existence of such a word as šu'âlu, and Zimmern (in Gunk. Schöpf. 154, n. 5) says that certainty has not yet been attained. Delitzsch himself omits šu'âlu in his Ass. HWB, and Schwally (Das Leben nach dem Tode, 89, n. 2) assents to the decision of Jensen. A critical re-examination of the four relevant passages in Assyrian vocabularies was urgently called for. This has been given by Jastrow (AJSL 14 165 ff.), who comes to the conclusion that Jensen's position is untenable, and interprets the Ass. šu'âlu as 'the place of inquiry'—i.e., the place whence oracles can be obtained.[2] Provisionally we may be content with this at any rate possible explanation, remembering that one of the Babylonian terms for 'priest' is šâ'ilu (lit. inquirer), and that the Hebrew šā'al is frequently used of consulting an oracle (e.g., Judg. 1 1 Hos. 4 12 Ezek. 21 21 [26], etc.). We may venture therefore to hold that when the primitive Hebrews used the name Shĕōl they may have thought of the power of the dead in the underworld to aid the living by answering their inquiries. In course of time the priestly representatives of the established religion would naturally succeed in checking this practice. Of primitive Hebrew religion, however, we have in fact very little direct evidence; survivals of it may be found in later superstitious usages, and this is nearly all that we know. Nor must we suppose that all the dead had power to furnish oracles to the living. This power was an element of divinity, and it was probably only heroes like Ea-bani, who appears to Gilgameš (Jensen, Mythen und Epen, 263; Jastrow, RBA 511; Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 589), and like Samuel (1 S. 28 7 ff.), who were consulted for oracles.

To the later Hebrews Shĕōl appeared like a monster which 'enlarged its greed, and opened its mouth without measure' (Is. 5 14; cp Hab. 2 5 Prov. 27 20 30 15 f.). Its leading characteristic is darkness (Job 10 21 f.); it is the land of dust—עָפָר ('dust'), can indeed be used as a synonym for שְׁאוֹל (Shĕōl), see Job 17 16 20 11 21 26 Ps. 30 10 [9]. Like the Babylonian Aralû it was far below in the earth (Job 11 8 26 5, etc.). Hence שְׁאוֹל, Shĕōl and בּוֹר (pit) sometimes receive the epithets תַּחְתִּיָּה or תַּחְתִּיּוֹת, 'nether' (Dt. 32 22 Ps. 86 13 88 7 [6]); and heaven and Shĕōl are the farthest opposites (Is. 7 11 Am. 9 2 Ps. 139 8). Silence as a rule reigns supreme (see, however, Is. 14 10). It is a land whence there is no return (Job 7 10); so too the Babylonians called it irṣit lā tāri, 'the land without return' (for other names see Jensen, Kosmol. 215-225). Still it was a land of order; it was figured as a city with gates (Is. 38 10 Ps. 9 13 [14] 107 18 Job 38 17), and both in the gospels (Mt. 16 18, cp HADES) and in the Talmud the same conception is found. On the state of the dwellers in Sheol, see DEAD, ESCHATOLOGY (references on col. 1390 f.), and on the whole question see Jastrow, Religion of Bab. and Ass., 560, 606 ff.; Charles, Eschatology; Schwally, Das Leben nach dem Tode, 59-66; A. Jeremias, Bab.-ass. Vorstellungen vom Leben nach dem Tode, 106-126.

The following is the description of the Babylonian Hades at the opening of the 'Descent of Ištar' (KB 6 1, p. 81):—

To the land without return, the earth . . .
['Set'] Ištar, the daughter of Sin, her ear.
The daughter of Sin 'set' her ear
To the dark house, the dwelling of Irkalla,
To the house, from which he who enters never emerges,
To the way, going on which has no turning back,
To the house, into which he who enters is without light,
When dust is their nourishment, clay their food,
They see not light, they sit in darkness,
Dust (rusts) on door and bolt.

SHEPHAM (שְׁפָם, 'a bare height'?—§§ 75, 99), as the text of Nu. 34 10 f. stands, is the name of a point on the ideal eastern border of Canaan, mentioned with HAZAR-ENAN [q.v.] and RIBLAH [q.v.]; like Riblah, it is unmentioned in the ‖ passage, Ezek. 47 15-18. Van Kasteren's identification of it with Ōfāni, on the upper course of the Nahr er-Raḳḳād, SE. of the lake called Birket Rām (Baed.(2) 266), is not one of his best (Rev. Bibl., 1895, pp. 23-36), and his argument to prove that the 'Aphamīyā of Sam. and Targ. Jerus. is derived from Shepham is more ingenious than convincing. This and similar names are, according to the present writer's theory, distinctively 'Jeraḥmeelite' or S. Canaanitish names (Shephupham [1 Ch. 8 5 Shephuphan] and Shuphamite, Nu. 26 39; Siphmoth, 1 S. 30 28; Shuppim, one of the sons of Aher = Ahiram = Jeraḥmeel, 1 Ch. 7 12; Shiphmite, 1 Ch. 27 27). This confirms the view that the geography of Nu. 34 1-15 and of Ezek. 47 13-21 has been edited, with the view of expanding the limits of the region referred to. This editing, for which many parallels can be given (e.g., Gen. 10 Nu. 13 21-25 Dt. 34 1-3 Josh. 11 2 S. 24 1-9), would not have been possible if some of the names in the original document were not found in more than one part of the country. A Riblah and a Hamath for instance doubtless existed in the far N., but it is not at all likely that a Shepham was to be found there. The real Shepham was apparently on the E. border of the land of Kenaz (the original document must have spoken of 'the land of Kenaz' [קנז], not 'the land of Canaan' [כנען]), between Hazar-enan (Hazar-elam =

In 1 the names of David's wives and children being in several cases, as it seems, corruptions of tribal names (e.g., Abigail, Absalom, Haggith, Abital, Ithream, Eglah), and a name compounded with -iah being quite isolated in this list, we are bound to explain Shephatiah if possible as a tribal name. According to analogy it may well be an expansion of שְׁפָטִי = צְפָתִי, —i.e., 'belonging to ZEPHATH' (see SHAPHAT). This theory explains all the occurrences of the name. In 2 the companions of Shephatiah are of 'Jeraḥmeelite' origin (see PASHHUR); for 4, cp the Calebite ḤAREPH, and see HARIPH; and in the case of 3, 5, 6 and 9 the names Reuel, Michael, Maachah and Mahalaleel are all corruptions of Jeraḥmeel. With regard to 7, it must be clear that, like the b'nē Araḥ and the b'nē Elam, the b'nē Shephatiah were of Jeraḥmeelite origin; cp Neh. 11 4, and see PEREZ. Read 'b'nē Ṣefāthī.' T. K. C.]

6. b. Maachah, a Simeonite ruler (1 Ch. 27 16, שפטיהו, σαφατιας).

7. The b'nē Shephatiah were a post-exilic family numbered at 372 (Ezra 2 4, ασαφ [B], Neh. 7 9); the record, however, in Ezra 8 8, wherein the b'nē Shephatiah with Zebadiah at their head amount to 80 in number, is far more plausible (see EZRA-NEHEMIAH). The name appears as SAPHAT in 1 Esd. 5 9 (om. B, ασαφ [Ba.b mg.], σαφατ [A]), and as SAPHATIAS in 1 Esd. 8 34 (σοφοτιου [B], A om., σαφατιου [L]). See introduction, above.

SHEPHELAH, THE, or LOWLAND [OF JUDAH] (הַשְּׁפֵלָה; see PLAIN, 7; 𝔊 has CЄΦΗΛΑ in 2 Ch. 26 10 [AV 'low country,' RV 'lowland'], Ob. 19 [CΑΦΗΛΑ Qmg., AV 'plain,' RV 'lowland'], Jer. 32 44 [AV 'valley,' RV 'lowland'], 33 13 [om. A, AV 'vale,' RV 'lowland'], also in 1 Macc. 12 38 [ℵ*V CЄΦ. ΠЄΔΙΝΗ, AV Shephela, RV 'plain country']), a part of the territory of Judah, between the hill country (see JUDAH, HILL-COUNTRY OF), and the Mediterranean. On the geographical use of the term see G. A. Smith (HG 202 f.), who concludes that 'though the name may originally have been used to include the Maritime Plain, and this wider use may have been occasionally revived, the Shĕphēlah proper was the region of low hills between that plain and the high Central Range.' The cities of the Shĕphēlah are enumerated in Josh. 15 33-44; vv. 45-47, which mention Philistine towns as in the Shĕphēlah, are probably a later insertion (cp Oxf. Hex. 2 346). Eusebius, however (OS 296 10), describes this district as the plain (πεδίον) lying round Eleutheropolis, to the N. and the W., and Clermont-Ganneau and Conder (Tentwork, 277) state that they have discovered the name in its Arabic form Sifla about Beit-Jibrīn (Eleutheropolis). 𝔊 also gives πεδίον (see Dt. 1 7 Josh. 11 2 12 8) and ἡ πεδινή (see Josh. 9 1 10 40 Judg. 1 9, etc.) for שפלה, and a larger use is favoured by Dt. 1 7 Josh. 9 1 1 K. 10 27 2 Ch. 26 10, so that, even if the low hills behind the maritime plain were the most important part of the Shephēlah on account of the towns situated there, we can hardly deny that theoretically the maritime plain was included in the reference of this geographical term (see Buhl, Pal. 104, n. 164).

The RV has taken great pains to carry out a systematic rendering of shĕphēlah by 'lowland.' Compare the following passages: Dt. 1 7 Josh. 9 1 10 40 11 2 16 (bis, 𝔊B, τὰ ταπεινα, 𝔊AL τὰ πεδινά the second time), 12 8 15 33 Judg. 1 9 1 K. 10 27 1 Ch. 27 28 2 Ch. 1 15 9 27 26 10 28 18 Jer. 17 26 (𝔊B γῆς πεδινῆς) 32 44 33 13 Ob. 19 Zech. 7 7. Perhaps if RV had given the plural form 'lowlands,' it might have been more illuminative to the reader, for, as G. A. Smith (203) remarks, the Scottish lowlands, like the Shĕphēlah, are not entirely plain, but have their groups and ranges of hills.

SHEPHER (שֶׁפֶר), Nu. 33 23 f., AV SHAPHER.

SHEPHERD OF HERMAS. Under the name of Ποιμήν (Pastor, 'Shepherd'), with which from an early date the name of Hermas came to be connected, a book of some size, originally written in Greek, has come down to us from Christian antiquity. At one time greatly read, and even for a while regarded as canonical, it afterwards fell very much into the background without, however, being wholly lost sight of.

1. Name: transmission of text.

The Greek text, though still without the concluding portion Sim. ix. 30 3-x., was first brought to light comparatively recently (1856). A Latin version, the Vulgate, was published as early as 1513 by Faber Stapulensis; an Ethiopic by Anton d'Abbadie in 1860. Ever since Cotelier's time (1672) the work has been wont to be included in editions of the so-called Apostolic Fathers. We now know the Greek text of Vis. i.-Mand. iv. 3 6*a* from the Codex Sinaiticus edited by Tischendorf in 1862; the contents of the rest of the work (apart from the concluding portion already spoken of, and certain lacunæ) from the so-called Athos MS of which three leaves are now in the University Library at Leipsic (since 1856) and six still remain in the Monastery of Gregory on Mt. Athos; that of Sim. 2 7-10 4 2-5 from an old papyrus now in Berlin, formerly at Fayyûm, described by U. Wilcken in 1891; that of other fragments, we have known for a longer period from the citations of ancient writers.

Valuable help can also be obtained throughout from two Old Latin versions, the Vulgate and (since Dressel, 1857) the Palatine, as also from the Ethiopic. For the establishment of the original text, since the edition of Anger and Dindorf, 1856, who at first were led astray by Simonides (afterwards proved to be a forger) but were ultimately put upon the right track by Tischendorf, as he in his turn was corrected by Lipsius, specially meritorious services have been rendered by A. Hilgenfeld, 1866(2), 1881(3), 1887; O. de Gebhardt, 1877; J. Armitage Robinson, A Collation of the Athos Codex of the Shepherd of Hermas, 1888; F. X. Funk, Patres Apost.,(2) 1901.

2. Division.

The Shepherd, in view of its contents, is usually divided into three parts, entitled respectively (1) Visions, (2) Commandments, (3) Similitudes. The printed editions, in fact, all follow each other in giving five Visions, twelve Commandments, and ten Similitudes. This division, however, is hardly accurate, and it would be better to say that the book in the form in which it has come down to us consists of Visions (Ὁράσεις) or Revelations (Ἀποκαλύψεις) of which the first (Vis. 1 1) can be regarded as an introduction to those immediately following (Vis. 1 2-4) and the last (Vis. 5) as an introduction to the immediately following series of Commandments and Similitudes (αἱ ἐντολαὶ καὶ παραβολαί: Mand. 1-12, Sim. 1-8) to which is added an appendix called 'The rest' (τὰ ἕτερα; Sim. 9) and a conclusion (Sim. 10).

3. Form and contents.

So far as the form of the book is concerned, Hermas, a former slave of a certain Rhoda in Rome to whom his father had sold him, and who had afterwards come into the service of the Christian church, now comes forward as a writer, relating certain things that have happened to him and what he has seen and heard—or, in a word, what has been revealed to him.

As he was walking outside the city 'to the villages,'—εἰς κώμας, as the Greek text has it, for which the printed editions, after a conjecture of Dindorf, wrongly read εἰς Κούμας, 'to Cumæ'—he falls asleep and there appears to him the woman whose slave he formerly had been and whom he had not been able to seek in marriage (Vis. 1 1). Afterwards the church appears to him at longer or shorter intervals (a year, or less); first in the form of an old woman (Vis. 1 2-4; cp 3 10-11), next with a more youthful aspect (Vis. 2; cp 3 12); again, as quite young (Vis. 3 1-10; cp 13); finally, as a maiden in wedding attire (Vis. 4).

She reveals to him the future and expounds with regard to it the will of God. She gives instructions and shows visions which have reference to the necessity for repentance while yet the building of the tower, symbolising the church, is still unfinished, or rather suspended for a while—in other words while yet God affords the opportunity to repent, an opportunity which ere long will cease with the coming of the last great persecution. After these revelations (Vis. 1-4) Hermas relates how the angel of repentance appears to him in the form of a shepherd, as previously (Vis. 2 4 3 10) in that of a young man, and bids him write down 'commandments and similitudes' (Vis. 5). The twelve commandments which follow relate to faith in God; a life void of offence, full of compassion, love of truth; chastity; long suffering; our attendant angels, good and bad; the fear of the Lord; abstinence from all that is evil; prayer without ceasing and with unwavering confidence; two kinds of sadness; two kinds of spirit; two kinds of desire (Mand. 1-12). The eight similitudes which follow teach us how here we have no continuing city; how the rich can be helped by the prayer of the poor; how the righteous and the wicked cannot at first be discriminated, but will ultimately be separated (Sim. 1-4); how useful fasting is; how good it is to keep far aloof from luxury and temptation; how indispensable is chastening; how many are the varieties of saint and sinner (Sim. 5-8). Next, by way of appendix, is set forth in new images that which the Holy Spirit that spoke with Hermas in the form of the church had showed him. They are revelations vouchsafed to him by the Shepherd, the angel of repentance, with reference to those who are saved (Sim. 9). To round off the whole, yet a further earnest admonition is given by the angel who had sent the shepherd; a last exhortation to repentance in accordance with the precepts of the now completed work (Sim. 10).

The form in which the whole is clothed, far from being simple or natural, is artificial in the highest degree. It sets out, apparently, with the intention of relating what has passed between two known persons, Rhoda and Hermas. The names are reminiscent of a Christian woman Rhoda, mentioned in Acts 12 13, and of a Christian slave at Rome, Hermas, mentioned in Rom. 16 14. Here they become representatives, the one (Rhoda) of the church in various successive forms, the other as one devoted to her service, and one of her followers and members. 'Hermas' soon goes on to speak with poetic freedom like a Paul, a James, a John, a Barnabas, a Clement, an Ignatius, a Polycarp, in the epistles handed down to us under their names, as if he were the recognised elder and faithful witness addressing himself with words of warning and admonition to his 'house,' his 'children.'

4. The form artificial.

The original unity of the work in its present form, although frequently called in question since Hase (1834), cannot be denied. Even less, however, can the existence of inconsistencies and contradictions and other marks of interpolation, adaptation, and redaction be disputed. These point to it having been a composite work made up from earlier documents. Not in the sense (so Hilgenfeld, 1881; Hausleiter, 1884; Baumgärtner, 1889; Harnack, 1897) of its being a combination, effected in one way or another, of two separate works, entitled respectively 'Visions' and 'Commandments' and 'Similitudes' by one author, or by more than one; nor yet (so Johnson, 1887; Spitta, 1896; von Soden, 1897; Völter, 1900; van Bakel, 1900) in the sense of its being the outcome of repeated redactions of an originally Jewish writing. Rather in the sense of being a second edition of the original Shepherd, a bundle of 'Commandments and Similitudes' from the pen of but one writer who laboured on the whole independently, yet at the same time frequently borrowed from the books which he had before him. It is not possible to distinguish throughout between what he borrowed from others and what we ought to regard as his own.

5. Unity and composition.

The writer, who comes forward as if he were an older Hermas, the contemporary of Clement (Vis. 2 4 3), must not be identified with him of Rom. 16 14 nor yet with a younger one, brother of Pius I., bishop of Rome 140-155, who is referred to in the Muratorian fragment. The real name of the author remained unknown. From his work it can be inferred that he was an important member, perhaps even a ruler, of the Christian church, probably in Rome. A practical man. No Paulinist, nor yet a Judaiser in the Tübingen sense, but rather a professsor, little interested in the dogma of the Christianity that was already in process of becoming Catholic, in the days when it was grappling with the ideas and movements that had originated with Montanus. One who attached much value to revelations and yet was very particularly in earnest about the need for quickening, for the spiritual renewing of the Church, for which reason he laid peculiar stress upon the possibility of a second conversion. This possibility would ere long come to an end at the close of the present period; even now many were denying it as regarded those who once had received baptism, though others hoped to be able continually afresh to obtain the forgiveness of their sins. There is nothing that indicates the merchant supposed by Harnack-Hilgenfeld.

6. Author.

In date the author is earlier than Eusebius, Athanasius, Origen, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Irenæus, but later than the apostles and their first followers, the martyrs and leaders of the church, such individuals as 'Hermas' and 'Clement' (Vis. 2 4 3). Later than the first great and flourishing time of the church (the history of which can already be divided into different periods, and the spiritual renovation of which, in conjunction with the revived expectation of Christ's second coming is regarded as imperatively needful); in the days when the spiritual life of Christians was being stirred by Montanistic movements. Therefore, certainly earlier than 180 A.D.; yet not much earlier, nor yet much later, than about the middle of the second century. Perhaps some chronological truth may underlie the tradition that 'Hermas' was a 'brother' of Pius I. (140-155 A.D.).

7. Date.

The work was from the first intended for reading aloud at the assemblies of the church whether in larger or in smaller circles (Vis. 2 4 3). Its value, at first placed very high from the point of view of the interests of edification, but afterwards almost wholly lost sight of in Christian circles, has in recent years in spite of the diffuseness of its contents come anew to be recognised. Not to be despised as a praiseworthy production in the field of edifying literature it is still more to be prized as a valuable contribution to our knowledge of the Christianity that was widely spread and held as orthodox about the middle of the second century.

Conder suggests, as the site, Bēt Sīrā, a village 2 m. SW. of the Lower Beth-horon (Mem. 3 16). But can we implicitly trust the name? [The name Ephraim fixed itself not only in central but also in southern Palestine, where it is perhaps more original, and some of the names in the genealogy have an unmistakable N. Arabian affinity. Sheerah may, therefore, be a corruption of אשׁחר 'Ashḥur,' which turns out to be a N. Arabian tribe-name (cp Geshur). Heres in 'Ir-heres' (see HERES, MOUNT) seems to have the same origin (Crit. Bib.).—T. K. C.] For אזן (Uzzen) we should probably (cp 𝔊^L) substitute עיר 'city,' and refer to Judg. 1 35. Cp EPHRAIM, § 12. Beth-shemesh or Ir-shemesh is a curiously parallel name, if 'shemesh' comes from 'cūshīm' (see SHAALBIM). See, however, NAMES, § 99, where 'ear (=earlike projection) of Sheerah' is suggested as the possible meaning of Uzzen-sheerah ; cp AZNOTH-TABOR.

SHEREBIAH (שֵׁרֵבְיָה, § 39, but form seems doubtful, σαραβια[s]), a post-exilic priest and family (Ezra 8 18 ἀρχήν [BA], ἐν ἀρχῇ σαρουια [L], v. 24 σαραια [BA], Neh. 8 7 9 4 αραβια [B, where σαραβια represents SHEBANIAH, σαραβαια [A], 9 5 om. 𝔊^BℵA, 10 12 [13] ζαραβια [B], ζαθαρια [ℵ*vid.], 12 8). In 1 Esd. 8 47 the name appears as ASEBEBIA, RV ASEBEBIAS (ασεβηβιαν [BA], ἐν ἀρχῇ σαρουια [L]), cp HASHABIAH, 7 ; in v. 54, ESEBRIAS RV ESEREBIAS (εσερεβιαν [BA]), and 1 Esd. 9 48, SARABIAS, σαραριας [A*vid.]. Many of the companion-names on the lists are obviously ethnics (Che.). See SHEBER.

SHERESH (שֶׁרֶשׁ ; coυpoc [B], copoc [A], φopoc [L]), a Machirite name in a genealogy of MANASSEH (§ 9 [ii.]) ; 1 Ch. 7 16.† See PERESH.

SHEREZER (שַׂרְאֶצֶר), Zech. 7 2 AV, RV SHAREZER, 2.

SHERIFFS (תִּפְתָּיֵא, 𝔊 τοὺς ἐπ' ἐξουσιῶν κατὰ χώραν, οἱ ἐπ' ἐξουσ. [also Theod.]), EV's rendering of a Bibl.-Aram. official title (such at least is the prevailing opinion) in Dan. 3 2 f. It has been generally connected with the Ar. aftā 'to advise' (whence the participial 'mufti'), and accordingly translated 'counsellor' (cp RV^mg., 'lawyers'). A still more far-fetched suggestion is to read הפתיא = ὕπατοι 'consuls'; for the ת instead of ט Grätz (MGWJ 19 347) compares פסנטרין = ψαλτήριον. Another scholar says, 'possibly a mutilated form of a Pers. title in pat "chief"' (Bevan, Dan. 80), and Andreas (Marti, Gram. Bibl.-Aram., Glossary) suggests דנפתיא denpĕtāyē, 'chiefs of religion.' Nor does this exhaust the list of theories.

Can no step in advance be taken? Only by those who recognise that many narratives in the OT have been remodelled, so far as the geographical and historical background is concerned. It will become probable to any who adopt the present writer's theory that the supposed official tittles in Dan. 3 2 are really N. Arabian ethnics. One of these ethnics (אשחורי, Ashḥurite, miswritten אחשררי) passed, under the editor's hands, into אחשדרפניא] (see SATRAPS). Another (רחבתי, Rehobothite) appears three or four times in corrupt variants. The last of these variants תפתיא has probably come from רחבתיא through the intermediate form, which occurs earlier in MT's list, פחותא. 'All the rulers of the province' is, of course, an editorial insertion, the incorrectness of which is shown by v. 4, where the herald addresses 'peoples, nations, and languages.' Cp SATRAPS. T. K. C.

SHESHACH (שֵׁשַׁךְ, as if 'humiliation,' cp שכך 'to crouch') is generally explained as a cypher-form of 'Bābel' (Babylon), which indeed is given instead of 'Sheshach' by Tg. (Jer. 25 26 51 41). In Jer. 25 26 the whole clause, and in 51 41 'Sheshach,' is omitted in 𝔊 (Q^mg. adds in 25 26, καὶ βασιλεὺς Σησαχ πίεται ἔσχατος αὐτῶν, and in 51 41 inserts ὁ εισακ) ; Cornill follows 𝔊, and so too Giesebrecht in 51 41, whereas in 25 26 this scholar retains 'Sheshach,' but regards vv. 25 f. as an interpolation. But would a late glossator acquainted with the Athbash cypher (in which א = ת, ב = ש, etc.) have used it in interpolating a prophecy ascribed to Jeremiah? and what reason was there for using a cryptogram? 'Explication désespérée assurément' (Renan, Rapport annuel de la soc. asiatique, 1871, p 26). As to 51 41, there can be no doubt that 'Sheshach' should be omitted ; it mars the beauty of the elegiac metre (see LAMENTATION). To prove this let us put 50 23 and 51 41, both elegiac passages, side by side :—

(a) How is cut asunder and broken | the whole earth's hammer!
How is become a desolation | Babylon among the nations!

(b) How is [Sheshach] taken and surprised | the whole earth's praise!
How is become a desolation | Babylon among the nations!

As to Jer. 25 26, we must view the passage in connection with the whole list of peoples in vv. 18-26, and carefully criticise the text. The list begins with Judah. Next comes Miṣrim (so read ; cp MIZRAIM), Arabia, Zarephathim, . . . Edom, Moab, Ammon, Miṣṣur (a repetition, hid under 'Tyre and Zidon'), Dedan, Tema, Buz, Zarephathim, Arabia (thrice), Cushanim, Zimri (=Zimran), Jeraḥmeel (Elam and Madai), Zaphon, Jeraḥmeelim, Cush-jerahmeel (repetitions) ; then at the close something which by editorial manipulation became 'and the king of Sheshach (?) shall drink after them.'

The view of Lauth that 'Sheshach' is a Hebraisation of Šiška, a Babylonian district which gave its name (?) to an ancient Babylonian dynasty, according to Pinches's reading (but see Pinches himself, TSBA, 1881, p. 48), is untenable. Winckler (GBA 67 f. 328 ; AOF 1 275 ff.), and Sayce (RP(2) 1 13) read Uru-azagga. The Athbash theory is equally wrong. On this and on similar cyphers see Hal. Mél. 245 (his theory is peculiar); and cp LEB-KAMAI. T. K. C.

SHESHAI (שֵׁשַׁי, § 58, cp SHASHAI ; cec[c]ει [BFL]), one of the b'ne Anak, perhaps an old Hebronite clan-name (Nu. 13 22 cemει [A], Josh. 15 14 coυcει [BL], -αι [A], Judg. 1 10 † γεθθι [A]) ; see ANAKIM. Sayce (Crit. Mon.(1) 204) combines the name with Šasu √שסה (the Egyptian name for the Syrian Bedouins). But 𝔊^BL in Josh. 15 14, and the fact that סוס is frequently miswritten כוש, may suggest 'Cushi' (כושי) ; 'Anak' itself may come from 'Amalek' = 'Jerahmeel' (Che.). See, however, SHESHAN, JERAHMEEL, § 2*β*.

SHESHAN (שֵׁשָׁן, § 58 ; some MSS. שישן [Kenn.] ; cωcαm, cωcαn [B], cωcαn [A], cιcαn [L]), whose daughter married his servant JARHA (q.v.) and became the head of an interesting genealogical list (1 Ch. 2 34-41). See JERAHMEEL, § 2 f. The names may contain authentic tradition (Gray, HPN 234 f.) ; at all events, it is quite independent of the (possibly tribal) genealogy in vv. 25-33 (cp v. 33*b*), where Sheshan appears as the son of Ishi and father of Aḥlai (v. 31). The natural presumption that AHLAI was his daughter has no evidence to support it. Indeed, since it is probable that Jarḥa was not so much an 'Egyptian' as a Muṣrite, and since the name Sheshan is reminiscent of the old Hebronite SHESHAI [q.v.], it may be conjectured that we have here an allusion to the introduction of Hebronite and Muṣrite blood into the Jeraḥmeelites (see HEBRON).[1] Whether,

[1] That is to say, the fact that the Jeraḥmeelites married into the older inhabitants of Hebron, is expressed in genealogical fashion by saying that Jarḥa married a 'daughter of Sheshan' (cp DAUGHTER, GENEALOGIES i., § 1). It is possible that Sheshan (in spite of the philological difficulty) may have been connected with šasu (√שסה), the Egyptian designation for Bedouins (cp EDOM, § 2).

indeed, 'Jarḥa' was supposed to be etymologically akin to Jeraḥmeel (as a hypocoristicon) is a matter for conjecture. S. A. C.

SHESHBAZZAR (שֵׁשְׁבַּצַּר, § 83; ϲαϲαβαϲϲαροϲ [A, in Ezra 5 16 -αρ'], σαβασαρης [L]; but B in Ezra 1 8 σαβανασαρ, 5 14 βαγασαρ ib. 16 σαρβαγαρ. In 1 Esd. 2 12 15 SANABASSAR, σαναμασσάρῳ, σαμανασσάρου [B], σαναβάσσαρος, σαμα. [A], σασαβαλασσαρος [L], ib. 6 18 20; SANABASSARUS, σαβανασσαρος [B in v. 18], βασσάρῳ, σαμαβασσάρον, B v. 20, A, L, σασαβαλάσσαρος, -ης), the first governor of Judah under the Persians, Ezra 1 8 11 5 14 16†.

Van Hoonacker (Acad., Jan. 30, 1892, Nouvelles Études, 94 f.) acutely explained the name as = Bab.

1. Name. Šamaš-bil(or -bal?)-uṣur—i.e., 'O Sun-god protect the son'; cp Σαοσδουχῖνος (see ADRAMMELECH). So Che. Acad., Feb. 6, 1892, Wellhausen (1894), and doubtfully Guthe (1899). But the Greek forms point to the name of the Moon-god Sin as the first element in the name. The only difficulty in this view is the ש for Ass. s; but this is hardly insuperable. Accepting 𝕲's form Sanabassar for Sheshbazzar we are enabled to accept the very plausible identification of San(a)bassar with Shenazzar (1 Ch. 3 18), first proposed by Imbert (1888-89), and accepted by Sir H. Howorth, Renan, and Ed. Meyer (Ent. des Jud. 77 ff.). Upon this hypothesis San(a)bassar was not identical with Zerubbabel (so van Hoonacker, Wellhausen), but his uncle and predecessor. That SANBALLAT (q.v.) and the first governor of the Jews should have had names compounded with Sin would be a striking coincidence. But though this may have been the learned redactor's meaning, it is doubtful whether the original narrator intended it. The chief captivity may have been in N. Arabia. In this case the first part of the name Sheshbazzar would represent כוש (Cush in N. Arabia); the second part might possibly come from צרפת (Zarephath). Cp SHENAZZAR, ZERUBBABEL.

In Ezra 1 8 Sheshbazzar is called loosely 'prince of Judah' (נָשִׂיא לִיהוּדָה); in 5 14 he is called 'governor'

2. Notices. (פֶּחָה), the same title which is given to Zerubbabel in Haggai (1 1 14 2 2 21). He is said to have received from Cyrus's official the sacred vessels which Nebuchadrezzar had taken away with a charge to deposit them in the temple at Jerusalem when it had been rebuilt. In 5 16 TATTENAI (q.v.) mentions that the foundations of the temple had been laid by Sheshbazzar. Kosters (Herstel, 33) admits that he is probably a historical personage, and that he bears a Babylonian name, but thinks that he was a Persian, and that the Chronicler introduces a Shenazzar into the genealogy of Zerubbabel from interested motives. That Sheshbazzar brought back the sacred vessels, and laid the foundations of the temple, Kosters denies. On the two latter points see Intr. Is. pp. xxxv, 281 f., but bearing in mind the possibility that different views of the land of the captivity and of the circumstances attending the gradual lightening of the burdens of the Jews may have been taken by the narrator and the redactor respectively. But cp Meyer, Ent. des Jud., pp. 75 ff.; Guthe, GVI 245; Winckler, KAT(3) 285, with references (Sheshbazzar a son of Jehoiachin); and see EZRA AND NEHEMIAH [BOOKS], § 7.

The identification of Sheshbazzar and Shenazzar (Shen'aṣṣar) is questioned by Löhr (Theol. Rundschau, 1 181 ff.), but justified by Ed. Meyer (ZATW 18 343 f.), who refers to the different pronunciation of the sibilants in Assyrian and Babylonian, and explains the differences in the reproduction of these names by differences of pronunciation. SHETH (שֵׁת, ϲηθ). 1. Nu. 24 17†, regarded by AV, RVmg., 𝕲, Vg., Pesh., as a proper name, on the assumption that Seth the son of Adam is intended; this is in fact the old Jewish tradition—the 'sons of Sheth' are the 'sons of men' (Onk.), the 'armies of Gog' (ps.-Jon.). The assumption is untenable; but at any rate Sheth must be a proper name. The sceptre of Israel, we are told, 'shall smite the temples of Moab, and the crown of the head of all the sons of Sheth.' The name might come from the Suti, the Syrian Bedouins mentioned in the Amarna Tablets. But in the parallel passage, Jer. 48 45, we find שָׁאוֹן for שֵׁת, and this suggests כּוּשָׁן, 'Cushan' (cp Crit. Bib. on Am. 2 2). For מוֹאָב, 'Moab,' read probably מִצּוּר, 'Miṣṣur' (cp MOAB, § 14). The Miṣrites or Cushites were among Israel's chief foes. Most, however, with Dillmann, interpret שֵׁת (שֵׁאת?) in the sense of 'tumult' (so RV).

2. 1 Ch. 1 1, RV SETH (q.v.). T. K. C.

SHETHAR (שֵׁתָר), in Esth. 1 14, MT, one of the 'seven princes' at the court of Ahasuerus. 𝕲's ϲαρϲαθαιοϲ [BℵL$^{\beta}$], ϲαρεϲθεοϲ [A] seems to represent both SHETHAR and TARSHISH. According to Marquart (Fund. 69), Shethar comes from שרשתי, with which, however, compare the O. Pers. šiyātis 'joy.' This presupposes the accepted view that the scene of the Esther-story was always laid in Persia, and that consequently the names may be expected to have a Persian appearance. For another explanation see PURIM, § 3, and cp TARSHISH.

SHETHAR-BOZNAI, RV SHETHAR-BOZENAI (שְׁתַר בּוֹזְנַי, ϲαθαρβουζανα, -αν [B], -ναι, -νε [A], θαρβουζαναιοϲ [L]). The name of a Persian (?) official, mentioned with Tattenai, Ezra 5 3 6 6 6 13 1 Esd. 6 3 (σαθραβουζανης [BA], -βωζ. [L]) 7 (-βουρζ. [B], -βουζ. [A], -βωζ [L]) 6 27 7 1 (-βουζ. [BA], -βωζ. [L]), AV SATHRABUZANES. Four explanations may be mentioned; the fourth assumes that underlying the present narrative there is an earlier story of the relations between the Jews and the N. Arabian governors.

(1) Shethar-boznai may be a corruption of מתרבוזני = Μιθροβουζάνης, Old Pers. 'Mithrobauzana'—i.e., 'having redemption through the Mithra.'[1] (2) Marquart takes a different view (Fund. 53 f.). He equates שתר with Old Pers. Çithra ('seed,' 'brilliance') and quotes names compounded with this word.[2] (3) Winckler (Kohut Semitic Studies, 34 f.), however, considers that שתר בוזני may be the title of an official (e.g., chief clerk of the chancery), and compares the inscription on a weight from Abydos, where סתרא כספא is attested as such a title. In this case, for שתר we must read סתר. But the second part of the title seems incorrectly transmitted. Winckler's reason is that ש׳ ב׳ is not followed, as we should have expected, by a description of the office of the person so called. (4) Upon the theory mentioned above, it is at any rate possible that שתר comes from תרשיש (TARSHISH [q.v.]), the original of which may be אַשּׁוּרִי, and בוזני from כּוּשָׁנִי. 'Asshurite' and 'Cushanite' are two N. Arabian ethnics, used perhaps as personal names. See Crit. Bib. T. K. C.

[2] In the address of the letter of 'Tattenai the governor beyond the river and Shethar-boznai' (Ezra 5 6), the verb in MT is in the sing., and the suffix in כְּנָוָתֵהּ is also sing. Marquart suggests that Shethar-boznai may have come in from the subscription.

tafeln, 94) includes among the constituent parts of a Babylonian sacrifice 'the laying of loaves' (akalu) before the deity. It was usual to present either 12 or (3×12) 36. The loaves were of some fine meal, perhaps wheat. They were called akal mutḳi, 'sweet loaves'—i.e., unleavened.

SHIBAH (שִׁבְעָה), Gen. 26 33 RV, AV SHEBAH (q.v.).

SHIBBOLETH (שִׁבֹּלֶת), the word which the fugitive Israelites mispronounced, so falling into the trap set for them by the Gileadites (Judg. 12 6).

𝔊ᴮ renders εἰπὸν δὴ στάχυς. Being unable to reproduce the sh in shibbōleth, the translator chose στάχυς, where στ was found rather difficult to pronounce. ('And he said, Sibboleth,' remains untranslated.)

So the French betrayed themselves by their pronunciation of ceci and ciceri in the Sicilian vespers, 13th March, 1282 (Bertheau). An analogous story is related by Doughty (Ar. Des. 1 155). When the Druses came on to slay Ibrahim Pasha's troops, a grace was accorded to the Syrians in the force. 'O man, say Gamel.' Every Syrian answered Jemel (J as in French, whilst in parts of Egypt J is pronounced as G). So the Damascene soldiers were saved.

SHIELD. The most ancient defensive piece of armour was the shield, buckler, roundel, or target. The weapon varied greatly in make, form, and size, therefore bore a variety of names.

1. Terms.

1. ṣinnāh, צִנָּה (√צנן, 'preserve,' 'protect'); most commonly rendered θυρεός, θυραῖος, but also, some five times, ὅπλον, in the sense in which that word is used by the Greek historical writers; cp ὁπλίτης; Vg. scutum, but also, less properly, clypeus. This was a large shield which is commonly found in connection with spear, and was the shelter of heavily-armed infantry (1 S. 17 7 41 etc.); it is also used figuratively of Yahwè's favour and faithfulness. We hear of this shield being borne in front of the warrior by a Shield-bearer (נֹשֵׂא הַצִּנָּה; 1 S. 17 7 RV).

2. māgēn, מָגֵן (√גנן, 'cover,' 'defend'); most commonly rendered θυρεός, but also occasionally ἀσπίς and πέλτη, scutum. This was a buckler, or smaller shield, which, from a similar juxtaposition with sword, bow, and arrows, appears to have been the defence of the light-armed infantry and of chiefs; it is used figuratively also of the scales or scutes of leviathan; as a metaphor for a king or ruler (Ps. 89 18 [19] Hos. 4 18 Ps. 47 9 [10]), etc.

3. sōḥērāh, סֹחֵרָה, Ps. 91 4†. A doubtful word. A second word for 'shield' in the same line of the stanza is improbable. 𝔊 reads κυκλώσει—i.e., יְסֹבְבֶךָּ, which Whitehouse and Che. Ps.(2) adopt.

4. šèleṭ, שֶׁלֶט. The derivation and meaning of this word are both obscure. In 2 S. 8 7 χλίδων (reading צְעָדָה?) and in ‖ 1 Ch. 18 7 κλοιός (also reading צְעָדָה?); in 2 K. 11 10 τρισσός [BA], δόρυ [L], but in ‖ 2 Ch. 23 9 ὅπλα (L δόρυ, ἄσπις, and ὅπλα); Cant. 4 4 βολίδες; Jer. 51 (28) 11 φαρέτρας.

5. kīdōn, כִּידוֹן. See JAVELIN, 5.

6. θυρεός, Eph. 6 16 (metaphorically, of faith).[1]

2. Form, etc.

Among the Hebrews, as among other peoples at an early stage of development (cp Evans, Anc. Bronze Implements of Gt. Brit. 343), shields were no doubt at first made of wicker-work, wood, or hide. The leather coverings would vary in thickness; a single hide, if suitably prepared, sometimes serving as well as a double. At a later date the wooden framework was bordered with metal. The partial employment of metal would soon suggest the discarding of wood almost (or quite) entirely.

[1] [To these, according to some (Baethgen, Kirkpatrick), should be added עֲגָלָה, 'ăgālāh. In Ps. 46 9 [10], where MT has עֲגָלוֹת, properly 'waggons' [EV 'chariots'], 𝔊 has θυρεούς, and Tg. עֲגִילִין, 'shields.' But in Nu. 31 50, Ezek. 16 12 עָגִיל, 'āgīl, means 'a ring,' and it is not probable that the Psalter should contain two words for 'shield' (see 3) found nowhere else in the OT. On the assumption that in Ps. 46 and elsewhere (see PSALMS, § 28) the Jeraḥmeelites or Edomites are the foes chiefly referred to, Cheyne (Ps.(2)) would read מגן ירחמאל; corrupt forms of ירח' often present נ instead of ח. Cp Ps. 76 3 [4], as restored in Ps.(2),

He has broken the quiver of Cusham,
The shield and the sword of Jeraḥmeel. T. K. C.]

In Egypt the shield 'was most commonly covered with bull's hide, having the hair outwards, like the laseïon of the Greeks, sometimes strengthened by one or more rims of metal, and studded with nails or metal pins, the inner part being probably wickerwork or a wooden frame, like many of those used by the Greeks and Romans, which were also covered with hide' (Wilk. Anc. Egypt. 1 198 f.).

We may infer that the early Israelites—or at any rate the Canaanites—borrowed the forms in use in Egypt.[1] Their common shields would therefore be a kind of parallelogram, broadest and arched at the top and cut square beneath. They were of wood covered with leather; a late prophet (Ezek. 39 9) speaks of them as easily burned.

The ṣinnah was most likely what in the feudal ages would have been called a pavise, for such occurs on the Egyptian monuments. Sometimes such a weapon was above 5 ft. high.[2] An example of an Egyptian weapon of the kind is to be seen in Erman's picture (Life in Anc. Egypt, 524; see also Wilk. Anc. Egypt. 1 202) of a soldier of the Middle Empire. The body is not protected by other armour—a fact which suggests that in ancient times the shield was large in proportion as other defensive armour was lacking. This shield resembles a Gothic window in shape. Shields of such dimensions must have been made of light material. During a march they were, at any rate in the time of Rameses II., hung over the soldiers' backs (see Erman, 546). At a later date the Assyrian pikemen carried an 'enormous shield, sometimes round and convex, sometimes arched at the top and square at the bottom' (Masp. Struggle of the Nations, 627 f.). But the Assyrians had shields of all sizes. Layard (Nineveh and Babylon, p. 193 f.) found bronze shields at Nimroud. They were 'circular, the rim bending inwards, and forming a deep groove round the edge.' They had iron handles, 'fastened by six bosses or nails, the heads of which form an ornament on the outer face of the shield. The diameter of the largest and most perfect is 2 feet 6 inches.'

The lighter shields may perhaps have been soaked in oil (2 S. 1 21, but see col. 2334, and cp Löhr, ad loc., Is. 21 5, yet see Duhm, who keeps the text, though declining the usual interpretation, and Crit. Bib., where the text is criticised), 'in order that the weapons of the enemy might the more readily glide off them' (Dr. TBS 183). As to the source whence shields were procured, one must have recourse to conjecture. It has been suggested (Kitto, Cycl.) that 'hippopotamus, rhinoceros, and elephant skin shields may have been brought from Ethiopia, and purchased by the Israelites in the Phœnician markets; such small whale-skin bucklers as are still used by Arabian swordsmen would come from the Erythræan Sea.' In Nah. 2 4 shields 'made red' (with copper, according to Nowack) are spoken of; but the text is too doubtful to be trusted. Among the 'Hittites' one of the three occupants of a chariot bore a small shield with which he protected himself and the others (see CHARIOT, col. 729); on the other hand, the single chariot-soldier of Egypt had to protect himself as well as manage his chariot (Erman, Anc. Egypt. 550). During the Assyrian and Persian supremacy the Hebrews may have used the square, oblong, and round shields of those nations, and may have subsequently copied those of Greece and Rome. High personages might have shields of precious metals (1 S. 17 6 1 K. 14 27 [brass], 2 S. 8 7 1 K. 10 16 f. 14 26; cp 1 Macc. 14 24 15 18 [gold]; the exaggeration in 1 Macc. 6 39 cannot be added; shields partly of brass or gold seem to be intended).

[1] In a picture of a 'Philistine' ship of war given by Maspero (The Struggle of the Nations, 701) the combatants carry small round shields. In the picture of the storming of Dapuru, the fortress of the Kheta, given in Erman (Anc. Egypt, 533), shields of various shapes and sizes are well illustrated.

[2] Cp Hewitt, Ancient Armour in Europe: 'besides the ordinary Northern shields, we sometimes find them represented of so large a size as to cover the whole person.' Hewitt points out that the same kind of shield is to be seen in Egyptian, Assyrian, and Indian monuments (77), and that 'the Chinese still (1855) use a large round shield of cane-wicker' (ib. note m).

3. Management. To facilitate their management the shields had a wooden or leathern handle, and they were often slung over the neck by a thong. With the larger kinds a testudo could be formed by pressing the ranks close together; and while the outside men kept their shields before and on the flanks, those within raised theirs above the head, and thus produced a kind of surface, sometimes as close and fitted together as a pantile roof, and capable of resisting the pressure even of a body of men marching upon it. We learn from Erman (529 f.) that when the soldiers of the first army of Amon [Amen] pitched their camp, they arranged their shields to form a great four-cornered enclosure.

To break the force of a blow, 'bosses' or ὀμφαλοί were attached; cp ἀσπίδες ὀμφαλόεσσαι (Hom. Il. 4 48). But whether such 'bosses' are really referred to in Job 15 26, where MT (and consequently EV) makes the wicked man 'run upon' God 'with the thick bosses of his bucklers,' בַּעֲבִי גַּבֵּי מָגִנָּיו, is, to say the least, doubtful. The whole verse has a suspicious aspect.

Shields were hung upon the battlements of walls (Ezek. 27 11, if the text is correct [but cp Crit. Bib.], Cant. 4 4 [?], cp 1 Macc. 4 57), and, as still occurs, chiefly above gates of cities by the watch and ward. In time of peace they were covered to preserve them from the sun, and in war uncovered; this sign was poetically used to denote coming hostilities, as in Is. 22 6 etc.

Besides the works mentioned above, use has been made in a few instances of the article 'Arms' in Kitto's Bib. Cyclop.

SHIGGAION (שִׁגָּיוֹן), Ps. 7 1 (title). The traditional Jewish view (cp Aq. ἀγνόημα, Sym., Theod. ὑπὲρ ἀγνοίας) connects it with שׁגה, šāgāh, 'to wander,' supposing an 'error' of David (see IGNORANCE, SINS OF) to be referred to,[1] whilst Rödiger, Ewald, Delitzsch, and others explain it as 'dithyramb' on the same etymological theory (𝔊BNAR simply ψαλμός). More plausible would be 'a prophetic rhythm' (שׁגע = שׁגה; cp Ar. saj'a, the rhyming prose of the Arabian kāhins or diviners).[2] Ps. 7, however, is not in the Hebrew or in the Arabian prophetic style, nor is its tone more prophetic than that of other psalms. Zimmern (Busspsalmen, 1; cp Hal. Rev. Sém., 1894, p. 1) connects Shiggaion with šigû, the name of a class of Babylonian hymns; but šigû is properly 'vehement lamentation' (Del. Ass. HWB), a description which does not apply to Ps. 7.

In Hab. 3 1 the plur. Shigionoth (שִׁגְיֹנוֹת, Aq. Sym. [ἐπὶ] ἀγνοημάτων; Vg. [pro] ignorantiis; AVmg. 'variable songs or tunes') is plainly an error for שְׁמִינִית,[3] (see SHEMINITH, UPON). The clever suggestions of Grätz (שיר נגינת) and Wellhausen (נגינות) (cp 𝔊BNAQ, μετὰ ᾠδῆς; also, in Ps. Sol. 17, title) fail to do justice to the facts. Grätz neglects על; Wellhausen changes ש into נ, and gives נגינה a plur. form and a meaning to which it has no right (see NEGINAH, but cp HABAKKUK [BOOK], § 8).

SHIHON (שִׁיאוֹן), Josh. 19 19 AV, RV SHION (q.v.).

SHIHOR OF EGYPT, RV Shihor [The Brook] of Egypt (1 Ch. 13 5, שִׁיחוֹר מִצְרַיִם [ἀπὸ] ὁρίων αἰγύπτου [BNAL]),

[1] See the Midrash, and cp Field, Hex., ad loc.
[2] See Wellh. Ar. Heid.(1) 130; Hoffm. ZATW 3 89, and cp PROPHET, § 13. Hitzig on Ps. 7 1 makes the above comparison, but combines with it an arbitrary theory.
[3] גי (like ני) may proceed from an original מ.

or 'SHIHOR (RV THE SHIHOR), which is before [i.e., eastward of] Egypt' (EV, Josh. 13 3, הַשִּׁיחוֹר אֲשֶׁר עַל־פְּנֵי מִצְרַיִם, ἀπὸ τῆς ἀοικήτου [יְשִׁימוֹן?] τῆς κατὰ πρόσωπον αἰγ. [BAL]), Is. 23 3, Shihor (שִׁחֹר; μεταβόλων = סֹחֵר [BNAQ]), Jer. 2 18 (שִׁחוֹר, γηων [BNAQ], σιωρ [Qmg.]).

The position of the Shihor question was until lately as follows. In Is. 23 3 Jer. 2 18 either the Nile, or more strictly (Frd. Del. Par. 311) the Pelusiac arm of the Nile, seemed evidently to be intended, which appeared to make it probable that in 1 Ch. 13 5 Josh. 13 3 also the reference was to the Nile. This required the assumption that both the Chronicler and R_D gave an idealistic extension to the SW. frontier of Canaan. It was urged, on the other hand, that in Nu. 34 5 Josh. 15 4 1 K. 8 65 2 K. 24 7 Is. 27 12 the S. or SW. frontier specified is the נַחַל מִצְרַיִם (MT), which is supposed to be the Wādy el-'Arīš (see EGYPT, RIVER OF), and according to Franz Delitzsch and Kautzsch-Socin this wady is also referred to in Gen. 15 18 as the נְהַר מִצְרַיִם (MT). Were there, then, two Shihors? Steuernagel removes the difficulty in part by reading המדבר, 'the desert' instead of השיחור, 'the Shihor' (see 𝔊), in Josh. 13 3, and Benzinger does the same for 1 Ch. 13 5 by supposing that a thoughtless scribe substituted שיחר for נחל מצרים (cp 1 K. 8 65)—i.e., the Wādy el-'Arīš. In Is. 23 3 Jer. 2 18 the reference to the Nile has been pretty generally admitted. All that remained was to get a probable explanation for Shihor. The existence of the name SHIHOR-LIBNATH in the territory of Asher seemed to favour a Hebrew meaning; and it was thought that 'Shihor' might mean 'the dark-coloured turbid stream,' in allusion to the black mud of the Nile (cp the native name of Egypt, Kēmet, 'the black land,' EGYPT, § 1). Hommel, however, in 1897 (AHT 244), changed the position of the Shihor question, by showing that in all probability there was, to the SW. of Canaan, a land of Asshur or Shur, extending from the Wādy el-'Arīš to the region of Beersheba and Hebron, and pointed out the striking parallelism between 'the Shihor which is before מצרים' in Josh. 13 3 and 'Shur which is before מצרים' in Gen. 25 18. He even went so far as to explain גשור (Geshur) as 'simply a contraction of Gê-Ashûr or Gê-Shûr.' The present writer's investigations are in the main independent of those of Winckler and Hommel, though stimulated by the earlier writings of these scholars. He is of opinion that the true name of this region is neither Geshur nor Asshur but Ashḥur (out of which the other forms arose), and that Shiḥor is a cognate of this, also that Ashḥur, Asshur, or Geshur acquired a wider reference than Hommel has indicated.

The theory of the present writer is that this term occurs in many passages of the OT as practically synonymous with Jeraḥmeel, and we can well believe that the נחל מצרים (if this phrase may be taken to mean 'the wādy of Miṣrim'—i.e., of the Arabian Muṣri), was also at an early period called the wādy of Ashḥur, and at a later time the wādy Shiḥor (a modification of Ashḥur, cp SHEHARIAH); between 1 Ch. 13 5 and 1 K. 8 65 there will, therefore, if these views are correct, be no inconsistency.

A fair estimate of this theory is only possible in connection with a thorough methodical study of the OT, or at least of the greater part of it, from the point of view indicated at the end of the article NAME. There is little reason to suppose (see Crit. Bib.) that the result will be adverse to the theory.

It should also be emphasised that the critical investigation here referred to supports the view that Winckler's explanation of the name מצרים as the N. Arabian Muṣri in the phrase נחל מצרים, and in a large number of passages besides those which contain this phrase, is correct. Hommel's more recent theory that מצור (i.e., according to him, Moṣar or Maṣor) means Midian—i.e., the NW. Arabian coast from Leukekome to 'Aḳabah, is closely akin to that of Winckler, who regards Muṣri as the name of a N. Arabian kingdom, in vassalage to the more powerful Minæan kingdom, and peopled by the race called Midian (cp KAT(3) 143).

We have still to ascertain whether Is. 23 3 and Jer. 2 18, critically regarded, are, or are not, consistent with the theory respecting Ashḥur, Asshur, or Geshur, stated above. (a) Is. 23 3, as it now stands, is fairly rendered by RV :—

'And on great waters the seed of Shihor, the harvest of the Nile (יאור), was her revenue; and she was the mart (?) of nations.'

With the exception of Duhm all commentators have admitted that Shihor here means the Nile, though Dillmann noticed the awkwardness of the style here and elsewhere in the poem, which, together with the occurrence of 'Kaśdīm' (Chaldæans) in v. 13, suggested his theory that the original work (vv. 1-13) was recast by a later hand (cp Intr. Is. 139-143). Duhm, however, thinks that the writer means the Shihor on the S. border of Asher (see SHIHOR-LIBNATH), 'which, according to Gen. 49 20 (Ezek. 27 18), supplied Zidon with corn and the like.'

He regards יאור (no tin 𝔊) as an incorrect gloss. Duhm speaks of 'Zidon' rather than 'Tyre,' because צר in vv. 5 (?) 8 is, in his opinion, miswritten for צירון. Marti assents to this, but thinks that the gloss (יאור) is correct, and that 'Shihor,' after all, does mean the Nile. If, however, it is highly probable (see PROPHET, § 35 ff.) that the geographical names have been transformed by an editor in very many of the prophecies, it becomes at once probable that here, as elsewhere, צר should be מִצַּר, and צירון either סְרֵין or perhaps מִצּוּר. In this case we can hardly doubt that שִׁחֹר (Shihor), which is not understood by 𝔊 to be the name of a river, or even a proper name at all, should be either סחרים, 'merchants' (so 𝔊), or rather אַשְׁחוּר, 'Ashḥur.' תרשיש in vv. 1 6 10 has the same origin (see TARSHISH), whilst יאור presumably comes from יְעִיר. At any rate, the presence of שחר and סחר close together points to the existence of much uncertainty as to the right reading of the word which underlies both words.

(b) In Jer. 2 18 the prophet reproaches the Jews for being continually on the road to מצרים, 'to drink the water of Shihor,' and to Asshur, 'to drink the water of the river.' Most think that מצרים means 'Mizraim'—i.e., Egypt—and that 'Asshur' is the great kingdom whose capital was Nineveh. But in the context (v. 16) we only read of the 'sons of Noph and Tahapanes.' Either then 'Asshur' is superfluous, or it denotes the same country as מצרים. In the latter case מצרים must mean the N. Arabian Muṣri, and נף ותחפנס ('Noph and Tahapanes' ?) must be corrupt.[1] Clearly this is preferable; the quatrain in v. 18 must not be mutilated. 'Shihor' and 'Asshur' are ultimately the same name, but 'Shihor' has already become differentiated from 'Asshur,' and means the נהר מצרים (Gen. 15 18).[2] That 𝔊 in v. 18 reads γηων (Gihon) instead of 'Shihor' is hardly of importance for textual criticism.

It does, however, prove that the Greek translator did not understand Shihor, and therefore substituted for it a name which, owing to a misinterpretation of Gen. 2 13 (where 'Cush' becomes 'Ethiopia'), he supposed to be a Hebrew name for the Nile. It is no objection to our exegesis that in v. 36 אשור is represented as distinct from מצרים, for in v. 18 the right reading probably is, not אשור (Asshur), but אשחור (Ashḥur).

The above is written independently of Hommel's later investigations (Aufsätze, 3 1 [1901]) as well as of Winckler's more recent writings. Hommel holds that in Josh. 13 3 and in 1 Ch. 13 5 'the Shihor' is inaccurately put for the 'naḥal Moṣar.' He derives 'Shihor' from 'Shiḥon,' which he identifies with Seiḥân, the Arabic name of one of the rivers of Paradise. The 'Gihon' is the 'river' (נהר) of Asshur (or as he points it, Ashur—i.e., Edom); this he identifies with the Wādy Sirḥan (reckoned with the Euphratean stream region), the Ḥiddeḳel (as he thinks) of Gen. 2 14. Hommel's statements are criticised unsympathetically by König, Fünf neue arabische Landschaftsnamen im AT beleuchtet (1902). T. K. C.

SHIHOR-LIBNATH (שִׁיחוֹר לִבְנָת; CEIWN [B], C[E]IWP [AL], KAI ΛABANAΘ; Sihor et Labanath), apparently near Carmel on the S. boundary of Asher (Josh. 19 26†). The ancients, including Eusebius and Jerome (OS 275 23 136 2), distinguished two places called respectively Shihor and Labanath. Since, however, SHIHOR [q.v.] occurs elsewhere only as the name of a river, the moderns prefer to take Shihor-libnath as a compound phrase meaning 'the Shihor of Libnath.' There may have been a place near called Libnath, and Hommel (AHT 243) ingeniously conjectures that the Asherites, who originally dwelt between Egypt and Judah (cp ASHER, § 1), called the stream which marked the S. boundary of their territory by the name of Shihor in memory of the Nile. 'SHIHOR' [q.v.], however, does not mean the Nile. It is more probable that just as כרמל (Carmel) comes (according to the present writer's theory) from ירחמאל (Jeraḥmeel), so שיחור (Shiḥor) in Josh., as well as elsewhere, comes from אשחור (Ashḥūr), and that both names indicate that the sites called 'Carmel' and 'Shiḥor' had been originally occupied by Jeraḥmeelites and Ashḥurites (a distinction without a difference ?) respectively. There were probably other places called Ashḥur (Ḥeres, for instance [see HERES, MOUNT]); one of them was near Libnath, or belonged to a Laban or Libnah clan. See SHIHOR.

From the earlier point of view, Dillmann's identification of 'the [river] Shihor of Libnath' with the Nahr ez-Zerḳā (i.e., 'the dark blue river,' a little to the N. of Cæsarea, appeared plausible (but cp Buhl, Pal. 105). J. D. Michaelis and Gesenius (Thes. 1393) thought of the river Belus (now Nahr Na'mān, S. of 'Akkā), from the fine sand of which, according to Pliny, glass (לבנה, 'transparence' ??) was made. T. K. SHIKKERON (שִׁכְּרוֹן), Josh. 15 11 RV, AV SHICRON (q.v.).

SHILHI (שִׁלְחִי, § 52), apparently the name of the father-in-law of king Jehoshaphat, 1 K. 22 42 (CEMEEI [B], CAΛAΛA [A], CEΛEEI [L in 16 30], 2 Ch. 20 31 (CAΛEI [BA], CEΛEEI [L]), but really, as the CEMEEI of 𝔊[B] in 1 K. 22 42 (from CEΛEEIM = SHILHIM [q.v.]) shows, the name of the birthplace of Azubah, the king's mother. The majority, if not all, of the names of Jehoshaphat's brothers, together with his own, suggest a family connection with the Negeb. Cp HALLOHESH. T. K. C.

SHILHIM (שִׁלְחִים). A city of Judah 'towards the border of Edom,' Josh. 15 32 (CAΛH [B], CEΛEEIM [AL]). Perhaps the same as SHARUHEN (q.v.); cp also Shaaraim (Buhl, Pal. 185). Azubah, bath SHILHI (q.v.), was probably a native of Shilhim (see SHILHI). T. K. C.

A town of Ephraim, where the sanctuary of the ark was, under the priesthood of the house of ELI (q.v.).

1. Ephraimite town. According to 1 S. 3 3 15, this sanctuary was not a tabernacle, but a temple with doors. Josh. 18 1 [P], however, has it that the tabernacle was set up there by Joshua after the conquest. In Judg. 21 19 f. the yearly feast at Shiloh appears as of merely local character. Shiloh seems to have been destroyed by the Philistines after the disastrous battle of Ebenezer (cp Jer. 7 12 14 26 6 9; see ISRAEL, § 11). The position described in Judg. 21 19 (cp OS 152 1) gives certainty to the identification with the modern Seilūn lying some 2 m. ESE. of Lubban (Lebonah), on the road from Bethel to Shechem. Here there is a ruined village, with a flat, double-topped hill behind it, offering a strong position, which suggests that the place was a stronghold as well as a sanctuary. A smiling and fertile landscape surrounds the hill.

[1] Read נפתח ירחמאל; see NAPHTUHIM.

[2] Even if the Wādy of Ashḥur and the Wādy of Muṣri were, strictly speaking, distinct, some laxity in a Hebrew writing is intelligible.

That there was a Shiloh in the territory of Ephraim, is undeniable. It is probable, however, that there was another place with at least a similar name, in Benjamin, which was confounded by later writers (Jer., Ps.) with the northern Shiloh.

2. Probable Benjamite town.

שילו, שלו, and שלה, are all regarded by the present writer as connected with שָׁאוּל (Shaul) and שָׁלִשָׁה (Shalishah), names of Edomite, or rather Jeraḥmeelite, origin, which were not confined to one part of the country. He sees reason to think that the names, both of Eli and of his two sons, connect Eli's family with the Jeraḥmeelites, and there is evidence in the genealogy of Samuel connecting his family with the same N. Arabian stock; indeed the name of Samuel (see SAUL, § 1) may appear identical with the Jeraḥmeelite name of Saul.

It is very possible that the sanctuary of the ark was in the Benjamite not in the Ephraimite Shiloh (or rather Shalishah?); also that in the original narrative from which Josh. 18 1 (cp 19 51 21 2 22 9 12) is derived, the place intended was Shalishah in Benjamin. We can now probably understand aright the statement in Judg. 18 31 that the shrine containing Micah's graven image remained 'all the time that the house of God was in שלה.' Laish or Dan was not improbably the famous city of Ḥalūṣah in the Negeb (see MICAH, § 2), and of course shared the fortunes of the sanctuary in Benjamin which contained the ark. The question also arises whether the enigmatical statement about the 'daughters of Shiloh' in Judg. 21 19 ff. does not really refer to a southern city. In SHILOH ii. it has been argued that in all probability שילה (EV Shiloh) in Gen. 49 10 has been corrupted out of לַיְשָׁה (Laishah), which in turn is a popular distortion of Ḥalūṣah. It is possible that the place near which, according to the narrative, the capture of wives was effected by the Benjamites was really Laishah—i.e., Ḥalūṣah. The transformation of names in Judg. 21 19, which this theory presupposes, is not stranger than similar transformations which we have assumed elsewhere. Bethel is the southern Bethel—containing the sanctuary of Ḥalūṣah, Shechem should be Cusham (see SHECHEM), and Lebonah is a southern Libnah (cp Nu. 33 20 f.). Cp also MELCHIZEDEK.

Not only the names Eli, Hophni, Phinehas, but also Aḥitub, strongly favour the view that the family of Eli was Jeraḥmeelite, and to some extent make it natural to place the sanctuary of the ark in one of the territories known as Jeraḥmeelite. For אחיטוב (in accordance with types of corruption which we have often conjectured) is probably from רְחֹבוֹת, 'Reḥoboth,' or רְחֹבוֹתִי 'Rehobothite,' a view which is somewhat confirmed by the famous reading of 𝔊B in 1 S. 4 21, ουαιβαρχαβωθ, if we may take it (nearly as We., col. 2144) as אוֹי רְחֹבוֹת, 'Alas, Rehoboth!' It is, in fact, not improbable (as 1 S. 14 3 [see below] shows) that אי כבוד (Ichabod) and אחיטוב (Ahitub) are ultimately the same name. The corruption of רחבות into אחיטוב is not worse than many assumed corruptions, while the other corruption אי כבוד would be suggested by pious sentiment. Both corruptions, it will be noticed, imply the dropping out of ר from what we may assume as the original name—i.e., אוי רחבות, 'Oi-rehoboth.' May we then assume that there was a Rehoboth close to the Shalishah in Benjamin where the sanctuary of the ark may be best supposed to have been? It is better to hold that 'Rehoboth' and 'Jeraḥmeel' were used as synonyms. A clan of N. Arabian origin might indifferently be called 'Reḥobothite' and 'Jerahmeelite' (see REHOBOTH). Thus an Ephraimite site for the sanctuary of the ark, though believed in by later writers, becomes more and more improbable.

1 S. 14 3 runs אחיה בן־אחיטוב אחי אי־כבוד בן־פינחס בן־עלי. There are many parallels for the view tnat אי כבוד is a variant to אחיטוב; אחי would be inserted as a link when the variant made its way into the text. Note the warning Paseḳ.

SHILOH (שִׁילֹה; on versions see below), a proper name in EV of Gen. 49 10.

In the 'Blessing of Jacob' (Gen. 49 1-27; cp GENESIS, § 4, end) it is said—between the comparison of Judah to a lion, and the poetic description of the flourishing vine-culture in his territory—that 'the sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be,' into which rendering of AV, however,

1. Text and versions.

RV introduces the alterations 'the ruler's staff' for 'a lawgiver' (transferred to RVmg.), 'obedience' for 'gathering,' and 'peoples' for the archaism 'people.' RVmg. also gives, 'Till he come to Shiloh, having the obedience of the peoples,' and records the ambiguous reading שֶׁלּוֹ. The Hebrew of MT is:—

לֹא יָסוּר שֵׁבֶט מִיהוּדָה
וּמְחֹקֵק מִבֵּין רַגְלָיו
עַד כִּי־יָבֹא שִׁילֹה
וְלוֹ יִקְּהַת עַמִּים׃

Ginsburg gives as Ḳre שִׁילוֹ, which is a rare spelling of the place-name Shiloh, if it is not rather meant to signify 'his son,' see note.

A critical conspectus of the diverse interpretations of this passage would require many pages (for this we may refer to the special monographs).[1] We can only give such references to ancient or modern hypotheses as may save the student from committing himself to untenable or precarious views, and justify the offering of a new interpretation based upon a critical examination of the text, and confirmed by the study of some important historical passages elsewhere. It is not enough to rest in interpretations, however widely prevalent, which have an insecure textual basis; we are bound to attempt to lift the exegesis of this much disputed passage to a higher level, and to free it from the uncertainties of theological or semi-theological controversy.

The ancient renderings that chiefly concern us are:—

1. 𝔊 (and Theod.): οὐκ ἐκλείψει ἄρχων ἐξ Ἰούδα καὶ ἡγούμενος ἐκ τῶν μηρῶν αὐτοῦ ἕως ἂν ἔλθῃ τὰ ἀποκείμενα αὐτῷ, καὶ αὐτὸς προσδοκία ἐθνῶν. Several MSS have ᾧ ἀπόκειται, a few ὃ ἀπόκειται αὐτῷ or ὃ ἀπόκειται. The rendering ἐκ τῶν μηρῶν αὐτοῦ is one of the signs that the interpretation of the passage was influenced by Dt. 28 57. προσδοκία suggests the reading תִּקְוַת. On τὰ ἀποκ. αὐτῷ, see below.

2. Aq. οὐκ ἀναστήσεται σκῆπτρον ἀπὸ Ἰ. καὶ ἀκριβαζόμενος ἀπὸ μεταξὺ ποδῶν αὐτοῦ ἕως ἂν ἔλθῃ . . . καὶ αὐτῷ σύστημα λαῶν. Sym. οὐ περιαιρεθήσεται ἐξουσία ἀπὸ Ἰ. . . .

3. Pesh. (a).

'The wielder of power shall not pass away from the house of Judah, nor the scribe from his sons' sons for ever until that the anointed one come to whom belongs the kingdom and to him shall the peoples submit themselves.'

We have first to ask, Can Shiloh be a proper name, as the Reformation Versions mostly suppose?[2] As Driver has well observed, 'no ancient version, and indeed no known authority for several centuries after the Christian era, implies the Massoretic reading, or sees in the passage a proper name. It is true that it was generally interpreted in antiquity of the Messianic

2. Shiloh not a proper name.

The former takes Shiloh to mean 'peace-bringer'—i.e., Solomon; the conclusion of the latter scholar is given in the text in his own words. These monographs may be supplemented by the notes of Delitzsch, Dillmann, Gunkel, and Ball, in their works on Genesis. Cp also G. Baur, Gesch. der Alttest. Weissagung (1861), 227-290.

[2] Driver traces this rendering to Seb. Münster (1534), who gives 'quousque veniet Silo.' Pagninus (1528) gave 'Messias'; Luther (1534), 'der Held.'

or ideal future of Israel; but this sense was reached in virtue of the general context of the passage, and not through a proper name Shiloh.' Indeed, a proper name meaning Peace-bringer (which is the sense postulated for the proper name Shiloh) can certainly not be derived from √שלה, 'to be quiet, careless, secure'; the phrase we should have required is שַׂר שָׁלוֹם, 'prince of peace' (cp Is. 9 5 [6]), or, if the text of Mic. 5 4 [5] is correct, שָׁלוֹם, 'peace'—i.e., [König, Styl. 21] 'auctor pacis.'[1]

Those who (like Delitzsch, Dillmann) defend the rendering, 'until he come to Shiloh,' see a reference to the assembly of the tribes of Israel held, according to P, at Shiloh (Josh. 18 1), when 'the land had been subdued before them.' They take שֵׁבֶט to mean, not the royal sceptre, but the staff of the chieftain or leader, exactly like מְחֹקֵק (if this word really means 'staff of authority'); so that the passage will mean, 'Judah shall continue to be the valiant leader of the tribes of Israel, till, the peoples of Canaan having been subdued, they can celebrate the victory by a solemn religious assembly at Shiloh.' This, however, puts too much into the simple phrase 'until he comes to Shiloh,' and v. 10*d* conveys the impression that the victory over the 'peoples' is the victory, not of all the tribes, but of Judah. Moreover, שִׁילֹה is not one of the recognised ways of spelling the place-name 'Shiloh,' and it is even doubtful whether the Massoretes intended to favour this interpretation.[2]

3. No reference to the place 'Shiloh.'

Hence some good critics adopt the old reading שֶׁלֹּה or שֶׁלּוֹ (see 𝕲). According to Driver, the rendering

4. 𝕲's reading unacceptable.

'till he whose [it is] shall come' would afford an excellent sense, but is not reconcilable with the absence of the subject in the relative clause. 'Perhaps,' he adds, 'we should fall back upon the original LXX construction, and render "Till that which (or, he that) is his shall come," and regard the clause as an indeterminate expression of the Messianic hope, which was afterwards defined more distinctly.' The reading שֶׁלּוֹ is also adopted by Wellhausen (Gesch. 1 375, n. 1, but cp CH 321), Stade (GVI 1 159, n. 5), Ball (doubtfully), Briggs, v. Orelli, Holzinger, Gunkel. It is thought to be presupposed, not only by 𝕲, but also by the language of Ezek. 21 32 [27], עַד־בֹּא אֲשֶׁר־לוֹ הַמִּשְׁפָּט, 'until he come whose right it is.'

If, however, τὰ ἀποκ. αὐτῷ is a genuine rendering, שֶׁלּוֹ cannot be the whole of the text which the translator had before him. The present writer, therefore (Theol. Rev. cited at end), suggested יוּשַׁת לוֹ or (as Rönsch before him) יוּשַׂם לוֹ. Most probably, however, 𝕲 simply made the best of the obscure reading שֶׁלּוֹ, a reading unworthy of acceptance,[3] and clearly a fragment of some longer word. שֶׁלּוֹ וְלוֹ would, in fact, be intolerable. As to Ezek. 21 32, it is by no means clear that the prophet was thinking of Gen. 49 10. Very possibly the reading שֶׁלּוֹ was suggested by a misleading reminiscence of Ezekiel.[4]

But if the passage is, at any rate in the larger sense, Messianic—and this is generally assumed, because of the reference in d to a universal empire,—what are we

[1] König, however (l.c.), qualifies his statement by an 'at least' in the next sentence. There can hardly be a doubt that the text needs emendation (see MICAH [BOOK], § 5, e).

[2] A favourite Jewish interpretation of שִׁילֹה (found in Ibn Janâḥ and Ḳimḥi) was 'his son' (cp Talm. שְׁלִיל, Ar. salîl, 'extractus, filius'); e.g., Tg. ps.-Jon. paraphrases וְעֵיר בְּנוֹי, 'his youngest son,' an interpretation which, according to Driver, is 'perhaps embodied in the Massoretic pointing.'

[3] It is usual to find in שֶׁלּוֹ a deliberate affectation of mystery. But it is more than mystery; it is grammatical obscurity. In a solemn benediction like this, nothing but Ezek.'s אֲשֶׁר־לוֹ הַמִּשְׁפָּט would be tolerable, if a veiled reference to the legitimate king of Judah were intended.

to read in place of שִׁילֹה or שֶׁלֹּה or שֶׁלּוֹ? Matthew Hiller (OS, 1706, p. 931), Lagarde ($OS^{(1)}$ 295, $OS^{(2)}$ 368), the present writer (op. cit.), as an alternative, and Bickell (Carmina VT metrice, 1882, p. 188), took שִׁילֹה to be a contracted form of שְׁאִילָה, 'he whom Judah prays for'; cp perhaps Dt. 33 7, where, according to Gunkel,[1] 'bring him to his people,' means 'bring the Messianic king to his people.' This is at any rate more plausible than the idea that שִׁילֹה should be שָׁלֻחַ or שִׁלֹחַ (Vg., 'qui mittendus est'), with which compare the view of Grotius (col. 1803) that Jn. 9 7 identifies 'Siloam' with 'Shiloh.' But is the passage before us really Messianic? Critics who in our day hold this view, generally regard Gen. 49 10 as a later insertion. This is, of course, a permissible hypothesis; but, on different grounds from those of Gunkel, we are compelled to reject it.

The truth is, we believe, that the text of the passage in its context requires a much more thorough examination before we can proceed to exegesis. There are serious difficulties both in v. 10 and in v. 11 f. Does מְחֹקֵק mean 'staff of authority'? and, if not, how can שֵׁבֶט be parallel to it? Is מִבֵּין רַגְלָיו, however it be explained, at all natural? And is יְקָהַת a sound reading? Then, in v. 11, is סוּתֹה correct, and are such expressions as these possible—'he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes with the blood of grapes'? In v. 12 is חַכְלִילִי correct?[2] and is not the whole verse superfluous?

5. The restored text and its meaning.

By a careful criticism the present writer has elsewhere reached the following text:—

לֹא־יָסוּר שֹׁפֵט מִיהוּדָה	A champion shall not depart from Judah,
וּמְחֹקֵק מִבֵּין גְּדוּדָיו	Nor a marshal from between his bands,
עַד כִּי־יָבֹס לַיְשָׁה	Until he tramples upon Laishah,
וְלוֹ [יִשְׁמְעוּ] יְרַחְמְאֵלִים	And the Jerahmeelites are obedient unto him.[3]

Verse 11 may here be passed over with the remark that it probably continues the description of the conquest of the Negeb by Judah, and that כִּבֵּס בַּיַּיִן לְבֻשׁוֹ should probably be יִכְבֹּשׁ בְּנֵי יִשְׁמָעֵאל, 'he shall subdue the b'ne Ishmael,' the proof of which is that in v. 12, which should certainly be read יְרַחְמְאֵלִים בְּנֵי יִשְׁמָעֵאל יְרַחְמְאֵל, the true text contained a correction of the miswritten words in v. 10. See Crit. Bib. Laishah, considered already, may be, as we have seen (SHILOH, 1), Ḥalūṣah, one of the most important cities of the Negeb. Who the Jerahmeelites are, we also know; they are the same as the Zarephathites or 'Pelethites' (the Philistines of MT) who were the chief enemies of Israel in the days of Saul and the early period of David. If this theory be adopted there is no reason for the hypothesis of interpolation. Contrary to the prevalent opinion, the whole of the blessing of Judah is continuous. Beginning with a description of the fierce and fearless courage of the tribe of Judah, it goes on to prophesy that judges or champions of Judah's rights (the rights of the strongest) will never be wanting till its troublesome neighbours, the Jerahmeelites or Zarephahthites, have been conquered,—a conquest which in the original song was described in some detail.

The theory suggested with regard to שִׁילֹה throws a fresh light on 1 K. 11 29, where (see JEROBOAM i., end)

[1] Genesis, 436, (2) 424. The singular theory connected with this interpretation cannot be here discussed.

[2] Contrast Prov. 23 29.

[3] For the confusion of שֵׁבֶט and שֹׁפֵט, cp 2 S. 7 7 1 Ch. 17 6 (parallels in We. TBS 170); and for the sense 'ruler,' 'marshal,' see 𝕲 and Onk. For the correction גדודיו, cp ENSIGN, § 1 b (on דגל; Sam. here דגליו). For יָבֹס, cp SBOT on Is. 41 25. In d ישמעו fell out through the vicinity of words (שילה=עמים) containing virtually all these letters. Cp also JERAHMEEL, § 4.

the true text perhaps said that Jeroboam had just come from Miṣrim, or rather Ishmael, where he was 'found' by the prophet Ahijah the Shilonite. Was Ahijah really an Ephraimite prophet? It is more natural to suppose that he was of a place much nearer to the N. Arabian land from which Jeroboam had come, viz., of Laishah (i.e., Ḥalūṣah), a name which we have found to have been altered by a scribe's error into Shiloh in Gen. 49 10.

The literature of Gen. 49 10 is extensive. In 𝔊BA, however, it is Shimeath's son that is Ammonite. Possibly 'Ammonite' stands for 'Jerahmeelite' (Che.). See SILLA, SHIMRITH.

SHIMEATHITES (שִׁמְעָתִים; σαμαθιειμ [BA], -θειν [L]), 1 Ch. 2 55. See JABEZ.

SHIMEI (שִׁמְעִי, a gentilicium of שִׁמְעוֹן [see WRS, Journ. Phil. 9 96]; σεμε[ε]ι). 1. b. Gera of BAHURIM (q.v.), a Benjamite of the house of Saul who cursed David as he fled from Absalom[1] (2 S. 16 5-13). On David's return after the death of Absalom Shimei is said to have been the foremost of the 'house of Joseph' to go down (with a thousand Benjamites), to welcome the king. In return he begged for forgiveness (2 S. 19 16-23). In David's last words, however (1 K. 2 8 f.), the king charges his son to put Shimei out of the way, as a proof of his wisdom (see DAVID, col. 1034, n. 1; Ki. Hist. 1 181, but cp Wi. GI 2 247). Upon his accession, Solomon permits Shimei to dwell at Jerusalem on certain conditions (see KIDRON, § 2), which after three years Shimei violates, ostensibly in order to recover two slaves who had fled to Achish king of Gath[1] (rather, of REHOBOTH). He is slain by Benaiah at the royal command (1 K. 2 36-46). The exact course of events is not free from doubt, but this at least is clear: Shimei was a leader of the Benjamites who was politically dangerous, and it is likely that he really sought to draw Nahash, king of Rehoboth, into his schemes. Nahash may in fact very possibly have been displeased at the coup d'état which had made Solomon his suzerain. On the 'legend' of Shimei, cp Winckler (GI, l.c.), and see below, nos. 2 and 10.

2. Shimei and Rei and the gibbōrīm who belonged to David are enumerated among those who did not join Adonijah in his attempt on the throne (1 K. 1 8, σαμαιας [L]). It seems best to assume with Winckler (GI, l.c.) that Shimei 1. is intended, while REI (q.v.) may be = Ira, a kōhēn or perhaps sōkēn ('minister') of David, mentioned in 2 S. 20 26. Stade, however (GVI 1 293, n. 1), thinks that they were two officers of David's bodyguard; the fact that the two names do not occur elsewhere in 1 K. 1 only shows the fragmentariness of our knowledge of the times. Some think that one of David's heroes, SHAMMUAH (3) or Shimei, may be meant; Ewald's suggestion that David's brother Shammuah (or Shimeah) is intended is unlikely (see RADDAI).

3. b. Elah, high officer of Solomon in Benjamin (1 K. 4 18; om. B, σεμεει [A], σαμα [L]). See SHAMMAH, 3.

4. 2 S. 21 21, σαμαα [L] AV SHIMEAH, see SHAMMAH, 2.

5. b. Pedaiah; brother of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3 19 om. B), perhaps the same as SHEMAIAH (v. 22).

6. b. Zaccur, of SIMEON (§ 9 ii.) (1 Ch. 4 26 f.), who had sixteen sons and six daughters, and is described as the father of an important clan (gens) which overtopped all others, but did not equal the b'ne Judah (within whose territory it was settled); cp perhaps Shemaiah, v. 37.

7. b. JOEL, of REUBEN (§ 13), 1 Ch. 5 4 (σαμεε [L]); cp v. 8, Shema (σεμεει [L]) b. Joel.

8. AV Shimhi, a Benjamite, the father of Adaiah, Shimrath, and BERAIAH [q.v.,] (1 Ch. 8 21 σαμαειθ [B], σαμαι [A], in v. 13 called SHEMA [q.v., no. 3]). See AIJALON.

9. A Ramathite, or man of Ramah (הָרָמָתִי, ὁ ἐκ ραηλ [B], ὁ ῥαμαθαῖος [AL]), one of David's officers who was 'over the vineyards' (1 Ch. 27 27). Which of the southern Ramahs is meant, is unknown. 𝔊B's ραηλ may spring from 'Jeraḥmeel' (Che.).

10. b. Kish, a Benjamite, an ancestor of MORDECAI (Esth. 2 5 . . . τοῦ σεμεειου [BאLβ], . . . τοῦ σεμειου [ALα]); in the apocrypha of Esther (11 2) σεμεειου [B], σεμειου [אLαβ], SEMEI, RV SEMEIAS. Shimei is here evidently, like Kish, a clan-name; a reference to the person who 'cursed David' is out of the question.

11. Shimei occurs frequently in the later writings as a son of Gershon b. Levi (Ex. 6 17 [AV Shimi] Nu. 3 18, 1 Ch. 6 17 [2]). He appears in 1 Ch. 6 as the son of Jahath, v. 42 (27), with which contrast 1 Ch. 23 9 f. where he is the father of Jahath; again in v. 29 [14] (σομεει [B]) Libni, who elsewhere is his brother, appears as his son, and both are Merarite Levites. He is the founder of the Shimites (AV) or more correctly (with RV) Shimeites (Nu. 3 21: הַשִּׁמְעִי; τοῦ σεμεει [B, om. F], . . . σεμει [AL]). What is meant by 'the Shimeites' (so RV; AV 'Shimei,' הַשִּׁמְעִי; but 𝔊 and Pesh. have 'Simeon') in Zech. 12 13, Nowack pronounces to be unknown. Baudissin (Priesterthum, 248), however, thinks that the above-mentioned Shimeites of Gershon are meant. [For a revision of the text of the whole passage, without attempting which probably no single detail can be understood, see Crit. Bib.]

12. One of the sons of Jeduthun (1 Ch. 25 17: [σ]εμεει [B], σουρει [L]), whose name should be inserted in v. 3 with 𝔊BA (but 𝔊L ιεζδρει) to make up the full number six.

13. A son of Haman (2 Ch. 29 14).

14. A Levite, Ezra 10 23 (σαμου [BA], -ουδ [א]); in 1 Esd. 9 23 SEMIS, RV SEMEIS (σενσεις [B], σεμεις [A]).

15. One of the b. HASHUM (Ezra 10 33); in 1 Esd. 9 32 SEMEI.

16. One of the b. BANI (Ezra 10 38); 𝔊BאA, however, for BINNUI, SHIMEI, reads 'the sons of Shimei,' but 𝔊L υἱοὶ βουνει σ. In 1 Esd. 9 34, SAMIS, RV SOMEIS (σομεεις [BA]).

[1] [Note that Achish is called 'ben Maachah.' Maachah, like Ahiman (which 𝔊L has instead of 'Maoch' in 1 S. 27 2), may plausibly be taken to be a popular corruption of Jerahmeel. Achish, then, was connected with N. Arabia. ('Achish,' however, should perhaps be emended into 'Nahash.' See NAHASH, 2. Tradition seems to have varied.)]

SHIMRATH (שִׁמְרָת, § 78; σαμαραθ [BA], -ρει [L]) of BENJAMIN (§ 9), assigned to the b'ne SHIMEI (1 Ch. 8 21†).

SHIMRI (שִׁמְרִי; σαμαρ[ε]ι [AL]), a N. Arabian and S. Palestinian ethnic; the original seat of the clan seems to have been called Har-shimron, according to a very necessary emendation of Am. 6 1, 'Woe unto the secure in Ishmael,[1] the careless in Har [mountain of]-shimron; cp PROPHETS, § 35, SHIMRON.

1. Of SIMEON (§ 9 iii.) [cp MEUNIM], 1 Ch. 4 37 (σαμαρ [B], -ιου [A]).

4. A Levite, one of the sons of Elizaphan [cp ZEPHANIAH], 2 Ch. 29 13 (ζαμβρει [B], σαμβρι [AL]). See also SHOMER, SHIMRITH. T. K. C.

SHIMRITH (שִׁמְרִית; σαμαριθ [A], σομαιωθ [B], σαμιραμωθ [L]). As the text stands, the mother of one of the murderers of Joash, described as 'the Moabitess,' 2 Ch. 24 26 (הַמּוֹאָבִית); cp JEHOZABAD, 1. The ‖ 2 K. 12 21 [22] has SHOMER (1). More probable than either reading is SHIMRI (q.v.).

Similarly read הַמּוֹאָבִי, or rather (the confusion between מואב and מצור being so frequent) הַמִּצְרִי. The 'Shimrite' clan was in fact located in the Jerahmeelite Negeb (cp Am. 6 1, see SHIMRI, ad init.). 𝔊, however, reads המואבי, applying the title to Jehozabad. Cp SHIMEATH. T. K. C.

SHIMRON (שִׁמְרוֹן; συμοων [B]), a place in Zebulun, mentioned between Nahallal and Idalah and Bethlehem (2), Josh. 19 15 (σεμρων [AL]). Idalah (𝔊[B] ιερειχω—i.e., Jerahmeel) may be only a variant to Bethlehem (i.e., Beth-jerahmeel). At any rate, if possible, we need a site between Ma'lûl (NAHALLAL) and Beit-lahm (BETHLEHEM, 2). Such a site we have in Semûnîyeh, the Simonias of Josephus (Vit. 24), the Simonia of the Talmud (Neub. Géogr. 189); according to Tomkins, the Š'mâna of Thotmes III., nos. 18 and 35 (RP[(2)] 5 44 46), with one of which (35) E. Meyer (Glossen, 73) identifies the Šamḫuna of Am. Tab. 220 4.

1. Name; identifications.

As the text of Josh. 11 1 ff. now stands, we are led to assume that Shimron (σομερων [AFL]) was anciently a royal city, and that its king, together with those of Hazor, Madon, and Achshaph, was defeated by Joshua beside the 'waters of MEROM.' The same royal city is evidently referred to in Josh. 12 20 as Shimron-meron (מְראוֹן [מרון Kr.] שִׁמְרוֹן; βασιλέα συμοων, β. μαμρωθ [B], β. σαμρων, β. φασγα, β. μαρων [A], β. [σ]αμαρων [L]). 𝔊, however, does not recognise a compound name; certainly Meron must be wrong.[2] Either it has simply arisen through dittography or (S. A. Cook) it is a variant of 'Madon' in v. 19 (see MADON) which has found its way into the text.[3] If Josh. 11 1 ff. is to be our guide in locating Shimron, Mühlau's identification of it with es-Semûrîyeh, about 1 hr. N. from Accho (Riehm, HWB; Bäd.-Socin) deserves attention, though the modern form rather suggests Shāmīr (Sta. ZATW 5 167).

The question, however, has been raised in Crit. Bib. whether the textual problem is not more complicated than critics have supposed. As the result of a close examination of the text of Judg. 4 5 and Josh. 11 it is there held that the original scene of the events related was more probably in the S. of Palestine. The names throughout having become corrupted, they were editorially emended under the influence of a later historical view respecting the conquest of Canaan.

2. Larger problems involved.

Jabin, it is held, comes from Jamin—a popular distortion of 'Jerahmeel,' a suitable name for any king of Hazor. 'Canaan' (כנען) in Judg. 4 2 5 19 (as in Gen. 10 6, and a number of other passages) was originally 'Kenaz' (קְנַז); by 'Achshaph' (Josh. 11 1) was probably meant 'Cusham' (see CUSH, 2), and by 'Shimron' the 'Shimron' referred to in Am. 6 1 (see SHIMRI). 'Madon' or rather 'Marom' (Eus. μαρωμ) can equally well be accounted for on this hypothesis. It is the place referred to in the phrase מי מרום, cp מי מגדו (Judg. 5 19). Both these phrases, if the scene of the war was in the S., come from מי מגדל, 'waters of Migdol' (or rather [cp SHECHEM, TOWER OF] of Jerahmeel), a phrase parallel to נחל כּוּשָׁן, 'the torrent of Cushan.' So Crit. Bib. Cp, however, MEROM, WATERS OF. T. K. C.

[1] 'Ishmael' here = 'Jerahmeel'—i.e., the Jerahmeelite Negeb. See Crit. Bib. on Am. 6 1.

[2] The proposal of Frd. Delitzsch (Par. 287) and Halévy (REJ, 1881, p. 12) to emend the name into שמש־מרן—i.e., Samsi-muruna, a place whose king is mentioned by Sennacherib at the head of the Canaanite tributaries (cp MENAHEM), fails to take account of the easy development of glosses, etc.

[3] [In support of this view we may refer to the treatment of the second part of the name in 𝔊 and Vg. 𝔊[BA] om. Madon, v. 19, and read μαμρωθ or μαρων (for Meron), v. 20, as a separate name. 𝔊[L] and Vg. read only 'Shimron' in the latter verse, and evidently found 'Madon' (λαμορων) in v. 19. There seems to be, therefore, an identity between 'meron' and 'Madon,' which latter name, as shown under MADON, should probably be read with ר instead of ד.—S. A. C.]

SHIMRON (שִׁמְרוֹן, § 10; properly a place-name? see, however, SHAMIR, 2; σαμ[α]ραμ [BAF]), one of the (four) sons of ISSACHAR (§ 7), Gen. 46 13 (ζαμβραμ [A], -αν [D], σαμβρα καὶ ζαμβριν [L]) = Nu. 26 24 (αμβραν [A], -μ [L]), 1 Ch. 7 1 (σεμερων [B], σομβραν [L] [AV Shimrom, but AV of 1611 'Shimron']). The patronymic Shimronite (שִׁמְרֹנִי; σαμαρανει [B], σαμραμι [Bab], σαμβραμι [F], αμβραμ[ε]ι [AL]) occurs in Nu. 26 24.

SHIMSHAI (שִׁמְשַׁי, on meaning see below; σαμσαι [A], σαμαιας [L]), a state official (secretary) who, with REHUM [q.v.] and others, sent a letter to Artaxerxes to induce him to stop the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra 4 8: σαμασα [B], v. 9: σαμεε [B], 17: σαμεαισ [B], 23: σαμεσα [B]). In 1 Esd. 2 17 he is called SEMELLIUS, RV SAMELLIUS (σαμελλιος [B], σεμ., or σεβ., or σαμ. [A], ραμελιος [L]; cp Jos. Ant. xi. 2 1, σεμελιος).

[A right explanation of the name would be one of the results of a thorough critical examination of Ezra-Nehemiah. E. Meyer (Ent. 34) claims it as Syriac. At any rate, it looks as if it were derived from שֶׁמֶשׁ, 'the sun' (cp § 76). But there are still two possibilities. (1) שמשי may be a Hebraised form of an Iranian ששמי—an abbreviation of such a Persian name as σισιμάκης or σισάμνης (see Rawl., Be.-Rys., and cp Marti, Bibl.-aram. Gloss.). (2) The forms in 1 Esd. suggest as the original either שמלי or רמלי—i.e., ישמעאלי or ירחמאלי. This view is preferable. It may naturally be combined with the theory (see REHUM) that the geographical and personal names in Ezra-Neh. have been systematically altered; but independently of this theory Marquardt (Fund. 62) decides in favour of שמלי. Rehum has probably a similar origin.—T. K. C.]

SHINAB (שִׁנְאָב; Sam. שנאר; σεννααρ), king of ADMAH [q.v.], Gen. 14 2. He is mentioned with SHEMEBER (שֶׁמְאֵבֶר; Sam. שמאבר; συμοβορ [A*D*E]; συμορ [L]), king of ZEBOIM [q.v.]. The tokens of corruptness are so evident that many moderns decline the attempt to explain these names. If, however, we feel sure that there is a historical substratum to the story, we may be inclined to equate Shinab with Sanibu, the name of an Ammonite king in the time of Tiglath-pileser III. (so Frd. Del. Par. 294; cp KAT[(2)] 141; KB 2 21), or with the Ass. Sin-šar-uṣur (cp SHENAZZAR), and Shemeber with the Ass. Sumu-abi (so Sayce, Exp. T 8 463; cp SHEM, NAMES WITH). The reading of the Sam. suggests that an edifying comment ('name has perished') has taken the place of the true name; similarly the Midrash (Ber. Rab. 42) explains Shinab as שואב ממון, 'one who draws money (wherever he can),' and Shemeber as שם אבר, 'one who makes to himself pinions (to fly in search of treasure).'[1] If, however, the narrative in Gen. 14 only owes its appearance of historicity to an editor who had before him a corrupt text, and if by applying the right key we are able to restore the original sufficiently to understand it aright, it becomes probable that only one king was mentioned on either side of the contest, viz. the king of Geshur (or Ashḥur) and the king of Sodom (?), and that just as 'Jeraḥmeel' occurs apparently no less than six times (five times in variants) in v. 1, so 'Ishmael' occurs five or six times (owing to variants) in v. 2. Among the variants referred to are שנאב (Shinab) and שמאבר (Shemeber). See further SODOM AND GOMORRAH. T. K. C.

SHINAR (שִׁנְעָר), according to the prevalent view a name of Babylon (cp GEOGRAPHY, § 13 a). It is mentioned eight times in all: Gen. 10 10 11 2 14 1 9 Josh. 7 21 Is. 11 11 Zech. 5 11 Dan. 1 2†. In Am. Tab. 25 49 we find the king of Šanḫar mentioned as an ally of the king of Ḫatti, and in the Egyptian inscriptions a king of Sangara often appears (cp WMM, As. u. Eur. 279). Ed. Meyer (Ægyptiaca, 63 f.) argues that both these forms are equivalent to Karduniaš, the Kassite name for Babylonia;[1] this, however, is not more than plausible (cp Flinders Petrie, Syria and Egypt, 180). The older views explaining Shinar as 'the land of two cities' (sani-'iri, KAT(1) 34), or as = sumer in the phrase Sumer and Accad = S. Babylonia, are untenable.[2] Probably the identification of Shinar with Babylonia, though an early theory, is erroneous, and except in Josh. 7 21 Dan. 1 2, we should everywhere read Geshur.[3] NIMROD [q.v.] was a N. Arabian, not a Babylonian, hero; and originally the great Tower (Gen. 11 1-9) was probably placed not in Babylonia but in Jeraḥmeel.[4]

In Josh. 7 21, however, a different emendation is necessary. The goodly mantle (see MANTLE, § 2) in the spoil of Jericho, coveted by Achan, came neither from 'Shinar' nor from 'Geshur.' שנער (EV Shinar) is most probably a corruption of שִׁרְיוֹן, 'a coat of mail' (see, however, MANTLE, § 2 [5]); this word probably stood in the margin as a correction of the erroneous לשון (EV 'wedge'), for which it has been elsewhere (see GOLD, § 2) proposed to read שִׁרְיוֹן. On the other passage see Crit. Bib.

In Josh., l.c., 𝔊B gives ψιλὴν ποικίλην for אד' שנער, disregarding טובה (𝔊AFL καλήν); Vg. pallium coccineum (valde bonum). Generally 𝔊 gives σεν(ν)ααρ; but in Zech. 5 11 βαβυλων, unless בבל here comes from ירחמאל; cp Is. 11 11 where in like manner βαβυλωνίας may = בבל = ירחמאל (cp PATHROS). T. K. C.

SHION (שִׁיאֹן), a city of Issachar, Josh. 19 19 (ϹΙѠΝⲀ [B], ϹЄΙⲀΝ [A], ϹΗѠ [L]; Seon (OS(2) 154 18) in Jerome's time was a village near Tabor, which may be identified with the 'Ain Sha'īn, 4 m. NW. from Tabor, near which is a ruin called Khirbet Sha'īn. There is also a Neby Sha'īn, NW. from Nazareth. The name may be akin to Shunem, which occurs in v. 18.

The current AV rendering Shihon differs from that of the edition of 1611, which, like RV, has Shion.

SHIP. The Hebrew term אֳנִיָּה, ŏniyyah, and the Greek πλοῖον are used somewhat loosely in OT and NT in references to navigation, and EV in most cases renders by the equally vague, and often obviously too pretentious term, 'ship.' Sometimes there seems to be no good reason for the choice of this term, as the Hebrew adds a qualifying word to indicate what is really meant. In Job 9 26 for instance, we find the phrase (elsewhere [see OSPRAY] indicated as corrupt) אֳנִיּוֹת אֵבֶה, ŏniyyōth 'ēbeh, 'ships of reed' (RVmg.), but in EV 'swift ships' (‖ 'as the eagle that swoopeth on the prey'); with this Dillmann and most critics [but cp Crit. Bib.] compare Is. 18 2 where the expression כְּלֵי-גֹמֶא, kĕlē gōme', is given in AV as 'vessels of bulrushes' (see RUSHES), but where the natural meaning is 'vessels [better, boats] of papyrus' (RV). In both cases light boats or skiffs are meant, such as those mentioned by Lucan (Phars. 4 36), Pliny (HN 13 11) and other ancient writers. These were used on the Nile (Eg. name, baris; Copt. bari), carried only one or two persons (Plin. HN 7 57), and were so light that where navigation was difficult or dangerous they could be carried forward on the shoulders (Plut. De Is. et Osir. 18).

1. Light boats and rafts.

In their oldest and most primitive form these vessels were mere rafts, and such rafts are not unknown in modern times (see the description in the Mémoires of the Duc de Rovigo in Che. Proph. Is. 2 304). Speaking of the smaller boats of this kind, Erman (Anc. Eg. 479) says, 'these boats had no deck, they were in fact little rafts formed of bundles of reeds bound together. They were rather broader in the middle than at the ends, the hinder part was generally raised up high whilst the front part lay flat on the water.' They were propelled by poles or paddles, not with oars. Larger boats of the same kind were used for carrying light freights; with these is perhaps to be compared the Assyrian kelek or raft made of a framework of wood supported by inflated skins, though these seem to have been capable of carrying considerable loads (see Masp. Dawn of Civ. 615 ff.; Place, Ninive, pl. 43; cp Layard, Nineveh, 1 13 2 5; Peters, Nippur, 2 340). We seem to have references to some conveyance of the latter kind in OT. At least, as the text of 1 K. 5 9 stands, the timber for Solomon's temple was brought from Lebanon to Joppa by sea in 'floats' (1 K. 5 9, דֹּבְרוֹת; 2 Ch. 2 16, רפסדות; 𝔊 in both cases σχεδίαι). In 1 K. RV has 'rafts.' A similar statement is made with reference to Zerubbabel's temple (1 Esd. 5 55, σχεδίας; EV 'floats').[1] Such primitive modes of navigation are alluded to in Wisd. 14 5 f. A certain floating bridge or landing-stage at Alexandria went by the name of Schedia (3 Macc. 4 11).

The papyrus boats of later times, however, were of more elaborate construction. Light boats have often been constructed with some kind of framework—a keel and ribs—as well as of papyrus or other reeds, like the bark canoes of Australia and more especially of the American continent. Boats of this kind may have carried a sail. As in the case of the Madras surf-boats the wood was no doubt fastened by thongs.

2. Use of wood.

'Vessels thus stitched together, and with an inserted framework, have from a very early time been constructed in the Eastern seas far exceeding in size anything that would be called a canoe, and in some cases attaining to 200 tons burthen' (EB(9) 21 804 b).

They were not so primitive in construction as the Indian canoes made of a hollowed tree-trunk (Herod. 3 98; cp the ancient boats of the Swiss lake dwellings), but would seem to rank between these and the wooden boats made in pieces (see below).[2] The round kufas or coracles of the Assyrians made of plaited willow (Herod. 1 192; see Masp. Dawn of Civ. 615) were apparently used for short distances—as ferry-boats for crossing rivers; they were thus an improvement on the simple inflated skin (cp ASSYRIA, § 10 b).

Larger boats were constructed entirely of wood fastened by pegs or tree-nails. To craft of this kind perhaps the phrase אֳנִי-שַׁיִט, ŏnī-šāyiṭ, 'row-boat' (EV 'galley with oars'), of Is. 33 21, used in connection with streams and rivers, may be supposed to refer. Such boats were also used on the Nile (Herod. 2 96; cp the boats in use among the Polynesian islands[3]—the modern nuggur). They were often of considerable size, even under the Old Empire. They had oars for rowing (not for paddling, as in the papyrus boats) fixed into row-locks, or through the sides of the boat, and fastened by a rope to prevent loss; oars were used also for steering—one for small boats, several on either side at the stern for larger craft.

1 See Rogers, Hist. of Bab. and Ass. 1 411.

2 Against the latter see Sayce, PSBA, June, 1896, p. 173, who argues that if Ḫammurabi = 'Amraphel, king of Shinar' (Gen. 14 1), and if Ḫammurabi reigned in N. Babylonia, it follows that Sumer (= S. Babylonia) cannot be the biblical Shinar. So, too, Pat. Pal. 67.

3 'Miṣṣur' is a less probable emendation, though it would suit in Gen. 11 2, if בבל in v. 9 was originally בלע = צער = מצור. ('Bela' probably comes from 'Jeraḥmeel.')

4 מקדם, v. 2, was doubtless originally בירחמאל (so also 13 11). Cp PARADISE, § 6.

1 [These statements are open to criticism, both on the ground of their inherent improbability and because there are indications that the original form of the text (already corrupt in the redactor's time), was very different from that in MT, whilst the statement in 1 Esd. is an invention suggested by the manipulated form of the narrative of Solomon's temple.—T. K. C.]

2 They would seem to have been heavier than the boats of the Esquimaux, constructed of skins and whale-bone; see Lubbock, Prehistoric Times(6), 483 f.

3 On Polynesian navigation cp A. De Quatrefages, The Human Species(5) (ISS), p. 191 ff.

At a later date boats of this build carried, in addition to oars, 'a rectangular square sail which was probably made of papyrus matting' (Erman). For the mast two pieces of wood fastened together at the top were employed; it was held in its place by large ropes or shrouds fastened at the bows and stern, other ropes being attached to other parts of the boat to give additional strength. 'The yard-arm rested on the point of the mast' (see Erman, 481). These were long flat boats. Having little depth, a cabin[1] fitted on the deck suffices both for the ship-master's accommodation and for a hold; in some of the rowing-boats nearly the whole length of the deck is taken up by the cabin so that a sail can hardly have been used. A cargo would, of course, have to be stowed on deck, and boats carrying a large freight seem always to have been towed.

3. Boats with sails.

A great advance is made under the Middle Empire. The double mast gives place to a stout single one, the steering-oars to a large rudder; the sail now has two yards, the upper one being fastened to the mast by ropes, not, as before, fixed to the top of it. In the New Empire the vessels increased in size and complexity, and were elaborately adorned (cp Ezek. 27). In the sailing-boat of Queen Ha'tshepsu (see fig. 1) the mast and sail have assumed huge proportions, and the yards are constructed of two pieces of wood. Here we get a craft to which we may strictly apply the term 'ship.' Something of the kind may perhaps be meant by the צִי אַדִּיר, ṣī 'addīr, EV 'gallant ship,' of Is. 33 21, which is contrasted with the ŏnī-šáyiṭ in the same passage.

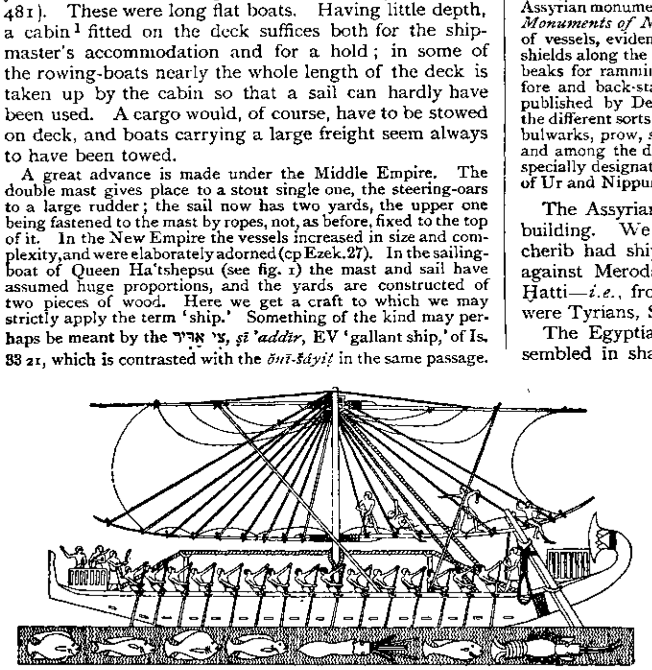

FIG. 1.—Sailing boat of Queen Ha'tshepsu (Chnemtamun). After Erman.

In v. 23 'tackling' (חֲבָלִים, ḥăbālīm), 'mast' (תֹּרֶן, tōren), and 'sail' (נֵס, nēs), are referred to. Nor must we overlook the fine poetic similitude of Ezekiel (chap. 27) in which Tyre is compared to a ship. The oars are said to have been made of oak, the deck of ivory inlaid in cedarwood. The sail was of fine linen with embroidered work to serve as ensign; the cabin of blue and purple stuffs. It has been suggested that the many-coloured sails of the ancients may have served as distinguishing signs. Flags, as Cornill (on Ezek. 27 7) seems to have conclusively shown, were not known in antiquity.[2]

4. Chaldæan ships.

In a famous passage of II. Is. we find the phrase 'even the Chaldæans, in the ships of their rejoicing' (Is. 43 14, RV).[3] That the ships of Uru on the Persian Gulf (see UR OF THE CHALDEES) appear prominently in very early inscriptions, and that there is evidence of commercial intercourse between Babylonia and India at least as early as the seventh century B.C. (OPHIR, § 2), is undeniable. The Babylonian Deluge-story, moreover, gives an elaborate account of an elippu or ship—i.e., the 'ark.' And even the Assyrians, who were an inland people, were by no means limited to the round kufas or coracles, or to the kelek or raft.

Kufas and keleks are not the only vessels represented on the Assyrian monuments and referred to in the inscriptions. Layard's Monuments of Nineveh (pl. 71) gives illustrations of a number of vessels, evidently war-ships, having two banks of oars, and shields along the bulwarks. 'Five have sheer prows, and sharp beaks for ramming, and these have also a mast, a single yard, fore and back-stays, braces, and halliards.' A text (K. 4378) published by Delitzsch (Ass. Lesestücke,(2) 86-90) enumerates the different sorts of vessels. Masts, sails, yards, rudder, rigging, bulwarks, prow, stern, deck, hold, and keel are all mentioned; and among the different kinds of vessels the 'Assyrian ship' is specially designated, along with those of the Babylonian cities of Ur and Nippur.

The Assyrians, however, had no great skill in ship-building. We are told that in 696 or 695 B.C. Sennacherib had ships built at Til Barsip for his expedition against Merodach-baladan. But the carpenters were Ḫatti—i.e., from the land of the West—and the sailors were Tyrians, Sidonians, and Ionians (Javnâi).

5. Merchant-ships in OT.

The Egyptian ships mentioned above (§ 3, end) resembled in shape the war-ships of a later time rather than the merchant vessels, for whilst the war-ships (πλοῖα πολεμικά, 1 Macc. 15 3) were, like these, long (μακραί; navis longa), the merchant-ships (אֳנִיּוֹת סוֹחֵר, ŏniyyōth sōḥēr; Prov. 31 14, oneraria) became round and deep (στρογγύλαι). The increase in depth allowed of a hold (cp the [rare and late] term סְפִינָה, sĕphīnāh, in Jon. 1 5, from √ספן, 'to cover,' and the expression יַרְכְּתֵי הס", yarkĕthē hassĕphīnāh, 'sides of the ship'). We hear in the OT of a special class of merchant-ship—the so-called Taršiš ships (אֳנִיּוֹת תַּרְשִׁישׁ, ŏniyyōth taršīš, 1 K. 22 48). They seem to have been ships of large build, and the expression has often been compared to our East- or West-Indiamen. They were no doubt provided with oars as well as with a sail or sails.

Elsewhere (see TARSHISH) the phrase, or rather the probable earlier reading of the phrase, has been explained as meaning 'galleys with oars.' Torr (2 f.), assuming with most that taršīš is the correct reading, makes the following suggestion. 'Among the Greeks the oars of a ship were collectively termed tarsos, and among the Hebrews ships of a certain type were known as ships of taršiš; and Tarsos and Taršiš were the Greek and Hebrew names for Tarsus in Cilicia. The coincidence suggests that this city was pre-eminent in furthering the use of oars upon the Mediterranean. But of this there are no records.'

6. Navigation among the Jews.

In spite of their surroundings, however, the Israelites (see PALESTINE, PHŒNICIA, GALILEE [SEA OF], RED SEA, NILE, etc.) seem to have taken little interest in navigation.[1] Not until the Maccabæan times was the importance of harbours realised, and the value of ships to some extent appreciated, whether for the purposes of trade or for war.[2] Simon the Maccabee converted Joppa into a Jewish port (1 Macc. 14 5), and Herod established another harbour at Cæsarea (Jos. BJ i. 21 5 Ant. xvii. 5 1 xv. 9 6)—a harbour famous on account of the part it plays in the story of Paul's journeys (Acts 9 30 18 22 27 2). Israel's knowledge of

[1] The hut or cabin seems to have been quite an ancient feature. Dr. Budge in A History of Egypt (1 73 f. [1902]) gives illustrations of ships drawn from predynastic vases in the British Museum, which he describes as follows: 'Each boat contains two small huts, which are placed amidships, and attached to one of these is a sort of mast, on the top of which is an emblem of some kind; in the front of the boat is placed what appears to be a branch or bough of a tree, and in some examples a rope for tying up is represented under the front of the boat, and steering poles are represented at the stern.'

[2] Egyptian ships seem to have received names at quite an early date. See L. B. Paton, The Early History of Syria and Palestine, 71 f. Standards are found, according to Dr. Budge (A History of Egypt, 1 78), on the boats represented upon predynastic vases. The object of the bough or mat in these boats (see above, n. 1) 'seems to have been to supply to all beholders information concerning the tribe and family of the occupant of the boat. The short mast which was attached to the aft cabin was probably used for displaying a flag or symbol which either referred to the country or city of the master of the boat, or declared his rank.'

[3] [So Kittel, 'the text seems incurably corrupt.' Dillmann, it is true, accepts the text, and only stumbles at the ו before כַּשְׂדִּים. For the present state of the question see 'Isa.' SBOT (Heb.), ad loc., and Crit. Bib.]

[1] Their lack of interest and ignorance in this respect is somewhat surprising. Cp, however, what we learn of certain maritime tribes among the Esquimaux, viz., that they are 'ignorant, even traditionally, of the existence of a boat.'—Ross, Baffin's Bay, 170 (quoted by Lubbock, Prehistoric Times,(6) 483).

[2] In AV of 1 Macc. 1 17 2 Macc. 12 9 the term NAVY is used.

ships, such as it was, must after the settlement have been derived from the Phœnicians and Philistines in whose hands were the harbours along the coast. It is true that some of the tribes seem to figure in the early legends as seafaring (cp Ps. 107 23-30); but, apart from the fact that these stories are legendary, the text does not seem to have been transmitted to us in its original form (cp Gen. 49 13 Dt. 33 19 Judg. 5 17, and see ASHER, DAN, ZEBULUN). The description of the ARK (q.v.) also shows a slight knowledge of such matters (see Now. HA 1 248). It has been pointed out, too, that when David had an opportunity of seizing Philistine harbours it did not occur to him to take it. Solomon's connection with the sea—he is said to have had a 'NAVY of Tarshish'—seems to have been due to Hiram; we know that his ships were manned by Hiram's men (1 K. 9 26 f.). On the difficulties of these passages see SOLOMON, §§ 3 b 4. Jehoshaphat is said to have built 'Taršiš-ships'; but his naval experience was a disastrous one (1 K. 22 48 2 Ch. 20 36*f.*; see EZION-GEBER). The war-ships of which we hear in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. 8 26 15 3; cp Dan. 11 30) were no doubt similar to those in use amongst the Greeks and Romans. See Smith's Dict. under 'navis.'

In the NT we hear of vessels on the sea of Galilee (Mt. 4 21 f. 8 24 14 24 Mk. 4 37). The Greek term commonly employed is πλοῖον,[1] which AV translates 'ship.' RV renders 'boat,' but, as has been pointed out elsewhere (Kitto, Bibl. Cycl. under 'ship'), passages in Josephus which refer to navigation on the lake (BJ iii. 10 1; Vit. 33) suggest that the barks on this piece of water were something more than boats (they carried an anchor, and are called σκάφη by Josephus). In the time of Jesus some of these were owned by his disciples (Mt. 4 21 Jn. 21 3 Lk. 5 3), and the same writer points out that, having regard to the evidence in Josephus, it is a mistake to 'represent the Galilæan fishermen as of the poorest class.'

7. Boats in NT.

FIG. 2.—A merchant-ship of 186 A.D. After Torr (Ancient Ships).

8. Merchant-ships in NT.

The most important references, however, to ships and navigation in the NT are found in the story of Paul's voyage to Rome.[2] This narrative (Acts 27 f.) may be best illustrated by studying two representations of ancient merchant-ships that have come down to us, in which all (or most of) the parts mentioned are depicted. A merchant-ship of 186 A.D.,[3] for instance, is represented on a coin of the emperor Commodus (see fig. 2; cp Smith, The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul,(4) 202). Here we see the two steering-oars (cp Acts 27 40, τὰς ζευκτηρίας τῶν πηδαλίων) at the stern (ἡ πρύμνα), which supplied the place of the rudder of later times; in this case it is to be noted that the upper parts of the oars are protected from the waves by a covering—'a prolongation of the upper waling-pieces, or something of the sort' (Torr); and that the sails have bands of rope sewn across to strengthen them. Such a ship would rely for travelling on the large square sail which is figured in about the centre (cp Acts 27 17, τὸ σκεῦος). The small sail at the bow was subsidiary; the name of this foresail[1] was artemon (ἀρτέμων, Acts 27 40), not dolon (δόλων), as has sometimes been thought.

The object at the stern, which Smith takes to be a mast, might be taken to suggest that there was also a sail at the stern, as Pliny (Proœm. in lib. xix.; see Smith, p. 192) asserts that there sometimes was; but the use of such a sail would seem to have been quite exceptional, as it does not appear to be represented in the pictures that have come down to us. In fig. 2 the object does not resemble a mast (as in Smith's reproduction) so much as an oar. In any case it may be only a spare mast (or oar), or may even be an addition on the part of the original artist.

These merchant-ships were often of considerable size. The Alexandrian ship (πλοῖον Ἀλεξανδρινόν; Acts 27 6) in which Paul is said to have started on his voyage to Rome carried, according to the Alexandrian MS, 276 persons (the Vatican MS, however, has 76) in addition to its cargo (v. 37); and when this vessel was wrecked another merchant-ship took on board all these passengers in addition to its own freight.

9. Undergirders.

In Acts 27 17 we are told that when the ship was in danger of shipwreck 'they used helps, undergirding the ship' (βοηθείαις ἐχρῶντο, ὑποζωννύντες τὸ πλοῖον). These helps, which are called elsewhere hypozōmata (ὑποζώματα), were cables for undergirding and strengthening the hull, especially in bad weather. As to the method in which they were attached, however, there is some question.

According to Torr they were 'fastened round the ship horizontally; the two ends of each cable being joined together, so as to make it a complete girdle extending from stem to stern along the starboard side and back from stern to stem along the port side.' Smith, however, contends that the hypozomata were bound 'round the middle of the ship at right angles to the length, and not parallel to it (he is followed by Ramsay, p. 329).' He claims that Böckh (who held the alternative view;[2] p. 134 [see § 12]) has misquoted the passage on which he relies as evidence (Vitruvius, De Architectura, x. 15 6). Böckh gave as the crucial words 'quemadmodum navis a puppi ad proram continetur.' Smith ((4) p. 213) gives as the correct text 'q. malus navis, etc.,' which he maintains supports his view ('the word "malus" is omitted in the edition of Schneider, but is retained in the later carefully edited edition of Poleni, Utini, 1829'). Torr's quotation (41, n. 100), however, agrees with that of Böckh; he adds, 'this shows that the girding cables went from the stem of a ship to the stern.' In Teubner's text (1899; ed. V. Rose) the words are 'ita religati quemadmodum navi a puppi ad proram'; but in the notes 'navis' is given as the common reading. The whole passage, moreover, seems to be obscure. On the strength of a passage from Isidore (Orig. 19 4, 'tormentum, funis in navibus longis qui a prora ad puppim extenditur quo magis constringantur; tormentum autem a tortu dicta'), Smith admits that 'it does appear that ropes were occasionally applied in a longitudinal as well as in a transverse direction, to prevent ships from straining' (p. 213). In the passage on which this admission is based, however, the reference may be to a rope such as that which we see stretched amidship over posts from stem to stern of the Egyptian ships on the relief from Deir-el-Baḥri—a rope which was designed perhaps more for strengthening the heavily-laden mast than for holding together the hull, round which, as a matter of fact, the ends of the rope are fastened at right angles to the length (see fig. 1). If, as Smith affirms (p. 214),—speaking as one who had had practical experience in seamanship—undergirding lengthways is 'a mode which must have been as impracticable as it would have been

1 There is mention also of a πλοιάριον or of πλοιάρια, especially in Jn.

2 As a tent-maker Paul may also have been a sail-maker, and may have travelled in this capacity.

3 Figs. 2 and 3 have been chosen for their illustrative value. As to the date of ACTS (q.v.) no suggestion of course is here offered.

1 A writer in Schenkel (BL) speaks of the artemon, or top-gallant sail, but see Smith, 192 ff. 'The word has been interpreted by various writers as meaning nearly every sail which a vessel carries.'—R. J. Knowling, Expos. Gk. Test. 2 535.

unavailing for the purpose of strengthening the ship,' the other view seems preferable until further evidence is forthcoming.

Another interesting representation of a large merchant-ship is that of about 200 A.D. on a relief found at Porto near the mouth of the Tiber (see fig. 3).

10. The Porto relief.

This picture illustrates many features in the ancient merchant-ships. The hull of a ship was commonly painted, sometimes for a special purpose—as in war, to make the vessel as little conspicuous as possible; but in addition to this it was often decorated, especially at the stern. We see an example of this decoration in the Porto relief, a group of figures being depicted at the stern. The ornament on the stern-post was often a swan or goose head (χηνίσκος). It figures at a very early period; it is represented for instance on the Asiatic ship of the naval battle of Rameses III. as represented on a bas-relief at Medinet Habu (see Warre-Cornish, Dict. of Gk.

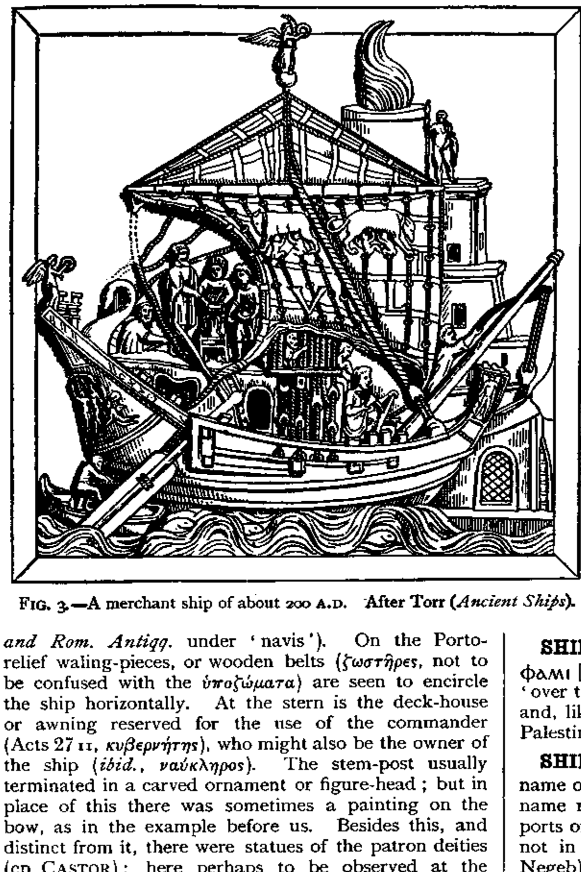

FIG. 3.—A merchant ship of about 200 A.D. After Torr (Ancient Ships).

and Rom. Antiqq. under 'navis'). On the Porto-relief waling-pieces, or wooden belts (ζωστῆρες, not to be confused with the ὑποζώματα) are seen to encircle the ship horizontally. At the stern is the deck-house or awning reserved for the use of the commander (Acts 27 11, κυβερνήτης), who might also be the owner of the ship (ibid., ναύκληρος). The stem-post usually terminated in a carved ornament or figure-head; but in place of this there was sometimes a painting on the bow, as in the example before us. Besides this, and distinct from it, there were statues of the patron deities (cp CASTOR); here perhaps to be observed at the stern. In this ship there are galleries projecting at the bow and the stern; the latter contains the deck-house (mentioned above), in that at the bow were probably stowed the anchors and other instruments (στροφεῖα καὶ περιαγωγεῖς, windlasses, etc.?). At the stern are the steering oars, here again protected by the upper waling-pieces. The large sail in the centre has brailing-ropes (κάλοι) and rings, and the mast is kept in position by a number of other ropes. The rope by which the lower corner of the sail was attached to the side of the ship—the sheet—was called pes veli or πούς; in the case of a large sail, such as this, when two ropes would be required, πούς would denote the rope which drew it aft, whilst πρόπους (propes) designated the rope which drew it forward, or the tack. Various designs were often woven upon the sail; we seem to have an example in this picture. At the bow is a smaller mast to carry the artemon. But a third sail is to be noted on this ship. This is above the large square sail. Being triangular in shape and having its base along the main-yard and its apex attached to the top of the mast, it requires no topsail-yard. Similar triangular topsails are represented on some of the coins of the Emperor Commodus. Lastly, we notice that a small boat is being towed astern (cp Acts 27 16, ἡ σκάφη); this would be used for various purposes, but it was of special importance as a life-boat in case of shipwreck (Acts 27 16 30 32). It could even be hoisted on board.[1]

From Acts 27 29 it appears that sometimes several anchors were carried.

11. Anchors, etc.

At first stones were used for this purpose; later, the anchors resemble very much those of modern times, they were provided with arms, stocks, and crowns, but had no flukes at the extremities of the arms.[2] Ships also carried a plumb-line for sounding (cp Acts 27 28, βολίς); but the want of a compass made navigation often very dangerous—the stars, by which the course of a vessel was directed, not always being visible (cp Acts 27 20).[3]

An ancient ship could sail, according to Smith, at an angle of about seven points with the wind. 'We have no information,' he says, 'as to the exact angle with the wind which an ancient ship could sail. It must, however, have been less than eight points, but more than six, the usual allowance for a modern merchant-ship, in moderate weather. I have, therefore, in my calculations taken seven as the mean between these extremes, and I cannot suppose it would be much greater or less' (p. 215).

Before putting out to sea it was usual to make supplication to the protecting deities for a prosperous voyage (Wisd. 14 1).[4] Cp, further, TRADE.

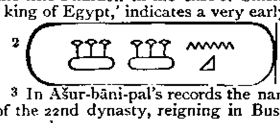
SHISHAK (שִׁישַׁק, cp Vg. Sesac, 1 K. 14 25, more correctly שׁוֹשַׁק—i.e., Shōshaḳ [Kt.]), the king of Egypt to whom Jeroboam fled (1 K. 11 40) and who plundered Jerusalem and the temple in the fifth year of king Rehoboam, 1 K. 14 25 (2 Ch. 12 2 5 7 9).[1]

1. Šošenk I. Egyptologists have always recognised in this name the first king of the twenty-second, Bubastide, dynasty, Shoshenḳ I. His personal name Sa-ša-n (sometimes nu, sometimes assimilated)-ḳ[2] is undoubtedly of Libyan etymology, like several other names of that royal family. The vowels of the name are rendered Su-si-in-ḳu (i.e., Shoshenḳ) by the Assyrians,[3] and the biblical orthography confirms this pronunciation. Josephus (Ant. vii. 5 3 viii. 10 2) has the form Σουσακος (in another recension Σισωκος) after 𝔊. Manetho transliterates Σεσῶγχις (var. Σεσωγχασις), and according to Wilcken (quoted Beitr. zur Assyr. 1 351) a Theban ostracon has the name Σέσογχσι.[4] This vocalisation Sheshónk is later but not necessarily wrong, as the Libyan languages (like modern French, for example) have little or no accent. The original pronunciation may thus have been Shâshânk, exactly as the name is spelt in Egyptian. The assimilation of n is sometimes met with already in hieroglyphics (cp above). The reading of 𝔊, Σουσακ(ε)ιμ, seems to have arisen from an attempt to put in again this assimilated n.[5]

On the origin of this founder of a new dynasty from a family of Libyan officers, see EGYPT, § 63.[6] The connection by marriage with the high priests of Memphis seems to mark the first step towards high influence for these 'commanders of the Mashauasha.' The exact date of Shoshenḳ I.'s accession to the throne would be of the highest importance for biblical chronology, but cannot be determined exactly with our present material. The end of the twenty-second dynasty seems to fall somewhat after 800 B.C. Manetho gives the sum of the dynasty as 120 (the single items amount to 116), which would bring us to about 920; but the Manethonian dates conflict with monumental dates which give at least 220 years.[7] We have, evidently, a great many co-regencies for which we may allow some fifty years, so that the beginning of Shoshenḳ's reign would be about 950.



More cannot be said; but, fortunately, the Tyrian chronology in Menander[8] seems to show that we can place the first year of dynasty twenty-two after 950 B.C. (On the campaign against Jerusalem, cp below, § 3, and CHRONOLOGY, § 32). Twenty-one years are monumentally attested for Shoshenk on an inscription in the quarries of Silsileh, announcing that the king ordered stone to be quarried for great constructions in the temple of Amon at Thebes. These seem to be the constructions on the SE. side of the second pylon; their completion would point to a somewhat longer reign. Manetho, however, in Julius Africanus, gives only twenty-one years to the king.

Sculptures on the S. wall of the great temple at Karnak present the list of Palestinian cities conquered by this king,[1] a monument of great historical importance, for a specimen of which see EGYPT, § 64. So far, 133 ovals with names are known,[2] of which, however, many are destroyed. Each oval is surrounded by a line indicating a fortified wall; a bound captive above indicates that this strong city was conquered by Pharaoh. The figures are certainly not portraits, but symbolical. The names have been distributed very awkwardly by the ignorant sculptor; e.g., one name has been mechanically divided into three names, so that now (107) 'the fields (108) of Arad (109) the Great' reads as if three separate cities were intended. The rendering of the names, which is good for the consonants, but very imperfect for the vowels, suggests sources in so-called Phœnician letters in an Aramaic or half-Aramaic language (As. u. Eur. ll.c.). A geographical arrangement of the list (which properly begins only with the

2. List of cities. 11th oval) cannot be established; the most important cities come first, Israelitish and Judæan names being freely mixed. Many writers have been surprised at the mention of N. Israelite cities, because from 1 K. 11 48 we should have expected Shoshenḳ to have been a friend and helper of Jeroboam.[3] C. Niebuhr (Chronologie der Gesch. Isr., vii.) thinks that the Pharaoh conquered the Israelitish cities for his vassal (cp Wi. GI 1 160); cp, however, Stade's correct observation in GI 1 354. The truth is (see Masp. Hist. 2 774, and cp As. u. Eur. 166) that it is not necessary to assume that any of these northern cities were attacked by the Egyptians. Their enumeration merely means that the northern kingdom was tributary; it is only the second half of the list which contains details pointing to the actual conquest,[4] and these seem to belong to Judah. The tribute, which the Pharaoh claimed everywhere, was promptly given by Jeroboam who owed his throne to Egypt; in Judah it had to be exacted by force. The Philistine cities were omitted in the list. As usual, no full record of the conquests was given, but only a specimen which, in this case, comprised David's and Solomon's kingdom. The Philistines were certainly not exempt from the tribute, and it would be strange if the expedition had not comprised Phœnicia, at least.[5]

The date of Shoshenk's expedition is unknown. Maspero's conclusion (Hist. 2 773) that it must have been not more than two or three years before the opening of the quarry in Silsileh, is very precarious. It would be more natural to assume that the king undertook the expedition not long after his accession,

1 See PHARAOH, § 2 [5], for an explanation of the absence of the title Pharaoh in the case of Shishak; that he is only called 'king of Egypt,' indicates a very early source.

3 In Ašur-bāni-pal's records the name is used of a descendant of the 22nd dynasty, reigning in Busiris (Bu-ši-ri) as a simple nomarch.

4 Pseudo-Callisthenes and others (see Wiedemann on Herod. 2 102) have preserved the name as Sesonchosis. They confound the king with the fabulous Sesostris. We can thus see that Sheshonḳ-Sesonchosis must later have enjoyed the reputation of being a great warrior.

5 The variant ša-ša-ḳ(e)-n occurs, but too rarely to be considered legitimate (see Lieblein, Dict. de noms). Wiedemann, Gesch. Æg. 548, quotes Shesakus from Abulfarag, Asochæus (as also some late MSS. of Josephus have) from Method. in Phot. 300 b.

6 The unfortunate theory that the family was Assyrian (Birch, Lauth, Brugsch) and that in Takelōt we have to recognise Tiglath (Assyrian tukultu), in Ne-ma-ra-te (probably Ašur-bāni-pal's Lamintu furnishes the correct pronunciation) Nimrod, etc., is now generally abandoned.

4 Such as the 'surrounding' (חקל, Aramaic word) of, or the road to, a city.

5 Name 29, Yu-d-h-ma-ru-k was explained by Champollion as 'roi de Juda' and this error which seemed to furnish a portrait of Rehoboam has become as popular as most flagrant errors. The present writer has (PSBA 10 81) proposed יַד־הַמֶּלֶךְ, 'hand (i.e., sign, monument?) of the king,' as name of a city. The article would, however, be uncommon, and this makes the explanation somewhat doubtful. The interpretation of Brugsch (Geogr. Inschr. ii. 6 2) and Maspero (Hist.(2) 2, ll.), Jehud in Dan, does not agree with the orthography.

after the manner of so many kings. A reference to 'expeditions in the countries of the Syrians' (R-ṭ-nu), which seems to mean Shoshenḳ's campaign, is discussed in OLZ 4 280; a determination of the year in which a certain official was governor of Thebes (or vizir) would furnish the date of the expedition.

The other constructions of the king of which traces have been found in Thebes, Memphis, Pithom, Tel(l) el-Yehūdeh,[1] Bubastus (Naville, Bubastis, 46), Hibeh (see above) do not seem to have been very considerable.

Shishak's wife had the name Ka-r-'-ma, frequent in dynasty 22. At any rate, 1 K. 11 19 need not be referred to, since Hadad's exile in Miṣraim seems rather to point to an old misinterpretation of Muṣri, S. of Palestine. See HADAD, 3; JEROBOAM, 1; SOLOMON. W. M. M.

3. Shishak = Cushi? The study of the historical episodes with which the name of Shishak is connected has passed into a new phase owing to Winckler's discovery of the N. Arabian land of Muṣri in a number of passages in the OT (see Winckler, in KAT(3) 146 f., and for a fuller, though still incomplete, list of OT references, MIZRAIM, § 2 b). Already in 1898 (MVAG, 1898, 1, pp. 14 f., note, (3) cp GI 2 269 f. [1900]) this scholar pointed out the possibility of the view that Jeroboam fled not to Egypt but to Muṣri, and in 1899 (JQR, July, see especially 558-560, and cp JEROBOAM, 1) Cheyne discussed at length and in their connection the references to מצרים in the accounts of Solomon and Jeroboam. In 1902 (KAT(3) 243, cp GI 1 160) Winckler reaffirmed the view of C. Niebuhr that Shishak conquered N. Israel for Jeroboam, adding that even if Jeroboam took refuge in Muṣri, not in Egypt, it was natural for a Pharaoh to favour the plans of Jeroboam on the principle divide et impera. He remarks, however, that Egyptian supremacy in Palestine did not last long; the mutual enmity of Israel and Judah drove them into the arms of their stronger neighbours, Tyre and Damascus. He still holds that 'Shishak' in 1 K. 11 40 is an interpolation (so also Che. JQR, l.c.). Unfortunately there are four not altogether insignificant objections to this view.

1. There is much evidence in the OT for the view that N. Arabian potentates were constantly interfering in the affairs of Palestine in the regal period, whilst most probably there is no evidence (cp SOLOMON, § 5 ff.) that Egypt even occasionally interfered, until we come to the time of Neco and Apries, and even in the case of these kings there is room for doubt whether the Hebrew editor has not fallen into misunderstandings.

2. If 'king of מצרים' means 'king of Miṣrim' in 1 K. 11 40, the presumption is that it has the same meaning in 1 K. 14 25; we can hardly doubt that the invasion of Judah there referred to has some connection with the plot which Jeroboam hatched in Miṣrim during his sojourn there.

3. The fortresses built by Rehoboam, according to 2 Ch. 11 5-10, were most probably intended to guard against a N. Arabian invasion (see REHOBOAM).

4. From a text-critical point of view it is difficult to doubt that שישק (MT) and שושקים (𝔊 σουσακειμ) are corruptions of כוש and כושים respectively. They belong to well-ascertained types of textual corruption (cp Crit. Bib. on Is. 66 20 Zech. 14 15 where סוס comes from כוש, and see SHESHACH, SHASHAK). In 2 Ch. 12 3 ('the Lubim, the Sukkiim, and the Cushites') the second of the three ethnics is no ethnic at all (but cp SUKKIIM); כושים was written the first time כשים (cp Am. 9 7). לובים should be לודים—i.e., probably גלעדים (the people of the southern Gilead [Jer. 8 22 and often]. We may, therefore, hold that, whether or no Shoshenḳ I. really invaded Palestine, the event which is recorded in 1 K. 14 25 and 2 Ch. 12 2 9-12 is a N. Arabian invasion, such as is referred to in 2 Ch. 14 9. Shishak and σουσακειμ both represent כושי 'Cushi,' a name such as might appropriately be given to a king of Miṣrim. It is just possible that the redactor had heard of an Egyptian invasion by Shoshenḳ (cp PHARAOH, § 2 [5]); but no stress can safely be laid upon this. W. M. M. § 1 f.; T. K. C. § 3.

SHITRAI (שִׁטְרַי Kt., שִׁרְטַי Kr.; ασαρταις [B], σατραι [AL], Pesh. follows Kr.), a Sharonite, superintendent of Solomon's herds in Sharon; 1 Ch. 27 29. Kr. 'Shirtai' is probably right; the name (like SHAPHAT, which follows) comes from צרפתי, 'Zarephathite.'

T. K. C.

SHITTAH-TREE (שִׁטָּה; πυξος [Sym. ακαρπον ξυλον, Theod. ακανθα], Is. 41 19†), RV 'acacia-tree,' and Shittim wood, RV 'acacia wood' (עֲצֵי שִׁטִּים, ξυλα ασηπτα, Ex. 25 5 10 and often, Dt. 10 3). Originally šinṭah; borrowed from Ar. sanṭ; Egypt. šnṭ (perhaps sondᵉt) 'may very possibly be also a loan-word' (Erman, ZDMG, 1892, p. 120). Mentioned in Is., l.c., between the cedar and the myrtle in a list of choice trees (see Jerome's comment), and used, according to Dt. (but interpolation is probable) in the construction of the ark, to which P in Ex. adds staves, boards, bars, table, pillars, altars in the tabernacle. It is perhaps too much to say with Tristram that the Acacia seyâl must be meant. It is true 'the timber [of that tree] is very hard and close-grained, and admirably adapted for fine cabinet work' (NHB 39). But Tristram's remark that this is 'the species of Acacia found' in the Arabian desert is not borne out by Doughty who writes thus (Ar. Des. 2 91):

'The eyes of the Aarab distinguish four kinds of the desert thorns; ṭólḥ (the gum-acacia), sámmara, sillima, and siâla; the leaves of them all are like [i.e., small and pinnate], but the growth is diverse. The desert smiths cut ṭólḥ-timber for their wood work, it is heavy and tough; the other kinds are too brittle to serve them.' Elsewhere (2 678) he states that the ṭólḥ-timber is used for shipbuilding on the Arabian Red Sea coast. It must be difficult to those who are not 'Aarab' to distinguish the ṭólḥ (ṭûlḥ) from the seyâl, and both from the sanṭ.

Several species of acacia, including the seyâl and the sanṭ, are found, says Tristram, in the Holy Land to-day; probably all bore the same Heb. name šiṭṭah—i.e., the 'prickly' or 'thorny tree' (Theod. ἄκανθα).

The sanṭ (Acacia vera, Mimosa Nilotica) grows both in Lower and in Upper Egypt, as Hasselquist long ago stated (Travels, 250). Robinson found it in Palestine in the western part of the Wādy es-Sanṭ, where perhaps formerly it was more abundant, since it has given its name to the Wādy. The seyāl too is abundant not only in Arabia (though less so, doubtless, than formerly), but also near En-gedi, where these trees form a characteristic feature of the landscape.

'They are trees of middle height, gnarled, with conspicuous branches, which form a head like a parasol, covered with light, elegant, and beautifully green leaves. The gum-arabic exudes from them in the autumn, at the base of the trunk, between the crevices of the bark, and coagulates in 'tears' as large as a hazel-nut, of a pale yellow colour, and almost transparent' (Lortet, La Syrie d'aujourd'hui, 111).

The golden-headed tufts of blossom are much admired (Tristram, Land of Israel, 489). The seyāl is 'less dependent on moisture than the palm, though certainly its finest specimens are found near springs' (E. H. Palmer, Sinai, 39). All these trees have painful thorns; 'happy I was, in those often adventures of night travelling in Arabia, never to have hurt an eye' (Doughty, Ar. Des. 2 495). The species to which they belong includes more than 400 varieties, found in the dry, hot regions of Asia, Africa, and Australia (Delitzsch, in Riehm, HWB 1 66). SHIZA (שִׁיזָא; possibly a battered clan-name; but cp שזא, the name of a Palmyrene family [Mordtmann, Neue Beiträge zur Kunde Palmyras, Munich, 1875, no. 55]), father of ADINA [q.v.], 1 Ch. 11 42 (σαιζα [B], σεζα [ℵ], σεχα [A], σιζαι [L]).

SHOA (שׁוֹעַ; σουε [BQ], σουδ [A]; Aq. τύραννον; Vulg. tyrannos; Pesh. reads lud), the name of a people, mentioned beside Koa, whose seats were not far from Babylonia (Ezek. 23 23). Delitzsch identifies it with Sutū, which occurs often in the cuneiform inscriptions beside Ḳutu (see KOA). A shorter and more original form is Su, whence the Hebrew form Shoa'. The country of the Su or Sutū lay on the Tigris, and extended as far as the southern declivities of the Medo-Elamite mountains (Del. Par. 235). On the dangers to which Babylonia was exposed from the incursions of the Sutū, see Sargon's Khors. inscription, 1 135 f. (KB 2 73). Ezekiel's list of names, however, has to be criticised before we can venture on identifications. How can 'all the Assyrians' be said to accompany the Sutū and the Ḳutu? PEKOD (q.v.) gives the key. The three names are—Rehoboth, Ishmael [שע], and Jerahmeel; and the 'b'ne Asshur' are the people of Ashhur (almost = Jerahmeel). See Crit. Bib. T. K. C.

SHOBAB (שׁוֹבָב, cωBαB, as if 'backsliding,' but see below). 1. One of the sons of DAVID [§ 1 a, n. 2, § 11, n.] (2 S. 5$_{14}$: σωβαδαν [A], ιεσσεβαν [L]; 1 Ch. 3$_{5}$: σωβαν [B]; 14$_{4}$: ισοβοαμ [B], σωβηβ [L]). SHARAR in 2 S. 23$_{33}$b should perhaps be Shobab; cp HARARITE, 3.

2. A descendant of Caleb and Azubah (1 Ch. 2$_{18}$: ιασουβ [B], σουβαβ [L]).

The names of David's sons evidently spring from ethnics. ιεσσεβαν and ισοβοαμ point to ישבעל—i.e., ישמעאל, 'Ishmael' (cp some of 𝔊's readings under ISHBAAL, JASHOBEAM). This explanation suits both 1 and 2. Cp Crit. Bib. on שׁוֹבָבִים, Jer. 50$_{6}$. The theories suggested under AZUBAH refer, on the whole, to MT. T. K. C.

SHOBACH (שׁוֹבָךְ), captain of the army of Hadad-ezer who was defeated and slain by David at Helam (2 S. 10$_{16-18}$: cωBαK [BA], [σαβ. Au. 18], cαBεε [L]). His name appears in 1 Ch. 19$_{16-18}$ as SHOPHACH (שׁוֹפָךְ, σωφαρ, σαφαθ [B], εσωφαρ [ℵ*], -αχ [ℵ$^{c.a?}$], σωφαχ, σωβαχ [A], σωφακ [L]).

If Hadad-ezer was really king of Muṣur, and not of Zoba (see ZOBA), 'Helam' (חילם, חילאם) will be a corruption of Jeraḥme'el (ירחמאל), and 'Shobach' (שובך) connected with יִשְׁבָּח, ISHBAH. Cp SHOBEK. T. K. C.

SHOBAI (שֹׁבָי; αBαOΥ, cαBει [B], cωBαι, cαBαι [A and ℵ in Neh.], cωBαι [L]). A family of NETHINIM [q.v.] in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA ii., § 9), Ezra 2$_{42}$ Neh. 7$_{45}$ = 1 Esd. 5$_{28}$; AV SAMI, RV SABI (σαβει [A], σωβαι [L], B om., unless τωβεις represents this name). If the Nethinim are Ethanite families (see SOLOMON'S SERVANTS), שבי will come from ישבי (as often from ישמאל). It was an Ishmaelite—i.e. Jerahmeelite—family. Cp. SHOBI. T. K. C.

SHOBAL (שׁוֹבָל, probably related to Ishmael, cp Ashbel, Ishbaal; hardly 'young lion,' as WRS Journ. Phil. 9$_{90}$ [see Gray, HPN 109], cωBαλ [BADEL]), b. Seir, a Horite (Gen. 36$_{20\ 23\ 29}$ [σωβαρ E] 1 Ch. 1$_{38\ 40}$; COΥBαλ [L in Ch.]). Another genealogical scheme (cp GENEALOGIES i., § 5) represents him as son of Hur (which, as it happens, may be shortened from Ashḥur[ite] or from Jeraḥmeel[ite]), and of Calebite origin (1 Ch. 2$_{50}$, σωβα[ρ] [BL]), and since the name 'Caleb' may also plausibly be traced to 'Jeraḥmeel,' and Judah was represented by legend (see JUDAH, § 3) as partly Jeraḥmeelite, it is natural to find Shobal appearing also as a son of Judah (1 Ch. 4$_{1}$, σουβαλ [BA]). The name Shobal is also perhaps to be identified with SHUBAEL [q.v.]. Turning to 1 Ch. 2$_{52}$ (σωβα[L]), we find that whilst one of Shobal's sons (Haroeh) appears at first sight to bear a personal name, all the rest bear gentilic names. The presumption is that Haroeh also is gentilic, and when we see the name under the form Reaiah (4$_{1}$) we cannot doubt that it is a shortened form of 'Jeraḥmeel.' This Haroeh, or (better) Reaiah, is said to be the 'father' of Kirjath-jearim, and there is now plausible historical evidence for the view that Kirjath-jearim is a corruption of Kirjath-jeraḥmeel (that is to say, the place was originally a Jeraḥmeelite settlement). To this place four families are assigned (2$_{53}$). Their names, however, have come down to us in a corrupt form. They appear to be partly parallel to the three 'families' of Kirjath-sepher (i.e., Kirjath-sārĕphāthīm), given, according to the most probable reading, in 2$_{55}$. 'Ithrites' may correspond to 'Tirathites' (where an old tribal name Jether [cp ITHRITES] may be suspected); 'Shumathites' to 'Shimeathites' (cp Šimeon); 'Puthites' may come from 'Perathites' (Perath or Ephrath was an important name in the Negeb); 'Mishraites' (like 'Zorathites'?) reminds us of the 'Miṣrites,' a race akin to the Jeraḥmeelites (see Crit. Bib.).[1] The MANAHETHITES [q.v.] and Zorites or Zorathites (see ZORAH) are reckoned (if the text is correct) partly to Shobal and partly to Salma (i.e., Bethlehem). 𝔊 found vv. 52 ff. unintelligible, and copied slavishly, but Pesh. ceases at v. 52 with an obscure enumeration of the sons of Shobal in Kirjath-jearim, thus omitting the sons of Salma [v. 54] and the notice of the Kenites [v. 55*b*]. The latter notice is enigmatical. We are perhaps meant to trace a connection between the Kenites and 'Salma' (see SALMAH, 2). It may be added that Hammath (so RV, following MT) is very possibly miswritten for מַעֲכָה, Maachath (but cp HEMATH). T. K. C.

[1] So partly Winckler (GI 2 186, n. 3). That 'Puthites' = a clan called 'Peleth' is improbable. See PELETHITES.

SHOBEK (שׁוֹבֵק; cωBHK [BℵA], cωBειρ [L]), signatory to the covenant (see EZRA i., § 7); Neh. 10$_{24}$ [25]. Cp SHOBACH.

SHOBI (שֹׁבִי, see on SHOBAI), son of Nahash, of Rabbath-ammon, who brought supplies to David at Mahanaim (2 S. 17$_{27}$: OΥεcBει [BA], cεφεει [L]; Pesh. reads 'Abishai' [which is a corruption of 'Ishmael'], cp ZERUIAH). The combination of this enigmatical member of the Ammonite royal family with a Machir, whose real existence is certainly not proved by the reference in 2 S. 9$_{4}$ f., and an old Gileadite who bears the difficult name Barzillai, and whose son bears the equally doubtful name Chimham, and both of whom are introduced again in a narrative of strongly romantic appearance, suggests critical caution. It is too slight a remedy to omit 'son of Nahash' as an incorrect gloss (We. TBS 201 n.). The verse is largely made up of corrupt variants and glosses, and the genuine kernel probably is, 'And it came to pass . . . that Jeraḥmeel, son of Jonathan, the Gilgalite,' where 'Jeraḥme'el' corresponds to 'Shobi' [Ishmael; see below], Machir to '[son of] Ammiel,' 'Jonathan' to 'Nahash,' and 'Gilgalite' to 'Gileadite.' The words 'Rabbath of the b'ne Ammon' are a corruption of 'Rehoboth-jeraḥmeel.' See, further, MEPHIBOSHETH, NAHASH, ROGELIM. But cp AMMON, § 4 (end), and HPSm., ad loc., for attempts to explain MT.

S. A. Cook (AJSL 16 164 f. [1900] proposes to read ויבא for ושבי, and to omit בן as a later insertion consequent on the corrupt reading ('and Nahash, etc., brought'). It is better from our present point of view to read ויבא שבאל; ויבא easily fell out before שבאל, which form, being intermediate between שבי and ישמעאל, may once have taken the place of שבי. T. K. C.

SHOCHO (RV Soco), 2 Ch. 28$_{18}$; SHOCHOH (RV Socoh) 1 S. 17$_{1}$, and SHOCO (RV Soco) 2 Ch. 11$_{7}$. See SOCOH.

SHOES. Under this heading it will be convenient to take note of all coverings for the feet whether sandals, shoes, or boots, so far as they were known among the early Hebrews.

1. Introduction.

This treatment is in fact necessary on account of the ill-defined use of the various terms to denote coverings of this nature. The term 'sandal' is usually applied to a foot-covering consisting simply of a sole bound on with thongs, but it was also tied on, and so the word is roughly used by 𝔊 to denote the na'al (נַעַל, see § 3), the ordinary Hebrew term. The Gk. ὑπόδημα (lit., 'that which is bound under [the foot]') originally denoted a sandal; but it came to be applied to the Roman calceus (a shoe covering the whole foot), and is used by Josephus (BJ vi. 1 8) of the caliga (the thick shoe, studded with nails, worn by Roman soldiers).[1]

Coverings for the feet have not always formed a regular part of the clothing of the Oriental. Primarily, of course, everything depended upon the climate and the nature of the country. Upon the Assyrian monuments the warriors are not unfrequently barefooted, and many of the royal statues are totally devoid of any covering for the foot. In Egypt sandals were not in use before the fifth dynasty, their introduction was gradual, and their popularity a work of time; 'they were, when off the feet, sometimes carried by an attendant, showing that they were not always worn' (Wilk. Anc. Eg. 2$_{336}$ n.).

[1] Examples of such extensions of usage could be easily multiplied (e.g., Talm. מוקא, boot; מוקים, breeches). A shoe corresponding with the caliga is evidently referred to in Shabb. 60 a. In Syr., na'lā and its denominative are used of horse-shoes.

Examples of the ordinary sandals abound (for Egypt, see op. cit. 2, figs. 443 f.), and are represented upon the oldest monuments depicting inhabitants of Sardinia (WMM As. u. Eur. 374), Cilicia (ib. 340 f.), Western Asia Minor (ib. 364 f.), etc. They vary from a mere sole bound with a thong, to elegant and elaborate shoes of the richest ornamentation, and are variously made of such materials as palm-leaves, and papyrus stalks (Egypt), linen (Phœnicia), and leather (Assyria, etc.).[1]

2. Illustrations from the monuments.

In Assyria the simplest and most common variety consists of a sole with back and sides bound to the foot by two bands over the instep (see Perrot-Chipiez, Art in Chald., etc., 1 76), at times a third band crosses the toes, and is, again, sometimes connected with the straps over the instep.[2] In a painting on stucco from Nimrūd (op. cit., 2, pl. xiv.), the sandals are coloured black, the straps yellow. A more serviceable and not uncommon variety is seen to advantage in the foot-gear of Ašur-bāni-pal's followers (op. cit., 1 145, 2, opp. p. 138). Over a kind of tight-fitting bandage enveloping the leg is a boot reaching mid-way up the back of the calf, the uppers being connected by straps. Similar straps are interlaced from the top of the boot (top-lacings ?) and appear to be held up by a garter worn just below the knee.[3] A third important variety is seen in the turned-up boot, a characteristic feature of the Hittites (cp Perrot-Chipiez, Art in Judæa, 2, fig. 282, and passim), a good example of which is seen in the representation of one of Ašur-naṣir-pal's vassals at Nimrūd (Art in Ass. 2, fig. 64). Finally, from the Egyptian monuments, we perceive that the Bedouins of the Sinaitic peninsula customarily went barefooted (as is common at the present day, see Doughty, Ar. Des. 1 224); on the occasion of long journeys, however, they appear to have worn a sandal of black leather, the females, on the other hand, being depicted with a sort of boot, reaching to the ankle, of red leather with a white border.

From a consideration of these circumstances and our knowledge of the statues of the earliest Hebrews, we may suspect that they, too, at first, were unaccustomed to wear shoes save in travelling (cp Ex. 12 11 Dt. 29 5 Josh. 9 5 13),[4] although the fact that, in later times, to go barefooted (i.e., to revert to the older practice) was looked upon as a deprivation and as a manifestation of grief (Is. 20 2-4 Ezek. 24 17 23, cp 2 S. 15 30) shows that the custom of wearing shoes soon became firmly established.

Shoes or sandals are frequently mentioned.

3. Heb. and Gk. terms.

The ordinary term is nă'al, נַעַל (√to confine, shut in),[5] EV 'shoe,' but RV 'sandals' in Cant. 7 1 [2], 𝔊 ὑποδήματα frequently, and σανδάλια in Josh. 9 5 Is. 20 2. Both occur in the NT, ὑποδήματα, Mt. 3 11 10 10 Mk. 1 7 etc. (EV 'shoes'), and σανδάλια, Mk. 6 9 Acts 12 8 (EV 'sandals'). Vg. has both calceamenta and sandalia. In the Mishna the term for a shoemaker is רַצְעַן סנדלר; the word 'sandal' had become naturalised. The strap by which the sandal is bound under the foot is called in biblical Hebrew šĕrōk, שְׂרוֹךְ (σφαιρωτήρ; and ἱμάς, with which cp Mk. 1 7 etc.) or ḥūṭ, חוּט (σπαρτίον), 'thread' (see, for both, Gen. 14 23). Once, according to most moderns (e.g., Ges.-Buhl, Siegfr.-Stade, Di.-Kittel's Is., Duhm, Kautzsch), who follow Ḳimḥi, there is mention of the military 'boot.' This is in Is. 9 5 [4] where RVmg. offers the reading, 'for every boot of the booted warrior,' etc. This view of the meaning is supported by a reference to Ass.,[1] Syr., and Eth. parallels. It is unknown, however, to the old exegetical tradition, which, so far as it presupposes סאון (or some word like it), supports the rendering 'tumult' (as if שָׁאוֹן); see Vg., Pesh., Sym., also Rashi, Ibn Ezra, AV ('battle'), one part of which probably supports the rendering 'armour,' the other 'tumult.' [𝔊's πᾶσαν στολὴν ἐπισυνηγμένην δόλῳ possibly represents כָּל־חֹסֶן חָסוּן בְּרֶשַׁע. Vg., Pesh., Sym., also Rashi, and Ibn Ezra explain שָׁאוֹן, 'tumult.'] AV ('battle') favours the latter view; RV the former.[2] Our right course is perhaps to compare parallel descriptions of the abolition of war elsewhere (e.g., Ps. 46 9 [10]). So at any rate Cheyne, who rejects סאון altogether, and, finding other improbabilities in the text of Is. 9 4 [5], proposes a possible reconstruction (SBOT, 'Isa.,' l.c.).

4. Hebrew customs—references to the shoe.

There are many references to the shoe in the OT which have a close relation to important Hebrew customs, but the Hebrew and even the Greek text sometimes requires close preliminary investigation. (a) We notice first the command to Moses to draw off his shoes[3] when on holy ground (Ex. 3 5, cp 12 11 Josh. 5 15). This supplies a trace of a primitive taboo, to which those who assisted at religious festivals, especially in the sacred dance or procession (cp DANCE, §§ 2-6), were subject.[4] Tunics and the like were washed to avoid this taboo. In Egypt, too, we find that the priests frequently took off their sandals when officiating in the temple. On the other hand, a worshipper such as Ašur-naṣir-pal offers a libation still wearing them (Perrot-Chipiez, Art in Chald., etc., 2 fig. 113). The Talmud says (Yĕbāmoth, 6 b) that no one was allowed to approach the temple with staff, shoes, purse, or dirt on the feet.[5]

(b) Next, we have to deal with an obscure reference in Ps. 60 8 [10] 108 9 [10]. We know from Ruth 4 7 (see below) that drawing off the shoe meant giving up a legal right. May we assume from Ps. l.c., that casting a shoe on a piece of land was the sign of taking possession of it? Rosenmüller (see Delitzsch's commentary) quotes an Abyssinian custom of this sort; Delitzsch and Baethgen follow him. Others (see RVmg.) think that Edom is here represented as a slave to whom the shoe is cast, that he may carry it.[6] But this is forced; and the reference to Moab as a 'washpot' being at least equally strange, it may be necessary to suppose corruption of the text (see Che. Psalms(2)). The idiom which the psalmist would have used, had he wished to describe the humiliation of a conquered country, would have been 'upon Edom will I place my feet,' or the like (cp Josh. 10 24). Wilkinson (2 326) gives a picture of a captive in the lining of an Egyptian sandal, depicting the humiliating condition considered suited to the enemies of the country.

(c) In the MT of Am. 2 6 and 8 6 a 'pair of sandals,' which, made in a few minutes, would be dear at a penny, would seem to be proverbial for something of small value.[7] But the parallel clause has 'for money'; נעלים may not be the correct reading.

It is true that it is supported by 1 S. 12 3 𝔊 and Ecclus. 46 19*b* 𝔊 Lat., which agree in representing Samuel as too honourable to accept even ὑποδήματα (sandals) as a bribe. But no doubt

1 Leather shoes are referred to in Ezek. 16 10 (ואנעלך תחש, 𝔊 ὑάκιθον; see BADGERS' SKINS [5]).

2 One is reminded of the Roman soleæ where the thong passes between the great and the second toe and is fastened to another, the ligula.

3 Especially curious are the swathes and bandages covering the foot of Marduk-nādin-aḫē (op. cit., 2, fig. 43). At the present day the shepherds of Palestine wear rough simple shoes (cp Conder, Tentwork, 2 281) with leather gaiters covering the calf of the leg, on account of the rocks and thorns among which they climb. The miṣĕḥōth (מִצְחוֹת, 1 S. 17 6, 'greaves') of Goliath may have been similar; see GREAVES.

4 Josh. 9 5 affords the interesting phrase נְעָלוֹת בָּלוֹת וּמְטֻלָּאוֹת, 'shoes, worn out, and patched.'

5 min'āl, מִנְעָל, Dt. 33 25 AV. RVmg. 'shoes' (so 𝔊) is properly 'bars' (RV, Dr., Steuernagel, etc.), cp man'ūl, מַנְעוּל, Neh. 3 3, Cant. 5 5.

1 On Ass. šenu, 'shoe' (the ideogram means 'road-leather'), see Del. Ass. HWB, s.v., and Haupt on 'Isa.' l.c., in SBOT, 'Isa.' (Heb.), 88.

2 Hitzig supports the rendering 'armour' by the Syr. ܙܝܢܐ 'weapon.'

3 The verb used is נשל, elsewhere שׁלף in Ruth 4 7 f., and חלץ in Dt. 25 9 Is. 20 2.

4 See WRS Rel. Sem.(2) 453; We. Heid.(2) 110.

5 Analogies from Crete and Rhodes are cited by Frazer, Paus. 5 202. Conversely, on the occasion of ceremonial sacrifices the worshippers or initiated members are shod in slippers made of the skin of the victim. W. R. Smith (Rel. Sem.(2) 438) cites such a case from a late Syrian rite, and Greek and Roman analogies are quoted by Frazer, l.c. It is somewhat remarkable that the Levitical law is silent on the matter of the priest's shoes, and interesting also is the silence of the Roman rubrics.

6 So Hupf., Riehm. Cp Mt. 3 11. In Egyptian paintings servants are represented performing this menial duty.

7 So šis' (lorum soleæ), in the Arabic poets (G. Jacob, Altarab. Parallelen, 17); cp also Goldziher, ZA 7 296 f. (1892).

נעלים (which these versions presuppose, and which the Heb. text of Ecclus. actually has) is a corruption of שְׁלוּם (Mic. 7 3), which must have been the original reading in 1 S. 12 4 [Che.].[1]

(d) We have already alluded to Ruth 4 7 f. (see b). 'A man pulled off (שָׁלַף) his shoe,' we read, 'and gave it to his neighbour' to indicate transference of rights. Hoffmann (ZATW 3 98) explains that the shoe, being part of the seller's attire, was passed on to the buyer as an attestation of his right. Cp RUTH, and for an Arabian parallel, references in TRADE, § 82 e 2 (5).

(e) Similarly, in the ceremony for freeing the husband's brother from the duty of the levirate marriage (Dt. 25 9) his shoe was removed in token of renunciation.[2] So in a Bedouin divorce the husband says; 'she was my slipper and I cast her off' (WRS Kins. 269). The renunciation of the brother was considered contemptible; hence the woman spat in his face, or, as the Rabbis explain, in his presence. So, too, the shoe was not removed by the brother himself, but by the woman, in token that he was abandoning a privilege as well as a duty. Note the phrase in Dt. 25 10, 'the house of the unsandalled one' (בֵּית חֲלוּץ הַנָּעַל). Cp FAMILY, KINSHIP.

(f) Sandals were put on the feet of the prodigal son on his restoration to favour (Lk. 15 22). It would seem, then, that in the time of Jesus, sandals were not worn by the lowest class. The sandals of the rich could no doubt be sumptuous, like those of the ladies of Egypt (Wilk. Anc. Eg. 2 336). Cp Cant. 7 1, Judith 10 4 16 9.

5. Difficult NT references.

[Having considered a very obscure and familiar passage of a psalm (60 8 [10]) and a not perfectly satisfactory phrase in a prophecy (Is. 9 5 [4]), we now approach a still more sacred passage which is repeated under slightly different forms in all the four gospels. These are the four versions of the Baptist's words:—

Mt. 3 11, He that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not sufficient (RV^mg.) to bear.

Mk. 1 7, There cometh after me he that is mightier than I, the latchet of whose shoes I am not sufficient (RV^mg.) to stoop down and unloose.

Lk. 3 16, There cometh he that is mightier than I, the latchet of whose shoes I am not sufficient (RV^mg.) to unloose.

Jn. 1 27, He that cometh after me—the latchet of whose shoe I am not worthy to unloose.

The difficulty is twofold. What does 'bearing the shoes' (τὰ ὑποδήματα βαστάσαι) mean? and how came the other traditional form of words into existence, which substitutes 'unloosing the latchet' for 'bearing the shoes'?

(1) B. Weiss (1876) explains the phrase in Mt., 'carrying the sandals after him'; so, too, Holtzmann, who describes it as a constant duty of the slave, thus contrasting with the occasional duty of unloosing the master's sandals on his return home. There seems, however, to be no more evidence that those who chose (not as mourners) to walk barefoot had their sandals carried after them than for the carrying of a washpot behind a king when he travelled (see above). (2) The change from βαστάσαι to λῦσαι is ascribed by Nestle (Phil. Sacra, 11) and Chajes (Markusstudien, 5) to the freedom of a translator. Bertholet (Meyer, Jesu Muttersprache, 120) prefers to look for some Semitic word which, through being misunderstood, could be rendered in two different ways. He thinks that Mk. and Lk. give the right rendering of למשקל סינין, which Mt., not inexcusably, misunderstands. Unfortunately, as Nestle (l.c.) remarks, למשקל cannot mean 'to unloose.'

We must look more deeply into the text of the Baptist's sermon as given in Mt. It is largely composed of phrases which occur or might occur in the OT, and vv. 11 12 are parallelistic. The latter consideration is of special importance. 'He that cometh after me is mightier than I' is not suitably followed by the words given in EV—'whose shoes I am not worthy to bear'; the second expression ought to expand and amplify the first. The 'mighty one' that 'cometh' is neither God (Is. 53 1 f.) nor the Messiah; he is a warrior, and we do not expect the prophetic narrator to condescend to mention his sandals. Not his sandals but his weapons must be referred to, and the speaker may be expected to say that he is not mighty enough himself to wear, or to bear, the warrior's armour; ὑποδήματα must have displaced a word meaning armour, and ἱκανός must mean, not ἄξιος ('worthy'), but 'strong enough.' A probable remedy at once suggests itself. The passage may have been written in Hebrew, and נְעָלִים, 'shoes,' have been misread for כֵּלִים,[1] 'weapons.' Read אֲשֶׁר קָטֹנְתִּי מִשְּׂאֵת כֵּלָיו, 'whose weapons I am too puny to bear.' The passage is now surely worthier of the second Elijah, who did in fact both carry and wield the sword of the Mighty One.—T. K. C.] I. A.—S. A. C.—T. K. C.

SHOHAM (שֹׁהַם, § 71; ιc[c]οαм [BA], ιєccαм [L]), a Levite, b. Merari (1 Ch. 24 27)†. The name is of interest, having possibly come by transposition of letters from מֹשֶׁה, 'Moses.' Cp MOSES, § 2.

T. K. C.

SHOMER. 1. (שֹׁמֵר; cωмнρ [B], pr ωc [A]; cєммнρ [L]; the name appears as שֶׁמֶר, SHEMER [q.v.] in 1 Ch. 7 34), father of JEHOZABAD, 1 (2 K. 12 22). In 2 Ch. 24 26 the form is שִׁמְרִית, SHIMRITH (σομαιωθ [B]; σαμαριθ [A]; σαμιραμωθ [L]).

2. (שׁוֹמֵר, שָׁמֵר; σαμηρ, σεμμηρ [B], σωμηρ [AL]), a name in a genealogy of ASHER [q.v., § 4, ii.], 1 Ch. 7 32. In v. 34 SHAMER, RV SHEMER [q.v., 2] (שֶׁמֶר).

SHOPHACH (שׁוֹפַךְ 1 Ch. 19 16-18, in 2 S. 10 16-18 SHOBACH.

SHOPHAN. See ATROTH-SHOPHAN.

SHOSHANNIM; SHOSHANNIM-EDUTH; SHUSHAN-EDUTH, UPON (עַל־שֹׁשַׁנִּים; אֶל־שֹׁשַׁנִּים עֵדוּת; עַל־שׁוּשַׁן עֵדוּת); phrases found in the respective headings of Pss. 45 69 80 and 60 in AV; RV for 'upon' gives 'set to' and in mg. renders 'lilies,' 'lilies, a testimony,' and 'the lily of testimony.' As in the case of other enigmatical elements of psalm-headings, Shoshannim and Shoshannim (or Shushan) Eduth are often taken to be the catchwords of a song, to the air of which the psalm which followed was to be sung (so already Ibn Ezra).[2] The 'testimony' (i.e., the law?) might be compared to lilies. Others (e.g., Thrupp) think of a musical instrument in the shape of a lily, or (Rashi, strangely) with six strings, while others (Grätz; Haupt in 'Pss.' SBOT, Eng., p. 183) render the phrase 'with Susian instruments,' comparing al 'ălāmōth='with Elamite instruments' (?) in the headings of two psalms close to Ps. 45. That the Susians are called Susanchites (?) in Ezra 4 9, may not be decisive against this view. But why should Susian instruments be mentioned as well as Elamite? A similar hypothesis with regard to Gittith is rejected elsewhere (GITTITH) as untenable, and our experience both with Gittith and with other strange words in psalm-headings leads us to suspect textual error. ש and ת were easily confounded in pronunciation, and letters were often transposed by the Scribes. ששנים, שושן may be regarded as corruptions of כֻּשָׁנִים, כּוּשָׁן, 'Cushan,' 'Cushanites' (cp SHEMINITH). EDUTH must also be a corruption. Possibly עדות has sprung out of עַל־ידותון, 'upon (?) Jeduthun.' On Jeduthun, see PSALMS, § 26 [10].

[1] Halévy restores שְׁלוּם in Ecclus. but not in Sam. This further step, however, is clearly necessary (Che). Cowley and Neubauer (cp Lévi, L'Ecclés. 1 120) render נ׳ in Ecclus. 'a secret gift.' This, however, presupposes MT of 1 S. 12 4, which, as Thenius (KGH 'Sam.'(2)) rightly saw, is incorrect. The argument of Löhr (KGH 'Sam.'(3)) seems indecisive.

[2] [For a similar Ar. usage see Goldziher, Abhandl. z. Arab. Phil. 147 (1896).]

[1] כ became נ, and ע, as in other cases, intruded.

[2] In Ps. 80, however, the words 'on Shoshannim' are marked off from what follows by the accent Athnāḥ.

𝔊 g ves, ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀλλοιωθησομένων (שֹׁשַׁנִּים), or, in Ps. 60, τοῖς ἀλλοιωθησομένοις ἔτι (עֵדוּת, Rom. ἔτι), in Ps. 80 adds μαρτύριον. Aq. ἐπὶ τοῖς κρίνοις, ἐπὶ κρίνων, ὑπὲρ τῶν κρίνων μαρτυρίας; Symm. ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀνθῶν, ὑπὲρ τ. ἀ. μαρτυρία; Theodot. ὑπὲρ τῶν κρίνων; Jer. pro his qui (quæ) commotabuntur. Cp Bä. JPT, 1882, p. 631. SHOULDER. The words are (1) זְרוֹעַ, zᵉrōa'; (2) כָּתֵף, kātheph; (3) שְׁכֶם, šĕkem (cp SHECHEM). The sacrificial 'shoulder' of Nu. 18 18 AV becomes in RV 'thigh' (שׁוֹק). Cp SACRIFICE.

SHOVEL. The words are :—

1. יָע, yā' (√יעה, to sweep together), only in plur. יָעִים, utensils for cleaning the altar (see ALTAR, § 9; COOKING, § 4), Ex. 27 3 38 3 Nu. 4 14 [all P], also 1 K. 7 40 45 2 K. 25 14 2 Ch. 4 11 16 Jer. 52 18†.

2. יָתֵד, yāthēd, usually 'pin,' especially 'tent pin' (see TENT); in Dt. 23 13 RVᵐᵍ· for 'paddle' of EV; plainly, from the context, an implement suitable for digging with.

3. רַחַת, rāḥath, Is. 30 24†. See AGRICULTURE, § 9.

SHUA (שׁוּעַ), a Canaanite (or Kenizzite?), Gen. 38 2 12 (AV SHUAH [iii.]), whence BATH-SHUA (q.v.), a Canaanite (or Kenizzite?) woman, 1 Ch. 2 3; see JUDAH, § 2.

SHUA (שׁוּעָא), a name in a genealogy of ASHER (q.v., § 4 ii. and note—perh. = SHUAL? cp 𝔊ᴮᴬ), 1 Ch. 7 32† (ϲωλα [BA], ϲογα [L]).

SHUAH (שׁוּחַ; ϲωγε), son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25 2 1 Ch. 1 32: ϲωε [B], ϲογε [L]). Very possibly the original text had כּוּשׁ, 'Cush' (cp Jokshan, in the same passage, from Cushan, and see HUSHAM). Upon the common theory, however, Shuah is identified with the Sûḫu of the Assyrians (temp. Ašur-nasir-pal, about 860 B.C.), the name of a land situated on the right bank of the Euphrates, between the mouths of the Beliḫ and Ḫabor (Del. Par. 297 f., Schr. KGF 142 f.), perhaps represented by the σαυη of Ptol. v. 19 5 (Di. on Gen. l.c.). Friedr. Delitzsch, Dillmann, and Cheyne (Job and Sol. 15) connect with the ethnic SHUHITE (שׁוּחִי, ὁ σαυχ[α]ίων, σαυχ[ε]ίτης, αὐχ) applied to Job's friend BILDAD, in Job 2 11 (and elsewhere). But when the old story of Job, which came down in a very fragmentary form to post-exilic times (see JOB, BOOK OF, § 4) was recast, so as to form a setting for a theoretic treatment of the problem of the suffering righteous, it is not likely that the Hebrew artist or poet brought one of the wise men (Job's friends) from a country which had no reputation for 'wisdom.' Besides, 'Bildad' reminds us forcibly of Bedad (?= Birdadda), an Edomite name (Gen. 36 35; see BEDAD). Now it so happens that in 1 K. 4 31 [5 11], we hear of certain wise men, not Israelites, who were famous in Hebrew legend (see HEMAN). The exact reading of their names is uncertain. Possibly 'Darda' in 'Calcol and Darda' (כלכל ודרדע) is a corruption of בלדד. If so, Bildad's description ought to be 'the Jerahmeelite' (son of Mahol = son of JERAHMEEL). But 'Cush' and 'Jerahmeel' are practically equivalent. 'Shuhi' may easily have come by transposition from Ḥushi = Cushi (cp SHUHAM). Otherwise we might perhaps venture to read 'the Zarhite' (הַזַּרְחִי). Cp ELIHU. T. K. C.

SHUAH (שׁוּחָה) 1 Ch. 4 11, AV, RV SHUHAH.

SHUAH (שׁוּעַ), Gen. 38 2 12, RV SHUA (i.).

SHUAL. 1. (אֶרֶץ שׁוּעָל; [ΤΗΝ or Τ. ΓΗΝ] ϲωγαλ [BL, missing in A]), 'Land of Shual' is the name of the district in, or near, which OPHRAH lay (1 S. 13 17†). Its resemblance to HAZAR-SHUAL [q.v.] and to SHAALIM [q.v.] is remarkable. Cp ASHER, § 4 note, also JQR 11 110. 2. (שׁוּעָל; ϲογλα [B], ϲογαλ [A], -Ν [L]), a name in a genealogy of ASHER (q.v., § 4, ii.), 1 Ch. 7 36†.

It should be noted that SHUAL and SHILSHAH (q.v.) occur in the same group of names, just as in 1 S. 9 4 SHALISHAH (q.v.) occurs close to SHAALIM [q.v.]. Cp also שָׁאוּל, SAUL.

SHUBAEL (שׁוּבָאֵל; on origin of name, see below; ϲογβαηλ [BA], -ιηλ [L]). A Levitical name given to a descendant of Amram b. Kohath b. Levi (1 Ch. 24 20, ιωβ. [B]); also under the form SHEBUEL to the chief of the sons of Gershom b. Moses (1 Ch. 23 16, שְׁבוּאֵל), 'ruler over the treasuries' (1 Ch. 26 24, שְׁבָאֵל, ιωηλ [B], σωβιηλ [L]). Tg. Chron. identifies Shebuel with JONATHAN [q.v.] b. Gershon b. Moses (Judg. 18 30). SHEBUEL also appears as a son of Heman, 1 Ch. 25 4 (σουβαηλ [L]); but v. 20 returns to the original šûbāēl (cp 23 16).

In the period of the Chronicler Shubael may perhaps have been derived from שׁוּב, 'to return,' and אֵל, 'God' (cp NAMES, §§ 31, 79, ii.). But the name is probably very old, and may be identified with SHOBAL [q.v.], a name borne by a family originally Calebite, which afterwards became merged in Judah (for parallels, see GERSHOM, HEMAN, KORAH). The further possibility must be admitted that שְׁמוּאֵל, Shĕmûēl (Samuel) is only a modification of שְׁבוּאֵל, Shĕbuel, and therefore of Shobal (cp Jastrow, JBL 19 102 [1900]). In 1 S. 1 1 Samuel's origin is traced to Jeroham—i.e., Jeraḥmeel. In 1 Ch. 25 4 Shebuel is followed by Jerimoth (= Jeraḥmeel?), and in 23 23 the name of this son of MUSHI (q.v.) again occurs. T. K. C.

SHUHAH (שׁוּחָה), brother of Chelub (1 Ch. 4 11; AV SHUAH, ϲογα [L], sua [Vg.]); 𝔊ᴮᴬ and Pesh. omit his name and give after Chelub 'father of Achsah,' a reading which Benzinger (KHC) favours. But Shuhah may be identical with Hushah (חוּשָׁה), v. 4—i.e., Cushah.

SHUHAM (שׁוּחָם; ϲαμ[ε]ι [BF], ϲαμειαη [A], ϲαμε [L]), and the family of the Shuhamites (הַשּׁוּחָמִי, Δημοϲ ο ϲαμ[ε]ι [BAF], Δ. ο ϲαμε [L], Δ. ο ϲαμειΔηι [A in v. 46]) exhaust the list of 'the sons of Dan after their families' in Nu. 26 42 f. = Gen. 46 23, HUSHIM—i.e., Cushim (Che.); cp MICAH, 2, on a theory of Danites in the Negeb. See also DAN, § 9.

SHUHITE (שׁוּחִי), Job 2 11. See SHUAH.

SHULAMMITE, THE (הַשּׁוּלַמִּית), i.e., the woman of Shulem,[1] the designation of the bride in Cant. 6 13 [7 1]. The true form, however, is probably הַשּׁוּנַמִּית, 'the Shunammite,' which should possibly be restored for עמי נדיב in 6 12, and for עננים in 7 7 (see CANTICLES, § 16; JQR, Oct. 1899, p. 133). Perhaps Shulem was an alternative form for 'Shunem'; cp Bethel = mod. Beitin, Jezreel = mod. Zer'in, and see Kampffmeyer, ZDPV 15 32, also the statement of Eus. and Jer. (SHUNEM). Whether the poet is speaking directly of the historical Shunammite damsel who was David's 'companion,' or simply means to compliment any and every Jewish woman at whose wedding festivities Canticles may be used, is disputed. The latter view (Budde's) seems the more probable (see CANTICLES, § 6). The Shunammite was the type of a fair woman (1 K. 1 3; cp Cant. 1 8 5 9). Budde does not, however, completely explain why this type was selected. Possibly (though this is no part of Budde's theory) a tradition known to the poet stated that Solomon actually took the Shulammite for his wife. In this case, we may venture to suppose that for 'Naamah the Ammonitess' (הָעַמֹּנִית, 1 K. 14 21 31) we should read 'Naamah the Shunammite' (הַשֻּׁנַמִּית). 'Abishag' (1 K. 1 3 15 2 17 21 f.), like Abital, is no real name. See SOLOMON, § 2, near end, and article in JQR, referred to above.

[1] Apart from the article, the name שולמית might be a proper name. Cp 'Salome' and שְׁלִימַת, an Aramaic proper name (Ges.(13); cp Cook, Aramaic Glossary, 113).

𝔊's readings are σουμανειτις [B], σουλαμιτις [ℵA, and most cursives]. Vg., It., two Onomastica (OS 198 66 204 41), Procop., Theodoret, favour σουλαμιτις; Philo of Carpasia, strangely, οδολλαμιτις. The older and more original 𝔊 reading is that of B (Riedel, Die Auslegung des Hohenliedes, 1899, pp. 105 f.). Aq. ἐν εἰρηνευούσῃ; Sym. τὴν ἐσκυλευμένην.

SHUMATHITE (שֻׁמָתִי), 1 Ch. 2 53. See SHOBAL.

SHUNAMMITE (שׁוּנַמִּית, 1 K. 1 3 15 2 17 2 K. 4 12 25; שֻׁנַמִּית, 1 K. 2 21 f. 2 K. 4 36). A gentilic (fem.), applied to Abishag and to the hostess of Elisha, both women of SHUNEM [q.v.].

𝔊 in Kings invariably has σωμαν[ε]ιτις, σωμανιτης, σουμανιτις, or σουμανιτης. Cp SHULAMMITE, and, for Eus. and Jer. see SHUNEM.

SHUNEM (שׁוּנֵם, in Josh. ϲογναν [B], -μ [A], ϲγνημ [L]); in 1 S. ϲωμαν [BL], γωναμαν [A]; in 2 K. ϲογμαν [B], ϲωμαν [B^a mg. L], ϲιωναμ [A*vid.], ϲιωμαμ [A?]; on Eus. and Jer. see below). 1. A place in Issachar, grouped with Jezreel and Chesulloth (Josh. 19 18), and mentioned in the Egyptian lists among the places in Palestine which submitted to Thotmes III. and Shoshenk (RP(2) 5 46; As. u. Eur. 170). Shunem must be the mod. Sôlem, which is a small village, with beautiful fruit- and flower-gardens, well situated on the SW. slope of the Nebi Dahi (Little Hermon), and looking over the whole plain as far as Carmel. Two natives of Shunem are specially mentioned—viz., Abishag, David's 'companion' (1 K. 1 3 2 17 21 f.), and the 'great woman' who entertained Elisha (2 K. 4 8 ff.); many add, as a third, the 'Shulammite' of Canticles. We also learn from 1 S. 28 4 that the 'Philistines,' in the time of Saul, pitched their tents in Shunem, over against the Israelites on Gilboa (1 S. 28 4). (On Elisha's miracle at Shunem and its NT parallel, see NAIN.)

2. If we may hold that the scene of Saul's last struggle with the Philistines, and also that of Elisha's prophetic ministry, have been mistaken by the editor or editors who brought the texts of 1 S. 28 and 2 K. 4 into their present form, there was a second Shunem in the Negeb. This is, of course, not a mere isolated theory, but a part of a general theory that much of the OT has been recast, on the basis of a partly corrupt text, and under the influence of wrong theories of the geography and (partly) the history of ancient Israel. On this matter, so far as it concerns Shunem, see SAUL, §§ 4 b ff.; PROPHECY, § 5 f. 'Shunem' is probably the place called 'Beth-shan' in 1 S. 31 10—that is to say, perhaps the Bor-ashan of 1 S. 30 30 (see ASHAN), and 'Mt. Carmel' to which the 'great woman' rode, and where Elisha dwelt, was Mt. Jerahmeel. If so, it becomes very possible that Abishag 'the Shunammite' was a native of the Shunem in the Negeb; indeed, David's close connection with the Negeb makes this in itself highly probable.

It is remarkable that Eus. (OS 294 56, s.v. σουβημ) and Jer. (OS 152 17, s.v. Sunem), who say that the Issacharite locality was in their time called Sulem, do not identify it with the Shunem of Elisha's hostess. This they refer to separately as σωναμ, Sonam (OS 295 86 153 18), and identify with the σανιμ or Sanim of their own day, 'a village within the border of Sebaste in the region of Acrabattene.'

SHUNI (שׁוּנִי; ϲαγνιϲ, ϲογνι [A], ϲαγνειϲ [D], ϲογνει [B], ϲογνι [F], ϲαγνειϲ, ϲωγνι [L]), one of the sons of Gad (Gen. 46 16 Nu. 26 15), a corruption either of Sharonite (GAD, § 13) or of Shunammite (Gad having been originally settled in the land of SIHON [from Cushan], or of the Negeb, where there appears to have been a Shunem).[1] The patronymic is Shunite, Nu. 26 15 (הַשּׁוּנִי, σουν[ε]ι [BAF], σωυνει [L]).

SHUPHAM, RV Shephupham (q.v.), whence the gentilic Shuphamite (שׁוּפָמִי), Num. 26 39. Cp SHUPPIM, also SHAPHAM and SHEPHAM, originally names belonging to the Negeb, whence Benjamin also may be held to have come (Che.).

SHUPPIM (שֻׁפִּים, § 75). 1. A son of Benjamin:[2] 1 Ch. 7 12 15† (σαπφειν, μαμφειν [B], σαφειμ, σεφφειμ [A], σαφαν, σαφιν [L]). The preferable form is probably SHUPHAM (q.v.).

2. According to 1 Ch. 26 16 MT, the westward lot fell 'to Shuppim and Hosah' (see HOSAH) when the courses of the doorkeepers were arranged in David's time (εἰς δεύτερον [B, as though שֵׁנִים], εἰς δ. τοῖς πυροθύροις [L, as if it read סִפִּים], τῷ σεφιειμ [A]). The name is probably a mere error arising from the repetition of the last two syllables of the preceding verse (הָאֲסֻפִּים, 'the stores').

SHUR (שׁוּר; ϲογρ; but in 1 S. 15 7 αϲϲογρ [B], ϲογλ [L]; 1 S. 27 8 [γελαμ] ψογρ τετειχιϲμενιον [B],—ϲογρ . . . τετ. [A], γεϲϲογρ [L]; Gen. 25 18 ϲογηλ [A]), generally supposed to be a locality on the NE. border of Egypt (1 S. 15 7 27 8 Gen. 16 7 20 1 25 18); adjoining it was the 'wilderness of Shur' (Ex. 15 22). If, however, we examine these passages and their contents historically, we soon see that Egypt is not at all likely to be referred to; the scene of all the narratives in question is the Jerahmeelite Negeb (see NEGEB). מצרים should therefore be vocalised Miṣrim (= the N. Arabian Muṣri) not Mizraim (see MIZRAIM, § 2 b), and the Shūr or Asshūr (correction or gloss in Gen. 25 18 and 1 S. 15 7 𝔊^B) is a region south of Palestine and adjoining Miṣrim or Muṣri.

The passages are—(1) Gen. 16 7; Hagar is found 'by the fountain in the way to Shūr' (i.e., between Kadesh and Bered [on the phrase in 16 14 see Crit. Bib.]). (2) 20 1; Abraham dwelt 'between Kadesh and Shūr' (see GERAR). (3) 25 18; the Ishmaelites dwelt 'from Havilah [= Jerahmeel] as far as Shūr that is in front of Miṣrim, [to the entrance of Asshur].' (4) Ex. 15 22; after leaving the yām sūph [RED SEA], the Israelites 'went out into the desert of Shūr,' after which they came to Marah and Elim [together = Jerahmeel; cp REPHIDIM]. (5) 1 S. 15 7; the Amalekite country 'from Havilah [rather Jerahmeel] to the entrance of Shur that is in front of Miṣrim.' (6) 27 8; the Amalekites whom Saul defeated, and the other peoples named, inhabited 'the land which is from Jerahmeel (מעלם comes from ירחמאל, and corresponds to מחוילה in the ‖, Gen. 25 18) to the entrance of Shur.' To these may be added two phraseologically similar passages, though the name given is not Shur, but in one case Asshur and in the other Shihor, viz., (7) Gen. 2 14; Hiddekel (i.e., the wādy Jerahmeel) which 'goes in front of Asshur'; and (8) Josh. 13 3; the territory of the Geshurites, etc., 'from Shihor (= Ashhur) which is in front of Miṣrim as far as the border of Ekron (rather 'Jerahmeel') northward.' See PARADISE, § 5; SHIHOR.

Thus, to the equivalent forms Asshūr, Ashḥūr, and Gĕshūr, we may now add a fourth 'Shūr.' The view based upon 𝔊^BA of 1 S. 27 8, held formerly by Wellhausen (TBS 97) and still assented to by H. P. Smith (Sam. 133), that Shūr originally meant the wall (or line of fortresses) which extended from Pelusium through Migdol to Hero, and protected Egypt against the Arabians (cp Brugsch, Gesch. Aeg. 119, 195; Die Bibl. Sieben Jahre, 80), must apparently be abandoned. [No such line of fortifications is known. W. M. Müller

SHUSHAN (שׁוּשַׁן, COYCA[N]), always (except in Esth. 3 15*b* where הָעִיר שׁוּשָׁן, cp 𝔊's constant ἡ πόλις) with the addition of 'the palace,' or rather [RV^mg.] 'the castle' (הַבִּירָה; see BDB, 108*a*), in the time of Daniel's Belshazzar, capital of the province of ELAM (q.v. and cp PERSIA, § 12); in that of Nehemiah's Artaxerxes and of Esther's Ahasuerus, the residence of the kings of Persia (Dan. 8 2 Neh. 1 1 Esth. 1 2 5 3 15, twice). The

1. Ancient Susa. identification with Susa, which in the Ass. inscriptions is repeatedly referred to as Šušan (= the Šušin or Šušun of the Susian inscriptions), is obviously agreeable to the intention of, at any rate, the last redactor of Dan., Neh., and Esth.; whether the reading 'Shushan' was that of the original narratives, remains to be considered. Where the ancient Susa was situated, and what it was like in the glorious period which begins with its second foundation by Darius Hystaspis, we now know more fully than was once possible, owing to the explorations of Loftus and M. Dieulafoy, though ancient tradition had told of the magnificent walls and of the hoards of gold found in the treasury by the victorious Alexander. Of the first Susa with its palace (Rogers, Hist. Bab. Ass. 1 420) and its zikkurrat (see BABYLONIA, § 16) of alabaster, which was destroyed by Ašur-bani-pal (KB 2 205), we have no mention, primary or secondary, in the OT, though the SUSANCHITES in Ezra 4 9, whom 'the great and noble Osnappar (?) brought over' (to Samaria) are generally thought, incorrectly perhaps but with no slight plausibility, to have come from the district of Shushan. The situation of Susa, indeed, was so suitable for a large city that a revival of its ancient prosperity might have been with some confidence predicted.

'It is at a distance of 15 m. in a SW. direction from Dizful that the prodigious mounds of Shush, or Susa,

2. Situation. stand up against the sky. They are situated on the left bank of the river Shaur (originally Shapur), which rises at no great distance to the north and flows in a deep, narrow bed below the Tomb of Daniel, and between the larger rivers Ab-i-Diz (Eulæus), 6½ m. distant on the E., and the Kerkhah (Choaspes), 1½ m. distant on the W. The Choaspes divided the populous quarter of the ancient city from the citadel and palace. The entire circumference of the mounds is from 6 to 7 m. They consist of three levels: the lowest conceals the remains of the ancient city; the second, which is a rectangular platform 2½ m. round and 72 ft. high, was the fortified enceinte that contained the palace; the uppermost, 120 ft. in height, 1100 yds. round the base, and 850 yds. round the summit, was the citadel, and is still known as Kaleh-i-Shush.'[1] So strong was this citadel (the μεμνόνιον of Strabo xv. 3 2; cp Herod. 5 54) that it successfully withstood Molon in his war with Antiochus the Great (Polyb. 5 48). The original palace, however, was destined to a somewhat short existence; it was destroyed by fire in the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus. Artaxerxes Mnemon restored it. According to Xenophon (Cyrop. viii. 6 22) Susa was the winter residence of the Persian kings, the rest of the year being spent by them at Babylon and Ecbatana. Susa was still a flourishing city under the Sassanians. It was razed to the ground after a revolt, but rebuilt by Shapur II., under the title Iranshahr Shapur. The fortifications were dismantled at the Moslem conquest, but the site was still inhabited in the Middle Ages, and a seat of the sugar manufacture of Khuzistan.

If M. Dieulafoy may be followed, the excavations which he brought to so successful a close at Susa are of high importance for the study of the book of Esther. Among other matters, he refers to the bīthān (EV 'palace') mentioned twice, once as the place in the court of the garden of which a feast was made by the king for all the people of 'Shushan the castle' (Esth. 1 5), and again in connection with the 'banquet of wine' at which occurred the crisis in the fortunes of the 'wicked Haman' (7 7 f.). The word (בִּיתָן) occurs nowhere else, and all that scholars can say is that it is a new formation from בית. M. Dieulafoy, however, thinks that when for two years one has interrogated the soul of the Memnonium, it is impossible not to recognise in the 'Bithan' of the OT the Susian apadâna.[1]

'Alone of all the palace buildings, the tabernacle consecrated to the divinised king could and ought to rise in the midst of a paradise [παράδεισος]; alone, it was sufficiently isolated from the apartments reserved for the sovereign to make it possible conveniently to introduce a considerable number of persons. Like the bīthān, the apadâna was surrounded by groves immediately adjoining the house of the women; like the bīthān, it was preceded by an immense vestibule, capable of holding the guests of Ahasuerus; like the bīthān, it was a hypostyle, and paved with coloured marbles. Lastly, like the bīthān, it played a special part in the life of the kings of Persia and the ceremonial of the Achæmenian court.' 'The apadâna, or throne-room, resembled a Greek temple; the king occupied the place of the divine statue. The throne-room of Susa covers more than a hectare (2½ acres); the porticoes, the staircases, the enclosures open out on a terrace eighteen times more considerable in area, and divided in two parts by a pylon. On this side a colossal staircase led from the place d'armes outside to the level of a vast parade; on the other, radiant with its crown of enamels, buried in the foliage of a hanging garden, was the apadâna, past which marched the ambassadors of all the states of Greece.'[2]

That this is satisfactory we cannot bring ourselves to admit. We will not insist on the אפדנו (appadnō) of Dan. 11 45 (EV 'his palace'), for, in spite of the tendency of scholars to identify this word with the Old Pers. apadâna, we feel the strong probability that this word is corrupt (see PALACE, § 1 [9]). But is it likely that the narrator in Esther should have known the Persian architecture so accurately when (see ESTHER, § 1) the book is in other respects so full of patent improbabilities? A little experience of the ways of the scribes shows a better way out of the difficulty of the ביתן. That it is a parallel formation to בית, is a purely arbitrary theory. Much more probably ביתן is a corruption of בָּטְנִי. It was an orchard (גִּנַּת) of pistachio nut-trees that was meant (cp the 'garden of nuts' [גִּנַּת אֱגוֹז] in Cant. 6 11).

The improbabilities of the story of Esther would

3. Present writer's theory. become less striking, if we could reconstruct the original story, which the editor (according to a theory for which there seem to be analogies elsewhere in the OT) has converted as well as he could into a story of the Jews under Persian rule, whereas originally the story had reference to the period when the Jews were (it may be held) in captivity under the N. Arabian Jeraḥmeelites. The present writer sees reason to think that the books of Daniel and even Nehemiah (besides Judith and Tobit) have passed through a similar process. Into the details of this we cannot enter here (see Crit. Bib.).

We may, however, point out (1) that 'Shushan habbirah' (not a very probable phrase[3]), in all the places where it occurs, may very possibly have come from 'Cushan-hārabbah'; (2) that בעילם המדינה may be an editor's recast of בעילם [ירחמאל], where 'ירח' may be a correction of the corrupt word עילם; (3) that אובל אולי in the same verse may represent two corrupt forms of ירחמאל (i.e., the river of Jeraḥmeel, Ezekiel's 'Chebar' or rather 'Barachel' = Jeraḥmeel). The parallelism between Daniel on the banks of Ulai (?) and Ezekiel by the 'river Chebar (?)' has already been noticed by commentators. Parallels for the corruptions here assumed will be found in Crit. Bib.

The result of accepting the theory referred to would be that we get in each case two documents instead of one—first the original narrative, in so far as it can be traced, which had to do with N. Arabia, and next, the edited and recast narrative, which shows the acquaintance, slight indeed, but genuine, of a much later Jew with Persian geography and history. If, then, we are tempted to criticise severely the historical errors in these books (Dan., Ezra-Neh., Esth.), which have absorbed so much time with so little result, let us remember that, according to this theory, the editor had to make the best that he could of partly corrupt material, and that he is not to be judged by the standard of an original narrator.

The name (see SHELAH) probably came from the Negeb. It should perhaps be inserted in Gen. 46 20*b* with 𝔊 (σουταλααμ [AD] -θ. [L]); see, however, EPHRAIM, § 12, n. 1.

It occurs twice in the much-edited genealogy of EPHRAIM [q.v., § 12], 1 Ch. 7 20-27; in v. 20 f. (σωθαλα [A v. 20], -θ. [B ib.], -ελε [Ba.b.mg., om. B* A v. 21], σουθαλα[αμ] [L]), and, again, in the corrupt form TELAH in v. 25 (תֶּלַח, θαλε [A], -εες [B], θαλ -α [L]).

Critics (Wellh., Dr., Klost., Budde) agree in restoring his name in place of the corrupt MEBUNNAI (εκ των υιων [BA]: σαβενι [L]) in 2 S. 23 27: this is supported by several MSS of 𝔊 (including 𝔊L σαβενι), and by the parallel passage (1 Ch. 20 4; σοβοχαι [B], σοββ. Jerome (on Is. 16 8) states that it was hardly 500 paces from Heshbon. Conder identifies it with the important site Sūmia, with tombs and ruined vineyard towers, 2½ m. W. of Heshbon (PEFQ, 1882, p. 9). As Derenbourg has suggested, Sibmah may be referred to in MI l. 13.

The passage runs, 'And I settled therein (i.e., in the conquered city of ATAROTH, q.v.) men of שרן.' In the Jerus. Targ. שרן is given for שבם and שבמה. So also Schlottmann (ZDMG, 24 259). Cp ZERETH-SHAHAR. T. K. C.

SIBRAIM (סִבְרַיִם; ϹΕΒΡΑΜ [B], ϹΕΦ- [A], -ΡΑΙΜ [Q], ϹΑΒΑΡΕΙΜ [Qmg.], Pesh. reads 'Sepharvaim'), a city on the ideal northern border of Canaan (Ezek. 47 16), described in MT as lying between the territory of Damascus and that of Hamath. According to Cornill (see 𝔊) this definition belongs strictly to another city HELAM (q.v.), the name of which should be inserted after Sibraim. It is more important, however, to notice that the original text, which has been redacted by an uncomprehending editor (cp TAMAR), probably referred (as also Nu. 34 1 ff.) to the Jerahmeelite Negeb. The four names in the MT of Ezek. 47 16*a* will in this case represent Maacath, Rehoboth, Zarephath, Cusham (see MAACAH, REHOBOTH, ZAREPHATH). Nor could we hesitate to explain Helam (חילם) as = Jerahmeel. If on the other hand we suppose the MT to give the original text, the difficult question arises, where is Sibraim to be placed? In accordance with his view of the ideal frontier as a whole, van Kasteren identifies Sibraim with Khirbet es-Sanbarīyeh, 4½ m. SSE. of Kh. Serādā (see ZEDAD), near the bridge of the Nahr Ḥasbānī, on the road to Bāniās (Rev. bib., 1895, p. 31). The form Sanbarīyeh, however, would rather (as van Kasteren himself remarks) point to a Hebrew form Sabbarim or Sibbarim. Nor is Furrer's identification, which arises out of an opposite view of the situation of the frontier, less free from difficulty (see below). Sibraim was at any rate a place of importance, if we may accept Halévy's view (ZA 2 401 f.) that both Sibraim and Sepharvaim are identical with the Šabarain which was destroyed in 727 by Shalmaneser IV. according to the Babylonian Chronicle discovered by Pinches (see SEPHARVAIM, and note the reading of Pesh. given above). The objections are (1) the representation of ס by š (which, however, is not an insuperable difficulty), and (2) the possibility of reading Šamarain. See SAMARIA, SHALMANESER.

[The conjecture of Furrer that Sibraim is the mod. Shaumeriya (ZDPV 8 29) on the E. side of the lake of Emesa, rests mainly on the doubtful reading σαμαρειμ in some copies (e.g., 68, 87) of the LXX.—W. R. S.] T. K. C.

SICYON (ϹΙΚΥΩΝ[1] [אV], 1 Macc. 15 23). Sicyon appears in the list of cities and countries to which 'Lucius, consul of the Romans' (i.e., probably Lucius Calpurnius Piso, consul in 139 B.C.) wrote in favour of the Jews. We may infer that Jewish settlers and traders formed a considerable element in the population of the places named. Reference is made in the authorities to the extent of the Jewish Dispersion about this date (cp Orac. Sibyll. 3 271, πᾶσα δὲ γαῖα σέθεν πλήρης καὶ πᾶσα θάλασσα—i.e., about 140 B.C.

[1] Ephrath in the Negeb is probably intended. See RACHEL'S SEPULCHRE, and note that in 1 Ch. 27 11 Sibbecai is connected with the Zerahites.

[1] The change from the early form Σεκυών or Σεικυών to the form Σικυών is dated by the coins to the time of Alexander the Great (Leake, Num. Hell. 95).

See also the quotation to the same effect from Strabo in Jos. Ant. xiv. 7 2 and cp id. BJ vii. 3 3). Philo Judæus testifies to the wide diffusion of the Jewish race over the far East and Asia Minor, and after enumerating Thessaly, Bœotia, Macedonia, Aetolia, and Attica as regions in which Jews were plenteously scattered he adds Argos and Corinth, and 'the most and the best parts of the Peloponnese' (Leg. ad Caium, 36, Mang. 2 587, τὰ πλεῖστα καὶ ἄριστα Πελοποννήσου. Cp Philo, In Flaccum, 7, Mang. 2 524).

Sicyon was one of the most ancient cities of Greece, advantageously placed about 2 m. from the sea on a terrace over-looking a fertile plain on the S. shore of the Corinthian Gulf, about 18 m. W. of Corinth. Though she could not rival Corinth, Sicyon next to that city was renowned for skill and industry in all kinds of manufacture (Strabo, 382).

At an early date Sicyon became a flourishing home of plastic art (see Gardner, Handbook of Greek Sculpture, 1 190 f.). The ancient wealth and importance of the town is attested by the large number of its coins still extant, dating from about the middle of the fifth century B.C. (usual type, a Chimæra and flying wood-pigeon; see Head, Hist. Numm. 345 f.). The destruction of Corinth by the Romans in 146 B.C. would tend to revive the commercial importance of Sicyon, more especially as Sicyon received an accession of territory thereby (cp Paus. ii. 2 2). Nevertheless the town gradually sank into decay, even before the restoration of Corinth, and was burdened with debt (Cic. Ep. ad Att. i. 19 9 i. 20 4 ii. 1 10); in the second century A.D. it was in a miserably decayed condition (Paus. ii. 7 1).

SIDDIM, VALE OF (עֵמֶק הַשִּׂדִּים; Vg. vallis silvestris; for 𝔊 see below), the scene of the battle between the king of Sodom and Chedorlaomer (and their respective allies), Gen. 14 3 8 10. It is said, as the text stands, to have been 'full (a conjectural paraphrase, see AV) of slime-pits,' or rather of 'pits of bitumen' (חֵמָר; see BITUMEN), which proved fatal to two of the kings (see SODOM).

In 14 3 the 'vale of Siddim' has the gloss, 'that is, ים המלח (EV 'the salt sea'). The notion is supposed to be implied that the 'salt sea' at a later time extended itself over the vale of Siddim where Sodom and Gomorrah stood. 𝔊ADEL gives the strange rendering ἐπὶ τὴν φάραγγα τὴν ἁλυκήν· αὕτη (ἐστὶν) ἡ θάλασσα τῶν ἁλῶν (v. 3; ἡ κοιλὰς ἡ ἁλυκή, vv. 8 10). Theod., however, gave (according to Jerome; see Field's Hex., n.) τῶν ἀλσῶν—i.e., הָאֲשֵׁרִים, '(the vale of) the Asherahs'; and 𝔊 may once have had the same reading. This, however, can hardly be correct, nor is it satisfactory to keep the letters of MT, pointing הַשֵּׁדִים, 'the demons,' with Renan (Hist. 1 116), Wellhausen (IJG(4) 103), and Winckler (GI 2 33 108).[1]

If the view of Gen. 14 set forth elsewhere (SODOM) is correct, the notion that the vale of Siddim has any connection with Sodom and contained pits of bitumen must be abandoned. The 'vale of hassiddim' has most probably arisen by corruption from Maacath-cusham—i.e., Maacah of Cusham. See SODOM, § 6 (c).

SIDE (ϹΙΔΗ [ANV]), 1 Macc. 15 23. A rich and flourishing seaport of Pamphylia, lying between the rivers Eurymedon (W.) and Melas (E.). It was founded by the Cymæans (Strabo, 667) and possessed a temple of Athena apparently of some celebrity.[2] Attaleia and Side were the two outlets for the products of Pamphylia. Side had close commercial relations with Aradus[3] in Phœnicia (cp Livy 35 48, where the contingents of Aradus and Side form the left wing of the fleet of Antiochus the Great, as those of Tyre and Sidon the right—quas gentes nullæ unquam nec arte nec virtute navali æquassent; see also id. 37 23 f.). According to a tradition current at Side itself the town was of Hellenic origin, but the Asiatic elements gradually asserted themselves, until, by the time of Alexander the Great, Greek was no longer spoken there, but a peculiar idiom which differed also from that of the neighbouring aborigines (Arrian, Anab. 1 26). This curious statement is borne out by the fact that a series of the coins of Side has the legend Σιδητικόν supplanted by inscriptions in characters resembling the Aramaic which have never been deciphered with certainty (see Waddington, in Rev. Num., 1861, 13).

After the defeat of Antiochus by the Romans, Side retained practical autonomy, and became one of the chief places of mintage on this coast. Its importance is indicated by the fact that the Attic tetradrachms of Side were allowed to circulate in Asia assimilated in value or tariffed with the cistophori which under ordinary circumstances were the only legal tender (Momms. Hist. Mon. Rom. 1 99). This coinage lasted a long time and is of astonishing abundance, perhaps owing to the fact that Side was the great mart in which the Cilician pirates disposed of their booty (Strabo, 664). It is, therefore, not surprising to find Side enumerated in 1 Macc. 15 23 as containing a strong Jewish element. Antiochus VII. (138-128 B.C.) owed his by-name Sidetes to the fact that he had been brought up at Side.

Side continued to be a town of importance under the Empire, to which fact its coins testify in various self-laudatory epithets—λαμπροτάτης, 'splendid,' ἐνδόξου, 'honourable,' or πίστης φίλης συμμάχου Ῥωμαίων. Aspendus on the Eurymedon was her rival (Pol. 5 73), and later also Perga. Both Side and Perga claim the title πρώτη Παμφυλίας. In fact, the ecclesiastical lists always separate Pamphylia into Pamphylia Prima under Side, and Pamphylia Secunda under Perga, although the civil organisation recognised but a single province (Rams. Hist. Geog. of A.M. 393).

The remains of Side (now Eski Adalia) on a low peninsula are now deserted. Its two ports are silted up; its theatre is one of the largest and best preserved in Asia Minor (for description and views, see Beaufort, Karamania, 140 f.).

SIDON, SIDONIANS. (צִידוֹן; צִידֹנִים; ϹΙΔΩΝ, Ϲ[Ε]ΙΔΩΝΙΟΙ, ΦΟΙΝΙΚΕϹ). For the early history, see PHŒNICIA.

1. Etymology. Ancient writers already explained 'fish-town' from ṣūd (צוד), 'to hunt,' and in Phœnician also 'to fish' (see Justin 18 3). If we accept this, 'Sidonians' originally meant the fishing population on the coast; but perhaps we should rather derive the name from some tribal god Ṣid (צד), after whom both town and people were named.[1] We do not indeed find any trace of a worship of Ṣid; but the gods Ṣid-melkart and Ṣid-tat are both met with (cp PHŒNICIA, § 12).

Ṣīdōnīm, Sidonians, both (a) in Phœnician and Assyrian inscriptions and (b) often in OT, means the Phœnicians generally.

2. Use of 'Sidonians.' (a) Hiram II. calls himself mélek ṣīdōnīm (מלך צדנם), 'king of the Sidonians' upon a votive inscription, and Tyrian coins of the time of Antiochus IV. bear the legend lᵉṣōr ēm ṣīdōnīm (לצר אם צדנם) 'of Tyre, the metropolis of the Sidonians.' So too in Assyrian inscriptions Elulæus king of Tyre and suzerain of most of the Phœnician coast is called Lule, king of Sidon. Of course, we also find the narrower use of the term both on Phœnician coins and in Assyrian inscriptions.

(b) In Gen. 49 13*b* 'Sidon' is, not the town—which lies too far N.—but the Phœnician coastland, and in Judg. 18 7 the phrase 'the manner of the Sidonians' refers to the unwarlike Phœnician traders. Ittobaal (see ETHBAAL, but also SOLOMON, § 3 b) is called 'king of the Sidonians' in 1 K. 16 31, and Solomon (1 K. 5 6 [20]) admits the superiority of the 'Sidonians' to the

[1] The 'Valley of Spirits,' thinks Winckler, is a fictitious name derived from Babylonian mythology (GI 2 108).

[2] Hence, on the interesting series of coins of Side, Pallas frequently appears. The coin-type or symbol of the town, playing upon its name, is the fruit of the pomegranate, which the Greeks called σίδη (see Hill, Handbook of Greek and Roman Coins, 176).

[3] The name of Aradus occurs immediately after that of Side in the enumeration in 1 Macc. 15 23.

[1] Winckler also questions the explanation 'fish-town.' He supposes 'Ṣidon' to be a Semitised form of a pre-Phœnician name (AOF 1 427).

Jews in the hewing of timber. In both cases the Phœnicians are meant. 'Sidonians' as the name of a people must once have been as common as the ethnic names Moabite, Edomite, Ammonite, and the rest.[1] Quite rightly, then, in Gen. 10 15, Canaan (=Syria, as in Amarna Tablets) is said to have two sons, Sidon (the Phœnicians) and Heth (the Hittites). Of these Sidon is the firstborn, because, as we now know, the Hittites did not penetrate into central Syria till the fourteenth century. 'Afterwards,' so the writer continues (v. 18*b*), 'the tribes of the Canaanites spread themselves abroad'; v. 16*b* is admitted to be an interpolation (see e.g., Dillmann). The same use of 'Sidonians' is common in Greek literature.

The Phœnicians are in Homer very often called Σιδόνιοι (Il. 6 290; Od. 15 118=4 618), and their land Σιδονίη (Il. 6 291; Od. 13 205). True, Φοίνικες is also found (Il. 23 743 f.; Od. 13 272, 14 288 ff. 15 415 ff.). Both names occur together likewise in the celebrated verses concerning Menelaus' wanderings (Od. 4 83 f.). The name of the town Sidon is found in Od. 15 425. From the fact that Sidon, not Tyre, is mentioned we must not draw political conclusions as some have done; through the influence of the ethnic name 'Sidonian' the name of Sidon was familiar to the Greeks at an earlier time than that of Tyre, although the latter was then much the more important.

Roman poets, too, frequently use 'Sidonius' (as a synonym for 'Poenus') in the sense of 'Phœnician' (cp Ovid. Fast. 3 108, etc.). E. M.

A king of Sidon has dealings with Zedekiah (Jer. 27 3), and Jewish prophets mention Sidon by the side of Tyre both in the Babylonian and in the Persian period (Jer. 47 4 Ezek. 27 8 Joel 3 [4] 4). Unfortunately the OT references to Zidon, as well as to Tyre, often occur in passages where corruption may with probability be suspected (so Cheyne; for instances see MIZRAIM, TIRAS, ZAREPHATH).[2] Whether the destruction of Sidon by Artaxerxes Ochus (351 B.C.) is really referred to in Is. 23 1-14 (Duhm), 24 10 (Cheyne), is also at any rate doubtful. The comparative revival of Sidon in later times is attested by Lk. 6 17 Acts 27 3.

times destroyed, it was for three centuries quite insignificant till at the beginning of the seventeenth century it began to recover under the Druse Emir Fakhr ed-Dīn. The present town of Ṣaida contains about 15,000 inhabitants. The northern harbour still survives; but the large southern harbour was filled up by Fakhr ed-Dīn, to make it inaccessible to the Turks.[3] E. M., § 1 f.

SIEGE. The proper term for 'besiege' is the ḳal of ṣūr (צוּר) Dt. 20 12 2 S. 11 1 1 K. 15 27 16 17 20 1 2 K. 6 24 f. 17 5 18 9 24 11 Is. 29 3 Jer. 21 4 32 2, usually followed by עַל or אֶל. The corresponding substantive is māṣōr (מָצוֹר), Nah. 3 14, and the phrase יָשַׁב בַּמָּ׳ or הָיָה בַּמָּ׳ is used to express the passive 'to be besieged.' בּוֹא בַּמָּ׳ is used in the same sense when applied to a city Dt. 20 19 2 K. 24 10 25 2 Jer. 52 5. The Greek equivalents are πολιορκεῖν (ἐπι), περικαθίζειν (ἐπί, ἐν), περικαθῆσθαι ἐπί, ἐπικαθῆσθαι ἐπί, συγκλείειν, χαρακοῦν ἐπί, or διακαθίζειν ἐπί, or καθίζειν ἐπί. The Assyrian word is lamû (esêru used of persons).

The earliest pictorial representations of sieges and assaults of fortified towns come to us from ancient

1. Egypt; Amarna Tablets; early Israel.

Egypt. Thus the tomb of Beni-Ḥasan portrays a fortress of the Middle Empire and presents a vivid example of a siege.

Like the Assyrians of a later time, the Egyptians 'advanced under cover of the arrows of the bowmen; and either instantly applied the scaling ladder to the ramparts or undertook the routine of a regular siege, in which case having advanced to the walls, they posted themselves under cover of testudos, and shook and dislodged the stones of the parapet.' This they accomplished by means of what might be called a hand battering-ram, consisting of a long lance or pole with a strong metal point. In case the fortress resisted all attacks by scaling ladders and assaults by the hand-ram the testudo or pent-house would be employed, which concealed as well as protected the sappers who undermined the walls. This testudo was a rude framework covered with hides large enough to contain several men (Wilk. Anc. Egp. 1 242 ff. and woodcut; Rosellini, Monumenti civili dell'Egitto, 118).

The Tell-el-Amarna despatches (1450-1400 B.C.) yield us but little information. The Egyptian governor Rib-Addi, in repeated letters to the King of Egypt, compares himself to a 'bird sitting in a snare' (?cage, basket),[1] when besieged in Gebal by the hostile forces commanded by Abd-Aširta. We are reminded of Sennacherib's phrase in the Taylor-cylinder in which he boasts that he had shut in Hezekiah 'like a bird in a cage' (col. 3 20). Rib-Addi addresses repeated pathetic appeals to the Egyptian sovereign to send him ṣabi (or amilûti) maṣarta(-ti), 'garrison troops' (cp Heb. מָצוֹר), and says (in another letter) that he remains helpless and inactive in his town and dare not pass outside the city gates (64, ll. 20 f.); but we have no details respecting siege operations.

When we come to the latter part of the thirteenth century B.C. (19th dyn.), however, the reign of Rameses II. affords us interesting glimpses into the methods of siege and assault. The scenes are depicted in Lepsius' Denkmäler, 3 166. We have a representation of the storming of Dapuru (?), a fortress of the Ḥeta.

'This fortress, as we see, deviates somewhat from the ordinary style of building. Below, a battlemented wall surrounds an immense lower building which supports four towers, the largest of which has windows and balconies. Above the towers is seen the standard of the town, a great shield pierced through with arrows. . . In order to protect themselves from the shower of stones and arrows that the besieged pour down from above, the Egyptian soldiers advance under cover of pent-houses. Then ensues the actual storming of the castle by means of scaling-ladders. . . Some of the besieged let themselves down over the wall, more than one being killed in this attempt to escape' (Erman, Life in Anc. Egypt, 533). See fig. 4 in EGYPT.

In the earliest periods of Israel's history we do not read of regular siege operations. No attempts were made to capture cities save by assault, since the early nomad Hebrews did not possess engines of war or other appliances requisite for the regular reduction of a fortress. In capturing a city-fortress by direct assault, as in the case of Jerusalem which was stormed by David's warriors (2 S. 5 6-8, a very obscure passage),[2] there must have been enormous loss of life. Some skilful stratagem was sometimes resorted to by the besiegers, as a pretended retirement followed by an ambuscade (Josh. 8 4 f.) or a night-attack (Judg. 7 19 f.).

It is doubtful how far the Assyrians resorted to the slow methods of siege in reducing the fortress-cities to subjection in the earliest period, viz., in the reign of Tiglath-pileser I. Even in the records of Ašur-naṣir-abal and Shalmaneser II. we have no account of such operations, though the monuments portray them occasionally. Thus in describing the capture of Madara in the annals of Ašur-naṣir-abal (col. 2, ll. 98 f., KB 1 89) we are only told; 'The city was very strong (danân danniš). Four walls (durâni) encircled it. I stormed the town; they feared my fearful weapons.' In an earlier passage (col. 2 54) no details are furnished of siege-operations (in the capture of Amalu), and many other similar instances might be given. It is certainly probable that in a large number of cases regular siege operations were not carried on. These involved a considerable expenditure of time as well as of means and material. Engines of war, like chariots, were difficult objects of transport in a mountainous country. We have already had occasion to notice the passages in the annalistic inscriptions which record that chariots were left behind for this reason (CHARIOT, § 4).

When we come to the records of Sargon II. (721-705) we have in his great triumphal palace-wall inscription a vivid account of his campaign against Merodach-baladan. This document (KB 2 68 ff.), as well as the annals (where the defence of Dûr-Athara is recounted, ll. 248 f.), describes the precautions taken by the besieged. Merodach-baladan flees from Babylon, his capital, takes refuge in the fortress of Dûr-Yakin, strengthens its walls, summons the neighbouring tribes to his assistance, and posts them before the great wall. He then dug out a trench of immense size, 200 cubits broad and 18 cubits deep, and filled it by cutting a channel to the Euphrates (Triumph. Insc. ll. 127 f.). Having thus flooded a large area around the city with water, he broke the bridges. What follows is certainly somewhat obscure. Merodach-baladan is described as pitching his royal tent in the midst of this defensive lake 'like a tušmi bird.' In flamboyant style Sargon says that he (Sargon) transported his warriors over the flood 'like eagles.' We may suppose that some rafts were constructed (see Winckler's remarks in the Introduction to his Keilschrifttexte, 34). The battle must have been fierce and murderous and the waters were stained with the blood of Merodach-baladan's warriors (l. 130). We read of no prolonged attempt to reduce Dûr-Yakin by regular approaches. Similarly, in the case of the fortress Dûr-Athara, into which on another occasion Merodach retreated, defending it by means of a deep fosse, filled from the river Surappi (ll. 248 f.), the siege operations were of brief duration, for we are told that the town was reduced before sunset (l. 252).

In the Taylor-cylinder of Sennacherib (col. 3 21 f. KB 2 95) we read that the Assyrian general erected against Jerusalem ramparts (ḫalṣâni, probably 'towers') which effectually shut in the defenders of the city. Cp Rassam cyl., col. 2 52. Ašur-bani-pal, in his description of the operations against Urdamani, says that he blockaded him and deprived him of food and water (KB 2 168), and in another passage (cyl. col. 3 109) refers to the warriors posted on the walls of the cities. These are, however, very slight details and bear reference to defence rather than attack.

What these verbal descriptions omit is supplied to us in fair abundance by the monumental representations. The accompanying figure of the siege of a city by Ašur-naṣir-abal (fig. 1) furnishes the details which we require and enables us to realise the enormous slaughter which the storming of a fortress entailed. Another figure (fig. 2) portrays the siege of a town by Tiglath-pileser III. Archers are depicted shooting at the walls from behind wicker screens, while the battering-ram is wielded below, and we behold the ghastly spectacle of captives impaled ad terrorem before the walls. To this horrible practice the inscriptions bear witness. Thus Ašur-bani-pal (Rassam-cyl. col. 2 3 f.) in the account of his Egyptian campaign describes how his generals attacked the hostile cities of the Delta, hung the corpses of the rebels on stakes and, after having flayed them, placed their skins on the city walls.

The monumental reliefs show that the usual course in storming a fortress was for the heavy-armed to advance first and with shield in hand to mount the tall ladders which were placed against the city-walls and reached almost to the summit of the latter. The archers meanwhile from behind the protective screens made of wicker- or wood-work discharged arrows against the defenders on the walls and especially against the towers where the enemy were concentrated. Doubtless fire was employed, and missiles covered with tow and resin or pitch would be hurled against anything combustible. Thus in the early Israelite episode (narrated in Judg. 9 46-49) we read that Abimelech and his followers cut down branches and set fire to the hold of the temple of El-Bĕrīth into which the occupants of the tower of Shechem had betaken themselves.[1]

The historical books of the OT and occasional passages in the prophets enable us to supply a few details of the ancient siege-operations carried on in the wars of pre-exilian Israel. Thus 2 S. 11 furnishes some account of the siege of Rabbath Ammon, and it can be readily inferred that it lasted a considerable time. On the other hand there is no reference to any entrenchments, engines of war, or other siege operations or appliances. The Hittite URIAH (q.v.) was simply slain by a sortie executed by the Ammonites against Joab's beleaguering force. Yet it can hardly be asserted that Israel by that time was not conversant with any other methods of warfare than night-attacks, surprises, feigned retreats or ambuscades. For in 2 S. 20 15, where the siege of Abel-beth-maacah is described, a mound or embankment (sōlĕlāh) is thrown up against the city. This embankment stood in the intervening space between the principal wall and a smaller outer-wall (ḥēl). And we are apparently to understand that under the protection of this embankment, occupied probably by archers or engines of war, some of the Israelite troops were occupied in undermining (so Ewald) or battering down the walls.[1] The passage shows that the Hebrews under Joab's energetic military guidance were beginning to make some progress in siege operations, not improbably under Phœnician influence. See FORTRESS, § 2, and cp 2 S. 5 11.

When we turn to another important passage, in 1 K. 20, descriptive of the siege of Samaria by Benhadad (= Hadadezer, the Dad'idri of Shalmaneser's inscr. read by Winckler Bir'idri)[2] we find several elements that are obscure [see Crit. Bib.]. The account, moreover, is from two distinct sources (see Kittel). In v. 12 a word seems to have dropped out between וישׂימו and the following עַל-הָעִיר. 𝔊 read οἰκοδομήσατε χάρακα 'build a rampart' or perhaps 'palisaded camp.' The former seems here to be the meaning of χάραξ, which is also employed in a collective sense by Polybius (in the sense of 'entrenched camp'). The omitted word, corresponding to this Greek word for 'rampart,' was in the original Hebrew text used by the 𝔊 מָצוֹר (cp Dt. 20 19 Heb. and 𝔊) 'siege-works' or 'lines of circumvallation.' There is an alternative view, that the word to be supplied here is כָּרִים 'battering-rams'; but this has no basis of support in the 𝔊, and is only plausibly sustained by the use of the phrase שׂים על in Ezek. 4 2 in connection with the word כָּרִים. Over these lines of entrenchment, within which Benhadad and his Syrian troops thought themselves secure, Ahab made a desperate sally with 7000 men and utterly routed the enemy.

The importance of the military embankment (סֹלְלָה) for siege operations may be clearly discerned in the monumental reliefs. The סֹלְלָה was constructed of earth and stones and might even reach almost to the level of the confronting fortress-wall. Sometimes a path paved with bricks or tiles was formed on this rampart and upon this lofty six-wheeled movable turrets, carrying bowmen on the summit, and provided with a powerful battering-ram, were driven down the paved slope against the hostile wall or tower. Some of these movable rams (fig. 3), mounted on wheeled conveyances, were of much smaller size. These possessed a powerful head or spur, shaped like a ram's head, and the body of the conveyance was framed of thick planks which afforded protection to the warriors inside against the arrows and stones discharged by the defenders of the besieged city. The more simple and primitive contrivances, consisting of long beams or poles with metal heads (such as the ancient Egyptians used, see above), which were driven by hand only against the lower portions of the walls, were employed even as late as in the days of Shalmaneser II. (middle of 9th cent. B.C.), and even in the days of Nebuchadrezzar, if we can trust the details of Ezekiel's portrayal of his operations against Tyre, 26 9 (see below). The larger movable towers with powerful rams may be found depicted on the monuments of Ašur-naṣir-abal. Billerbeck thinks that they must have been employed at a much earlier period to reduce the enormous walls of strongholds that were erected in Babylonia as far back as 3000 B.C.[1]

As we approach the close of the regal period in Hebrew history the methods adopted by the Assyrians became familiar to Israel. Thus the word for battering-ram, kār, is several times employed by Ezekiel (4 2, 21 27 [22]).

3. Later pre-exilic Israel.

We cannot, however, lay stress on the details of 2 Ch. 26 15 in which it is recorded that King Uzziah placed catapults or ballistæ (חִשְּׁבֹנוֹת, see ENGINE) for discharging stones and darts on the towers of Jerusalem. Probably the passage reflects the tradition as to defensive apparatus in a besieged town of the early Greek period (300 B.C.). Certainly catapults were employed by the Assyrians for discharging stones and darts at the defenders in the days of Uzziah, and it is possible that Israel was familiar before 750 B.C. with these military engines; but we have no mention of them in pre-exilian literature. In Jer. 6 6 reference is made to one of the characteristic accompaniments of a siege, viz., the destruction of trees. Fruit-trees are here not specifically mentioned, but all the trees whose wood served for palisades or hurdles, as shelters for the archers or as timber for the pent-houses. That the Hebrews, like the Assyrians, employed the services of slingers (see SLING) in sieges is clearly shown by 2 K. 3 25.

In Ezek. 4 2 we have an enumeration of the various forms of siege-work to be depicted on the tile in which the central figure represents Jerusalem itself. Around it are placed the rampart (dāyēḳ) and the embankment (sōlĕlāh). Encampments are to be made and battering-rams erected on every side. It is quite evident that these clear and definite features have been derived from the prophet's acquaintance with the military operations of Nebuchadrezzar's armies. A fresh and vivid detail should be noted in Ezek. 26 8 in the prophecy against TYRE (q.v.). Nebuchadrezzar will besiege Tyre. The embankments will be cast up and the testudo reared against her. Kraetzschmar, however, doubts the rendering of ṣinnāh by testudo, and prefers to regard it as meaning the high shield carried by the Babylonian soldiery, under whose protection they undermined the walls. In favour of this view he cites Delitzsch, Beiträge zur Assyr. 3 175. In v. 9 the doubtful words מְחִי קָבָלוֹ probably refer to the battering-ram, and we should render with Cornill, 'And his battering-ram he places against thy walls and thy towers he demolishes with his lances.'

The Books of Maccabees throw some light on the

[1] Heb. מַשְׁחִיתִם לְהַפִּיל הַחוֹמָה. Ewald regards מַשְׁחִיתִם as denom. verb from שַׁחַת 'hole,' and is followed by Böttcher and Thenius. 𝔊, however, render, ἐνοοῦσαν (L ἐνενόουν), which leads Wellhausen and Klostermann to restore מְחַשְּׁבִים (cp Prov. 24 8 Jon. 1 4), 'were meditating to overthrow, etc.'—a weak meaning.

[1] See 'Fortress-construction in the Ancient East,' by Colonel Billerbeck in Der alte Orient,(1) no. 4 (Leipsic, 1900). The present writer much regrets that this careful study came into his hands too late for him to utilise in the article FORTRESS. Billerbeck gives a ground-plan (16) of the ancient fortress of King Gudea (about 3000 B.C.) inscribed on a stone slab preserved in the Louvre.

siege operations of the second century B.C. In the siege of Mt. Zion described in 1 Macc. 6_{51} f. we read of stations to shoot from (βελοστάσεις, probably embankments, כֵּלֹּלוֹת) and engines of war for the discharge of fire-brands (πυροβόλα) and stones (λιθοβόλα), as well as σκορπίδια which seem to have been a smaller kind of σκορπίος or great cross-bow (called also γαστραφέτης 'stomach-bow').[1] Lastly we have slings (see SLING). Engines were also constructed by the besieged to repel these attacks. In the days of Simon the Maccabee strongholds were erected in Judæa 'fortified with high towers, great walls, gates, and bars' and well provisioned. In 1 Macc. 13_{43} we read that Simon besieged Gaza and invested it with intrenched camps and brought a particular engine called ἑλέπολις (or 'city taker') to bear against the city, and battered one of the towers and captured it. 'The occupants of the ἑλέπολις then leaped into the city and there was a great commotion in the city and the inhabitants rent their clothes and went on the walls with their wives and children and cried with a loud voice beseeching Simon.'

4. Details in Maccabees and Josephus.

This ἑλέπολις was invented by Demetrius Poliorcetes in the siege of Salamis in Cyprus in 306 B.C. It was a tower 120 feet high and measured 60 feet laterally. It was carried on four wheels, each 12 feet in diameter, was divided into nine stories, and was manned by 200 soldiers, who moved it by pushing the parallel beams at the base (Warre-Cornish). An even larger machine was employed at the siege of Rhodes in the following year, pyramidal in shape and with iron plates on the three sides.

The use of slings in sieges to which 2 K. 3_{25} 1 Macc. 6_{51} bear witness was also characteristic of the Roman period of domination. When Sabinus the Roman procurator was besieged by the Jews, the attackers used slingers as well as archers (Jos. Ant. xvii. 10_{2}) and they were also employed by Pompey with considerable effect when he besieged Aristobulus in Jerusalem (Jos. BJ i. 7_{9}). This siege was memorable for the enormous labour involved in filling up not only the ditch in front of the N. side of the temple, but the deep valley as well.

Josephus in his De Bello Judaico furnishes abundant material for detailed description — though not infrequently exaggerated[2]—of a Roman siege. Especially interesting are the vivid particulars, derived from personal experience, of Vespasian's operations against the naturally strong fortress of Jotapata (BJ iii. 7_{4} f.). Hurdles were formed of the wood cut down from the mountains for the protection of the soldiers in the construction of the embankment. Meanwhile the Jews hurled darts and stones at the troops so engaged. Vespasian, on the other hand, set up 160 engines which discharged javelins, stones a talent in weight, arrows, and fiery missiles, and thus made the walls untenable by the defenders, when they came within range. Sallies, however, were made from the walls, the hurdles dragged away, and the workers at the embankment killed. The attempt made by Josephus to raise the height of the city walls was carried out, in spite of the volleys of missiles, by the ingenious expedient of covering fixed piles with raw hides from newly killed animals, which owing to their moisture were proof against fire. Another device, to neutralise the shock of the battering ram,[3] consisted in letting down sacks of chaff to meet the impact (§ 20). As an effective mode of defence scalding oil was poured upon the Roman soldiers and penetrated within their armour.

We have no space to describe further the varied expedients in offence and defence in this memorable siege, nor to recount other phases of warfare that present themselves either in the investment of Gamala or in the operations carried on by Titus around Jerusalem. These, like the account of the siege of Alesia in Cæsar, de Bell. Gall. 7 68-89, belong to classical rather than biblical archæology.

The ethics of ancient warfare are almost universally conspicuous by their absence. The religious sanction of ḥērem (see BAN) was given to wholesale slaughter which the Hebrews like other Semites ruthlessly inflicted on the captured inhabitants (Joshua, passim, 1 S. 15_{33} 2 S. 8_{2}; cp 2 K. 8_{12} 15_{16} Hos. 14_{1} [13_{16}] Am. 1_{13}. Also see Stone of Mesha, l. 17). Even the deuteronomic legislation made it incumbent (Dt. 20_{13}) that every male inhabitant of a town that resisted should be put to the sword, but women, children, and cattle should be carried away as captives. Assyrian monuments depict the terrible closing scenes of the tragedy of a captured town. Mothers and maidens on the walls are portrayed with dishevelled hair and outstretched hands praying for mercy. But mercy was scant. Ašur-naṣir-abal, after storming a mountain stronghold, boasts that he cut off the heads of 260 warriors and built them up into a pyramid (col. 1_{64}). In the capture of Ḫulai 3000 prisoners were burnt (l. 108). The strong fortress of Tela with three encircling walls received a fearful punishment. Many prisoners were burnt. Others were deprived of hand, arm, nose, ears, or eyes. The Assyrian boasts that he erected a column of writhing agony (l. 118). Boys and girls were burnt in the flames (col. 2_{1}). That all the survivors became slaves was the natural outcome of universal custom. Walls were razed to their foundations, the city totally demolished, while cattle and valuables were carried off as spoil. The fruit-trees around the city were utterly destroyed by the invader. Thus Tiglath-pileser III. in describing his operations against Chinzer (Rawl. Nimrud-insc. II., 67, 24) says, (iṣu) ḳirî (iṣu) musukkani ša diḫ dûrišu akisma išten ul ezib; 'The plantations of palm which abutted on his rampart I cut down, not a single one did I leave.' Though Elisha recommended a like course in the war against Moab (2 K. 3_{19}), the growing humanitarian spirit gradually broke into the old ruthless tradition of ḥērem. The fruit-trees around the city were to be spared (Dt. 20_{19} f.). Yet the old spirit of warfare still remained in full force (vv. 13-17), especially in reference to Canaanite towns. But this was after all a trait of the dead past. Greater mercy was to be shown in wars with more distant peoples (vv. 11-15). And this growing spirit of humanity is reflected in the conduct of Simon the Maccabee towards the inhabitants of Gaza (Gazara), an episode already narrated (§ 4). In response to their entreaties he becomes reconciled.

5. No ethics for sieges.

The duration of a siege varied with the resisting power of the walls and its defenders as well as the strictness of the investment. Other factors co-operated, such as the provisions stored in the city and the water-supply. Disease also might accelerate the end. The siege of Samaria lasted more than two years. The siege of the island of Tyre by Shalmaneser IV. and Sargon II. lasted probably five years, and by Nebuchadrezzar thirteen years (unsuccessfully). Of the great straits to which a prolonged siege reduced the inhabitants we have a vivid portraiture in 2 K. 6_{25} Ezek. $4_{10\ 11}$ $5_{10\ 11}$ Jer. 19_{9} Lam. 2_{20} Dt. 28_{53}. It was a vast beam of wood like a vessel's mast, with a thick piece of iron at the head and swung in the air by ropes passing over its centre and suspended like a balance in a pair of scales from a second beam supported by other beams passing on both sides of the second like a cross. This battering-ram was then pulled by a great number of men with united force. In order to protect them it was cased with hurdles all over the upper part, secured with skins.

SIHON (סִיחוֹן, סִיחֹן; ΣΗΩΝ [BAF], ΣΙΩΝ [L]), a king of the Amorites, in the time of the early Israelites. There are serious problems arising out of the accounts of Sihon. Our object must be, first, to give a sketch of the traditions in their present form, and to state the position of previous critics as to their historical value, and next, to point out the great simplification of the whole question produced by the application of a keener criticism to the text of the narratives.

1. The traditional text. Sihon is represented in the traditional text as a king of the Amorites beyond the Jordan, whose dominion was bounded by the Jabbok on the N., by the Arnon on the S., and by the Jordan on the W., and extended eastwards to the desert (Judg. 11 22). According to Josh. 12 3 13 27, however, it also included the ARABAH [q.v.] between the Jabbok and the sea of Galilee (called Chinnereth or Chinneroth), and in Josh. 13 21 the five kings of the Midianites killed by the Israelites (Nu. 31 8) are called 'princes of Sihon' (σειων B], σηωρ [A]). When Israel asked leave of this Amorite king to pass through his land, in order to reach the Jordan and invade Canaan, he refused it, and took the field against them, but was defeated and slain at Jahaz (Nu. 21 21-24; Dt. 2 26-36; Judg. 11 19-22). The Israelites took Heshbon, Sihon's capital, and with it all the territory between the Jabbok and the Arnon. OG [q.v.] and his kingdom they also conquered, and so, as it would appear unintentionally, they became the masters of the whole of the trans-Jordanic region called, in the wider sense, Gilead (see GILEAD, § 3). The northern part—the former kingdom of Og—was given to half Manasseh, the southern to Gad and Reuben. From Nu. 21 27-30 Josh. 13 25 Dt. 2 36 it is inferred that Sihon 'had crossed the Jordan, and driving Moab southwards over Arnon and Ammon eastwards to the sources of the Jabbok, had founded a kingdom for himself.'[1] The extraordinary negotiations described in Judg. 11 14-27 are based upon the asserted fact that the territory between the Jabbok and the Arnon originally and properly belonged to Ammon. The Ammonites sought in vain to conquer their ancient territory from the Israelites, and in 1 K. 4 19 we find one of Solomon's prefects ruling over 'the land of Gilead, the country of Sihon king of the Amorites and Og the king of Bashan.'

The circumstance that neither J nor P mentions the fight with Sihon has suggested to Meyer (ZATW 5 36 ff.) and Stade (GVI 1 117) that the fight with Sihon can have formed no part of the original tradition, and arose out of a misunderstanding of the old song in Nu. 21 27-30. Their objections are noticed and replied to by Kittel (Hist. 2 228-231) and by G. A. Smith (HG 561), but not altogether conclusively.

2. Critically emended text. The redactors and editors of the already corrupt Hebrew texts have ventured to alter the historical and geographical details in accordance with their own inaccurate ideas; but they use their liberty so conscientiously that it is almost always possible in a greater or less degree to discern the true text underlying the false. Og the king of the Amorites was really Agag king of the Arammites or Jerahmeelites (= Amalekites), and the region occupied by his branch of the Jerahmeelite race was called Cushan—i.e., the N. Arabian Cush, which adjoined Miṣṣur or Muṣri. This 'Cushan' (כושן) was miswritten Sihon. Whether the capital of the land was called 'Ḥeshbon' (חשבון) or 'Ḥeshmon' (חשמן) may be doubtful. There are traces of a clan called חֲשַׁב or the like (cp Ḥashabiah, Ḥashubah) as well as of one called חֻשָׁם (cp Ḥeshmon, Ḥusham). That the five kings of the Midianites should be called 'princes of Sihon' (Josh. 13 21) need not surprise us. Their names are based on the three ethnic names Jeraḥmeel, Zārephath, and 'Arāb; it is not more wonderful that such personages should be connected with Cushan than that Balak, a son of Zippor (i.e., a Zarephathite), should be introduced to us as king of Miṣṣur ('Moab,' in Nu. 22 4, etc., as often, is miswritten for 'Miṣṣur'), and that these kings should be called 'Midianites' harmonises with the fact that Balak king of Miṣṣur ('Moab') is closely connected with the elders of Midian.[1] The reconstruction, whether partial or complete, of all the other Sihon passages would occupy too much space here (see Crit. Bib.). Suffice it to say that the view of E. Meyer, Stade, Bacon, and the Oxf. Hex. that Nu. 21 26 is an editorial insertion arising out of a misunderstanding of the song which follows seems fully justified. The song itself, in a revised form which probably approaches the true text somewhat more nearly than earlier revisions, appears to run thus:—

27*b* Let the castle of Heshbon be built,
Let the city of Cushan be established!
28 For a fire burned Heshbon,
A flame the city of Cushan,
It devoured the cities of Miṣṣur,
It consumed the citadels thereof.
29 Wo to thee! [O people of] Miṣṣur,
Thou art undone, O people of Cusham!
He has given up his sons as fugitives,
(Yea), Jeraḥmeel his daughters into captivity.
30 Cushan as far as Rimmon has perished,
Miṣṣur as far as Naphtoaḥ is desolate.[2]

The criticism of Judg. 11 12 ff. given elsewhere (JEPHTHAH, §§ 3, 5) may be here reaffirmed, so far as it asserts that the narrative has been editorially recast, and in particular that the account of Jephthah's message to the king of Ammon (?) must originally have referred to the compact between Laban and Jacob or Israel (Gen. 31 44-54). But the theory that עַמּוֹן has often arisen out of עֲמָלֵק or ירחמאל, taken in connection with the view of the earlier tradition respecting Moses suggested elsewhere (see MOSES, § 18), suggests a better key to the problem. The Og-story itself (see OG) did not originally have Hauran for its scene; this naturally suggests a more radical treatment of the Sihon-narrative. On the statement in 1 K. 4 19 (MT and 𝔊), which Kuenen wrongly supposed to confirm the tradition of an Amorite king Sihon, see Crit. Bib. Solomon's twelve prefects (as the original text must have stated) were most probably placed over the Israelite territory in the Jerahmeelite Negeb; see SOLOMON, § 6, n. 1.

SILAS, SILVANUS. Silvanus (in this form of the name) is mentioned only four times in NT. In

1. NT data. 1 Thess. 1 1 2 Thess. 1 1 he appears as joint author, along with Paul and Timothy, of the respective epistles; according to 2 Cor. 1 19 he preached the Gospel in Corinth along with the same two; according to 1 Peter (5 12) that Epistle was written 'through' (διά) Silvanus.

Silas (in this form of the name) is met with only in

[1] G. A. Smith, HG 557 f.

[1] Either the large ethnic term 'Midian' covers the smaller one of 'Jeraḥmeel' (or 'Zarephath'), or more probably מדין is written in error for מִצֻּר (Miṣṣur); cp Joel 3 [4] 4, צר וצידון, where צידון may come from מְצוּר, a correction of צר, and the poem in Is. 23, where both צר and צִידוֹן are the scribe's errors for מָצוֹר, the oracle being concerned with Miṣṣur. In Nu. 22 7 (MT and 𝔊) 'elders of Moab' and 'elders of Midian' are mentioned side by side; מדין apparently comes from צידון, and this from מְצוּר (the original reading out of which מואב sprang).

[2] See Crit. Bib. The last line seems to baffle Prof. Sievers (Metrische Studien, 2 411). But Pesh.'s reading מדבר (see MEDEBA) might have suggested the remedy. Cp נאות מדבר (Ps. 65 13 [12]), i.e., אַרְמְנוֹת מִצּוּר.

Acts 15 22-18 5. At the council of Jerusalem he is chosen along with Judas Barsabas to accompany Paul and Barnabas in name of the primitive church to Antioch and there deliver the letter embodying the apostolic decree which at the same time is to be communicated by word of mouth also (15 22 27). After some time so spent they return to Jerusalem (15 32 f.). In connection with their appearance in Antioch they are called 'prophets' (προφῆται); when chosen at Jerusalem they are referred to as 'chief men among the brethren' (ἄνδρες ἡγούμενοι ἐν τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς); 15 32 22.

After the separation of Paul and Barnabas in consequence of the difference about John Mark before the second missionary journey, Paul makes choice of Silas to take the place of Barnabas as his companion (15 40). The next mention of Silas is in connection with the incidents at Philippi when he and Paul were apprehended, beaten at the instance of the Roman authority, and cast into prison. It is described how as they prayed aloud at midnight they were miraculously delivered and how they baptised the gaoler and his family. When orders came to let the prisoners go, Paul claimed for himself and his companion their privileges as Roman citizens, thus compelling the magistrates to come in person and beg them to leave the city (16 19-40).

In connection with the sojourn in Thessalonica it is recorded of Silas that he took part in the successful missionary work there; and after a tumult was escorted out of the town by the Christians there on his night journey with Paul towards Berœa (17 4-10*a*). In Berœa with Paul he was again successful in the synagogue. Along with Timothy (of whom there has been no mention by name since 16 3) Silas remained in Berœa whilst Paul, in consequence of a tumult, was brought by the Christians to Athens (17 10*b*-15*a*). These bring back a message from Paul begging Silas and Timothy to join him as soon as possible, he awaiting their arrival there (17 15*b* 16). But it is not until after he has gone on to Corinth that they actually come up with him (18 5).

2. Possible identity. The question whether by the two forms of the name the same person is denoted is one which must be determined mainly by the contents of the passages in which they respectively occur; the mere suggestion of a person having two names does not in itself create any difficulty (§ 7).

(a) It is in agreement with 2 Cor. 1 19 that, as we read in Acts 18 5, Silas and Timothy rejoin Paul in Corinth.

(b) According to 1 Thess. 3 1 f. 5, Paul, before the composition of 1 Thess., sent Timothy from Athens to Thessalonica. According to this we shall have to assume at all events a hiatus in Acts. If, as we read in Acts 18 5, Timothy first rejoined Paul not at Athens, but at Corinth, then if he was to be sent by Paul from Athens to Thessalonica he must first have again made the journey to Athens from Corinth along with the apostle.

Of any such break in Paul's sojourn in Corinth, however, we find no trace in Acts 18 1-18*a*. Moreover, it is impossible to assign the journey to Athens to a later date; for, according to Acts 18 18*b*-22 Paul's route from Corinth leads him directly by way of Ephesus to Syria. The third missionary journey is not to be thought of in this connection; for in it the apostle came to Macedonia first, proceeding afterwards to Hellas (Acts 20 1 f.; whether to Athens or no is not at all said), whilst according to 1 Thess. 2 18 3 4 he had not been in Thessalonica again before the letter was composed.

Unless we are prepared to assume that a journey of Paul from Corinth to Athens has been omitted, the only alternative is to seek for the lacuna in what we are told concerning Timothy (and Silvanus), and suppose somewhat as follows. While Paul was still in Athens (Acts 17 16-34), not afterwards when he was in Corinth, he was joined from Berœa by Timothy, whom he then sent (from Athens) to Thessalonica. As for Silvanus, it is not necessary to suppose even a lacuna, if we conjecture that his meeting with Paul did not occur at Athens but only after Corinth had been reached. But if in Acts the arrival of Timothy at Athens is left unmentioned and the journeys of Timothy and Silvanus are always represented as having been made together, there is also the other possibility that Silvanus joined Paul along with Timothy while the apostle was still in Athens. Only, in that case, when Timothy set out from Athens for Thessalonica Silvanus must have been sent off somewhere else, as we find Paul saying that the journey of Timothy to Thessalonica had for its consequence that he himself was left in Athens alone. The plural in 1 Thess. 3 1 f. 'we thought it good to be left behind at Athens alone and sent Timothy' seems to allow the supposition that Paul remained in Athens along with Silvanus; but the singular in 3 5 'I . . . sent' shows that this is excluded.

It is to be emphasised that the introduction of a coming of Timothy (and Silvanus) to Paul in Athens is quite contrary to the view of Acts; for according to 17 16 Paul awaits both in Athens, yet in point of fact (18 5) they do not reach him till he is in Corinth and this last circumstance is stated in such a form as makes the meeting there entirely the result of the apostle's injunction recorded in 17 15. If, however, the student is prepared to accept the assumption of the one lacuna or the other in Acts as above, there is nothing to hinder the identification of Silas with Silvanus.

3. Two distinct persons? Weizsäcker (Ap. Zeitalter,[2] 256, ET 1 292 f.) nevertheless doubts the identification. He thinks that the companion of Paul was Silvanus but that the composer of Acts substituted for him Silas, a member of the primitive church, with a view to expressing by this means also the connection of Paul with Jerusalem. It is correct to say that this tendency really is at work in Acts (see ACTS, § 4; CORNELIUS, § 5; COUNCIL, §§ 6, 10). In point of fact one can very easily find cause for bringing it into requisition in the case of Silas when regard is had to the parallel case of Barnabas.

Silas is Paul's companion on the second missionary journey as Barnabas was on the first. Now we find Barnabas figuring in Acts 11 19-26 as the emissary of the primitive church who is charged by it with the task of inspecting the first Gentile Christian church at Antioch and who fetched Paul from Tarsus to Antioch. Not only is this difficult to reconcile with the known independence of Paul; it is also excluded by the order of the provinces, Syria and Cilicia, to which, according to Gal. 1 21, Paul betook himself after his first visit to Jerusalem. As, then, in Acts, for the first period of his activity Paul is placed under the guiding hand of Barnabas, so also is it possible to conceive that under the influence of the same tendency he has assigned to him a companion from Jerusalem for the second missionary journey, a companion who shall be the guarantee that in the missionary activity of the apostle the connection with Jerusalem shall not be lost. The same composer in fact in 21 20-26 goes so far as to affirm that Paul, on the last occasion of his coming back to Jerusalem, took upon himself a Nazirite vow and fulfilled it in order to prove with all publicity the completeness of his adherence to the Mosaic law. As against this see ACTS (§ 7, 11 end). In particular, in 16 4 a main business of the second missionary journey is represented as having been that of communicating and inculcating the decree which we are told had been arrived at in the Council of Jerusalem. (As against the historicity of this decree, see COUNCIL, § 11.) For such a purpose Silas must have seemed a singularly suitable companion for Paul, as along with Judas Barsabas he had been the messenger solemnly charged by the primitive church to carry the decree to Antioch.

All this, however, supplies no compelling reason for assuming a substitution of the Jerusalem Silas for a companion of Paul not belonging to Jerusalem who was named Silvanus. Precisely by the instance of Barnabas ought we to be put on our guard against too far-reaching critical operations. That Barnabas was a prominent missionary companion of Paul is assured by Gal. 2 1 9, and that he was a Jew—a Jew in fact who notwithstanding all his daily intercourse with Paul had nevertheless not as yet succeeded in freeing himself from the yoke of the law—is shown by Gal. 2 13. This being so, Paul can very well be supposed to have selected also a second Jew—Silas, to wit—for a travelling companion. Had Silas really been the bearer of the decree of the council, Paul assuredly would not have done so; it must be remembered, however, that no such decree was ever made and, least of all, carried to Antioch. It is possible to recognise the tendency of Acts, spoken of above, to represent Paul as in connection with Jerusalem by means of his companion Silas, and yet, to decline to be shut up to the supposition that this tendency brought about the substitution of this Silas in the place of another companion of the apostle; it is enough to discern the error and the tendency of Acts simply in its representation of the Silas who actually did accompany Paul as a prominent person in the primitive church and, in particular, as guarantor of the apostolic decree.

That the companion of Paul was a Jew is presupposed not only by the composer of Acts as a whole, inasmuch as he represents Silas in 17 10 (2-4) as coming forward in synagogues and also (16 3) represents circumcision as being necessary in a companion of Paul (in the case of Timothy), but also by the author of the 'we'-source (see ACTS, § 1, 9 end), who includes Silas among the number of those who (according to 16 16) go to the synagogue or, as the case may be, to the Jewish place of prayer, and (16 13) teach there. In 16 20 Paul and Silas are even called Jews expressly—though only in the mouths of their accusers, it is true, on which account the passage must be set on one side as possibly meaning to suggest that the accusers were in error (cp 16 37).

Amongst the views of critics we find not only the distinction between Silas and Silvanus just spoken of; there is also the attempt to identify the individual to whom both names are assigned with other persons as well. With Luke, to begin with. This hypothesis was put forward by Van Vloten (see below, § 10) in the interests of his proposed answer to the question as to the authorship of the 'we'-source in Acts.

4. Silas-Silvanus same as Luke?

There is much that speaks for the view that this author was Silas; other considerations speak for Luke; yet neither theory is in itself alone quite satisfactory (see ACTS, § 9). Van Vloten accordingly sought to combine the advantages of both by identifying the two persons. In particular he found difficulty in the supposition that in 16 10 the author of the 'we'-source should have joined Paul as a travelling companion without the fact being mentioned. The supposition is necessary as long as one chooses to see in this author some one not named in Acts—Luke, for example; it can be dispensed with (he thinks) as soon as we see in him one who has already been spoken of as a member of the travelling company—Silas, for example. Van Vloten sought to establish the possibility of his identification with Luke by the consideration that the words from which Silvanus and Lucanus (the original form underlying the abbreviation Lucas; see LUKE, § 6) are derived, have the same meaning (silva = lucus = wood); also by the argument that in 2 Cor., 1 and 2 Thess., and 1 Pet. only the name Silvanus is met with, but conversely in Col. (4 14), Philem. (24), 2 Tim. (4 11) only that of Luke.

To all this the answer must be that identity of etymological meaning in the case of two proper names by no means establishes any title to identify the persons who bear them. Moreover, it is not objectionable but befitting the seemly modesty of the author if his joining the company of travellers is indicated not by the mention of his name but simply by the transition from the third to the first person, whether he is really himself the eyewitness or falsely makes himself appear as such (see ACTS, § 1). The transition to the first person, too, is not made any more explicable if the person so indicated has already been named. Since he is not the only one who has been so named we do not learn from the 'we' who he is. Moreover, Van Vloten has not at all succeeded in disposing of the difficulties by which the hypothesis that Silas wrote the 'we'-source is beset (see ACTS, § 9), or even in lessening them; the identification with Luke contributes absolutely nothing at all towards their removal.

The identification of Silas-Silvanus with Titus has been attempted in quite other interests. (a) It has long been regarded as a conspicuous instance of silence due to 'tendency' that in Acts the name of Titus, who, according to Gal. 2 3, was the subject of so violent a contention at the Council of Jerusalem, is mentioned neither in this connection nor yet anywhere else (see COUNCIL, § 7). This difficulty would disappear if Titus was identical with Silas. Titus, however, was a Gentile Christian, we learn (Gal. 2 3); whilst Silas, according to Acts 15 22, was a member of the church of Jerusalem.

5. Silas-Silvanus same as Titus?

SILAS, SILVANUS

In order to identify the two in spite of this consideration, Märcker and Seufert (see below, § 10) find themselves reduced to the violent expedient of interpreting Acts 15 22 in the following sense: 'it seemed good to the apostles and the elders, with the whole church, to choose men out of their company and send to Antioch with Paul and Barnabas, Judas Barsabbas and Silas, chief men, in company of (ἐν) the brethren.' On this interpretation Judas and Silas are distinguished from the brethren chosen from out the church of Jerusalem, and therefore Silas may possibly be a Gentile Christian. On the other hand, even apart from the violence done to the language of the text, this supposition is, in its substance also, in the highest degree improbable; for it would be impossible to have chosen as exponent of the apostolic decree any more unsuitable person than Paul's uncircumcised comrade. No less astonishing is the other supposition, that of Graf, which seeks to reach the same result by the opposite route; the supposition, namely, that Titus-Silas was from the first a member of the church of Jerusalem and was chosen from its midst. In other words, we are asked to suppose that an uncircumcised person had been for years a member of the church in Jerusalem. Apart from the inherent difficulties, neither form of the hypothesis serves in any adequate degree the purpose for which it is introduced; for though it is true that on this hypothesis Acts does not leave out the name of Titus-Silas altogether in connection with the Council of Jerusalem, it omits the principal thing—viz., that the demand for his circumcision was frustrated by Paul.

(b) A peculiar position is taken up by Seufert. He does not write in the apologetic interest; rather does he ascribe to the composer of Acts a tendency similar to that supposed by Weizsäcker (§ 3 above), that, namely, of putting forward Titus, by the selection of his Jewish-sounding name Silas (see below, § 7*b*), as a man standing in close connection with the Jerusalem Christians, and so bridging over the gulf between these and Paul. It will be time to consider this theory when the identity of Titus and Silas has been established; but, as has been shown, what is proved is their distinctness.

The acme of complexity is reached by the hypothesis of Zimmer (see below, § 10). According to him, Silas the Jewish Christian of Jerusalem is mentioned only in Acts 15 22 27 32 f.; distinct from him, but identical with Silvanus and Titus, is the Silas named in Acts 15 40-18 5.

6. One Silas identical with Titus, another not?

(a) The Silas who, according to Acts 15 40, is chosen by Paul, then in Antioch, to be his travelling companion, cannot be the same person as the Silas who, according to 15 33, returned from Antioch to Jerusalem.—But why not? Paul might have summoned him back from Jerusalem; or, without the circumstance being expressly mentioned, Silas could, after the interval named in 15 35 f., have again returned to Antioch.[1]

(b) The Roman citizenship which, according to Acts 16 37, Silas possessed, does not disprove that he belonged to Jerusalem; for either he or his parents can have acquired it somewhere in the Diaspora in the same manner as, for example, the 'libertini' of Acts 6 9 possessed it (see Schür. GJV(2) 2 537 f., ET ii. 2 276 f.). Besides, this citizenship of Silas is itself exceedingly doubtful (see below, § 8 a).

(c) Zimmer argues that in 2 Cor. 8 23 the same thing is said of Titus as is said of Silvanus in 1 19, and therefore the two are identical. But the statements are by no means completely coincident. Titus could rightly be called 'fellow-worker' (συνεργός) of Paul in writing to the Corinthians, even if he had not been the companion of the apostle in the founding of that church, simply in view of the fact that after their alienation from Paul he had won them back to him; on the other hand, the expression employed with reference to Silvanus ('preach the gospel') relates to the founding of the church.

[1] We have no need, therefore, in order to maintain the identity of the Silas of 15 33 with him of 15 40, to fall back upon the interpretation—in point of fact a very unskilful one—offered by v. 34*a*, 'But it seemed good to Silas that they should remain' (ἔδοξεν δὲ τῷ Σίλᾳ ἐπιμεῖναι αὐτούς). It presupposes that the ἀπελύθησαν ἀπὸ τῶν ἀδελφῶν of v. 33 does not mean 'they took leave of the brethren and set out on their journey'—a meaning which nevertheless is assured by 28 25, and in our present passage is made specially necessary on account of the addition 'unto those that had sent them forth' (πρὸς τοὺς ἀποστείλαντας αὐτούς)—but, 'it was said to them by the brethren that it was not desired to detain them longer in Antioch.' Had the composer of Acts held this to have been what actually happened, he would not in any case have regarded it as a thing worth recording. Matters are not made any better by the reading 'it seemed good to Silas to remain there' (αὐτοῦ) with the further addition 'but Judas alone proceeded' (μόνος δὲ Ἰούδας ἐπορεύθη). They become still worse if this last clause, which D and Vg. are almost alone in giving, be omitted (so, for example, RVmg.); for in that case ἀπελύθησαν must necessarily mean, 'they on their side took leave,' and why Silas should then suddenly have changed his mind is left wholly unexplained.

SILAS, SILVANUS

(d) The apologetic aim—followed by Zimmer as well as by Märcker and Graf—of freeing Acts from the charge of silence with a purpose, is even less successfully realised in the case of Zimmer than it is in that of the other two, since the Silas who, according to Zimmer, is identical with Titus is not mentioned at all in connection with the Council of Jerusalem.

(e) The difficulty (only arising in connection with Zimmer's hypothesis) that in Acts two separate persons of the name of Silas should be mentioned in such close proximity (15 32 40) without any indication of their being distinct individuals is hardly less than that which presses upon all forms of an identification of Titus with Silas-Silvanus—this, namely, that Paul should have designated one and the same fellow-worker now as Silvanus now as Titus, and should have interchanged the two names even within the limits of so short a passage as 2 Cor. 1 19-2 13.

As for the forms of the names, the identity of Silas and Silvanus admits of being shown in a variety of ways.

7. The names. (a) Silas may be an abbreviation of Silvanus. This sort of abbreviation used for pet names (hypocoristica) is, properly speaking, native to Greek soil; but that in NT times it was also applied to Latin names is shown by the instance of Luke (see LUKE, § 6). Strictly speaking, the form we should have expected would be Silvas; but the form Silas is also possible, since abbreviation followed no hard and fast rules.

It can be shown that Μενέστας (not Μενέστρας) is equivalent to Μενέστρατος (Polyb. iv. 16 9 xx. 10 5 xxii. 12[14] 13) and 'Αρχίστας to 'Αρχίστρατος (Fick, Griech. Personennamen,(2) 73). For Lucas too no hesitation is felt in assuming Lucianus (not to mention other forms which have been suggested) as the unabbreviated name. Jos. BJ vii. 8 1 f. 5, §§ 252, 275-279, 306 ff., ought not to be cited as against this, for the Σίλουας[1] there named is, according to Schürer (GJV(2) 1 541, ET i. 2 259) and Forcellini (Onom. Latinitatis, 3 (1883) 116*a*), L. Flavius Silva Nonius Bassus, so that the name does not come into consideration here at all. Still less ought appeal to be made to the fact that in MSS of the NT the word is accentuated Σίλας, although if an abbreviation from Silvanus it really ought to be Σιλᾶς;[2] for the accentuation of MSS is in no sense authoritative. The circumstance, too, that the name Silas, according to Zahn (Einl. i. d. NT 1 22 f.), does not occur at all elsewhere on Latin soil, and has been met with on Greek soil only at Thespiæ (CIG Septentrion. 1, no. 1772, l. 12[3]) is far from being decisive, indeed, against abbreviation from Silvanus, yet at least points to another alternative, viz. that (b) Silas may also be a Semitic name.[4] Silvanus in this case will be the Roman form nearest possible in sound to his own name, a Roman form assumed by this Jew for intercourse with the non-Jewish world (see NAMES, § 86).

As regards etymology, the derivation from שָׁלשׁ, 'three,' is inadmissible. The שֶׁלֶשׁ (SHELESH) named in 1 Ch. 7 35 becomes Σελλης in 𝔊A. Should one choose to conjecture שֶׁלֶשׁ (with sĕgōl) as the Hebrew form—as is perhaps done by Hoole (Classical Element in the NT, 1888, p. 61 f.)—the Greek, after the analogy of סֶלֶד in 1 Ch. 2 30, which appears in the LXX as Σαλαδ [BA] or Σαλεδ [L], would in no case be Σιλας. Thus also the conjecture that Silas is identical with the Tertius of Rom. 16 22 (so Franz Burman, Exercitt. Acad. 2, Rotterdam, 1688, p. 161) is seen to be quite baseless.

Jerome (on Gal. 1 1; ed. Vallarsi, vii. 1 374) and OS (ed. Lag. 71 16 72 25 199 70) derive Silas and Silvanus alike from שָׁלַח (missus: OS 198 61 has Σιλας μεσίτης). So also Zimmer, who cites the שֶׁלַח (SHELAH, 2) of Gen. 10 24 11 13-15 1 Ch 1 18 24. This last, however, appears as Σαλα in 𝔊 (or Σαλας [L once in Gen. 10 24]), in Jos. Ant. i. 6 4 f., §§ 146, 150, as Σαλας, Σαλης or Σελας. For this reason we must also reject the conjecture of Seufert (above, § 5 b) that the choice of the Hebrew name which the composer of Acts gives to Silvanus was determined by the attribute of its bearer as being an apostle or one 'sent.'

In all probability the root of Silas is שאל. The Palmyrene inscriptions nos. 17, 18, and 95 in de Vogüé (Syrie Centrale, inscript. Sémit., 1868, pp. 21, 65) show—and indeed in the case of no. 17 with the Greek parallel text του Σεειλα[1]—the form שאילא which is equivalent in meaning to the Heb. שָׁאוּל, 'he who has been asked for'; cp Nöld., ZDMG, 1870, p. 96 f. As the aleph in the middle was hardly audible, the form Sila easily arose out of this. So in CIG 3 4511 = Le Bas et Waddington (see n. 1) 2 3, no. 2567, p. 586, explic. p. 589 f.: Σαμσιγεραμος ὁ καὶ Σειλας in Emesa in Cœlesyria, 78-79 A.D.; שילא several times in Talmud (cp Nöldeke, l.c., and Zahn, 1 23); also שילי in eastern Aramaic in the fifth century A.D. (CIS 2, no. 101, according to Zahn). On this etymology Σίλας will be the correct accentuation.

The form τῷ Σειλεα in Acts 15 34 D (d: Sileæ) is noticeable, as also the (only graphically different) τῷ Σιλαια of Acts 17 4 D, whilst elsewhere D invariably has Σιλας or Σειλας. The Σιλβανός found in 2 Cor., 1 and 2 Thess. (Dd Ee FG), and in 1 Pet. (B) is only another writing for Σιλουανός.

We come now to the question of the credibility of the data regarding Silas-Silvanus.

8. Credibility of Acts, 1 and 2 Thess., and 1 Pet. on Silas. (a) As regards Acts it has been remarked already (§ 2 f.) that the share of Silas-Silvanus in Paul's second missionary journey is not open to any question, especially when confirmed as it is by 2 Cor. 1 19 (on the genuineness of which epistle see GALATIANS, §§ 6-9), but that Acts needs between 17 15 and 18 5 some supplementing, and so far as its entire presentation of the 'apostolic decree' is concerned is completely unhistorical. The same holds good of the miraculous deliverance of Paul and Silas from prison at Philippi, as soon as 1 Thess. is accepted as genuine, for in 1 Thess. 2 2 Paul alludes to the evil treatment he had received at Philippi and yet attributes it not to any outward miracle but to his own inward disposition that he nevertheless found fresh courage for the preaching of the gospel in Thessalonica (cp ACTS, § 2). The fact also that the Roman citizenship is here so unexpectedly attributed to Silas rouses the suspicion that the author may have expressed himself carelessly and included Silas in his statement, although in fact all that he really knew of was the citizenship of Paul (see above, § 6 b).

(b) Whilst the genuineness of 1 Thess., and so also the designation of Silvanus as joint author (1 1), is open to no well-grounded objection, that of 2 Thess. must be given up, especially on account of 2 1-12. It will not avail to plead for the genuineness of the rest after this has been set aside; rather must we regard those portions of 2 Thess. which coincide with 1 Thess., including that in which Silvanus is named, as being imitations by which it was sought to give the epistle the appearance of being a genuine writing of Paul (cp Schmiedel in HC zum NT 2 1; Holtzmann, ZNTW, 1901, pp. 97-108).

(c) Since after the sojourn of Paul at Corinth in the course of his second missionary journey (Acts 18 5 2 Cor. 1 19), Silvanus is not again mentioned as having been in the company of the apostle, it is in itself possible that when 1 Pet. was written Silvanus was in the company of Peter—the epistle being assumed to be genuine and to have been written after that date. Of those who do not regard 1 Pet. as genuine, many find in the affirmation of 5 12 that Peter is writing 'through Silvanus' (διὰ Σιλουανοῦ) and particularly in the words ὡς λογίζομαι (AV 'as I suppose') which RV, certainly correctly, takes as referring to 'faithful' (πιστοῦ, 'by Silvanus, our faithful brother, as I account him, I have written unto you briefly'), a veiled reference to the fact that Silvanus had written the epistle after Peter's death. If, however, the epistle dates from 112 A.D. (see CHRISTIAN, § 8) this theory is excluded by consideration of what would have been Silvanus's age at that time. Thus we

1 To be accentuated so, according to Winer,(8) §§ 6 8*a*, 5 n. 73, because ου stands for a consonant and other MSS write Σιλβας.

2 Thus, if for no other reason, because in the longer form the accent lies upon the second not upon the first syllable. That all hypocoristica should have the circumflex on the last syllable is in accordance indeed with the principles laid down by Herodian (ed. Lentz, 1 50-59) but not with the examples he gives; cp Winer,(8) § 6 7*g*.

3 With Greeks it might be an abbreviation of Σιλανός which occurs—e.g., so early as in Xen. Anab. vi. 2 [4] 13.

4 In Josephus the following Jews bear the name of Silas:—(a) a tyrant of Lysias (Ant. xiv. 3 2 § 40); (b) a friend of Agrippa I. (xviii. 6 7, § 204; xix. 6 3, § 299; 7 1, §§ 317-325; 8 3, § 353); (c) a commandant of Tiberias (Vit. 17, § 89 f.; 53, § 272; BJ ii. 21 6, § 615): (d) a commandant from Babylon (BJ ii. 19 2, § 520, iii. 2 1 f., §§ 11, 19).

1 The Greek text also in CIG 3, no. 4484, and in Le Bas et Waddington, Voyage archéologique en Grèce et en Asie Mineure, 2 3, 1870, no. 2601 (p. 594; explications, p. 600).

shall have to suppose that the mention of Silvanus, as also that of Mark (5 13), who also can hardly have been still alive at so late a date as 112 A.D., subserves a definite purpose. Both had been members of the primitive church (for Mark, cp Acts 12 12) and at the same time companions of Paul; thus, on the one hand, they become fitted to figure as comrades of Peter, and, on the other, the naming of them creates the impression that Peter had a thoroughly good understanding with Paul the founder of many of the churches included in the address of the epistle (Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia). The remaining contents of the epistle show little of that tendency to bring about a reconciliation between Paulinism and Jewish Christianity which the Tübingen school attributed to it; but the closing verses which have been under our consideration must doubtless be taken in this sense (cp PETER, EPISTLES OF, § 6, end).

In doing so it is a matter of indifference whether we are to understand by 'through' (διά) that Silvanus is indicated as the individual who, like Tertius in Rom. 16 22, wrote the epistle at the apostle's dictation (so the subscription to Rom. in cod. 133: 'it was written through Tertius,' ἐγράφη διὰ Τερτίου), or whether, as the analogy of the other spurious subscriptions of Pauline letters would warrant, we are intended to look upon him as the bearer of the letter; all that is excluded is the attribution to him of any sort of independent share in the composition of the epistle.

9. Later views. In the lists of the 'seventy' (Lk. 10 1) Silas and Silvanus figure as distinct individuals, the former as bishop of Corinth, the latter as bishop of Thessalonica. According to the Περίοδοι Βαρνάβα John Mark was baptized by Barnabas, Paul, and Silas in Iconium (Lipsius, Apokr. Ap.-gesch. i. 203, ii.1 9*f.* 2 277 280 285). Many interpreters maintain Silas to be the 'brother' referred to in 2 Cor. 8 18*f.* This brother, however, must rather have been a Macedonian, as he was chosen by the Macedonians to represent them in conveying the collection to Jerusalem. Against the theory that Silas was the author of the 'we'-source of Acts see ACTS, § 9. Against the view put forward in 1825 by Böhme and Mynster that Silas was the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews the same considerations hold good as have been urged against the authorship of Barnabas in so far as they both belonged to Jerusalem (see BARNABAS, § 5).

SILENCE (דּוּמָה; ᾅδης; infernum), a title of SHEOL (q.v.), Ps. 94 17 115 17.

The existence of such a word is, however, most improbable, and there is no Ass. parallel. 𝔊's ᾅδης may = צַלְמָוֶת. See SHADOW OF DEATH.

SILK occurs in AV as the rendering of three different words.

1. שֵׁשׁ, šēš, is rendered 'silk' in AV text of Pr. 31 22, and mg. of Gen. 41 42 Exod. 25 4. On this see LINEN (7).

2. מֶשִׁי, mĕšī (τρίχαπτος),[1] Ezek. 16 10 13†. Amidst the variety of ancient renderings there is a general agreement that some cloth of fine texture is intended; Jewish tradition favours 'silk' (Ges. Thes.), a meaning with which the rendering in 𝔊 is not inconsistent; and Movers (Phön. ii. 3 264) contends that silk was, at least as far back as Ezekiel's time, conveyed from China into W. Asia by the land route through Mesopotamia, though it was probably almost unknown in Europe till after Alexander's conquests, and did not come into general use before the period of the Roman Empire.[2] Cp TRADE, § 62. In any case the reference in Ezek. 16 10 is to a long outer vail of fine material which covered the entire person (Smend, ad loc.).

[1] I.e., 'woven of hair'; Aq. has ψηλαφητός and ἄνθιμος, Sym. ἐπένδυμα and πολύμιτος; Th. merely transliterates. Vg. subtilia and polymitus, Pesh. ḥellā ('vail'), and teklēthā ('blue').

[2] Cp EB(9) 22 56.

3. σιρικόν, i.e., σηρικόν, the familiar Greek name for silk (from Σηρ: see Strabo, 516, 701), occurs in Rev. 18 12†, in the enumeration of wares which formed the merchandise of the apocalyptic Babylon.

The references in classical writers show that, under the early empire, silk was of great costliness, and its use a sign of extreme luxury.

The larva of the silk-worm moth, Bombyx mori, so called from its feeding on mulberry leaves, produces far the greatest bulk of the silk in use. Inferior silks are, however, produced by several species of the same genus, and Tussar silks are spun from the cocoons of Antheræa pernyi, which feeds on oaks, in China; and of A. mylitta in India, and from other species mostly belonging to the family Saturniidæ. The silk is the hardened extract of certain silk glands which open just below the mouth of the caterpillar, and is excreted to make the cocoon within which the insect passes its pupal stage.

SILLA (סִלָּא; σελλα [Eus. OS 296, 99]; SELA [Jer., Vg.]), a place-name in the account of the murder of Joash (2 K. 12 20 [21]). 'At the house of Millo [or, at Beth-millo] which goeth down to Silla,' as AV gives, is clearly wrong (ἐν οἴκῳ μααλω τὸν γααλλα [B, ἐν γ. B[ab]], . . . μαλλων τῷ ἐν τῇ καταβάσει αλλων [L], . . . μααλω τὸν καταμένοντα γααλαδ [A, sic ut vid.]), kad neḥēth las'la' [Pesh.]).

The key to the problem is supplied by the theory that the people with whom the Israelites had most constant relations were the Jeraḥmeelites, and that Solomon most probably obtained his timber for building, not from the Lebanon, but from the mountain-country of the Negeb. The mysterious word מלוא (Millo) is most probably a corruption of ירחמאל (Jeraḥmeel), and so too is הירד סלא (see MILLO). It was at Beth-jeraḥmeel that Joash was slain, and since the context requires a place in Jerusalem, the most plausible view is that 'Beth-jeraḥmeel' means the 'house of the forest of Lebanon,' for Solomon's Lebanon, or perhaps Gebalon, appears to have been in the Jeraḥmeelite Negeb (see SOLOMON, § 3 b). The same building is probably specified in the true text of 2 Ch. 24 25 (see Crit. Bib.). Cp, however, Winckler, KAT(3) 260, n. 2, and the commentaries of Benzinger and Kittel (less satisfactory conjectures).

SILOAM, SILOAH, SHELAH, SHILOAH. The four places in which Shiloah or Siloam are mentioned are: (1) Is. 8 6 (מֵי הַשִּׁלֹחַ[1]; τὸ ὕδωρ τοῦ Σειλωάμ [Bℵ], τ. ὕ. τ. Σιλ. [AQΓ], The waters of Shiloah, EV); (2) Neh. 3 15 (בְּרֵכַת הַשֶּׁלַח; κολυμβήθρα τῶν κωδίων [B], om. κωδιων ℵ*, hab. κωδιων ℵ[c.a mg.], ℵ adds θε τοῦ Σιλωαμ, τῆς κρήνης τοῦ Σιλωα [L]; The pool of Siloah AV, of Shelah RV); (3) Lk. 13 4 (ὁ πύργος ἐν τῷ Σιλωάμ; The tower in Siloam); (4) Jn. 9 7 and (not in best MSS) 11 (τὴν κολυμβήθραν τοῦ Σιλωάμ, The pool of Siloam 'which is by interpretation, Sent'; the better reading seems to be τὸν Σ.).

Possibly also there is an allusion to Siloam in the 'fountain' and 'pool' of Neh. 2 14. For topography and description see JERUSALEM, § 3 and diagram; also §§ 11, 18 f., and map facing col. 2420; also CONDUITS, § 5, where a translation of the famous Siloam inscription is given. Josephus (BJ v. 4 1 § 140) speaks of the waters of the fountain (πηγὴ Σιλωᾶς) as sweet and abundant, and (BJ v. 9, § 410) reports himself in his speech to his compatriots as having pointed out that Siloam and the other springs which were formerly almost dried up when under the control of the Jews, had, since the advent of Titus, run more plentifully than they did before. Jerome (Comment. in Esa. 86) also mentions the irregular flow of Siloam—a feature which has been noticed by most subsequent pilgrims and travellers, and is explained by the geological formation of the district. In NT times certainly, and probably earlier, a healing virtue was attributed to the waters of Siloam. On the mystical meaning of Jn. 9 11 see GOSPELS, § 56, col. 1803, but cp SHILOH, and, on the miracle, cp JOHN, § 35, col. 2539.

In Is. 8 6 the waters of Shiloah 'that go softly' (at least if the text is sound; see, however, Crit. Bib. [Che.]) represent either the power of the house of David, which certainly was insignificant, or the might of Yahwè which seemed but was not really slight; they are contrasted with the 'waters of the River, strong and many' (v. 7), which symbolise the vast physical power of Assyria. In Jn. 9 7 the ἀπεσταλμένος has been taken by most interpreters from Theophylact onwards to refer to Christ the true Siloam (cp 6 29 38 f. 7 28 8 26 17 3 21). Whether this is at all probable may be doubted; other interpretations however (see Holtzmann, ad loc.) are no better. Lücke has pointed out the possibility that the clause is merely a marginal gloss. Such explanations abound in the Onomastica.

SILVER (כֶּסֶף, késeph; Aram. כַּסְפָּא; Syr. kespā; Ass. kaspu; root-meaning perhaps 'paleness,' see WRS J. Phil. 14 125).

The word is sometimes used, in its proper sense, of silver ore, e.g., Ezek. 22 20 22 (figuratively), etc., but also often of silver as a measure of weight and value, e.g., 'silver 30 shekels' (Ex. 21 32), '400 silver shekels' (Gen. 23 15), and, with the omission of 'shekel' or 'shekels,' 'a thousand of silver' (Gen. 20 16), 'twenty of silver' (37 28). Hence more often still 'silver' (késeph) = 'money,' cp ἀργύριον and the French argent, but not necessarily coined money, e.g., Gen. 31 15 42 25 27 Dt. 23 20 [19]. In Gen. 42 25 35 the plural form (as if 'monies') is found.

1. OT references.

On silver mining, alluded to in Job 28 1, and on the methods of refining the crude ore alluded to in (Is. 1 25) Ezek. 22 20 22 Zech. 13 9 Mal. 3 3 Prov. 17 3 27 21 (we must not add Ps. 126 1 [7]), see Metals. The separated silver was called késeph ṣārūph (כֶּסֶף צָרוּף, Ps. 12 7 [6]); k. mezukkāk (כ׳ מְזֻקָּק, 1 Ch. 29 4 Ps. 12 7 [6]); k. nibḥār (כ׳ נִבְחָר, Prov. 10 20). The crucible is called maṣrēph (מַצְרֵף, Prov. 17 3 27 21).[2] In Jer. 10 9 we read of 'silver beaten out into plates'; where it came from we shall have to ask presently. Hebrew traditions told of great abundance of silver in early times. These traditions, which are supported by the use of késeph (silver) for 'money,' are doubtless correct. Abram and Ephron 'the Hittite' have certainly no lack of silver, according to Gen. 23, and, though this passage comes from the much disparaged priestly writer, he probably does but repeat the statements of earlier writers.

According to a view which, even if new, may nevertheless do justice to old and forgotten truth, the scene of the transaction described was not at Hebron but at some place of hallowed associations in the Negeb—probably Rehoboth,[3] which would justly be represented as Kirjath-'arab,[4] 'city of Arabia.' In this connection we may refer to Joseph's silver divining cup (Gen. 44 2). It is not impossible that the original scene of the fascinating story of Joseph was not in Egypt but in the Negeb. But even if this was not the case, we are assured on the best authority that silver in Egypt had at first a higher value than gold (see Egypt, § 38). The true Hittites, too (whose capital was Kadesh on the Orontes), had abundance of silver in the time of Rameses II.; the treaty between them and this powerful Egyptian king was on a silver tablet.

In Solomon's time, it would appear as if the larger introduction of gold depreciated the value of silver. We are told (1 K. 10 21) that none of the king's 'vessels' were of silver, which 'was nothing accounted of in [1] 𝔊, as we now have it, gives in Ps. l.c. δοκίμιον τῇ γῇ. In Prov. 27 21 δοκίμ. corresponds to מַצְרֵף, 'crucible.' Did the text of 𝔊 in Ps. at one time run, ἀργύριον πεπυρωμένον ἐν δοκιμίῳ (=δοκιμείῳ) without τῇ γῇ? Deissmann (Neue Bibelstudien, 90) thinks that the only tolerable sense of δοκίμιον τῇ γῇ is 'genuine silver for the land.' At any rate both the MT and 𝔊 of Ps. 12 7 [6] attest the activity of scribes working upon a corrupt text. Cp n. 2.

[2] Nestle (Exp.T 8 287) would give the same sense to עֱלִי, which in Prov. 27 22 = 'pestle.' This affects the criticism of בעליל. May we read בַּעֲלִי, 'in the crucible'? There seems to be a better solution.

[3] 'Hittite' itself, when used of any person in the S. of Palestine, is a mutilated form of 'Rehobothite.' See Rehoboth.

[4] For instances of numerals which are corruptions of ethnic names, see Moses, § 11, Prophet, § 7, Crit. Bib. on Gen. 15 13. 'City of Four' (Kirjath-arba) is as improbable as 'daughter of Seven' (see Solomon, § 2).

the days of Solomon,' and (v. 27) that he 'made silver to be in Jerusalem as stones.'

From what sources was this plentiful supply of silver derived? It is geologically impossible that either gold or silver should exist in the mountains of Syria and Palestine. We may suppose that most of the silver of the 'Hittites' came from the mines of Bulgar Dagh in Lycaonia. According to Prof. Sayce:—

2. Sources.

'The Hittite inscription found near the old mines of these mountains by Mr. Davis, proves that they once occupied the locality. It is even possible that their settlement for a time in Lydia was also connected with their passion for "the bright metal." At all events, the Gumush Dagh, or "Silver Mountains," lie to the S. of the Pass of Karabel, and traces of old workings can still be detected in them.'[1]

As to the treasures of Solomon, we are told in 1 K. 10 22 (cp Solomon, § 4, end) that the 'navy of Tarshish' brought silver as well as gold. Upon this Prof. W. M. Müller remarks (OLZ 3 269) that this points to great ignorance of the Red Sea coasts. There was, however, according to the Arabic notices, no lack of silver in the mountains of Yemen, and it was hence, as Oskar Fraas thinks (HWB(2) 1007*a*), that Solomon derived the precious metals. And what is to be said of Tartessus? If the current opinion is correct, though Solomon's ships did not get out so far as Spain, the later supply of silver to Palestine was largely derived from the rich territory by the Guadalquivir. We fear the opinion needs to be accepted with reserve. Tartessus was, no doubt, in a rich district. The story is, that since the Phœnicians found that they could not carry all their silver away, they made 'silver anchors' in place of those that they had brought (Aristot. De Mirab. 148; cp Diod. 5 35).

Unfortunately, there is considerable danger that, except in late passages like 2 Ch. 9 21[2] Jon. 1 3, 'Tarshish' is a corruption of 'Asshur'; and there is one extremely late passage (Jer. 10 9) where the same restoration ('silver . . . brought from Asshur') should apparently be made. Perhaps the most important passage is Ezek. 27 12 where, according to MT, silver, together with iron, tin, and lead, is represented to have been brought to Tyre from Tarshish. A close investigation of the passage in its context suggests that Miṣṣur (not Tyre) provides the market, and N. Arabian peoples provide the merchandise disposed of (see Crit. Bib.). The Asshurite merchants, it would seem, were the middlemen between the miners in some perhaps distant part o. Arabia, and the rich and powerful people of Miṣṣur. Another evidence of the abundance of silver in N. Arabia is supplied by 2 S. 8 10-12 (in the light of criticism), where the spoil taken by David from Zobah [q.v.], or rather Miṣṣur and other N. Arabian regions bordering on Palestine (such as 'Aram'—i.e., Jerahmeel), is said to have consisted in vessels of silver, of gold, and of brass. It is noteworthy, too, that the poem of Job, which most probably arose either in N. Arabia or under strong N. Arabian influences (the names point decidedly to this, see Job [Book], §§ 4, 9), shows great interest in gold and silver mines. On two out or the three references in Job (22 25 28 6), see Gold, § 1, col. 1750.

SIMEON

Where settled? (§ 1).	Extra-biblical? (§ 6).
Gen. 34 49 (§ 2).	Conclusion (§ 7).
Deut. 33 (§ 3).	Name (§ 8).
Judg. 1 (§ 4).	Genealogical lists (§ 9).
1 Ch. 4 (§ 5).	Geographical lists (§ 10).

Simeon (שִׁמְעוֹן; ϲγμεων [BAL]; see below, § 8) was the brother[3] of Levi and Dinah (Gen. 34 25, J; cp 49 5). What genealogical scheme underlay this representation we do not know.[4] In the scheme followed by the final redactors Simeon had five full brothers; how many sisters (Gen. 37 35, J; 46 7, D) we are nowhere told. Moreover,

1. Where settled?

[2] We do not add 1 K. 22 47 (see Jehoshaphat, col. 2352).

[3] On אחם in Gen. 49 see § 8, i.

[4] It is natural to suppose a genealogy that made Simeon, Levi, and Dinah the only children of their mother. We cannot assume this with confidence however. Simeon and Reuben form a pair in Gen. 48 5 (P), and Simeon is styled brother of Judah in Judg. 1 3 (J).

Simeon the brother of Dinah figures as a tribe in the district of Shechem, whereas the Simeon whose cities are enumerated in the well-known lists (§ 10) is there connected with the S. country and associated with Judah rather than Israel.[1] It has been customary to identify these two Simeons. It is not impossible, however, to hold that there were more Simeons than one (see below, § 6). If, however, we identify them, are we to regard the two representations as variant theories, belonging to a time when the real life of the tribe had been forgotten? Or may we suppose that they both contain reminiscences of history, that in fact Simeon lived, let us say, in the neighbourhood of Shechem and then removed to the S.? There would be more chance of giving confident answers to these questions, if we knew whether the framers of our sources had actual knowledge of a Simeon tribe or Simeon families; if, for example, we could point with confidence to sanctuaries which at least had been distinctively Simeonite, where therefore there might have been preserved a tradition of Simeon's having come S. from the highlands of central Palestine. It is, no doubt, natural to suppose that Beersheba was such a sanctuary. It may very well have been; it was certainly famous, and, in particular, was at least at times in touch with northern Israel. The difficulty is to prove that it, or any other definite spot, was Simeonite. Simeon is never mentioned as a component part of the southern kingdom.[2]

2. Gen. 34 49.

Still, although we may not be able to point with confidence to any contemporary statement about Simeon in the literature accessible to us, the editors whose work has reached us may have had such evidence lying before them.[3]

i. It must be remembered that the end of J's story of the Shechem exploit ascribed to the tribe has been lost. That may have told of Simeon's removal towards the south. From the fact that the redactor suppressed the passage we may plausibly conjecture that what it narrated was more or less of the nature of a catastrophe discreditable to 'Israel.' It may therefore have been historical, and may have come from a time when Simeon was still really a tribe. How a later writer would have told (and did tell) the story we can perhaps see from Gen. 35 5: After the incident which forms the subject of chap. 34 the Israelites moved off leisurely, their god having interfered in their behalf so that there fell on the natives of the land an awe such as fell on the Greeks when Apollo brought the seemingly vanquished Hector back to the fight strong as ever (Il. 15 279 ff.). So, a later writer thought, must it ever fare with Israel. The older story, however, told not of 'Israel,' but of Simeon and Levi.[4] All that a later editor was willing to retain of it was the remonstrance of Jacob: you have brought a disaster (עכרתם) on us, in making us abominable to all the natives of the land; as we are but a small company they will band themselves against us and defeat us, and we shall be destroyed.

ii. What the sequel of the older narrative was can probably be inferred from Gen. 49 5-7. Even there we are not told explicitly what happened; but there was a power to fulfil itself in the father's curse (cp BLESSING AND CURSING): I will divide them in Jacob, And scatter them in Israel. What meaning the writer would put into these words is uncertain. Steuernagel thinks that Jacob is here a tribe name and that the verse means that Simeon was dispersed in the highlands of central Palestine (Einwanderung, 104), some, however, perhaps wandering southwards (ib. 15). As treating of the early fortunes of Shechem, the story of Gen. 34 is dealt with elsewhere (see EPHRAIM, § 6, DINAH). Dinah was perhaps supposed to have disappeared completely (see DINAH, § 6); what the real history of Levi was is a difficult question (see LEVI, LEVITES, GENEALOGIES, § 7). It is with Simeon that we are here concerned. That it was not always counted as a tribe appears to follow from its absence from Dt. 33 (blessing of Moses).[1]

3. Dt. 33.

It has been questioned, however, whether the omission of Simeon in Dt. 33 is original.

Not only does 𝔊AL apply v. 6*b* to Simeon (καὶ συμεων [𝔊B om. σ.] ἔστω πολὺς ἐν ἀριθμῷ), to whom the words, however they are to be taken (REUBEN, § 4), are quite as applicable as to Reuben. It has been thought also (Graetz, Gesch. ii. 1 486 f., Heilprin, Hist. Poet. Heb. 1 113 f.; cp Halévy, J. As., 1897*a*, pp. 329-31) that 7*a* perhaps belonged to Simeon (there might be a play on the name in 'Hear'). If these proposals were combined the Simeon saying[2] would read:

Let Simeon be a small company.
Hear, Yahwè, his voice,
And bring him in unto his people.

The case for such a text, however, is not strong (see Driver, ad loc.).[3]

If the passage really mentioned Simeon in some such way it would seem to imply that Simeon had somehow come to be severed from 'his people.' That would be an interesting variant of the view of Simeon represented in the 'Jacob Blessing' (Gen. 49), where Simeon is not detached from his people but dispersed among them.

Moreover if Simeon is really mentioned in the Esarhaddon tablet to be discussed later (§ 6, iii.), a position of detachment for Simeon at a comparatively late period would be established by contemporary extra-biblical evidence. Gen. 49 (and 34) is, however, by no means the only biblical reference to movements on the part of Simeon.

4. Judg. 1.

Of special interest are the references in Judg. 1, as giving a theory, doubtless widely held, as to Simeon's arrival on the scene. There, as we have seen (col. 4524, n. 4), Simeon's brother is Judah (vv. 3 17). Israel, having agreed to a division of the land among the tribes, inquires of Yahwè who is to begin the attack. The answer being 'Judah,' Judah asks Simeon to join in the expedition, promising to return the favour later. Simeon consents, and the two peoples advance against the Canaanites, defeating them signally at Bezek, if the text is sound (see BEZEK). Whether the tradition made Simeon and Judah then settle in the central highlands is not clear.[4] The meagreness of the account of Judah's campaign suggests that the old story of Judah's advent was lost or suppressed: we hear of Caleb's appropriation of Hebron, Othniel's of Debir, the Kenites' of the district of Arad (Judg. 1 16; on the text see the comm.), and Simeon's of Zephath-Hormah;[5] but nowhere are we told where or how Judah settled.[6] It is difficult to think that this is accidental: the redactor would have told of Judah's southward progress if he could. Perhaps one reason why he could not was that, as Graf suggested (Stamm Simeon, 15), the district which ultimately bore the name of Judah was entered from the S. If Judah is primarily the name of the southern kingdom, which consisted of Kenites, Calebites, Jerahmeelites, Simeonites, and other southern elements, the settlement stories would naturally deal with the fortunes of its component

1 Cheyne, however, suggests that the Shechem-story also dealt originally not with central Palestine, but with a district on the N. Arabian border, in or near the Negeb (cp MOSES, § 13); SHECHEM, 2.

2 On Simeon's never being assigned to either kingdom cp Graf, Stamm Simeon, 19; also, on theories connecting him with the northern kingdom, ib. 33. For the Chronicler's notice see below, § 5, iv.

3 On 1 Ch. 4 38-41 see below, § 5.

4 There seems, however, to have been an independent story which did speak of 'Israel.' See Gen. 48 21 f. [E] (cp Gunkel in HK(2) ad loc.), and the legend in Jubilees 34 2-8 (cp Charles ad loc. and the literature cited by him).

1 On its omission in Judg. 5 see below, note 4.

2 This theory thus suggests that the Judah saying is: 7*b* 11.

3 On the various proposals see further, Graf, Der Segen Moses, 24-26 (1857).

4 If so, are we to suppose that old tradition did not always distinguish between Judah and 'Levi'? (Gen. 34). Only in this connection can the absence of any reference to Simeon in Judg. 4 or Judg. 5 have any significance.

5 To infer from the Hormah exploit being elsewhere (Nu. 21 3 see HORMAH) given to 'Israel,' that some assigned to Simeon in early times a position of great importance would be precarious.

6 Gen. 38 is somewhat different.

parts.[1] Even, however, if the other Judah elements entered from the S., Simeon might first have lost a footing temporarily gained in Central Palestine. That might account for the Shimeon at Semūnīyeh (right across Esdraelon from Ibzīḳ) of Josh. 11 1 12 20 if that is the true reading (see SHIMRON, and below, § 6, ii.). On the other hand the story of the partnership of 'Judah' and Simeon may not rest on prehistoric relations so early as the settlement. It may reflect a later time.

It has been thought, for example (Wi. GI 2 201 n.), that underneath what now appears in 1 Ch. 4 24 as a mere list of names it is possible to detect a statement relating to a migration of Simeon southwards. According to this theory Simeonites were settled in the southern part of the territory out of which Saul carved an extensive Benjamite state (above, col. 2583, n. 1), and rather than yield to him they moved south. That would be a likely thing to happen, especially if the Simeonites were not firmly settled. Of course such a movement would agree passably with the suggestion of Gen. 49 and the story in Gen. 34. Nor is there anything impossible about an origin such as Winckler proposes for the genealogical list. Still, the suggestion in question is perhaps hardly convincing enough (see below, § 9, i.) to form the basis of a definite theory of the history of Simeon.

5. 1 Ch. 4. To the same period was assigned by Dozy a movement, or movements, on the part of Simeon of which the Chronicler's account is still in the form of a narrative, although it contains a good many names. The passage (1 Ch. 4 38-43) contains several statements, the relation of which to one another is not clear, the text being more or less doubtful.[2]

(a) According to 4 38-40 certain Simeonites pushed down to the district of Gedor or Gerar in search of pasture for their sheep.

(b) According to v. 41 these men went in the time of Hezekiah and smote[3] . . . and the Meunim who were 'there' and banned them and dwelt in their place.

(c) According to v. 42 f. some of 'them' (500 with 4 leaders) went to Mt. Seir and smote those who were left of the fugitive Amalekites and settled there.

i. According to Benzinger these three statements are divergent accounts of the same thing (KHC, 17 f.), all of them being later insertions into the Chronicler's work. A question more important than the date of their insertion is whence they were drawn. We must allow for the possibility that they come from a good source. Of course that need not imply the correctness of the reference to Hezekiah.[4] There is nothing in itself improbable in the Hezekiah date. The Meunim seem to be mentioned under Uzziah, also Arabs in Gur (=Gerar? and בעל for גור?: Winckler, KAT(3) 143, n. 1: 2 Ch. 26 7; cp MEUNIM, b). A little later, under Manasseh, according to one interpretation of a passage in a cuneiform tablet, we find Simeon as a whole reckoned as belonging to Muṣri, not Judah (below, § 6, iii.).

ii. Dozy (De Israëliten te Mekka [1864], 56 [Germ. Trans. 50]), however, thinks that v. 31*b* shows that the events belong to the time of Saul, and in an extremely ingenious manner works out the following theory :—

When Saul's expedition was sent with orders to extirpate the Amalekites, the king was spared and brought back (1 S. 15 3 9). In Yethrib-Medina it was told that when the disobedient army returned to Palestine they were exiled for their disobedience and returned to the Amalekite land[5] (60 f. [53 f.]). The force sent would likely be Simeonite (the most southern tribe, 63 [56]). Afterwards, when David punished the Amalekites for their attack on Ziklag, 400 escaped (1 S. 30 17), to be destroyed later by 500 Simeonites who settled in Seir (1 Ch. 4 42 f. : p. 56 f. [50]). In Hezekiah's time an interest was felt in these Simeonite exiles (56 [49], 72 [64]) and Is. 21 11 f.[1] is an invitation to them to come back (67-73 [60-65]). In time they came to be called Ishmael (103-110 [93-99]); cp below, § 8 iii.

Dozy's reason for assigning the Simeonite movement to the time of Saul does not seem cogent : v. 31*b* ('these were their cities unto the reign of David') is not the Chronicler's; it is a marginal gloss which has intruded so as to sever 'and their villages' (v. 32) from the words to which the parallel Josh. 19 shows that they belong (so Be. ad loc.). Nor can Dozy's other combinations be accepted (for a sober criticism see Graf's review, ZDMG 19 330-351 [1865]).

iii. N. I. Weinstein (Zur Genesis der Agada, 291-156 [1901]), however, adopts most of Dozy's combinations, and adds others of his own.

He tries to show that the Minim of Talmudic literature are the Meunim of the OT, and they in their turn Dozy's wandering Simeonites, whose name he supposes later writers to have avoided on account of a reproach under which they lay, substituting Meunim or Minim. Much of this seems open to the same kind of criticism as Dozy's discussion.

iv. On the other hand, there seems no definite reason to urge in support of the view that the Chronicler's statements are a late invention (We. Prol.(5) 212; ET 213). Why should he invent such a story? Elsewhere the Chronicler seems to treat Simeon as belonging to northern Israel [but cp Crit. Bib. 16, on Is. 9 7-10 4] (2 Ch. 15 9 : Ephraim, Manasseh, Simeon; 34 6 : Manasseh, Ephraim, Simeon, Naphtali). It would be a strong point in favour of an early source for the statements in 1 Ch. 4 39-43 if it could be proved that Simeon was still a current name in S. Palestine in the seventh century B.C. (see § 6, iii.).

6. Extra-biblical references? At this point, accordingly, we may conveniently turn to extra-biblical sources in search of references.

i. We may begin with the attempt to find such in Thotmes III.'s list of 119 places of Upper Rṯnu.

No. 35 is Ša-m-'-n-' and no. 18 Ša-m-'-n-'-w (var. Ša-m-'-'-w), which looks like the plural of no. 35. We may grant the similarity of the names to Simeon (cp the spelling of Ša-ra-ḥa-na); but we cannot infer much. We cannot locate them. According to W. M. Müller, they, at least, were not in the S., as the list (he believes) does not include names in the S. of Judah. Cp also col. 3546, number 35, and notes 2 and 3. The conjecture, therefore, that Simeon (with Levi) was an early settler in Palestine (Hommel, AHT 268; Sayce, Early Heb. Trad. 392) remains a hypothesis.

ii. Nor are we much better off a century or more later in the Amarna correspondence.

There is a letter (KB 5, no. 220 3) from Šamu-Addu, prince of a place called Ša-am-ḫu-na, which is phonetically=Simeon, and is definitely indicated as the name of a town (alu); but we cannot tell where it lay. Steuernagel inclines to identify it with the Symoōn (Συμοων) of 𝔊B in Josh. 11 1 (𝔊AFL Σομερων, MT שִׁמְרוֹן, SHIMRON, § 1) mentioned with Achshaph, and Symoōn (so Buhl, Pal. 215) with Semūnīye[2] (see below, iii., a [1]). There is nothing to make the identity of Šamḫuna with one of the places mentioned in the Karnak list improbable (so also Meyer, Glossen, 73). If the identity be held probable, it would appear to stand in the way of connecting Simeon in any very definite manner with the Ḫabiri as Steuernagel proposes to connect the Leah tribes generally.

iii. Unfortunately, none of the later Egyptian lists contains a name resembling Simeon. It might be surmised that the old towns, or at least their names, had died out. Sayce conjectures that Simeon preceded Judah in the occupation of S. Palestine, and had disappeared by the time of David (Early Heb. Trad. 392). There is a passage, however, in one of the fragments relating to the successful Egyptian expedition of Esarhaddon, which must be taken account of.

[1] In this connection we may note the absence of all mention of Judah from the Shechem story in Gen. 34 30. See above, col. 4526, n. 4.

[4] Dozy argues that it is only the writing down that is ascribed to Hezekiah's time (Israel. te Mekka, 56 [49]). Bertheau thinks the reference is intended to include the expedition. It is difficult to see how the person who inserted the notice could apply it to any other than the time of Hezekiah.

[5] The Gedor of v. 39 is thus the jidār or sanctuary at Mekka (89 [80]), 'the valley' (of v. 39) is E. of Mekka (92-94 [83 f.]), which received its name from the great fight (מַכָּה רַבָּה = Macoraba: 81 [72 f.]).

[1] Dozy (70 [63]), Grätz (Gesch. ii. 1 485; a theory later abandoned) follow Aq. Sym. Theod. in inserting fugitives (נָדֵד = φεύγοντας) as subject to 'call.' On a supposed reference to Simeon in Mic. 1 15 (Movers, Untersuch. üb. d. Chron. 136; Hitzig, ad loc.) see Graf, Stamm Simeon, 32; on a supposed connection of Massa of Prov. 30 1 31 1 (Hitzig, Sprüche Sal. 310 f. and others) with Simeon, see ib. 34, and on other supposed references see Weinstein (as in § 5 iii.).

[2] Petrie, also, places Šamḫuna in Galilee (Hist. Egypt, 2 317).

'From (country) Mu-ṣur,' says Esarhaddon, 'I marshalled my camp (karašu ad-ki-e), to Me-luḫ-ḫa I directed my march, 30 kasbu-ḳakkar from (city) Ap-ḳu which is in (or 'by') (pa-ṭi) (country) Ša-me-n[a] to (city) Ra-pi-ḫi to (a-na i-te)[1] the Wādy of Muṣur.'

If this is really the text of the tablet—it is the reading of Budge, Peiser, Craig, and (doubtfully) Rogers[2]—it is important; the district (mat) in which Ap-ḳu lies is not, as has been supposed, Samaria, but Sa-me-n[a], a name which might be an Assyrian representation of Simeon.[3] According to this, there was probably in the first half of the seventh century B.C. a district known to the Assyrians as שמ[y]ן, apparently somewhere in Palestine. The next question is, Where?

a. The district contained, or had on its border (paṭi), a town called Apḳu, which lay 30 kasbu-ḳakkar from Rapiḫi—Raphia = er-Refaḥ. What the length of a kasbu-ḳakkar was is uncertain[4] (11½ kilom. [=7 Eng. m.]? or 5¾ kilom. [=3½ m.]). The average day's march in this inscription is 2 kasbu-ḳakkar.

(1) If the day's march was about 7 m., 30 kasbu-ḳakkar from Rapiḫi would give the site of Apḳu as somewhere about 100 m. from er-Refaḥ—that is to say, about as far as, e.g., between Dothan and Jenīn. It might then be a question whether Sa-me-n[a] is not perhaps a clerical error for Sa-me-ri-na. 'Aphek in Sharon' (cp APHEK, end) seems too far S. Fīḳ, E. of the Sea of Galilee, with which Schrader identified Apḳu (KAT(2) 204) is some 135 m. from er-Refaḥ; ḳal'at eš-Šema' SE. of Tyre, with which Šanda (MVG, 1902, p. 58 [2 74]) connects the district of Samen[a], identifying Apḳu with 'Aphek in Asher' of Josh. 19 30, is over 140 m.; Semūnīye (above, ii.), somewhat over 110 m.

(2) If the day's march was about 14 m., 30 kasbu-ḳakkar from Rapiḫi would make Apḳu some 200 m. from er-Refaḥ—that is to say farther than Bērūt. Afḳā (in B_4 on map facing col. 3736; cp APHEK, 1) seems to be about 215 m. from er-Refaḥ.

b. The attempt to do justice to the Apḳu part of Esarhaddon's statement, however, raises a difficulty in what precedes.

(1) Esarhaddon seems to say that when he directed his march to Me-luḫ-ḫa he was in Muṣur and there marshalled his camp, starting from Apḳu. Now, Mu-ṣur is nowhere used of N. Palestine. It has been argued with great force, however, by Winckler (and by no Assyriologist disproved[5]) that Muṣri is sometimes to be understood as referring to the neighbourhood of the Negeb of Judah.

Winckler, accordingly, conjectures that the Same[na] in question was in Muṣri, used in the sense just indicated, Apḳu being the Apheka of Josh. 15 53, where it is assigned to Judah. The Joshua context suggests the neighbourhood of Hebron; at all events, somewhere in the hill country of Judah. This theory would give us the most interesting and remarkable datum that, about a generation and a half after the fall of Samaria, the name Sim[eo]n was at least known as a geographical term denoting a district not far from Hebron, and the further datum that the Assyrians counted it to Muṣri. This would have some bearing on the theory which finds Simeon referred to in Dt. 33 (see above, § 3) and explain the prayer for its return to Judah. Many interesting problems would thus assume a new aspect; but the point most important for our present object would be the establishment of such a contemporary geographical use of the name Simeon as would virtually prove a real knowledge of a Simeonite people in S. Palestine, which would give us a valuable starting-point for dealing with the Hebrew Simeon legends.

There is, however, a difficulty in the way of identifying Esarhaddon's Apḳu with the Judahite Aphek of Josh. 15 53.

Hebron is barely some 60 m. from Raphia, which could equal 30 kasbu-ḳakkar only if the kasbu-ḳakkar were some 2 m. If that is not tenable, the Hebron Apḳu theory could be maintained only by supposing that '30' (since there is no doubt about the reading) is a mistake of the Assyrian scribe or of the source from which he compiled.[1] Placing Apḳu in S. Palestine is, therefore, not beyond criticism.

(2) On the other hand, the difficulty of a N. Palestine site for Apḳu hardly seems to be quite as great as Winckler suggests.

It is no doubt natural to suppose that Esarhaddon was himself in Muṣur when he set out for Meluḫḫa; but ad-ki-e is not quite unambiguous.[2] Esarhaddon might then, from a N. Palestine Apḳu have ordered his army out of Muṣri and have marched himself to join it. Sa-me-na might in that case be connected, perhaps, with one of the places in Thotmes III.'s list mentioned above (§ 6, i.) (so Šanda, [2 58 74], n.; cp above, i. f.).

There remains, however, against the N. Palestine theory, the difficulty emphasised by Winckler:

How came Esarhaddon's army to be in Muṣri so as to be called forth by Esarhaddon, unless that were, as Winckler suggests, simply the stage on the expedition reached at the point in the narrative? And, if so, how was Esarhaddon not with the army?

We must thus, apparently, be content to leave the problem open for the present. Simeon may be mentioned in contemporary documents belonging to the sixteenth century, the fifteenth, or the seventh; but we cannot be sure. The hope of securing a fixed starting-point for the story of Simeon in strictly contemporary evidence is for the present not fulfilled. Any day, however, new material may enable us to decide the question. Meanwhile, we must be content with possibilities.

7. Conclusion.

When the character of the development which resulted eventually in the formation of the kingdom of Judah is fully considered, and the suggestions of affinity with [1] Hommel, literally, 'to the borders of' (Aufsätze, 295).

[2] In 3 R. 35 no. 4 obv., l. 11, the name is read [1870] Sa-me-ru. G. Smith (TSBA 3 457 [1874]) does not quote the name, but (Assyr. Discov. 312 [1875]) renders it Samaria; similarly in W. Boscawen's text (TSBA 4 93 [1875]), and Strassm. Alph. Verzeich, p. 533, no. 4238: Sa-me-[ri-na], the reading followed by Schrader, (KAT(2) [1882]) and Delitzsch (Par. 286). Meanwhile Budge, however, Hist. of Esarhaddon [1880], 118, reads Sa-me-na (without query). This is rejected (emended?) explicitly by Tiele (BAG 350, n. 1 [1888]), and silently by Winckler (Unters. z. altor. Gesch. 98: translit. text [1889]). Later, however, the original was examined by Peiser and J. A. Craig and declared to read Sa-me-na (MVG iii. 18 [1898]) which is likewise the reading (shown shaded) of Rogers ('Two Esarhaddon Texts,' in Haverford College Studies, no. 2, 1889). The present writer examined the tablet, and is convinced that the reading Samerina is quite impossible (so also Budge, and C. A. Thompson, in conversation). There are several possibilities; but Samena seems most likely. See also § 6 iii, a (1).

[3] On Ass. ēn = Heb. ōn (for ān) see Delitzsch on 'Samaria' (Ass. Lesestücke,(4) 193 b). For disappearance of 'ayin at the beginning of a syllable, cp ibēl from ibāl = ib'al (יבעל).

[4] Cp Del. Par. 177-179, and C. H. W. Johns as in n. 1, col. 4530, and the literature cited there and in Muss-Arn. Dict. 414.

[5] Since the above was written, E. A. W. Budge has given his reasons for rejecting the view of Winckler (Hist. of Egypt, 6 pp. ix-xxx). It can hardly be claimed, however, that they settle the question. (1) The fragment (83, 1-18, 836) cited by Winckler as apparently mentioning Muṣri and Mi[ṣri] side by side must, indeed, be left out of the argument. It is broken off so close to the upright wedge of 'iṣ' that it is illegitimate to argue as if the character were complete, and therefore iṣ. It might quite well be luḫ (KAT(3) 145, n. 3). Budge and King go further, and say that they can see clearly a trace of the head of a second upright wedge (the present writer, after examination of the tablet, is inclined to think that they may be right). The reading would then probably be Mi-lu[ḫ-ḫa] as Winckler suggests (KAT(3) 145, n. 3: mi for me would be unusual [Wi.]: the reff. in the index to Bezold's Catalogue yield no parallel; still, in Khors. 103, Oppert and Ménant [Journ. as. 6 ser. 1, begin., 1863] give mi, though Botta, Mon., pl. 150. l. 9, gives the usual m[e], and Winckler's edition follows). Winckler's theory, however, by no means falls with the surrender of this reading. He never treated the tablet as the main justification of his theory (see Muṣri, etc., 1). (2) Budge's other arguments, however, seem open to criticism as inconclusive. In particular, the translation of ana ḳêpûti eli mat Muṣri (Kl. In. 34) by 'to the wardenship of the Marches of Egypt,' although following time-honoured precedent, has never been justified. The phonetic value of NI.GAB when it means gate-guardian, as in 'Descent of Ištar' passim, is pitû or mušêliš (5 R. 18 6 13 7); when its phonetic value is ḳêpu (as a comparison of Rost, Plate 23 16 ki . . . ti with Plate 37 6, NI.GAB-u-ti, shows that it is in the Esarhaddon passage [cp what is said by C. H. W. Johns on the phonetic value of NI.GAB in his careful discussion of the ḳêpu office in Assyrian Deeds and Documents, 2 84-88, which the present writer did not see till after this note was written]), it means governor. Schrader admitted twenty-four years ago that 'governor over Egypt' was impossible (KGF 265); only, he gave up 'governor' instead of giving up 'Egypt.' On ḳêpu see also Johns, Doomsday Bk. 9.

[1] Or by regarding kasbu-ḳakkar as not a technical measure but a general term: 'long journey' (cp C. H. W. Johns, Assyr. Deeds and Documents, 2 208).

[2] The contexts in which it oftenest occurs give it the meaning of 'muster, marshall forces where one is' (e.g., in Taylor Cylinder, 5 23: assemble your army [pu-uḫ-ḫir um-man-ka], muster your camp [di-ka-a karaša-ka]); but it need not imply presence; cp 4 R. 48 12, 13*a*: 'Bel will call forth (i-da-kaš-šum-ma) a foreign foe against him' (Del. Ass. HWB).

SIMEON

Ishmaelite, Edomite, Kenite, etc. are allowed for, it is natural to conjecture that Simeon stands for one of the unsettled elements of the southern population fused more or less permanently into a state by David, especially when it is noted (cp Sayce, Early Hebrew History, 392) how many (5 out of 11) of the towns (1 S. 30 27-31) to which he is said to have 'sent gifts' appear in the list of Simeonite towns, for there does not seem to be between the lists any literary connection (below, § 10). According to Land (De Gids, Oct. 1871, p. 21) Simeon was very possibly an Ishmaelite group that attached itself to Israel.[1] If we think that Beersheba was markedly Simeonite, interesting problems arise connected with such names as Abraham, Isaac, (cp Stade, GVI 1 155), Samuel's sons, David, Amos.

8. Name. i. In all the statements we have referred to, the name has borne practically the same form. It appears to consist of the radical šmʿ with the nominal termination ōn = ān.[2] What view of the name was taken in early times we cannot say. It is not necessary to suppose that the story of Leah's gratitude for the hearing of her supplications (Gen. 29 33) was a very early explanation. It is exactly parallel to the explanation of the cognate name Ishmael (Gen. 16 11: J).

The name Simeon has been connected by Hitzig (GVI 47), W. R. Smith (JPhil., 1880, p. 80), Stade (GVI 1 152), Kerber (Die rel.-gesch. Bedeut. d. Heb. Eigenn. 71) with the Arabic simʿ, said to mean the offspring of the hyæna and the female wolf (Hommel, Säugethiere, 304), and Ball (SBOT, ad loc. and 114) proposes to read Gen. 49 5: Simeon and Levi are ōḥīm (for aḥīm: 'brothers'[3]), in the sense of 'howling creatures,' perhaps 'hyænas.' Unfortunately, ōḥīm occurs only in Is. 13 21 and its meaning is not known (Che. SBOT, 'jackals'; but Duhm, Marti, probably 'wild owls'; cp Staerk, Studien, 2 18 [1899]). Smith supports his explanation by citing the Arabic tribal names Simʿ, 'a subdivision of the defenders (the Medînites),'[4] and Samʿān, 'a subdivision of Tamîm,' and compares such names as Ẓabyān (ẓaby, gazelle), Waʿlān (waʿl, ibex), Labwān (labwa, lioness), with which he classes such Hebrew names as Zibeon (צבעון, hyæna), Ephron (עפרון, עפר, ġifr, calf of wild cow).

If Simeon is really mentioned by Esarhaddon's scribe as Sa-me-n[a] (§ 6 iii.), it would seem that the name was at that time, at least, sometimes pronounced Samʿān. On the other hand, there was, as we have seen, a place-name pronounced Šamḫuna in the fourteenth century B.C. (above, § 6 ii.), and there is a contract tablet dated in the thirty-sixth year of Artaxerxes I. which mentions a man named Ša-ma-aḫ-ú-na (Hilprecht, no. 45, l. 2), brother of Ia-ḫu-ú-na-ta-nu (= Jehonathan).[5] Later, as a personal name, Simeon became common (see SIMEON ii., 1-6, and SIMON, 1-13; SIMON PETER, § 1 a, b; cp, for Palmyrene inscriptions, Lidzbarski, Ephemeris, vol. i., index (under שמעון).

ii. The name appears in regular gentilic form as Šimʿōnī, SIMEONITE (שִׁמְעֹנִי: cp Reuben, Reubēnī).

𝔊, however, everywhere represents the gentilic by the noun form (συμεων: in Nu. 25 14 הַשִּׁמְעֹנִי becomes in 𝔊B των σ. [AFL om. των]). It is possible, therefore, that the συμεων of 𝔊BNAQΓ in Zech. 12 13 implies that Shimei, שִׁמְעִי was known as an alternative form of the gentilic[6] (cp WRS, JPhil. 9 96 [1880]), just as in Arabic there is the similar pair ending in -ī and -ānī respectively (WRS, 80).

[4] He does not allude to Dozy's daring hypothesis referred to above (§ 5).

[5] The gentilic (amelu) Ša-ma-u-nu-ai occurs along with (amelu) Pu-ḳu-du-ai in a letter to 'the king' (K. 1248). What '(city) Sa-am-'-u-na (so, according to the text in Del. Lesestücke,(4) not [as in KB 2 106] Sa-am-u-na), son of Marduk-apil-iddina' in Sennacherib's Taylor Prism inscription (5 33 f.) can mean it would be hard to say. Śa(?)-ma-'-gu-nu was the name of one of the sons of Bel-iḳaša (ruler of the half-Aramæan tribe of the Gambulai) executed by Ašur-bāni-pal. Samuna in Sa-mu-na-aplu-iddina (Johns, Doomsday Bk. viii. 1 6 = K. 8179) and in Sa-mu-nu-ia-tu-ni (Ass. Deeds and Doc. 160 R. 11 = K. 279) is doubtless Eshmun (Doomsday Bk. 16).

[6] The Shemaiah also of 1 Ch. 4 37 appears in 𝔊B as συμεων.

iii. Names containing the three radicals שמע are so common, especially in the neighbourhood of S. Palestine, that they would be enough in themselves to suggest the theory of dispersion underlying Gen. 49. In that theory there may be more than popular fancy. We cannot here profitably discuss W. R. Smith's view that 'the dispersion of the tribe Simeon is most easily understood on the principles of exogamy and female kinship' (JPhil. 9 96 [1880]). A historical connection of some kind, however, between at least some of the various cognate names seems extremely probable.

We find Shimei as Simeonite (1 Ch. 4 27), Levite (Ex. 6 17), Reubenite (1 Ch. 5 4)—all Leah tribes—Benjamite[1] (2 S. 16 11 etc.; cp 1 K. 4 18), and in the family of David (2 S. 21 21 Kt.) as the name of the only brother mentioned in old sources (Bu. on 1 S. 16 9 in KHC); besides which we find cognate names like Eshtemoa, and Ishmael,[2] pronounced now in Egypt, Ismaʿīn[3] (cp Bethel, Bētīn; Reubel, Reuben).[4]

Not only are the names Simeon and Ishmael cognate. There seem to be also in the genealogy of Ishmael points of contact with that of Simeon (see MIBSAM, MISHMA), to which we now pass.

9. Genealogical lists. i. As in the case of Reuben, P's genealogy of Simeon occurs in Ex. 6 15 as well as in the usual passages. The list is as follows:—

‡צחר	‡זרח	‡זרח
*ושאול	*שאול	*שאול

The Gen. = Ex. list seems to contain three names each appearing twice: ימואל = שאול, יכין = ימין, and צחר = אהד. Nu., changing one sibilant, gives זרח for צחר, and drops its double (אהד). 1 Ch. 4 further shows יריב for יכין.

Winckler thinks that we have here a case the converse of what is suggested elsewhere with regard to ISSACHAR (§ 7): the Chronicler's list is, he thinks (GI 2 201, n. 1), the corruption of a sentence telling that the b'nē Shimʿōn went southwards when Saul contested with the Zarhites.[5] On this suggestion see above (§ 4, end).

If the list be taken for a real 'genealogy' it is difficult to choose between the variants (see the special articles).

Bertheau decides in favour of Jakin as against Jarib, but only for the (weak) reason that it occurs thrice. He thinks that the best known Simeonite clan was Shaul (Shaul's mother is known as a Canaanite and he alone has [three] sons, of whom Mišmaʿ in turn has three). It would seem that some popular story was current about this Shaul and his Canaanite mother. According to Jubilees 34 20 her name was Adibaa, and according to 44 13 she was a woman of Zephath, which, according to Judg. 1 17, was the city captured by Simeon and called Hormah. In Gen. Rab. 80 she is said to have been Dinah (cp Charles, Jubilees, 206).

ii. In the Chronicler's special genealogy (i. 4 25 f.), which appears in MT thus—

Shaul
- Shallum[6]
- Mibsam
- Mishma
  - Hammuel
  - Zaccur
  - Shimei

[1] Note also Jamin and Saul as Simeonite names (1 Ch. 4 24).

[2] Cp Graf, Der Stamm Simeon, 23, Ewald, GGA, 1864, p. 1274, and above, §§ 5 ii. 7.

[3] Indeed the note on the name in Gen. 16 11 (J) is שמע יהוה אל עניך, with עני as in the case of REUBEN (§ 7 i.).

[4] How cautious it is necessary to be in reasoning from similarity of names appears from the remarkable fact that Saul as well as Shimei is a Simeonite name, and that Samuel, who 'discovered' Saul, is brought into relation with Beersheba, the most famous of the towns claimed for Simeon. Shemuel b. Ammihud is the name of the Simeonite representative in the partition of W. Palestine (Nu. 34 20).

[5] ובני שמעון נוו אל ימין אחר יריב זרח שאול. This might be made more plausible perhaps by reading נסו, instead of the strange נוו, for נמו of נמואל; but the clause אחר יריב זרח שאול is not convincing.

[6] Cp P's Simeonite census prince Shelumiel b. Zurishaddai (Nu. 1 6 2 12 7 36 10 19), from whom Judith is said to be descended (Judith 8 1). Salu (סלוא, but 𝔊B σαλμων, 𝔊FL σαλωμ) was the father of the Simeonite Zimri who was slain with the Midianite woman, Nu. 25 14 (see § 10, a, end). The other names assigned to Simeon are Shaphat b. Ḥori, the 'spy' (Nu. 13 5), and Shephatiah b. Maacah, the ruler (1 Ch. 27 16).

the names, apart from the Ishmaelite Mibsam and Mishma' and the Judahite Ham(m)uel, need not be old (cp Gray, HPN 236): indeed 𝔊B omits Hammuel and Zaccur, and Shimei might be a duplicate of Mishma'. Moreover, they all appear in 𝔊BA as descendants in progressive generations of Shaul.

iii. Still more suspicious looking is the peculiar list in vv. 34-37. (On the number, thirteen,[1] of the names, some of which are supplied with genealogies, see below, § 10, i.).

It may be noted, however, in connection with Simeon's being a brother of Levi, that the names brought into prominence in the list—Shaul, Shimei, Ziza[2] (traced back five generations[3])—are known otherwise as Levitical names (cp GENEALOGIES i., § 7[v.]).

10. Geographical lists.

a. The theory of the statistical writers evidently was that Simeon was gradually merged in Judah: the Simeonites first settled amongst the Judahites (Josh. 19 1 9) and then, in the time of David (1 Ch. 4 31*b*—it is a marginal gloss to the whole list: see above, § 5 ii.), were lost in Judah. It would appear that there was a time when the Judah list in Josh. 15 21-32 lacked exactly those cities which in Josh. 19 are assigned to Simeon, for when they are omitted the total, twenty-nine (instead of thirty-six), is correct. The fact remains, however, that all the Simeonite cities are somewhere or other assigned to Judah. It has been noted that whereas we hear of the Negeb of Judah (1 S. 27 10), of Caleb (30 14), of the Kenite (27 10), of the Kᵉrēthi (30 14), of Jerahmeel (27 10), we nowhere hear of the Negeb of Simeon (Graf, Stamm Sim., 14). Whilst naturally no attempt is made to sketch a boundary line, it is clear that Simeon was supposed by the writer of Josh. 19 1-9 to be found in the SW. of Judah.

The slighting of Simeon[4] in the partition of W. Palestine has been connected (Weinstein, Gen. der Agada, 2 99) with the story of Zimri in Nu. 25 14; so also (Gen. rab. 99; Num. rab. 26; Rashi, and others) the fact that Simeon is the only tribe that falls in the second census (Nu. 26 14) enormously (from 59,300 to 22,200) below its size in the first (Nu. 1 22 f.).[5] It is difficult, however, to extract any more history out of the first story than out of the second.

b. The list of Simeonite cities appears in four forms, which are here shown side by side.

The names have been given in the forms under which they are discussed in the separate articles, where account

[1] In the Chronicler's expanded version of the Hexateuch list (1 Ch. 4 24-26) it is necessary to include Simeon himself to make up the full thirteen.

[2] In the form Zizah; see ZINA.

[3] Ending in 𝔊B with Simeon himself (σνμεων for Shemaiah).

is taken of the variants in 𝔊. It will suffice here to note that in list (1) 𝔊B inserts θαλχα after Rimmon; in list (3) 𝔊BA omits Heshmon and 𝔊A identifies ASHAN (v. 42) with ASHNAH (v. 43). In list (4) 𝔊L follows MT; but 𝔊BNA omits all except Jeshua and Beersheba.

i. The main list (i.) appears to consist of thirteen towns agreeing with the thirteen (1 Ch. 4 34-37) names (some with genealogies attached) of their inhabitants who afterwards migrated to Gerar (1 Ch. 4 39).

ii. The main list of towns is followed by a supplementary list (ii.) of four (Ain Rimmon being a single place, and Tochen preserved only in 1 Ch. 4 32), agreeing with the four 'captains' who migrated to Mt. Seir.

iii. Of the list of nine Judahite or Simeonite towns assigned to the priests (1 Ch. 6 57-59 [42-44] = Josh. 21 13-16) only ASHAN (q.v.; in Joshua miswritten AIN) is ever called Simeonite. H. W. H.

SIMEON (שִׁמְעוֹן; CYMЄωN [BAL]; see SIMEON i., § 8, i., end). 1. EV accurately SHIMEON, in the list of those with foreign wives (EZRA i., § 5, end), Ezra 10 31 (𝔊BNA Σεμεων).

2. Grandfather of MATTATHIAS (1 Macc. 2 1); see MACCABEES i., § 2.

3. A devout man of Jerusalem, mentioned in Lk.'s Gospel of the Infancy (Lk. 2 22-39). He was gifted with the 'holy spirit'—i.e., the spirit of prophecy—and had learned by revelation that he should not die without having seen the Messiah. Having been supernaturally guided to the temple courts, he saw the child Jesus brought in by his parents, according to custom, on the completion of the period of the mother's purification. He then burst into an inspired song (vv. 29-32), known to us as the Nunc Dimittis (cp HYMNS, § 3). He could now depart, like a relieved sentinel, and could transmit to others the happy tidings of the dawn of the Messianic day (see GOSPELS, § 39). For Mary he added a special word of prophecy, pointing to the different results of the preaching of the Cross of Jesus, which would lead some to a new life, and others to anguish at his crucifixion (vv. 34 f.). See further, J. Lightfoot on Lk. 2 25.

It is possible to regard Simeon as a poetic personification of that inner circle of Jewish believers which formed the true SERVANT OF THE LORD (q.v.). Long had it waited for the fulfilment of the prophecies of salvation, and now (i.e., when this 'Gospel of the Infancy' was written) its members were passing one by one into the company of believers in Jesus. Nor need we be startled to find an imperfect parallel to the story of Simeon in one of the legends which cluster round the birth of the Buddha (see Carpenter, The Synoptic Gospels(1), 155).

4. RV, SYMEON (Lk. 3 30). See GENEALOGIES OF JESUS, § 3.

5. RV, SYMEON, 'that was called Niger' (CYMЄωN ὁ καλούμενος Νίγερ [Ti. WH]), is mentioned along with Barnabas, Lucius, Manaen, and Saul, among the prophets and teachers in the primitive church at Antioch (Acts 13 1†). See MINISTRY, § 37. Niger was probably his Gentile name, whether chosen with any reference to his complexion we cannot tell; the name was not uncommon (see Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biogr. and Mythol.).

The list of the first preachers of the Gospel given by Epiphanius (Epiph. Opera, 1 337, ed. Dindorf) closes with the names Βαρνάβαν, καὶ Ἀπελλῆν, Ῥοῦφον, Νίγερα καὶ τοὺς λοιποὺς τῶν ἑβδομήκοντα δύο.

6. RV, SYMEON (Acts 15 14). See SIMON PETER, § 1.

SIMON (CIMωN; = 'snub-nosed'? a Greek name [see SIMON PETER, § 1 a] of frequent occurrence among post-exilic Jews [סִימוֹן]; cp JASON; see SIMON PETER, § 1 b.

The persons who bear the name in 𝔊 or NT are:—

1. Simon Chosameus (CIMωN ΧΟCΑΜΑΟC [B] . . . ΧΟCΟΜΑΙΟC [A]), 1 Esd. 9 32 = Ezra 10 31, SHIMEON [b. Harim].

2. Son of Mattathias surnamed THASSI (1 Macc. 2 3; θασσις [A], θασσ[ε]ι [ℵV]; thasi [V]; ܬܐܣܝ [Syr.]; Jos. Ant. xii. 6 1, θατις). See MACCABEES, §§ 1, 5.

3. Son of Onias, 'the great priest,' whose praise is set forth in Ecclus. 50. It is doubtful whether Simon I. ('the Just') or Simon II. is alluded to; cp ECCLESIASTICUS, § 7; CANON, § 36; ONIAS, §§ 4-7.

4. A Benjamite, who, wishing to avenge himself upon Onias, informed Apollonius of the existence of huge sums of money in the temple treasury (2 Macc. 3-4). The account of the attempt of HELIODORUS [q.v.] to seize the treasure is well known. See APOLLONIUS, MENELAUS, ONIAS, § 6. He is called the προστάτης τοῦ ἱεροῦ (3 4) or temple overseer, and it was perhaps his duty to look after the daily supplies of the temple. Cp TEMPLE, § 36.

5. Named in Mt. 13 55 Mk. 6 3, together with James, Joses, or Joseph, and Judas, as one of the 'brethren' of Jesus. He is not mentioned elsewhere in the NT; but it is not impossible that he is identical with the Simeon, son of Clopas the brother of Joseph, mentioned by Hegesippus as 'cousin german' (ἀνεψιός) of Jesus, who succeeded James in the bishopric of Jerusalem and suffered martyrdom in the reign of Trajan. See CLOPAS.

6. Surnamed the CANANÆAN, AV CANAANITE (ὁ Καναναῖος: Mt. 10 4 Mk. 3 18), or the ZEALOT (ὁ Ζηλωτής, Lk. 6 15 Acts 1 13); named as an apostle in all the four canonical lists (APOSTLE, § 1). There is no doubt about the superiority of the reading καναναῖος to that of TR, κανανίτης, though the latter has the support of ℵ; but although the writer of the Third Gospel and Acts took it as representing, and has translated it, 'Zealot' (see ZEALOTS), many modern critics (cp JUDAS, 9, § 2) are inclined to take the word as a Greek modification of קְנָאָן or קַנָּאִי, meaning, 'a man of Canan, or Cana' (there were several Canas). Simon does not reappear in the NT history. In ecclesiastical tradition he is usually mentioned in conjunction with Judas of James; and indeed in some western authorities in Mt. 10 4 the epithet Zelotes is given to Judas not to Simon, Judas Zelotes taking the place of Thaddæus. 'The addition of Zelotes is probably due to a punctuation of Lk.'s text which might not seem unnatural if no connection of sense were recognised between καναναῖος and ζηλωτής' (WH). Simon the Zealot is frequently identified with the Simon (Simeon) of Clopas mentioned by Hegesippus (ap. Eus. HE 3 32) as a descendant of David who was alive in Jerusalem in the days of Trajan and suffered martyrdom under the consular Atticus; but this identification is not made by Hegesippus or Eusebius themselves, and appears to be first met with in the Chronicon Paschale, Pseudo-Hippolytus, and Pseudo-Dorotheus, all of which call him Simon Judas.

Later ecclesiastical tradition varies as to the field of Simon's apostolic labours. One set of legends places his activity in Babylon or on the shores of the Black Sea. But, as Lipsius points out (Apokr.-Ap.-gesch. 3 142 ff.), these representations have probably arisen from a confusion with Simon Peter who writes from 'Babylon' and addresses the Christians in 'Pontus.' Another set of legends, especially met with in late Greek writers, represents him as preaching in Egypt, Libya, Mauretania, and Britain; but the same districts are also assigned by some traditions to Simon Peter. In the Western church the festival of Saints Simon and Judas is observed on Oct. 28. The Breviary lesson for the day has it that 'Simon Chananæus qui et Zelotes, et Thaddæus qui et Judas Jacobi appellatur in Evangelio, unius ex catholicis Epistolis scriptor' evangelised Egypt (Simon) and Mesopotamia (Jude) respectively, and afterwards went together into Persia and ended a successful ministry there in a glorious martyrdom.

7. Of CYRENE [q.v.] (Σίμων κυρηναῖος [Ti. WH]), perhaps a Hellenistic Jew, who came from the country and was compelled to carry the cross for the crucifixion (Mt. 27 32 Mk. 15 21 Lk. 23 26). Afterwards he was reckoned among the seventy 'others' (apostles), Lk. 10 1, and he was said to have died on the cross ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ—i.e., for the sake of Christ. The Basilidian and perhaps also other Gnostics believed that he died in place of Jesus; cp R. A. Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelgesch. 1 195 f. 204 3 427. According to Mk. he was the father of ALEXANDER and RUFUS [qq.v.]. W. H. Ryder (JBL 17 196 f., 1898) thinks that Simon's eldest son was Alexander, his second Rufus, his third Tertius, and his fourth Quartus—all Christians living in or near Rome when Mark wrote. Living among Gentiles, Simon gave his sons Greek and Latin names. This Rufus has been conjectured by many to be the same as the Rufus of Rom. 16 13. E. P. Gould, St. Mark, 289 f. (1896), remarks 'It is the height of foolish conjecture to identify this Rufus, the son of Simon of Cyrene, with the one in Rom. 16 13: St. Mark will only indicate that the names Alexander and Rufus were known to the early church.' Deep indeed is our ignorance on such points.

W. C. v. M. (No. 7.)

8. 'The leper' of Bethany, in whose house the woman anointed Jesus with the contents of the alabaster cruse (Mt. 26 6 Mk. 14 3; cp MARY, § 25). An incredible apocryphal story makes him the husband of Mary the sister of Martha; cp LAZARUS. [The designation 'leper' has greatly exercised the critics. It is worth recalling, however, that the mother of JEROBOAM [q.v. 1] is called in MT צרועה, 'a leper' (1 K. 11 26), and that Naaman in the extant recast of an older story (2 K. 5 1) is represented as מְצֹרָע, 'a leper.' In both cases the original tradition stated that a Miṣrite was referred to. It is possible that the Simon referred to was said to have come (like 'that Egyptian' in Acts 21 38) from Egypt to Jerusalem, and that the original narrative (in Hebrew) called him הַמִּצְרִי. Cp also 'Simon of Cyrene.' Chajes (Markus-studien [1899], p. 75) supposes an original Hebrew reading הַצָּנוּעַ, 'the humble'—i.e., 'pious' (as often in Talmud). 'One who had been a leper' is at any rate a miserable explanation.—T. K. C.]

9. The Pharisee, in whose house the penitent woman anointed Jesus' hands and feet (Lk. 7 40). Cp GOSPELS, § 10, and MARY, § 25, col. 2970. Against the identification of this anointing with that of Mary of Bethany, just before the Passion, see Plummer (209). The theory is at any rate ancient, for, as Plummer remarks, Origen on Mt. 26 6 contends against it. It is also supported by Keim (Jesu von Nazara, 3 222), Holtzmann (HC(2), 273, (3) 346), and Scholten (Het Paulinisch Evangelie, 254). The last-named scholar is of opinion that 'the influence of Paulinism on the changed representation of Luke is unmistakeable,' and that 'leper' in Mt. and Mk. was a symbolic phrase for Pharisee. Without committing ourselves to this, we may reasonably hold that here, as often in collections of traditions, a germ-idea received conflicting developments.

10. A tanner of Joppa with whom Peter lodged (Acts 9 43). The reference to his trade is significant; the narrator suggests that Peter was losing his old prejudices. It is said that a wife could claim a divorce from a husband who became a tanner (Mishna, Kĕthūbōth 7 10). Cp HANDICRAFT, § 5; JOPPA (end).

11. The father of Judas Iscariot, Jn. 6 71 13 2 26.

12. For Simon Magus, see below (special article). On the 'Great Apophasis' see GOSPELS, § 91 (and references).

13. For Simon Peter, see below (special article).

Simon Magus is mentioned in the NT only in Acts 8 9-24.

1. In Acts. (a) In Acts 8 5-8 we read that Philip the Evangelist preached the Christ in the city of Samaria, and wrought many miracles of healing. Next (vv. 9-13), we are told that Simon had previously to this bewitched the people by his magical arts, giving out that he was some great one, and being declared by them to be that power of God which is called Great. After that men and women had received baptism at the hands of Philip, Simon also did so, and continued with Philip, full of amazement at his miracles. Meanwhile (vv. 14-17), at the instance of the apostles in Jerusalem, Peter and John had come to Samaria, and through laying on of hands had obtained the Holy Ghost for those who had been baptised. Upon this, Simon (vv. 18-24) offered them money and desired the same power, but after a severe rebuke from Peter, finally besought the two apostles to pray for him, that the punishment they had threatened might be averted.

(b) This narrative contains much that is strange. That, instead of the city of Samaria (as in vv. 5 8 f.) the country of Samaria should be named in v. 14, may be set down to a pardonable want of exactness. The designation of Simon as 'that power of God which is called Great' and his designation of himself as 'some great one'[1] are not intrinsically incompatible with his sorcery; but it is very surprising that the sorcery is referred to twice (vv. 9 11) and that its second mention is preceded by the same word (προσεῖχον, 'gave heed') as had already been employed in v. 10.

This appears to indicate that the two explanations of his popularity come from two different sources. By the reference to his sorcery, he would, in that case, be characterised as a mere γόης of the sort that was very abundant in those days; 'that power of God which is called Great' would signify something much more exalted. Now, it is not easy to imagine that an editor would have introduced v. 11 if he had already found vv. 9 f. lying before him in his text. It is more probable that v. 10 was interpolated, and that in the process 'took heed' (προσεῖχον) was borrowed from v. 11. The close of v. 9 (Simon's giving out that he was some great one) can in that case have belonged to the original text, for it is far from conveying necessarily anything nearly so high as 'the power of God which is called Great'; but it is hard to believe that 'bewitching, and bringing the nation of Samaria into a maze' (μαγεύων καὶ ἐξιστάνων τὸ ἔθνος τῆς Σαμαρείας) also should come from the author of v. 11. Perhaps the original text had vv. 9 10*a* (down to 'great,' μεγάλου); the redactor beginning with 'saying,' λέγοντες (v. 10*b*), added the designation of Simon as the power of God that is called Great, and then thought it necessary to return in v. 11 to the idea of sorcery (from which attention had meanwhile been called away), and in doing so borrowed 'took heed' (προσεῖχον) from v. 10*a* and ἐξεστακέναι from v. 9 (ἐξιστάνων). This renewed mention of Simon's sorcery, however, was not indispensable; v. 12 could quite as well have followed directly on v. 10. It would have been equally superfluous if it had been inserted by the redactor in v. 9 (μαγεύων to Σαμαρείας), had v. 11 belonged to the original text (in which case the whole of v. 10, on account of the προσεῖχον, would have to be attributed to the redactor). If there is reluctance to assign to any redactor the doubled mention of the sorcery, there remains only the alternative that a copyist who acted as independently and arbitrarily as the copyist of D (or a preliminary stage of D; see ACTS, § 17 i) substituted at his own instance the other reference to the magical practices for that which he found before him; that then, upon comparison of this transcription with an unaltered copy, the new form of the idea was written upon the margin, and then was taken by the next copyist for an integral portion of the text left out by his predecessor by an oversight, and was accordingly introduced into it at what seemed to be an appropriate place.

(c) The idea that only apostles (by laying on of hands) can procure the gift of the Holy Ghost is quite unhistorical (see MINISTRY, § 34 c). From this, it would not at once follow, however, that it is a later insertion; for the whole passage may be equally unhistorical.

At the same time it is, in fact, apparent, that vv. 14-18*a* introduce a representation which in the actual connection is surprising. According to v. 13, Simon has been only astonished at Philip's miracles: as for the bestowal of the Holy Ghost, he wishes to be able to do the same. In a sorcerer would it not have been more natural to desire to possess the miraculous power of Philip (cp SIMON PETER, § 33 d)? Among the scholars, therefore, who separate sources in Acts (see ACTS, § 11), we find Van Manen, Feine, Clemen, Jüngst supposing that in the source Simon did seek to purchase Philip's miraculous power with money. On this supposition it is simplest to regard the last word of v. 13 (ἐξίστατο, 'he was amazed') and vv. 14-18*a* (down to πνεῦμα) as interpolated. In this case, in the immediately following context, we must regard, at least, v. 19, the 'them' (αὐτοῖς) instead of 'him' (αὐτῷ) in v. 18, 'Peter' in v. 20 and the plurals δεήθητε and εἰρήκατε in v. 24 as adjustments caused by the interpolation.

(d) However plausible this separation may seem to be, it by no means completely solves the riddle of our passage. The problem still remains quite dark, how it was that the editor could ever have come to interpolate, at one and the same time, into a source which consistently represented Simon as a sorcerer (v. 9 or 11), and as wishing to possess still greater magical powers, two such foreign elements as the designation of Simon as the power of God that is called Great and the communication of the Holy Ghost through the apostles (vv. 10 14-17). The two have not the slightest connection with each other. It might perhaps be suggested that the designation had been borrowed by the editor from a second source, and that the reference to the Holy Ghost was his own contribution; but this would not furnish us with any intelligible motive for his proceeding. Yet it seems highly necessary that we should discover such a motive; for a second surprising point which is not cleared up by separation of sources, and hardly can be, is the question how it could come to pass that a man to whom the whole people of Samaria gave heed, and showed high honour, should have been so easily converted to Christianity, and that as a sorcerer, he should so little resemble the Bar-jesus of 13 6-12 who quite naturally opposed the Christian missionaries so strenuously. Moreover, it is surprising that the story has no close; we are not told what in the end became of Simon. Here, once more, can it be seen how useless it is to carry out separation of sources merely on the ground of indications of broken connections, while not concerning oneself at all about the deeper questions relating to the composition of a piece, and about 'tendency' criticism. The solution of the problem can be led up to only by widely extended investigations.

Simon, to begin with, plays a great part in the writings of the Fathers.

2. In the Church-Fathers.

(a) Justin (about 152 A.D.) cites him as an instance to prove that, even after the ascension of Jesus, the demons caused men to come forward who gave themselves out to be deities, and were actually worshipped as such. Such was a certain Samaritan named Simon, of the village of Gitta,[1] who performed feats of magic by demonic arts in Rome during the reign of Claudius, was held to be a god, and was honoured by Senate and people with a statue in the middle of the Tiber, between the two bridges, bearing the inscription in Latin: 'Simoni deo sancto,' and almost all the Samaritans, as well as a few people elsewhere, worshipped him as 'the first god' (τὸν πρῶτον θεόν), 'the god above all rule and authority and power' (θεὸν ὑπεράνω πάσης ἀρχῆς καὶ ἐξουσίας καὶ δυνάμεως), and declared a certain Helena, who had formerly lived in a house of evil fame, and afterwards travelled about with him, to be the first

1 Perhaps originally it ran merely as in 5 36 εἶναί τινα ἑαυτόν—'that he was somebody'—and 'great' (μέγαν) may have been merely an explanatory gloss to 'somebody' (τινα); cp the neuter εἶναί τι, 'to be somewhat,' Gal. 2 6 6 3.

1 Ἀπὸ κώμης λεγομένης Γίττων. Thus Gitton would be a possible form of the name. Γίττων, however, is certainly gen. pl., since Gitta is met with elsewhere also as the name of a town: in Josephus (Γίττα or Γέττα, gen. Γίττης or Γίττων; see, e.g., Ant. vi. 13 10, §§ 319-321) for the Philistian Gath, in Pliny (HN v. 19 [17] 75) for a place on Carmel (Getta), and in the Philosophumena (6 7) we have ὁ Γιττηνός (not Γιττωνός). For further details see Lipsius, Petrussage, 33, n. In all the editions of Justin known to the present writer, indeed, the word is accentuated Γιττῶν, and so also in Eus. HE ii. 13 3 and Epiphanius, Hær. 21 1. In that case the nominative would be Γίτται; this, however, in view of the gen. Γίττης is quite unlikely. If both genitive forms are to be explicable, the nominatives must coincide. Cp Γομόρρας (2 Pet. 2 6) alongside of Γομόρρων (Mt. 10 15), Λύστραν (Acts 14 6 21 16 1) alongside of Λύστροις (14 8 16 2 2 Tim. 3 11), Θυάτειραν (Rev. 1 11: so in Lachmann, and as an alternative reading in WH) alongside of Θυατείροις (2 18 24), and Θυατείρων (Acts 16 14), Λύδδας (Acts 9 38) alongside of the accus. Λύδδα (9 32 35). Similar variations are found in 1 Macc. in the cases of Αδιδα, Βαιθσουρα, Γαζαρα. The word form 'ex vico Gethonum' (Clem. Recogn. 2 7) rests upon a misunderstanding.

thought that had proceeded from him (πρώτη ἔννοια: see Apol. 1 26 56 2 15, Dial. 120).

(b) The base of the pillar referred to was dug up on the island in the Tiber, at the place indicated by Justin, in 1574; the inscription runs: 'Semoni Sanco deo fidio sacrum. Sex. Pompeius . . . donum dedit.' Thus, the pillar was dedicated to the Sabine god Semo Sancus (cp Ovid Fast. 6 213-218), and not by Senate and people, but by the piety of a private individual.

As Justin has gone so far astray here, Lipsius (BL 5 318; Apokr. Ap.-gesch. ii. 1 34 f.) ventures to trace back also the alleged worship of Simon and Helena by 'almost all the Samaritans' to misunderstanding of certain sacred pillars or maṣṣēbahs (see MASSEBAH), to wit those of Hercules-Melkart, the 'king of the city' of Tyre and the Tyrian moon-goddess Selene-Astarte, whose impure worship is alluded to in the reference to the house of evil fame (according to Iren. Hær. i. 16 [23] 2 and according to the quotation of Justin, Apol. i. 26 3 in Eus. HE ii. 13 4, it was in Tyre). In the pseudo-Clementine Recognitions Helena is actually called Luna, that is to say, Selene (Σελήνη), and according to the Homilies (2 23) she was among the companions of John the Baptist (of whom Simon was the first) the only woman—thus only 'half man' (ἥμισυ ἀνδρός), to indicate that these 30 companions really represent the number of days in a lunar month, which are not 30 complete days but only 29½.

(c) What we read about the 'first god' (πρῶτος θεός) and his 'first thought' (πρώτη ἔννοια) is taken from the Gnostic system which is attributed to Simon. We may suppose Justin to have given full information as to this in the work cited by himself in Apol. i. 26 8, but now lost, entitled σύνταγμα κατὰ πασῶν αἱρέσεων, which was used by later heresiologists from Irenæus (Hær. 1 16 [23]) and the author of the Philosophumena (6 7-20) downwards. Harnack (Lehrb. d. DG(2) 1 206-208) finds in Simon a new 'universal religion of the supreme God,' Lipsius nothing more than the ordinary Gnosis which had become widely diffused in Syria from about the time of Trajan, and is known to us mainly through the Ophites, with this difference alone that here Simon takes the place of Jesus as the Redeemer. According to Kreyenbühl (Evang. d. Wahrheit, 1, 1900, pp. 174-264) Simon was not a founder of a religion, but the first genuine philosopher of religion, to whom belongs the undying merit of having been the first to formulate and scientifically to elaborate the fundamental principle of all Christian philosophy, namely, an 'anthropological pantheism' or an 'absolute and universal theanthropologism' (240).

In the 'Great Announcement' (ἀπόφασις μεγάλη), attributed to Simon, which is first mentioned in the Philosophumena and copiously extracted from, Kreyenbühl discerns, not, like all other critics, the work of a later Simonian, but a genuine production of Simon himself. For our present purpose it is not necessary to discuss this question or to set forth the Simonian system, for which the reader may consult Lipsius (BL 5 316 f.) and Hilgenfeld (Ketzergesch., 1884, pp. 163-186).

(d) Suffice it to observe here that all the church fathers from Irenæus onwards make Simon the prime author of all heresies, and inform us that he was regarded not merely as a leader of a sect, but also as a manifestation of the supreme Deity, as Messiah, also by the name of 'the Standing One' (ὁ ἑστώς), or, more precisely, according to the 'Great Announcement' (Philos. 6 9 13) as ὁ ἑστώς, στάς, στησόμενος—i.e., the permanently Abiding. Cp further, § 11 e, f.

(a) This interpretation of the expression 'the Standing One' is confirmed also by the pseudo-Clementine Homilies (2 22: ὡς δὴ στησόμενος ἀεί 'as intimating that he shall always stand') and Recognitions (2 7: 'negat posse se aliquando dissolvi, asserens carnem suam ita divinitatis suæ virtute compactam ut possit in æternum durare'). According to Recogn. 1 72, Simon further designated himself as 'virtutem summam excelsi Dei qui sit supra conditorem mundi.' Cp § 14 d.

3. Pseudo-Clem. Homm. and Recogg.: (a) on the Gnostic Simon.

(b) We thus find in Simon's case also application of the Gnostic distinction between the supreme Deity and his subordinate, the creator of the world or demiurge. The supreme Deity is incomprehensible and unknown to all (Recogn. 2 37 f.).

He sent forth the creative Deity to make the world; having done so, the latter declared himself to be God, and demanded observance of the Mosaic law. To Simon, also, is attributed the doctrine that the souls of men proceed from the supreme God (who at the same time is called The Good), but that they have been let down into captivity within the world. The body is their prison (2 57 f.). This enables us to understand what is meant when we are told that Simon denied the resurrection of the dead (Hom. 2 22). It can be explained from 2 Tim. 2 18, according to which the false teachers, who are simply Gnostics, declared that the resurrection was past already. By the resurrection they understood the soul's arrival at knowledge of its heavenly origin, and its superiority to the body which is its prison. Therefore, in their view, for all Gnostics the resurrection has already come about, and they consistently denied any future resurrection of the body.

(c) These data may be sufficient to show that it is a form of Gnosticism that the pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions are combating in the person of Simon. If they contained nothing more they would accordingly be seen to have arisen, at the earliest, sometime in the second century.

Other indications which do not need to be discussed here lead us to the beginning of the third century (so Lipsius, ii. 1 37, n. 2; Harnack, Lehrb. d. DG(2), 1 266: beginning or middle of third century, according to TLZ, 1902, p. 570, even as late as the 4th cent., before Eus. [HE iii. 38 5]—this after Chapman [below, § 15] had disputed their employment by Origen), and to infer a Catholic redaction of both writings (so Harnack, l.c.), or at least of the Recognitions (so Lipsius, l.c.). The story as to the members of Clement's family who became separated as non-Christians, and after their conversion find one another and recognise (whence the name 'Recognitiones,' ἀναγνωρισμοί) one another, both in a bodily and in a higher sense, has a purely edificatory purpose. Apart from the final redaction (see above) the proper standpoint of the authors—a Gnostical Jewish Christianity—does not point back to the oldest times, and can hardly have exercised much influence. Thus, from what has been said up to this point, it might well appear that these writings 'contribute nothing towards a knowledge of the origin of the Catholic church and doctrine.' This is, in fact, the opinion of Harnack (Lehrb. d. Dogm.-Gesch.(2), 1 268), and in his view, indeed, 'it may be regarded as certain.'

The pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions, however, contain yet another element of the very greatest importance. In them Simon displays features which are unquestionably derived from Paul, and plainly show him to be a caricature of that apostle drawn by an unfriendly hand. (a) The principal passage is Hom. 17 19.

4. (b) On Simon = Paul.

Here Peter says to Simon: 'If, then, our Jesus, manifesting himself in a vision, made himself known to thee also, and conversed with thee, in doing so it was as one who is wroth with an adversary, and therefore speaks by visions and dreams [Nu. 12 6-8], or, it may be, even by revelations which [yet] were external. But can any one be qualified for the teaching office through a vision? And if thou wilt say, 'It is possible,' then (I ask) 'Why did our teacher for a whole year continually converse with those who were awake? And, further, how are we to believe thy word that he even appeared to thee? How can he have appeared to thee, when thy manner of thinking is wholly contrary to his doctrine? But if thou hast for even so much as a single hour been made blessed and instructed for the apostleship by a manifestation of him, then pray declare his doctrine, set forth his words, love his apostles, and strive not against me who companied with him. For indeed thou hast come forward as adversary against me who am a firm rock, the foundation of the church [Mt. 16 18]. If thou wert not an adversary (ἀντικείμενος) thou wouldest not slander me and revile my preaching, in order that I, when I utter that which I have heard from the Lord face to face, may find no credence, plainly as if I were a condemned and reprobate person [read καὶ ἐμοῦ ἀδοκίμου ὄντος; cp 1 Cor. 9 27]. But if thou sayest that I am condemned (εἰ κατεγνωσμένον με λέγεις), in doing so thou inveighest against God who revealed Christ to me, and inveighest against him who on account of this revelation did call me blessed [Mt. 16 17],' and so forth.

What Gnostic ever personally withstood Peter? According to the incontrovertible statement of Hegesippus (ap. Eus. HE iii. 32 7 f.), Gnosticism arose from the times of Trajan after that the sacred choir of the apostles had deceased. For what Gnostic had it ever been possible to be, like Peter, a personal disciple of Jesus during his lifetime upon earth? What Gnostic ever gave himself out to be an apostle? What Gnostic ever claimed to have been qualified for the apostolate by a definite vision which he described? And who ever except Paul (Gal. 2 11) spoke of Peter as 'condemned' (κατεγνωσμένος)? Thus, it was at Antioch that 'Simon' assailed Peter and spoke evil of his preaching, and it was his vision on the way to Damascus (for Paul, according to 1 Cor. 9 1 Gal. 1 1 12, the basis of his claim to the apostolate) that is here intended to be reduced ad absurdum by a dialectic that really has much to say for itself. Already in chaps. 14 and 16 it is urged that such a vision could have been produced by an evil demon, just as well as by Jesus.

(b) Nor is this all. The words of Peter in his Epistle to James prefixed to the Homilies (chap. 2) relate also to the same incident in Antioch: 'Some of the Gentiles have rejected my doctrine which is in accordance with the law [of Moses], while imputing to me a certain lawless and nonsensical doctrine (ἄνομόν τινα καὶ φλυαρώδη διδασκαλίαν) of the hostile man. And indeed while I was in my journeyings some took in hand by manifold interpretations to wrest my words unto the dissolution of the law, as if I myself also were of such a mind but did not openly proclaim it' (cp the charge of hypocrisy, Gal. 2 12 f.). Nay, more, in Hom. 20 19 = Recog. 10 61, it is related that Faustus, father of Clement, to whom Simon has by witchcraft given his own outward semblance, is in Antioch constrained by order of Simon publicly to proclaim his repentance in the following words:—

'I, Simon, declare this to you, confessing that I have unjustly slandered Peter. For he is no false teacher, no murderer, no sorcerer, nor any other of those wicked things which I in my wrath formerly accused him of. I, myself, who have been the author of your hatred against him, beg of you to cease from your hatred of him; for he is a true apostle of the true prophet sent by God for the salvation of the world. . . . And now I will tell you why it is that I have made this confession. Last night angels of God severely scourged me, the godless one, as being an enemy (ἐχθρός) to the herald of the truth. I beseech you, therefore, if ever I again should come forward and venture to speak against Peter, do not listen to me. For I confess to you: I am a magician, I am a false teacher, I am a sorcerer. Perhaps it is possible by repentance to wipe out my past sins.' If the father of Clement did not occur in an older form of the book, we may conjecture that this confession was originally there put directly into the mouth of Simon. What is said about his chastisement is a malicious allusion to the declaration of Paul in 2 Cor. 12 7, as to the cause of his malady, that an angel of Satan (ἄγγελος Σατανᾶ) had been sent to buffet him. It is important to observe that in Recog. we have the sing.: 'an angel,' not the pl. 'angels' as in Hom.

(c) If we have here a well-ascertained case in which an utterance of Paul regarding himself is spitefully twisted to his discredit, soon also we find more of the same kind elsewhere.

In the course of his vindication of himself Paul had, with great reserve, declared that he had once been carried up into the third heaven (2 Cor. 12 1 f.). This is made ridiculous in Rec. 2 65: si putas facilem menti tuæ accessum esse super cœlos et considerare te posse quæ illic sunt atque immensæ illius lucis scientiam capere, puto ei qui illa potest comprehendere facilius esse ut sensum suum qui illuc novit ascendere in alicujus nostrum, qui adsistimus, cor et pectus injiciat et dicat quas in eo cogitationes gerat.[1] The doctrine of Paul that to eat meat offered to idols is not forbidden (see more fully under COUNCIL, § 11, col. 924 f.) is distorted into the story that Simon in the market-place entertained the people of Tyre with the flesh of a sacrificial ox and with much wine, thus bringing them under the power of the evil demons (Hom. 7 3; cp 4 4). This distortion is all the more worthy of attention, because the author, in connection with it, gives admonitions in the very words of Paul 'to abstain from (or not to be partakers of) the table of devils' (τραπέζης δαιμόνων ἀπέχεσθαι, or μὴ μεταλαμβάνειν, 7 48; cp 1 Cor. 10 20 f.). In view of the miracles which Paul himself claims in 2 Cor. 12 12 Rom. 15 19, it is easy to understand that he came to be spoken of as a magician. In the enumeration of the magical powers of which 'Simon' makes his boast in Recog. 2 9, the 'when bound I can loose myself . . . when confined in prison I can make the barriers open of their own accord' ('vinctus memetipsum solvam . . . in carcere colligatus claustra sponte patefieri faciam') specially recalls Paul's liberation from prison at Philippi (Acts 16 23-26). Even if this liberation is unhistorical (ACTS, § 2), it found belief after it had been related, and it can have been related a considerable time before the date at which Acts was written. Once more, let us take another word that is used, not indeed by Paul himself, but with reference to him by a follower. In Acts 9 15 he is called a chosen vessel of the Lord; in Recog. 3 49, Simon is called a vas electionis of the devil.[1]

(d) In this violent polemic it is not surprising to find thrown back at Simon—i.e., Paul—the charges which Paul had himself levelled at his opponents.

In 2 Cor. 11 13 Paul calls the Judaising emissaries at Corinth 'false apostles' (ψευδαπόστολοι); in Hom. 16 21 Peter says that Jesus foretold false apostles (ψευδαπόστολοι), false prophets, the forming of sects and lists for supremacy, all which seem to him to have taken their beginning with Simon the blasphemer of God. In 2 Cor. 11 14 Paul proceeds: 'And no marvel; for even Satan fashioneth himself into an angel of light'; in Recog. 2 18, Simon is called the 'malignus transformans se in splendorem lucis.' According to Hom. 2 33 wickedness (κακία) sent forth its comrade in arms, Simon, like a serpent (ὡς ὄφιν; cp 2 Cor. 11 3), according to Hom. 11 35, as one who preaches under a pretence of truth in the name of the Lord and sows false doctrines (πλάνη), and it was with reference to him that Jesus (Mt. 7 15) foretold the coming of ravening wolves in sheep's clothing. Here, also, may be recalled a saying which does not come from Paul himself, but from the author of Acts. This writer puts into Paul's mouth (20 29) the prophecy that after his departure grievous wolves shall make their appearance in Ephesus, not sparing the flock. It is very probable that reference is intended here to the Jewish-Christian school of thought, which was prevalent in Ephesus under John in the last third of the first century. Paul himself had already in 1 Cor 16 9 spoken of the 'many adversaries' (ἀντικείμενοι πολλοί) in Ephesus. This expression, also, is taken up and turned against himself in the passage already cited under a, above.

(e) More especially we find recurring in the pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions three designations which are already referred to in the epistles of Paul as having been made use of against him.

When in 2 Cor. 6 8 Paul says of himself, 'as deceivers and [yet] true' (ὡς πλάνοι καὶ ἀληθεῖς), the censure implied in the word πλάνος is just as little purely imaginary as is that contained in 6 9: ὡς ἀγνοούμενοι, ὡς παιδευόμενοι ('unknown,' 'chastened'), etc., or that repudiated in 4 5 ('we preach not ourselves'), or that hinted at in 3 1 ('are we beginning again to commend ourselves?'), cp 5 12. All these charges had actually been made, otherwise Paul would not have needed to repel them (§ 9 e). The word most fitted to stick as a term of reproach was 'the deceiver' (ὁ πλάνος), and in point of fact it does reappear in Hom. 2 17, which represents Jesus as having foretold that 'first must come a false gospel by the instrumentality of a certain deceiver' [the gospel of freedom from the law] (πρῶτον ψευδὲς δεῖ ἐλθεῖν εὐαγγέλιον ὑπὸ πλάνου τινός). Cp the πλάνη in the quotation (11 35) cited under d, as also the miracles which Simon works (2 33), 'to astonish and deceive' (πρὸς κατάπληξιν καὶ ἀπάτην), or (7 4), the expression 'deceived before by Simon' (ὑπὸ τοῦ . . . Σίμωνος προαπατηθέντες), or the deceptiones of Simon (Recog. 3 65), his 'slanders' (διαβολαί: Hom. 3 59).

Notice further that, according to Gal. 1 10, it was made a reproach against Paul that he sought by his doctrine to please men; this comes up again in the words of Peter in Hom. 18 10: 'Since ye have thus spoken to please the multitudes who are present' (ἐπειδὴ ἀρεσκόντως τοῖς παροῦσιν ὄχλοις οὕτως ἔφης).

Above all, however, it is of the constant designation of Simon as 'enemy' (ὁ ἐχθρὸς ἄνθρωπος, or simply as ὁ ἐχθρός, inimicus, see, e.g., above, b) in both writings, that we are able to infer from Gal. 4 16 with a high degree of probability that it had already been applied by his Galatian adversaries to Paul. It is difficult to see how Paul could have felt any occasion to ask the Galatians whether he had been the enemy of the Galatians by his preaching of the true gospel, that is of the gospel freed from the law (this is what is intended by ἀληθεύων ὑμῖν: 4 16) if he had not been spoken of to the Galatians as being their 'enemy.' Here should be added Mt. 13 28 (see below, § 6 c).

(f) This 'homo quidam inimicus' according to Recog. 1 70 f. raises a tumult against James the episco-

[1] 'If you think that there is easy access for your mind above the heavens, and that you are able to conceive the things that are there, and to apprehend knowledge of that immense light, I think that for him who can comprehend these things it were easier to throw his sense which knows how to ascend thither into the heart and breast of some one of us who stand by, and to tell what thoughts he is cherishing in his breast.'

[1] This very drastic kind of polemic is exemplified in the NT also. The Gnostics who are controverted in the Epistle of JUDE (q.v., § 2), in common with all Gnostics, divided mankind into the two categories of 'psychic' and 'pneumatic'; they held themselves to be pneumatic. This the author turns round the other way in v. 19: 'these are they who make a division [i.e., between psychic and pneumatic; not, as in AV, 'who separate themselves,' or, as in RV, 'who make separations'], sensual, not having the spirit.' There is a still closer parallel to this substitution of the devil for God in Rev. 2 24. It is hardly to be supposed that the followers of Jezebel made it their boast that they 'know the deep things of Satan'; we may be perfectly certain that their boast was that they knew the deep things of God. All the more sharply sarcastic is the form of the phrase: 'Know . . . the deep things of Satan, as they say.' But it is Paul who is the author of the claim to possess the spirit that searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God (1 Cor. 2 10-12). Cp § 6 b.

porum princeps at Jerusalem, snatches a firebrand from the altar and with this begins a general Jewish massacre of Christians; he throws James down headlong from the top of the steps, so that he lies as one dead. After three days the Christians who have fled to Jericho learn that the hostile man has received from Caiaphas the high priest the commission to persecute all Christians, and armed with written missives ('epistolæ') from him is about to go to Damascus in order to begin the persecution there, believing that Peter has betaken himself thither[1] (cp Acts 8 3 9 1 f. 22 4 f. 26 9-12 Gal. 1 13 1 Cor. 15 9).

(g) Even the style of Paul is plainly imitated in a mocking way. In the recantation (Hom. 20 19) of Simon mentioned above (b) we have his δέομαι ὑμῶν ('I beseech you': Gal. 4 12), αὐτὸς ἐγώ ('I myself': 2 Cor. 10 1), εἰδέναι ὑμᾶς θέλω ('I would have you know': 1 Cor. 11 3), παρακαλῶ οὖν ('I beseech therefore': Rom. 12 1 1 Cor. 4 16; cp Eph. 4 1 1 Tim. 2 1); elsewhere τί γάρ, τί οὖν, etc.

So also with the apocryphal Acts of Peter and Acts of Peter and Paul (as to which see SIMON PETER, §§ 32-34).

5. Apocryphal Acts.

Whilst in the apocryphal correspondence of Paul with the Corinthians which belongs to the Acta Pauli (see SIMON PETER, § 39 e, n.) the doctrine attributed to Simon is Gnostic, in the Apocrypha just mentioned Simon appears less as a gnostic than as a wonder-worker; but that by him the apostle Paul was originally meant is manifest here also.

(a) The question of Paul to Simon: 'Why didst thou deliver up circumcised men and compel them to be condemned and put to death?' (διὰ τί σὺ περιτετμημένους παρέδωκας καὶ ἠνάγκασας αὐτοὺς κατακριθέντας ἀποκτανθῆναι; see SIMON PETER, § 34 e) is decisive. There is no Gnostic who could have had either such power or such inclination. The words can refer only to what Paul did according to Gal. 1 13 1 Cor. 15 9 Acts 8 3 9 1 f. 22 4 f. 26 9-12. In this way what follows gains in cogency, the original reference to Paul being not so absolutely palpable without this key.

(b) In the (pre-Catholic) Acta Petri Simon is spoken of as 'inimicus,' 'condemned' (§ 4 a, e, and SIMON PETER, § 33 d), and even the Greek word πλάνος (§ 4 e) has found its way into the Latin text; according to the Actus Petri cum Simone (4 12, in Acta Apocr. i. p. 49, l. 13 and p. 60, l. 4) not only is Paul called ('magus' or) 'planus,' but Simon also is described as 'planus (et deceptor).' In the (Catholic) Acta Petri et Pauli (43) Nero makes it clear that Simon persecutes Peter and Paul out of envy, and is a 'manifest enemy' (πρόδηλος ἐχθρός) of both and of their Master.

(c) In the disputation on circumcision touched on above (a; cp SIMON PETER, §§ 34 e, 39 c), Simon warns the Emperor against believing Peter and Paul, as they are circumcised and therefore worthless persons. Paul makes answer: before we knew the truth we had the circumcision of the flesh; since then, only the circumcision of the heart. Peter adds: if circumcision is something bad, why art thou circumcised, Simon? It will be manifest at once that only the words of Peter, not those of Paul, are any effective reply to the reproach of Simon. If with Lipsius (II. 1 360) we remove those of Paul as being a later addition (cp SIMON PETER, § 35 e), then the pure antithesis between Simon as the opponent and Peter as the defender of circumcision comes to light. This, however, is directly contrary to the whole representation of Peter elsewhere in these Acts; for here he figures as the one who is doing away with the law (SIMON PETER, §§ 34 a, 39 c). In so far, however, as Peter defends circumcision the effect is to take away his complete agreement with Paul (the accentuation of which is nevertheless one of the main objects of the book; see SIMON PETER, § 35 d), for here it is only the circumcision of the heart that Paul stands up for. Thus in our present passage it is not at all the Catholic Peter, but the original genuinely Jewish-Christian Peter with whom we have to do, and this is our evidence that his opponent was not originally a Gnostic, but simply an opponent of the Judaising of Christianity, in other words, no other than Paul.

(d) To Paul also applies the further accusation in the same passage, that 'Simon' found it necessary to give himself out falsely to be a Jew and to put on the semblance of strict observance of the law in order to deceive the people whom otherwise he would not have been able to win over to his erroneous doctrine (see SIMON PETER, § 34 e). This clearly points back to 1 Cor. 9 20: 'to them that are under the law (I became) as under the law, not being myself under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law.' We recognise also, however, the charge which, according to Gal. 5 11 1 10, was made against Paul by his Judaistic opponents, that outside of Galatia he still continued to preach circumcision, for everywhere he shapes his doctrine so as to please men (see GALATIANS, § 13, middle).

(e) With this accords (even if not conclusive as evidence) the favour which Simon finds with Nero. After Nero had proved himself the most dreadful enemy which Christianity had, it must have suggested itself very readily to the adversaries of Paul to lay it to Paul's discredit that he had so expressly enjoined obedience to Nero (Rom. 13 1-7) and that Paul's captivity had been so mild (Acts 28 30 f.). As a result of his submissiveness such a partiality of the emperor as we find him expressing for Simon in the Catholic and also in the pre-Catholic Acta (SIMON PETER, § 33 h) seemed natural. Cp below, § 12 b.

(f) Lipsius (ii. 1 363 f.) has even conjectured that the story of the seeming beheading of Simon (§ 34 c) has at its root malicious misrepresentation of the beheading of Paul.

In order that Paul might not have the glory of martyrdom his traducers had it that he had not been beheaded, but by a trick had brought it about that a ram was decapitated in his stead. To this was then added the further touch that he presented himself to the emperor as one who had risen from the dead, in order thereby to secure acknowledgment of his divinity, and of the truth of the promise he had previously made, of a return from death after three days. This promise is met with also in quite another form in the Philosophumena, 6 20, where Simon suffers himself to be buried by his disciples, and proposes to rise again after three days, but does not revive (see SIMON PETER, § 32 a, n. 1). Evidently the theme has gone through several variations. In accord with it is what we read in the Catholic Acta, that Nero causes the body of Simon, who has fallen down from the clouds, to be watched for three days so as to know whether he will rise or not (see SIMON PETER, § 34 g). With Simon's promise Lipsius confronts the statement of the Acts of Paul (= 'Martyrium Pauli,' 4, 6 = Pseudo-Linus, 'Passio Pauli,' 8, 18, in Acta Apost. Apocr. 1 112-116 32 42) that it was Paul who foretold to Nero his return after his beheading and who also fulfilled this prediction.

(g) Lastly, mention must be made of the attempt of Simon to fly to heaven (see SIMON PETER, § 33 [f], § 34 [f]). The supposition lies close at hand that here too we have a malicious perversion of the saying of Paul that he had been caught up to the third heaven (2 Cor. 12 2) and that precisely the story of his fall and of his death was connected with this because the appeal to this rapture into heaven was regarded as a flagitious piece of self-glorification, and, should the conjecture of Lipsius just mentioned prove correct, the beheading of Paul was not regarded as being the true end of his life.

At the same time it must be observed that Simon's flying is reported in two forms. Alongside of the statement, just recorded above, that his desire was to reach heaven by it, we find another much simpler one that his intention was simply, by a brief flight, to give proof of his magical powers, and thereby secure public attention (SIMON PETER, §§ 33 a, 34 c). For this we have an authenticated parallel. Suetonius (Nero, 12) relates that a flying professor who had undertaken to play the part of Icarus in a representation of mythological scenes organised by Nero, in the circus on the Campus Martius (that is to say, exactly on the scene of the alleged attempt of Simon), at his first attempt fell to the ground close beside Nero, who was bespattered with his blood. If it was this or some similar occurrence that suggested the ascription to Simon of the attempt at flight, the statement that Simon's intention was to fly to heaven is a further development. The possibility remains that the story was manufactured with 2 Cor. 12 2 in view; yet we cannot be confident of this. In the pseudo-Clementine Homilies we find merely that Simon flies occasionally (2 32), and in the Recognitions (2 9) this takes the special form that Simon promises: 'si me de monte excelso præcipitem, tanquam subvectus ad terras illæsus deferar.' What seems to lie at the basis of this is the promise of Satan to Jesus in the temptation on the pinnacle of the temple (Mt. 4 5 f. = Lk. 4 9-11). The evidential value of the arguments adduced at the beginning of this section, however, is not impaired by the ambiguous character of the indications last adduced.

How small is the right of any one to set aside any such polemic against Paul as being from the outset impossible is shown by the fact that in early Christian literature the same thing is found also without intervention of the mask of Simon, and even occasionally with express mention of the name of Paul.

6. Analogous polemic against Paul.

(a) Epiphanius (Haer. 30 16, end) tells us that in Ebionitic Acts of the Apostles was found, regarding the apostle Paul, the statement that he was the son of a Greek mother and a Greek father belonging to Tarsus, that he had spent some time in Jerusalem and there desired the daughter of the high priest in marriage, on which account he became a proselyte and accepted circumcision; but, having after all failed in his suit, in his wrath he wrote against circumcision, the Sabbath, and the law.

(b) In Rev. 2 14 20 it is said of the followers of Balaam and Jezebel that they eat things sacrificed to idols and commit fornication. The two classes of persons are thus identical in spite of their different names. Nor are the Nicolaitans [cp NICOLAITANS] distinct from them, for we read (2 15): 'so also hast thou them that hold the teaching of the Nicolaitans in like manner' (οὕτως ἔχεις καὶ σὺ (not: σὺ καὶ) κρατοῦντας τὴν διδαχὴν τῶν Νικολαϊτῶν ὁμοίως).

That is to say, In that thou (the church of Pergamos) hast the Balaamites, thou hast also [in the same persons] those that hold the teaching of the Nicolaitans in like manner as the Church of Ephesus has (2 6). Now the Nicolaitans at Ephesus are in 2 2 said to be apostles who have been found to be false; and of the adherents of Jezebel we are told in 2 24 that they profess to have known the depths of Satan. All these accusations fit Paul; the last of them must be understood in the manner indicated above (§ 4 c, n.). To eat meat offered to idols and to commit fornication had been indeed sanctioned by Paul if we take 'fornication' in the sense that has been indicated under COUNCIL, § 11, col. 925. As he had already called his opponents false apostles (2 Cor. 11 13) it is not surprising if we find them hurling back this reproach at himself and his followers (cp § 4 d). The later the date to which the epistles in Rev. 2 f. are assigned (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 11) the more easily possible does it become that in them it is no longer Paul himself, but a later school that is being controverted, a school which made perhaps a more thoroughgoing use in practice of this doctrine of freedom from the law than he himself made, or which even abused that principle; but neither is it possible to show from the text itself that it cannot by any means have been directed even against Paul. On 13 11-17, see § 7 b.

(c) Even in the First gospel, in all probability, it is Paul who is alluded to alike as the 'enemy' (ἐχθρὸς ἄνθρωπος), of Mt. 13 28, and as the 'least' (ἐλάχιστος) in the kingdom of heaven; see GOSPELS, §§ 112 c, 128 c. Cp above, § 4 e, end.

(d) As for the canonical book of Acts, the polemic against Paul which underlies 8 9-24 and 24 22-26, and which is artificially turned aside by the composer, will come under our consideration later (§§ 13 f., 12 b; cp also BARJESUS). Kreyenbühl (214-216; § 15 below), it may be added, sees also in Acts 14 8-20 and 19 11-19 a similar proceeding on the composer's part.

In Lystra Paul was only stoned; the divine worship which he is represented as having received, rests only on the detraction of his Judaising adversaries, who thereby, as elsewhere in the person of Simon, wished to represent him as a man who owed his success with the Gentiles—these, according to Kreyenbühl, are figured in the lame man blind from his birth—to magical arts. The magical efficacy assigned to the handkerchiefs and aprons touched by him (19 12) is held in like manner to be an invention due to a similarly hostile intention. In the Nicolaus, also, of Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 4 25, p. 522, ed. Potter), who, when he had been rebuked by the apostles for jealousy, offered his beautiful wife to any one who chose to marry her, Kreyenbühl also (190 f.) finds Paul who gave up the 'chaste virgin,' the primitive church, to the Gentiles, and thus to fornication. Such conjectures hardly rise to the level of probability, even although the difficulties suggested by stories of this kind when literally taken remain worthy of attention.

(e) Similarly it is necessary to receive with caution the view of Preuschen (ZNTW, 1901, pp. 169 [186]-201), that the form of Paul underlies the delineation of the Antichrist in the Christian Apocalypse of Elias,[1] although the coincidences, especially also with the Acta Pauli, are some of them really striking.

Preuschen himself says that a searching investigation as to the history of the origin of this Apocalypse is still needed. According to Schürer (TLZ, 1899, pp. 4-8), it is later than Clement of Alexandria. If this be so, the features of the picture of Paul cannot have been transferred to the Antichrist for the first time when Paul's high place had become undisputed; that must have occurred much earlier, when the hatred against Paul was still alive and did not shrink even from such a distortion of his picture as this. In the transference of these features to the Apocalypse of Elias now before us, misunderstandings, however, can easily have crept in. This admonishes to great caution. Moreover, Preuschen's work is not yet completed.

At the same time, however, Preuschen's view regarding the Apocalypse of Elias leads to the question whether perhaps the figure of Simon may not also underlie the picture of the Antichrist in apocalyptic writings.

7. Simon as Antichrist in Apocalypses.

(a) Preuschen (l.c. 173-176) answers this question in the affirmative so far as Sibyll. 3 63-74 2 165-170 are concerned. That in 3 63 the expression 'afterwards shall Beliar come forth from the Sebastenes' (ἐκ δὲ Σεβαστηνῶν ἥξει Βελιαρ μετόπισθεν), Σεβαστηνοί has never as yet been satisfactorily explained is true.

Σεβαστός is the Greek rendering of Augustus, a name of honour which Octavian first received in 27 B.C. Should Σεβαστηνοί, however, mean, not people of Augustus, but people of Samaria, neither is this designation possible at an earlier date than 27 B.C., for it was not till then that Samaria received the name Sebastē. In order to be able to maintain the very tempting interpretation which refers the widow ruling the world in 3 75-80 to Cleopatra, and the triumvirate clearly indicated in 3 51 f. to Antony, Octavian, and Lepidus, and thus fixes the date of the whole piece 3 36-92 as falling somewhere between 40 and 30 B.C., scholars have found it necessary to take the expression Σεβαστηνοί as proleptically possible even before the official bestowal of his name of honour upon Augustus, or to regard the verse in which it occurs as an interpolation. Preuschen understands the world-ruling woman (v. 75) of Rome (that in v. 77 she is called a widow, and that in vv. 47 52 Rome is designated by its own proper name he does not take into consideration) and then interprets the Beliar who is to arise from among the Samaritans as referring to Simon the Magician. It is correct to say that the rather vague delineation here and in 2 165-170 presents no obstacle to stand in the way of this identification; but the identification is not yet thereby established.

In fact, it appears even to be directly excluded if v. 69 is correctly interpreted: Beliar is to seduce many men, namely 'as well faithful and elect Hebrews as also lawless ones, and other men who never at all heard of God' (πιστούς τ' ἐκλεκτούς θ' Ἑβραίους ἀνόμους τε καὶ ἄλλους ἀνέρας οἵτινες οὔπωθ' ὅλως θεοῦ εἰσήκουσαν). Jülicher, who was the first to interpret Beliar as referring to Simon Magus (TLZ, 1896, 379), finds mankind here divided into three classes: (1) Christians (πιστοὺς ἐκλεκτούς), (2) Jews (Ἑβραίους ἀνόμους), and (3) Gentiles (ἄλλους ἀνέρας, etc.). In that case, however, the third τε ought to have come after Ἑβραίους, not after ἀνόμους. Grammatically possible would be another threefold division: (1) πιστούς, (2) ἐκλεκτοὺς Ἑβραίους, (3) ἀνόμους καὶ ἄλλους ἀνέρας, etc. Only, in that case the πιστοί would certainly not mean Christians; otherwise the Ἑβραῖοι would not be called ἐκλεκτοί. If the passage is due to a Christian, as Jülicher supposes, then the only right construction is that which takes ἀνόμους as a predicate of Ἑβραίους, as above. Moreover, in the third class just supposed the καί would have a disturbing effect. If the τε after ἀνόμους could mean 'and,' then it would be permissible to render καί by 'also': 'and also other godless men.' The τε, however, after ἀνόμους must mean 'as also' since that after πιστούς means 'as well'; consequently καί can only mean 'and.' The only unexceptionable translation is accordingly the following: 'As well faithful and elect Hebrews as also lawless ones, and other men,' etc. As these 'other men' are the Gentiles, only Jews can be meant by the 'lawless ones.' If on this rendering one were to seek for Christians also, they must be indicated by the 'faithful and elect Hebrews,' in other words must be exclusively Jewish

[1] German translation from the Coptic by Steindorff in TU 17 3, 1899; as Apocalypse of Sophonias already published by Stern in Z. f. ägypt. Sprache, 1886, pp. 115-135, and in French by Bouriant, Mémoires de la mission archéologique au Caire, i. 2 260-279 (1885): not to be confounded with the Jewish Apocalypse of Elias cited by the Church Fathers; see Schürer, GJV (3) 2 673-676, ET ii. 3 129-132.

Christians, which will hardly be supposed by any one. Rather does the author divide the Jews into the two classes of the 'faithful and elect' and the 'lawless,' placing the Gentiles alongside of them. In that case, however, the passage is not the work of a Christian, and therefore it does not relate to Simon Magus; for it was only among Christians and not at all among Jews that Simon Magus passed for a person so objectionable and at the same time so important that he could be identified with the devil.

Nor yet even among Christians was any such estimate put upon him at so early a date as in the apostolic age; he acquired it by the enhanced importance which came to be attached to him through the romance of which he was the hero. Thus if Simon should be meant we should have to reject as too early the dating of Preuschen, who understands by the three men who destroy Rome (v. 51 f.) Galba, Otho, and Vitellius (68 and 69 A.D.) and by the fire from heaven (v. 53 f.) the eruption of Vesuvius in 79 A.D. Moreover the second dating cancels the first; for that Galba, Otho, and Vitellius had destroyed Rome could no longer be believed after 69 A.D. Geffcken (TU 23 1 p. 15), who agrees with Jülicher as regards Simon Magus, judiciously leaves the date undetermined. Yet it is altogether wrong to take vv. 36-92 or even only vv. 46-92 as a unity. In the passage before us the destruction of the world by fire is predicted as something new no less than three times (53-61, 71-74, 84-87); and moreover the destruction of Rome by the three men just referred to follows upon the reign of the Messiah over all the earth (46-52), whilst of course it must have preceded it, and the reign of the widow over the world follows upon the destruction of the world together with Beliar and his followers by fire (71-77), and also upon the destruction of Rome by the three men already related in v. 51 f., which would be equally inappropriate whether the widow be taken as meaning the widow Cleopatra or Rome. Thus only vv. 63-74 come into account as a unity for our present discussion.

(b) Simon the Magician has been detected in the 'other beast' of Rev. 13 11-17 (which in 16 13 19 20 20 10 is called the 'false prophet') in recent years by Spitta (Offenb. d. Joh., 1889, pp. 380-385) and Erbes (Offenb. Joh., 1891, pp. 25-27). This identification may in some measure suit the wonderful works which are attributed to this beast in 13 13-15*a*. But it no way suits the regard for the worship of the Emperor in vv. 12 15*b*, and the exclusion of those who have not the mark of the beast on hand or forehead from the buying and selling, unless we choose to suppose that the figure of Simon furnished merely the outlines for this second beast which were filled in by the author with essentially new features.

Still less have Volkmar (Comm. z. Offenb. Joh., 1862, pp. 197-213), Blom (Th.T, 1884, pp. 175-181) and Kappeler (Theol. Ztschr. aus der Schweiz, 1893, pp. 40-62, 65-69) succeeded, without resort to the greatest lengths of allegorical interpretation, in finding the apostle Paul in the second beast; on any literal exegesis, not even the miracles which cause no difficulty when referred to Simon can, by any possibility, be assigned to Paul.

(c) In so far, however, as, after the example of Gunkel (Schöpf. u. Chaos, 1895) and Bousset (Antichrist, 1895), the line taken is that of seeking in the leading apocalyptic forms merely renewals of older figures, whether of mythological or of literary origin, which assumed once for all a normative character that underwent only slight modifications when applied to new circumstances and conditions, it may certainly be worth while to inquire whether Paul, or Simon, or the features in the figure of Simon which have been derived from Paul, have contributed elements to the shaping of these renewed apocalyptic figures. Preuschen's aim is nothing less than to show that it was by the introduction of the form of Paul that the figure of Antichrist, originally thought of as a ruler, assumed the character of a false teacher, so that both types of Antichrist thenceforward existed alongside of each other.

After the survey just made of the appearances of Simon in the literature of early Christianity, our next task must be to ascertain what results, if any, can be claimed.

8. Four forms of Simon distinguished.

(a) In the first place, it has become evident that we have to do with three distinct magnitudes which meet us, now here now there, under the form of Simon. To these must be added as a fourth a Jewish magician of Cyprus, Simon, a guard of the procurator Felix, who employed him to draw away Drusilla from her husband, Azizus king of Emesa, and procure her in marriage for himself (Jos. Ant. xx. 7 2, § 141 f.). To him we shall return afterwards (§ 12 b c e). Meanwhile, the three figures that have come before us in the literature we have hitherto been surveying are: (1) the Samaritan magician as Acts, on the first impression, seems to present him; (2) the Gnostic, founder of the Gnostic sect of the Simonians; (3) the distorted image of the apostle Paul.

(b) It is indispensably necessary that we should distinguish these three forms as sharply as possible, and especially necessary in cases where they may have come to be mixed up in one and the same writing. In this sense, we have already treated separately the Gnostic and the perverted image of Paul as they are found in the pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions (§ 3 f.). In these writings Simon appears as a magician also; but if thereby the magician who, according to Acts, made his appearance in the very first years of Christianity, is to be understood, then the Gnostic system ascribed to him does not at all fit, for it is of much later date.

Now, magicians have existed in all ages, and thus it were easily conceivable that the author of the Gnostic system in question, in the second century, was really also at the same time a magician. As against this suggestion, however, two considerations must be borne in mind; not only that Gnosis and magical arts are united in the fancy of the Church fathers (who attributed to their adversaries, without discrimination, all kinds of evil things) more easily than they are in reality, but also that, on this view, we lose all connection with the Samaritan Simon of the earliest Christian times, a connection which is nevertheless presupposed in so far as Simon is opposed by Peter. If, in view of this, we decline to give up the connection, we must nevertheless recognise that in the pseudo-Clementines all the three forms of Simon are mixed up with one another so as to form a completely impossible figure. The case is similar in the apocryphal Acts; only, there the Gnostic features in the person of Simon are not very prominent. On Acts 8 9-24 see § 14.

(c) If, then, we desire to get at the truth of the matter, it is an exceedingly perilous thing to be too readily prepared to find a harmonious picture, instead of various features derived from distinct sources. Thus, the argument is very widely current that, inasmuch as in the Simon of the pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions a Gnostic tendency is being controverted, he cannot, at the same time, have any Pauline features; in fact, the myth has even come into being that Lipsius too, in conceding the Anti-Gnostic character of these writings, has also given up their Anti-Pauline character. Similarly, it is often supposed that nothing more is required than the postulate of the actual existence of a Samaritan magician of the name of Simon, in order to make it possible to set aside all supposed reference to Paul in the narrative of Acts 8: or, where a little more caution is exercised, it is supposed that the same result can be reached by the observation that the figure of Simon there exhibits Gnostic characteristics.

If once we are prepared to keep these different characteristics strictly separate, and at the same time to recognise their presence together (should they happen to be present together) in one and the same writing, the next question for us comes to be whether the Anti-Pauline polemic is older than the Anti-Gnostic.

9. The Anti-Pauline polemic older than the Anti-Gnostic.

(a) One might suppose that the answer could not be doubtful, seeing that Paul himself was before Gnosticism. The consequences, however, which have been deduced by the Tübingen school from this view of the case cause many to shrink from accepting this result, however obvious.

These critics are utterly averse to making the admission that any such intense hatred could really ever have been directed against Paul, as would follow from the malignant and perverse representation of him implied in the Homilies, and Recognitions, and in the apocryphal Acts, should it be the fact that the passages in question date from the earliest Christian times. The ideal of Acts, that the multitude of them that believed (as also the apostles) were of one heart and soul (4 32) dominates the current conception of that period much too strongly to make it possible for many to recognise as historical any conflict of so profound and far-reaching a character as that revealed in these writings.

(b) Only, what is it that is done in order to avoid the unwelcome admission of its historical character? Any attempt to explain away the hatred which these writings breathe against the Simon with whom they deal, promises little success. Thus, of necessity, one is driven to the assertion that the Anti-Gnostic interest is in these authors the original one and the Anti-Pauline features are merely later introductions, much in the same way as an artist, in order to give greater life to his picture, will introduce into it here and there a few additional touches, but without altering the nature of the work as a whole.

(c) This assumption, however, of the posteriority of the Anti-Pauline polemic in these writings is completely untenable. How should the writers have come to make precisely Paul their target? If there had been a conflict between him and another school of primitive Christianity from which these writers were not perhaps far removed, the conflict was nevertheless buried at the death of Paul.

It is coming to be more and more generally recognised that the real Paulinism hardly survived the lifetime of its author (so Harnack himself, Lehrb. d. DG 1(2) 46, n. 1, 52 f. 78 f., 116, etc.). Whilst the most general of all its results—the admission of the Gentiles to Christianity without observance of the law—was accepted in its own interests by the Church now beginning to be Catholic, every other special interest which Paul had promoted, and even his services in connection with the carrying out of the universalism which now was taken as a thing of course, passed into oblivion. Already the book of Acts represents Peter as the real originator of this, and Paul as but his follower in it (ACTS, § 4). Simultaneously, however, this book and the whole of that literature and period gave to Paul more and more a place of honour beside Peter (see MINISTRY, § 36), and his writings during the second century gained more and more of a canonical position.

Thus, partly forgotten so far as his conflict with the attitude of the original apostles is concerned, and partly highly honoured as an apostle of bygone days: how should Paul ever come to be in the second, or, so far as the pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions are concerned, even in the third or fourth century, the object of so fanatical a hatred? It is a psychological impossibility. Add to this that the writers, by the introduction of Pauline features, would have been making unrecognisable the picture of that which they wished to combat (§ 10 a).

(d) Harnack has felt this, and drawn the consequence which is the only possible one: 'perhaps the Pauline features of the [pseudo-Clementine] magician altogether are an appearance merely' (Lehrb. d. Dogm.-gesch. 1(2) 269). In the light of our preceding investigations, the boldness of this proposition will be apparent.

How could such a judgment be possible, or that of Headlam (JThSt., 1901 f., pp. 53 f.): 'With the possible exception of one passage, there is not the slightest sign of anti-Paulinism, and nowhere is there any opposition to St. Paul'? Is it, perchance, due to the fact that Headlam has his eye only on the real Paulinism and finds that the polemic of the pseudo-Clementines and apocryphal Acts does not touch that, and then omits to ask whether the authors perhaps precisely by their malicious distortion of the image of Paul deliberately wished to harm him more than would have been possible by means of any honourable polemic?

(e) The examples of polemic against Paul without the mask of Simon, already adduced in § 6, must have shown how deep the antipathy to Paul went, and how widespread it was even where we have not to do with writings which clothe themselves in the form of a romance. The epistles of Paul himself, however, contain still more traces of this.

In §§ 4 e 5 d, we have already touched on what admits of being inferred from Gal. 5 11 (still preaching circumcision), 1 10 (seek to please men), 4 16 (ἐχθρός), 2 Cor. 6 8 (πλάνος). Paul's self-commendation in 2 Cor. 3 1 5 11 f., his preaching of himself (4 5), and his claim to have been taken up into the third heaven and into Paradise (12 2-4), needed only to be exaggerated a little and the charge of self-deification was ready. To these have to be added, further, the charges which Paul would not be found repudiating so emphatically if they had never been made against him: such as that he walks in carnal wisdom (2 Cor. 1 12), writes other things than appear (1 13), says Yea and Nay in the same breath (1 17), corrupts the word of God (2 17), seeks to be lord of the faith (1 24), uses his power for the destruction of the churches (10 8 13 10), when present is weak but comes forward in his letters with the greatest claims (10 9 f. 1). From his refusal of financial support for himself, the inference was drawn that plainly he was conscious of not being a real apostle, otherwise he would have made use of the privilege of those who were (1 Cor. 9 15 2 Cor. 11 10). To this it was added, further, that he applied to his own uses the collections which he caused to be made for the poor in Jerusalem (2 Cor. 12 16-18 7 2, end). Finally, 'chastened' (παιδευόμενοι) in 2 Cor. 6 9 can only be understood as meaning that his malady had been interpreted as a divine punishment for his opposition to the Christianity of the original apostles.

(f) All these charges and reproaches, however, proceed, in the last resort at least, from the Judaizers who came to Corinth or to Galatia and sought to turn against Paul the churches which he had founded—in other words, from the representatives of that school which speaks in the pseudo-Clementine writings and apocryphal Acts or at least in their sources. If one desires not to be unjust to them, one will even have to concede that Paul had provoked them to the utmost by his persistent advocacy of his own views, by his unsparing attack even upon Peter at Antioch (Gal. 2 11-21), by his blunt judgment upon things which they regarded as sacred, by the anathema he pronounced upon their gospel (Gal. 1 8 f.), by his biting sarcasm (Gal. 5 12), and by his sweeping condemnation of everything about them (2 Cor. 11 13-15). We are only too readily inclined to take sides with Paul and to find in his case certain things to be perfectly correct, which in his adversaries we would either condemn without qualification, or even declare to be historically impossible. Whether, for example, Paul says that his opponents are servants of Satan (11 15), or whether the pseudo-Clementine Recognitions say that Paul is a chosen instrument of Satan (3 49) comes to very much the same thing; and, viewed from their standpoint, Paul must really have seemed to them quite as much the enemy of the truth as they to him—for after all he was doing away with the law concerning which they could quite honestly feel convinced that it had been laid down by God as of perpetual obligation (see COUNCIL, § 3, begin.). Instead of denying the manifestly-patent fact that the opposing schools, within the borders of primitive Christianity, carried on their controversies with the utmost violence, we ought rather to be unfeignedly glad that the Christian religion possessed within itself sufficient vitality to enable it to survive so severe a crisis.

(g) There is accordingly but one presupposition only, by means of which it will be really possible to hold the anti-Pauline features in the pseudo-Clementines to be more recent than the anti-Gnostic, namely the assumption that the principal Pauline epistles are more recent than the Gnosticism, which the pseudo-Clementines combat. So Loman (Th. T, 1883, pp. 25-47), Meyboom (ib. 1891, 1-46), and Steck (Galaterbrief, 325-335 [1888]). It makes little difference here, whether on this view the two things are also regarded as contemporaneous. Marcion passes for the chief representative of the gnosis which is controverted. We note further that Meyboom finds the polemic in the Homilies the fresher, and derived more from direct observation of the two views he opposes, Marcionitism and the Antinomism set forth by the 'canonical Paul'; that of the Recognitions he finds more colourless and confused. Against the denial of the genuineness of the principal Pauline epistles altogether, see GALATIANS, §§ 1-9.

10. Anti-Pauline and Anti-Gnostic polemic how connected.

If then it is impossible to deny the existence of the Anti-Pauline polemic or to maintain that it is later than the Anti-Gnostic, the next question comes to be as to how it came to be connected, and even combined with the Anti-Gnostic in such a manner as we see, especially in the Homilies and Recognitions. (a) Harnack, in so far as he does not explain the Anti-Pauline element as only seeming (above, § 9 d), says upon this point (loc. cit.) that the pseudo-Clementines 'before aught else con-troverted Simon Magus and his followers . . ., but also the apostle Paul, and seem to have transferred Simonian features to Paul, and Pauline features to Simon.' The question still remains, however, Why they did so? If they depicted Simon or Paul otherwise than each of them in reality was, they only obscured the picture of each, whilst in the polemic that was being waged, it must nevertheless have always been a matter of primary importance to depict the adversary in such a way that every one could clearly recognise him. The literary skill of the authors must accordingly, on the assumption of Harnack here presupposed, that they wrote their works as we now have them without making use of any sources, be ranked very low; in reality, however, it is admittedly very considerable. By the judgment we have quoted, accordingly, Harnack has merely raised another problem, not solved the one in hand.

SIMON MAGUS

(b) Harnack proceeds (loc. cit.), 'Yet it remains also possible that the Pauline features, borne by the magician, came first into existence in the process of redaction, in so far as in the course of this the whole polemic against Paul was deleted, but certain portions of it were woven into the polemic against Simon.' The assumption underlying these words is of the utmost importance. We see Harnack here reckoning, as he had not yet done in the preceding sentence, with literary antecedents of the pseudo-Clementine writings.

This is in point of fact indispensable, if only for the reason that we find the Homilies for considerable stretches dealing with the same matters as the Recognitions, and then again diverging widely from them and also changing the order of the occurrences which both relate in common. Further, in Recog. 3 74 f. it is said that Clement, at the instance of Peter, wrote down and sent to James in ten books (the so-called κηρύγματα of Peter) the discourses held by Peter in his disputation with Simon in Cæsarea, and in the same place is given a list of the contents of this writing which shows that it dealt with things which occur also in the pseudo-Clementines of to-day. To this must be added the family romance, and other matter which again points to a separate origin (above, § 3 c).

And yet it is precisely this question as to possible sources of this literature that we may not propound if Harnack's dictum is to hold good that these writings cannot be called into requisition in any investigation regarding primitive Christianity, because they did not come into existence at all until the third or fourth century. Granted that their present form is not older than the third or fourth century, nevertheless their sources certainly are older, and it is the bounden duty of the historian to look into them. Harnack withdraws himself from the task, although he has himself recognised its existence in the sentence we have quoted. Finally, immediately afterwards he goes on to say as quoted above (§ 9 d), 'the Pauline features of the magician are perhaps only apparent.' The student who finds himself disinclined to follow this path out of the difficulty which Harnack himself treads so hesitatingly, has no longer to face the question whether one is to 'believe' in a primeval Simon-romance (so Harnack; see SIMON PETER, § 31 n), but whether one is prepared in discharge of the duty of a historian to probe the matter to the bottom.

(c) That Harnack's hint of the result to which this would lead (above, b, begin.) is a happy one cannot be said. How are we to conceive to ourselves even so much as the initial juxtaposition of an anti-Simonian and an anti-Pauline polemic, which Harnack even presupposes at a certain stage of his hypothesis where he does not yet take account of a fusion of different sources? But why afterwards was the anti-Pauline polemic deleted? How came it about that nevertheless certain portions of the polemic against Paul got themselves woven into that against Simon? From mere confusion? No doubt some transference of traits that suit Paul to Simon has occurred; but this can be explained with any psychological probability only by supposing that the hatred against Paul in those circles, within which these writings took their rise, still continued to be active, and that what this hatred had found to be worthy of detestation in Paul, was involuntarily imputed, without any basis of fact, to other persons also simply from the need it felt to give itself air. This is only a proof of the original strength and bitterness of the hostility in question against the apostle. In him his enemies saw the embodiment of all that was detestable, nay devilish. If now, in course of time, there arose other teachers whose position resembled his, yet was not identical with it, the inclination was only too natural, in those who disapproved, to fix their attention only on the points of agreement, and to carry over, without alteration, to the newcomers the sentence of condemnation that had long ago been pronounced upon Paul, and all the words of censure in which it had been conveyed—'enemy,' 'false teacher,' 'devil's tool,' 'magician,' 'deifier of self,' and the like. Without the existence of a deeply-rooted hatred against Paul that continued to be active down to a later time, all this would not have been possible; but as soon as its existence is recognised, the mingling of the attributes of distinct persons is no longer unintelligible. In like manner also in that case one is in a position to understand that people of this fanatical sort, when unquestionably new characteristics emerged, did not allow themselves to be led by this to recognise that a new thing had appeared, that was not to be identified with the old, but simply regarded the new characteristics in question as a fresh development of the long familiar and detestable characteristics of the original adversary.

(d) One new characteristic of the kind just referred to, undoubtedly, was the divine worship implied in the erection of a statue in Rome (above, § 2 a). Even the most fertile imagination could hardly have constructed this out of the image of Paul.

Lipsius, therefore (ii. 1 40 f.), is probably right when he supposes this assertion about Simon to owe its origin to the stupid misunderstanding of Justin, and to have found its way into the Recognitions only after Justin's statement had become current. Here it is even put in the mouth of Simon as a prophecy: 'adorabor ut deus, publice divinis donabor honoribus, ita ut simulacrum mihi statuentes tanquam deum colant et adorent' (2 9; cp 3 63 where Rome is expressly named as the place). It is, however, as great a misunderstanding of the meaning of Lipsius as that already (§ 8 c) noted when Erbes (Z. f. Kirchengesch. 22, 1901, 13 f.) reports it in the following terms: 'that the Clementine story of Peter's conflicts with Simon in Rome can only have arisen on the foundation of the statement of Justin.' Lipsius does not say this of these conflicts in general, but expressly only of 'the Gnostic figure of Simon.' From the view which Erbes adopts, he draws the conclusion that 'we have no need at all to go into the question as to the sources and the strata of that [pseudo-Clementine] literature, and are now already in a position to affirm that the legend which brings Peter in conjunction with Simon Magus to Rome, cannot have arisen until after 147 A.D. [i.e., after Justin].'

What Lipsius holds, and at the same time what we too, it would seem, ought to hold, is the exact opposite of this. If, through an error of Justin with reference to a certain Gnostic, a statement arose which subsequently came to be incorporated in the pseudo-Clementines, we have all the more pressing occasion for inquiring what was the form which these writings exhibited, and what the picture of Simon which they presented, before the introduction of such Gnostic features.

(e) Lipsius, it is true, since 1876 (JPT 636 f., Apokr. Ap.-gesch. ii. 1 38 f. 363) has abandoned his earlier attempt to reconstruct, as a single writing, a purely Anti-Pauline, pre-Gnostic source which should embrace the whole of the existing Anti-Pauline material that we now find dispersed in the pseudo-Clementines and the apocryphal Acta—not, however, because it had been shown to be wrong, but simply because it could not be proved to be right. All the more decidedly, however, does he maintain that this whole Anti-Pauline polemic existed in an oral form before the introduction of the Gnostic features. This is in fact the least that we must suppose, unless all the facts which we have pointed out regarding the polemic against Paul are to be simply denied. Nor should a renewed attempt to find in the Clementines a written source of this kind be simply banned as impossible. Attention must, however, be called also to the fact that the position held by Lipsius has only in appearance been made worse by the new turn he has given to it, and in reality has been improved.

It can appear to be more questionable if it is unable to find support on any written source capable of being separated out from the writings before us, and if the possibility has to be reckoned with that the Anti-Pauline legend existed for long only in an oral form, and was reduced to writing only after the Gnostic features had been combined with it. Nor is this really difficult to suppose. The mixture of features, and the difficulty felt in keeping them clearly separate, become easily intelligible on the assumption that the writing was done at a late date; but the certainty of the existence of a mass of matter that was originally purely Anti-Pauline is not destroyed by the absence of any book in which this had been committed to writing. The hatred against Paul which still finds expression through the present forms of the writing which have been so much worked over, was strong enough to secure that every one, even without their being committed to writing, should know perfectly well what was the nature of the charges brought against Paul.

The positive advantage offered by the new form of the hypothesis of Lipsius is a chronological one. On the supposition of a written source, difficulties can be raised by the question as to whether it is really older than the period of Gnosticism (from about 100 A.D.), from which the non-Pauline features of the legend are derived. In presence of a legend that existed orally only, this difficulty disappears; for such a legend naturally must have existed since the days of Paul, in whose own letters we have already been able to point out so many of the features which it presents (§ 9 e).

If originally it was Paul who was attacked under the guise of Simon alike in the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions and in the Apocryphal Acts (above, § 4 f.), the question inevitably arises whether this happened in the two groups of writings independently, or whether both groups have a common origin.

11. Original oneness of anti-Pauline elements in Ps.-Clem. and Apocr. Acts.

(a) The first view is favoured by the circumstance that the pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions deal exclusively with encounters in Palestine and Syria, the Apocryphal Acts only with encounters in Rome. In many instances scholars have contented themselves with establishing this fact and then holding the question as at once settled.

(b) The idea, however, which underlies this whole polemic against 'Simon' is most distinctly against this, the idea, namely, that Peter has to follow Simon into every place where the latter has spread his erroneous teaching.

That this is Peter's task is everywhere taken for granted as a thing of course. Take, for example, Hom. 14 12, where we find Peter saying that Simon is in Antioch (with Annubion); 'when, then, we get there and come upon them, the disputation can take place'; out of a large number of other passages we may point also to 2 17 where Peter speaks of himself as having come in upon Simon 'as light upon darkness, as knowledge upon ignorance, as healing upon disease' (ἐπελθὼν ὡς σκότῳ φῶς, ὡς ἀγνοίᾳ γνῶσις, ὡς νόσῳ ἴασις). According to 4 6 none but Peter can cope with Simon, and his companions complain that he has sent them on this occasion before him. In Recog. 3 65 Peter says: 'Since Simon has gone forth to preoccupy the ears of the Gentiles who are called to salvation, it is necessary that I also follow upon his track so that whatever disputation he raises may be corrected by us' (Quia Simon egressus est aures gentilium qui ad salutem vocati sunt prævenire, necesse est et me vestigia ejus insequi, ut si quid forte ab illo disputatum fuerit, corrigatur a nobis), and in 3 68 we read that 'Simon has set out, wishing to anticipate our journey; him we should have followed step by step, that wheresoever he tries to subvert any there he might forthwith be confuted by us' (Simon præcedere volens iter nostrum profectus est, quem oportuerat e vestigio insequi, ut sicubi aliquos subvertere tentaret, continuo confutaretur a nobis).

In view of such passages as these it is not conceivable that the plan of the Homilies and Recognitions became limited to conflicts between 'Simon' and Peter in the East, as soon as it was known to the author that Simon had come also to Rome. But this was in point of fact actually known to the author, unless one is prepared to deny that the apostle Paul is meant by 'Simon.' Even if it is a Gnostic Simon that is controverted in the Homilies and Recognitions, it was Paul who supplied the basis for this Gnostic figure (above, § 9 f.); and it is only with the original oneness of the anti-Pauline elements in the Homilies and Recognitions on the one hand and in the Apocryphal Acts on the other that we have here to do.

(c) Nor yet are direct indications wholly wanting in the Homilies and Recognitions that the conflicts must be continued in Rome also.

Thus in Rec. 3 63 f. we read of Simon's going from Cæsarea to Rome saying that 'there he would please the people so much that he should be reckoned a god and receive divine honours' (dicens se Romam petere; ibi enim in tantum placiturum ut deus putetur et divinis donetur honoribus); see above, § 2 a. With this it agrees that Peter makes the request of Clement who is brought to him by Barnabas: 'travel with us, participating in the words of truth which I am going to speak from city to city, as far as Rome itself' (συνόδευσον ἡμῖν μεταλαμβάνων τῶν τῆς ἀληθείας λόγων, ὧν κατὰ πόλιν ποιεῖσθαι μέλλω μέχρι Ῥώμης αὐτῆς: Hom. 1 16 = Recog. 1 13: iter age nobiscum et audi sermonem veritatis quem habituri sumus per loca singula, usquequo ad ipsam nobis perveniendum sit urbem Romam; cp 1 74: usquequo deo favente perveniatur ad ipsam quo iter nostrum dirigendum credimus urbem Romam). So also in the Epistle of Clement to James prefixed to the Homilies (ch. 1) Peter is spoken of as being he 'who as being fittest of all was commanded to enlighten the darker part of the world, namely the West, and was enabled to set it right' (ὁ τῆς δύσεως τὸ σκοτεινότερον τοῦ κόσμου μέρος ὡς πάντων ἱκανώτερος φωτίσαι κελευσθεὶς καὶ κατορθῶσαι δυνηθείς), and as having died in Rome.

The value of these passages as evidence becomes greater in proportion to the fulness of their agreement with the fundamental idea set forth above, under b. All the more significant, therefore, is the simple ignoring of them by Harnack and Clemen who do not accept this idea, and all the bolder the view of Chase (Hastings, DB 3 775*b*) that they 'are so incidental in character that they may well be the interpolation of a later editor, the writer, for example, who composed the Epistle of Clement to James, prefixed to the Homilies.'

(d) Of equal importance is the fact that the Apocryphal Acts which deal only with conflicts in Rome contain references back to earlier conflicts of Simon with Peter (and Paul) in the East.

For the pre-Catholic Acts, 17, 23, see SIMON PETER, § 33 c, d, and for the Catholic Acts see chap. 17, where Simon says of Peter and Paul: 'They have turned aside all Judæa from believing in me' (διέστρεψαν ὅλην τὴν Ἰουδαίαν τοῦ μὴ πιστεύειν μοι), to which Peter makes answer, 'Thou hast been able to impose upon all, but upon me never; and those also who have been deceived, God has through me recalled from their error' (πᾶσι δι' ἐπιθέσεως ἠδυνήθης, ἐμοὶ δ' οὐδέποτε· καὶ αὐτοὺς δὲ τοὺς ἐξαπατηθέντας δι' ἐμοῦ ὁ θεὸς ἐκ τῆς ἰδίας πλάνης ἀνεκαλέσατο). Simon again holds precisely similar language in chap. 28 where he mentions all Palestine and Cæsarea as well as Judæa (according to the Recognitions it was in Cæsarea that the last great disputation between Simon and Peter occurred). With this it agrees that in the pre-Catholic Acts (ch. 5), in exact parallelism with the pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions, Peter receives from Christ in a vision the following instruction: 'quem tu ejecisti de Judæa approbatum magum Simonem, iterum præoccupavit vos Romæ . . . crastina die proficiscere,' whereupon Peter says to his Christian brethren 'necesse est me ascendere Romæ [for Romam] ad expugnandum hostem et inimicum domini et fratrum nostrum' [for 'nostrorum'] (cp SIMON PETER, §§ 34 c, 33 b).

Thus the pseudo-Clementines and the Apocryphal Acts alike make it plain that both of them have the underlying idea of a controverting of Simon by Peter in the East as well as in Rome, even although only the one half is developed in the one group of writings and the other half in the other.

(e) The attempt has been made to meet this by pointing out that church fathers mention the presence of Simon in Rome while at the same time not speaking of controversies between him and Peter. This is indeed true of Justin, who knows nothing of any presence of Peter in Rome at all (above, § 2; SIMON PETER, § 30 g), as also of Irenæus (1 16 [23]; about 185 A.D.) and Tertullian (Apol. 13; cp De anima, 34, 57; about 200 A.D.) who elsewhere do speak of the appearance of Peter in Rome (see SIMON PETER, §§ 25 b, 26 a, and, conversely, the mention of Peter and Paul without Simon, § 41 c). Only, this argument from silence cannot prove that Simon really did make an appearance in Rome without any conflict with Peter.

In the writings of the church fathers the first mention of this conflict occurs in the Philosophumena, about 235 A.D. (see SIMON PETER, § 39 d). Amongst the sources of this work, however, must unquestionably be reckoned the σύνταγμα πρὸς ἁπάσας τὰς αἱρέσεις of Hippolytus, written about 200 A.D., even if Hippolytus may not be held to have been the author of the Philosophumena itself; and Lipsius has made it probable (JPT, 1876, p. 607) that this σύνταγμα of Hippolytus, now no longer extant, already contained the conflict between Peter and Simon. If this be so, it can no longer be asserted that the tradition of the conflict is later than the opposite tradition of Tertullian and Irenæus. Moreover, it cannot be maintained that these two authors had any urgent occasion, in the particular connections in which they were writing, to mention this conflict if they had known it.

(f) In the case of Justin such an occasion undeniably did exist; and, moreover, Justin as being the earlier (about 152 A.D.) is also the most important witness. He, however, as already pointed out, knows nothing of Peter's presence in Rome. Thus what he says about Simon admits of explanation without any difficulty, even if a tradition was already in existence before his time to the effect that Simon had been controverted by Peter in Rome. One part of this tradition—that about Simon's presence in Rome—he found himself able to accept (in fact he held it to be confirmed by the statue, which he brought into connection with Simon; see above, § 2 a), the other—that about Peter's presence in Rome—he was unable to accept. Why he could not, is a matter of indifference; what is certain is that one who, as Justin does, regards all the twelve original apostles as having engaged in missions to the Gentiles, and is completely silent about Paul (MINISTRY, § 36 a) would have had no difficulty in accepting the presence of Peter in Rome, if he was in possession of credible information to this effect. One must reflect that the circles from which the traditions relating to the controverting of 'Simon' by Peter emanated enjoyed small repute in the church, and certainly no mistake will have been committed if we suppose that it was Justin's knowledge of the Roman tradition, which he acquired on the spot, that prevented him from believing in the presence of Peter there (cp SIMON PETER, § 40 d).

(g) As soon as the later hypothesis of Lipsius, which as we have seen (above, § 10 e) has most to recommend it, is adopted—viz., that the entire anti-Pauline polemic existed, in the first instance, in oral tradition—we are all the less in a position to doubt that from the beginning it formed a unity; and sayings of church-fathers about a presence of Simon in Rome without any conflict with Peter cannot, on the other hand, be regarded as proving anything, if only because they are all of them much later, since the oral tradition just referred to must have come into existence during and shortly after the lifetime of Paul.

(h) Nor can the fact that in the Homilies and Recognitions only the eastern conflicts are dealt with, and in the Apocryphal Acts only the Roman be held as having force against this conclusion, even if we are not able to explain it.

At the same time, we may certainly conjecture that the residence and the geographical horizon of the various authors had a determining influence on the selection of the places which they made the scenes of their romance. Otherwise, the Homilies and Recognitions would certainly not have confined themselves to Palestine and Syria, but would have included Asia Minor and even Macedonia and Greece as well, where also Paul had exercised his missionary activities. Moreover, neither the Homilies and Recognitions, nor yet the Apocryphal Acts (though this does not hold true of them in the same degree) exhibit unity of conception in their present form. We cannot tell whether older forms of them would not give us a clearer insight into the original oneness of this whole body of literature.

Having now examined the Simon-romance in all its ramifications, our next question must be: what element of historical truth (if any) is there attaching to Simon?

12. What Simon (or Simons) historical?

(a) Of the four Simon-figures distinguished above (§ 8), the caricature of Paul in the Homilies and Recognitions and in the Apocryphal Acts was interpreted as having its basis in the historical Paul and no other historical person whatsoever by the Tübingen school, followed by Nöldeke (in Lipsius, Ergänzungsheft, 32 f.) and Lüdemann (below, § 15), as also at an earlier date by Lipsius.

On this interpretation the explanation of the name Simon is that Paul, whose real name of course could not be mentioned, was the opponent of Simon Peter and thus was the false Simon; he was called a Samaritan, it was held, because he was a Jew, and yet also no Jew since he rejected the law of Moses. On all other features see above, §§ 4-7, 9-11.

(b) Krenkel (below, § 15), to explain the caricature of Paul, calls in the Cyprian magician Simon, who stood high in favour with Felix because of his services in helping him to win Drusilla (above, § 8 a).

As Paul also was well treated by Felix when in prison at Cæsarea (Acts 24 22-26), it was a comparatively easy thing for Jewish-Christian slander to assert that he really was identical with the Cyprian Simon, and that, using this name, in order the more easily to gain followers he gave himself out to be the apostle Simon Peter. This last conjecture is altogether improbable; but the first also goes somewhat far, although it seems to have some support in Paul's preaching before Felix and Drusilla 'of righteousness and temperance and the judgment to come' (Acts 24 25; see BARJESUS, § 4 d). Cp above, § 5 e.

(c) Kreyenbühl (205-214; see below, § 15) goes still further.

The accusation against Paul of having brought Drusilla to Felix, he attributes not to the Jewish Christians, but to the Jews who accused him before Felix. According to Kreyenbühl, a Cyprian Simon never existed; what Josephus relates regarding him is simply this slander which was current against Paul, having been brought against him under the name of Simon which was given to him. But the question arises: How came non-Christian Jews to give to Paul the name of Simon? Kreyenbühl's explanation of how it was that at the same time they designated him as a Cyprian by birth, is that Barjesus or Elymas (Acts 13 6-12) was originally the apostle Paul (see BARJESUS, § 4 b). Both names are, according to Kreyenbühl, nicknames which were given him by Jews (not Christian Jews), because he was received in a friendly way in Cyprus by Sergius Paulus, and there fully declared his apostasy from Judaism by changing his name. Elymas means 'magician,' literally 'man of Elam' (BARJESUS, § 1 c), the classical land of magic; Barjesus means 'follower of Jesus.' Such hypotheses are exceedingly precarious. The historicity of the Cyprian Simon, attested as it is by Josephus, must not be questioned; but it is not to the Paul of the Simon-romance, as Krenkel thinks (above, b), but only to the Paul who is presented under the name of Barjesus that features have been transferred from him (BARJESUS, § 4, b, c). Should it so happen that his name was not Simon, but Atomus (Ἄτομος), as Niese reads with the Milan codex and the epitome of Josephus, then one would be tempted to bring this into combination with the Ετοιμας, which is D's reading for Elymas in Acts 13 8 (so Harris, Exp. 1902 a, pp. 189-195; cp BARJESUS, § 1, b a).

(d) Lipsius, in his latest treatment of the subject (Apokr. Ap.-Gesch. ii. 1 49-56), has recognised a Samaritan γόης named Simon as historical. By doing so, he holds, we make it easier to understand the bestowal of the name of Simon upon Paul, and Justin's statement that Gitta was the birthplace of Simon, as well as the fact that Simon passes not only for the father of all heresies, but also as the revelation of the supreme God, and thus as a kind of Messiah (above, § 2 d). If Paul was the only basis for the figure of Simon, then only the first of these two predicates, not the second also, would have been attached to it. Lipsius adds, as a possibility, that this Samaritan Simon may be identical with the Cyprian Simon of Josephus.

(e) Harnack, in his turn, also maintains the historicity of the Samaritan Simon; not, however, as explaining the caricature of Paul (above, § 4 f.), but because the Gnostic sect of the Simonians must have had a founder. Lipsius (51 f.) adduces this reason for believing in the historicity of Simon only with the reservation that it is not necessary to bring the Simonians into direct historical connection with Simon; they seem to have marked him out as the representative of their ideas only by an afterthought. Kreyenbühl (199-201), in like manner, postulates a founder for the Simonian sect, but places him at the beginning of the second century, since the Gnostic contents of his Ἀπόφασις Μεγάλη, which he accepts as genuine (above, § 2 c), do not fit in with the first century, and Justin himself says that Simon was a pupil of Menander, and pupils of Menander 'are alive even now' (νῦν; Apol. i. 26 4), that is to say, about 152 A.D. Justin, it is true, says in the same chapter, and often, that Simon came to Rome under the emperor Claudius or, it may be (as Kreyenbühl thinks), under (Claudius) Nero (see SIMON PETER, § 37 d); but Kreyenbühl supposes him to draw this from another source without regard to chronology. In truth, the Simon of Acts shows very little if any of the attributes of a Gnostic leader of a sect, and we must be on our guard against holding him for such, on the ground, merely, that tradition names no other. If we assume a Gnostic Simon of Gitta at the beginning of the second century, then we do not need, as Kreyenbühl at the same time does, to deny the historicity of the Samaritan magician named Simon in the first century—a historicity which the reasons adduced by Lipsius make very probable. If, further, we hesitate about identifying the Samaritan with the Cyprian Simon—an identification which has nothing in its favour except that the name and the quality of magician is the same in both cases—we find ourselves in the end accepting three persons named Simon. The point, however, is difficult to decide.

(f) It is certain, however, from all our premises, that not only Peter, but also the Samaritan Simon of the apostolic age, never appeared in Rome. It is told of Simon merely because by his figure Paul is intended. The only writer who represents Simon as appearing in Rome without Peter—Justin—in view of his fiction about the statue of Simon is not entitled to credence, especially as his statement also, and not merely that of a simultaneous appearance of Simon always with Peter, is quite easily intelligible if it be taken as resting on the romance of Simon = Paul (§ 11 e, f). Whether a Gnostic of the second century named Simon appeared in Rome remains an open question; but it is not of decisive importance for our present investigation.

The acceptance of a Samaritan Simon in the first century does not, however, by any means, ipso facto, carry with it the acknowledgement of the credibility of Acts 8 9-24. The features enumerated in a preceding section (§ 1 c, d), which are by no means appropriate to a magician, find a satisfactory explanation only when it is recognised that the apostle Paul underlies this figure also.

13. Acts 8 9-24: Simon = Paul.

(a) Only Paul, not a magician, could have had the wish to be able to impart the gift of the Holy Spirit, and thereby attain equality of rank with the original apostles; and Simon's so rapid conversion to Christianity can apply only to Paul, the narrative already presupposing him to be a Christian and interesting itself solely in his desire to be able to impart the gift of the Spirit. In the same direction point also the words of Peter (8 21): 'thou hast neither part nor lot (κλῆρος) in the matter'; for κλῆρος (RV 'portion,' RVmg. 'lot') is in 1 17 (cp 1 25) used of the apostolate, the attainment of which by a magician is barred from the outset.

(b) Equality of rank with the original apostles was refused to Paul also by their party (1 Cor. 9 2: 'if to others I am not an apostle,' etc.), for which reason the apostle himself claims it with the emphasis which we see (9 1 1 1 2 Cor. 1 1 Gal. 1 1 Rom. 1 1-6). Now, it is not difficult to discern in Peter's other expressions also in Acts 8 21-23, traces of the polemic which was being carried on against Paul.

'Thy heart is not right before God' (v. 21) has a close similarity to the expression used in 13 10 in addressing Bar-jesus (i.e., Paul): 'wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?' At the same time, however, the phraseology recalls also Gal. 2 14: 'they walked not uprightly (οὐκ ὀρθοποδοῦσιν) according to the truth of the gospel.' So Paul expresses himself in Antioch against Peter and his fellows. Thus we perceive that Acts 8 9-24 is the counterpart to the setting down of Peter by Paul at Antioch, and we are able to understand 8 23. For this verse does not mean, as in AV RV, 'thou art in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity.' 'In the bond' might be intelligible, but 'in the gall' not. Thus εἰς χολὴν . . . ὁρῶ σε ὄντα is the same familiar Hebraism as we find in Mt. 19 5: 'I see that thou art bitter gall and an iniquitous bond.' Paul must have seemed like 'bitter gall' on account of his opposition to Peter in Antioch, and an 'iniquitous restraint' in so far as he endeavoured to prevent Peter from again withdrawing from table-fellowship with the Gentile Christians. Lastly, Simon's repentance (8 24) has its parallels (i.e., according to § 9, its foundation) in the Homilies and Recognitions (above, § 4 b).

(c) But, did Paul really offer the original apostles money in order to obtain from them a recognition of his equality with them? Certainly not. But it was merely the finishing touch to the discovery of the Simon romance when Volkmar (Tüb. Theol. Jahrbb. 1856, pp. 279-286) perceived that Paul, according to Jewish-Christian scandal, was held to have done so when he carried the great collection to Jerusalem on the occasion of his last journey thither (1 Cor. 16 1-4 2 Cor. 8 f. Rom. 15 25-28).

On this presupposition, let us now ask what judgment we ought to form as to the literary activity of the author of Acts.

14. Tendency of Acts 8 9-24.

(a) If the Samaritan Simon was not a historical person, the author of Acts invented him in order to say that not Paul but a Samaritan magician was the Simon with regard to whom Jewish-Christian stories told that he had wished to purchase equality with the apostles with money, and had been repulsed by Peter. If, on the other hand, a Samaritan Simon really did exist, then also the author of Acts can nevertheless have made use of him simply as a means for attaining the same purpose. In this event, the representation that the affair had happened before Paul's conversion, must be regarded as specially effective.

(b) In order not to be compelled to attribute this to the author of Acts, Lipsius in his latest treatment (Apokr. Ap.-Gesch. ii. 1 51 f.) assumed not only that the Samaritan Simon had actually existed, but also that he had an encounter with Peter.

At the same time, inasmuch as what is said in Acts 8 14-17 as to the prerogative of Peter and John in regard to the imparting of the Holy Spirit is quite unhistorical (MINISTRY, § 34 c), Lipsius can uphold his view only on the assumption that the encounter between Peter and Simon had another occasion. When this hypothesis is entertained, however, not only has a region of pure conjecture to be entered upon, but the tendency of the author of Acts remains just as it was before—a tendency to say something unhistorical about Simon in order to blunt the point of the Judaistic allegation that it applied to Paul.

(c) Lipsius further propounds it as a possibility that this substitution for Paul of the Samaritan Simon already lay before the author in one of the sources of Acts. This source, accordingly, it was which followed the tendency to divert from Paul the charge of bribery; the author of Acts, however, failed to perceive this tendency, but relates the story as referring to the Samaritan Simon in all good faith in its trustworthiness.

(d) By way of support of some such expedient, it had already been urged before Lipsius that the magician does not wear Pauline features; or at least not exclusively Pauline features, but also Gnostic ones.

In this connection, however, 8 9 cannot be urged: 'giving out that himself was some great one'; for by this expression he is more nearly brought on a level with Theudas (5 36). Even the fact of his being called 'the power of God that is called Great' (8 10) admits of being carried back to Paul. Paul, indeed, not only calls his gospel a power of God (Rom. 1 16 1 Cor. 1 18 24), but also claims himself to possess the power of God (2 Cor. 4 7 6 7 12 9 13 4 1 Cor. 5 4). Yet it remains possible that the expression in Acts 8 10 is a Gnostic one, especially in view of the word καλουμένη. We have no more reason for omitting this with HLP sah than we have for deleting τοῦ θεοῦ, after Blass (St. Kr. 1896, p. 462), on the sole ground of the Latin translation of Perpignan (ACTS, col. 50, n. 2). On the other hand, neither also is there any occasion for taking μεγάλη as the Aramaic participle Pael (מגלא or מגלי = 'the revealer'; so Klostermann, Probleme im Aposteltext, 1883, pp. 15-21). In the pseudo-Clementine Homilies (2 22) we read in the description of the Gnostic predicates of Simon: 'he wishes to be accounted a certain supreme power, higher even than the god who created the world' (θέλει νομίζεσθαι ἀνωτάτη τις εἶναι δύναμις καὶ αὐτοῦ τοῦ τὸν κόσμον κτίσαντος θεοῦ [ἀνωτέρα is perhaps to be supplied]; Recog. 2 7: excelsam virtutem quæ supra creatorem deum sit; cp § 3 a, and SIMON PETER, § 33 a).

(e) Yet, even if the author of Acts has already taken up a Gnostic feature into his presentation of Simon, the fact remains that he was aware of, and wished to obviate, the reproach that Paul had wished to purchase for himself equality with the original apostles by means of his great collection. Otherwise, he would not have passed the collection over in such complete silence in chap. 21, where we should have expected its delivery to be recorded, whilst yet he has preserved in 20 4 from the 'we-source' (according to a highly probable conjecture) the list of those who brought it (GALATIA, § 22). Not till 24 17 has been reached does the author allude to it at all, but here in such a manner that it becomes something quite different—viz., 'alms for my nation,' not for the Christians in Palestine only. For the main purpose of the book—the representation of the harmony subsisting between Paul and the original apostles (ACTS, § 3, end)—the mention of the collection would have been serviceable in the highest degree. This may be the reason why a collection brought by Paul to the Christians in Jerusalem is actually mentioned, though at a time at which it is historically impossible (11 29 f. 12 25; cp COUNCIL, § 1 a). All these circumstances speak for tendency too clearly to allow us to shut our eyes to the presence of the same thing in 8 9-24.

(f) The decision which must be pronounced, that tendency is at work here, is not weakened, but strengthened, by separating out a source which was not (as with Lipsius; above, c) already a tendency-document, but rather as absolutely historical as possible (above, § 1, b-d); for the user of this source has all the more assuredly, in that case, purposely introduced by his interpolations the tendency which the present narrative as a whole exhibits.

(g) What we are able to absolve him from, then, is certainly in no case (whether he used sources or not) the deliberate intention of representing the great collection in another light than that which agreed with actual facts, in order to take away all foundation from evil rumours about Paul which were based on the facts; the most that one can do is to absolve him from the charge of having deliberately invented statements of fact, if we assume that he actually knew of the existence of the Samaritan Simon which we must recognise as a fact, and in good faith believed that it must have been this Simon who made the attempt to bribe, and that Peter must have withstood him. This view admits of being understood as a result of his general assumption that the party of the original apostles cannot possibly have stood in a relation of such hostility to Paul (cp the similar judgment expressed under BARJESUS, § 4 c). It still, however, remains impossible to deny that the author has been led by tendency to be silent as to the real history of the collection, just as he has been led to be silent about the dispute between Peter and Paul at Antioch, and about Titus (see COUNCIL, §§ 3 end, 7 end), or that he relates matters for which he had no historical warrant.

1. Name. Simon, or Symeon (ϹΥΜΕѠΝ; so 𝔊 for שִׁמְעוֹן; see SIMEON, § 8), was the original and proper name of the intimate disciple of Jesus who was destined to be for ever known throughout all Christendom by the surname of Peter.

(a) The name Simon is a classical one which occurs (for example) in Aristophanes, Lysias, and Demosthenes. Ever since the Jews began the practice of assuming Greek or Greek-sounding names, alongside of their proper Hebrew ones, to be employed in intercourse with the outside world (cp BARNABAS, § 1, end, and NAMES, § 86), Simon was regarded as an appropriate equivalent for Symeon, all the more because in the selection of such equivalents similarity of sound was considered an important element. (b) The form Simon (Σίμων) is that almost invariably met with in the OT Apocrypha (3 Ezra [1 Esd.] 9 32 Ecclus. 50 1; also in 1, 2 and 4 Macc.). Only once is the well-known Maccabæan leader called Συμεών (1 Macc. 2 65); so too only once his great grandfather (2 1), and the son of the patriarch Jacob thrice (4 Macc. 2 19 Judith 6 15 9 2). For the last-named Josephus invariably writes Symeon (or Semeon: Συμεών, var. Σεμεών), for all other persons he has Simon (Σίμων), except in two cases (Ant. xii. 6 1, § 265—for the ancestor of the Maccabees—and in BJ iv. 3 9, § 159, where in each case Συμεών is found). Soon after the apostolic age it even came about that the Greek form was taken to underlie the Hebrew and סִימוֹן was written instead of שִׁמְעוֹן (cp NAMES, § 86, end). (c) In the NT Simon (Σίμων) is the current form. Symeon (Συμεών), in fact (if we leave out of account the patriarch, mentioned in Rev. 7 7, the ancestor of Jesus in Lk. 3 30, the aged prophet of Lk. 2 25 34, and the prophet and teacher of Antioch in Syria who bore the surname of Niger, Acts 13 1) occurs but twice; and in both instances—in 2 Pet. 1 1 as well as in Acts 15 14—is used with the obvious intention of giving special solemnity to the designation of the apostle. In Acts 15 this is all the more unmistakable because Peter is the name used throughout the rest of the book, except in presence of Cornelius or in the mouth of his messengers, when the style always is 'Simon whose surname is Peter' (10 5 18 32 11 13). It hardly needs to be said that we cannot assume the author of Acts to be here following a literally exact report; we see rather how as a literary artist he is taking account of the situation he is describing. Similarly it is plainly with conscious intention that in the third Gospel he uses the name Simon (4 38 5 3-10) down to the point at which in connection with the choice of the apostles (6 14) he mentions the giving of the name Peter. Only in 5 8 does he let fall the double designation 'Simon Peter'; we may perhaps hazard the conjecture that the addition of 'Peter' is due merely to the carelessness of a copyist (it is wanting in D, in 2 MSS [13 and 69] of the Ferrar group and in the old Lat. codd. a, b, e). Throughout the whole of the rest of the gospel 'Simon' recurs only in the mouth of Jesus (22 31) and of the disciples (24 34). In the only other passage where Jesus addresses the apostle (22 34) we find 'Peter' (Πέτρε). This, however, is probably introduced for the sake of the contrast; Jesus in effect says that Peter will be so far from showing himself a rock that he will actually deny his master. In the two passages in Acts where Peter is addressed (10 13 11 7: in the vision at Joppa) we also find 'Peter' (Πέτρε). It would be difficult to suggest any special reason for this here; the author will simply be following his prevailing custom.

(d) In Mk. also we find the same principles operative in determining the employment of the name Simon. Down to the choice of the apostles (3 16) we invariably find 'Simon' (1 16 29 f. 36), but after that only once, in the single instance in which the apostle is addressed by Jesus (14 37). Mt. departs from this only in so far as he adds the surname Peter to the name of Simon not only when he records the choosing of the apostles (10 2) but also at the point where he first has occasion to name its bearer at all (4 18), and thus as early as 8 14 he is able to use the simple designation 'Peter.' In the places where the apostle is addressed by Jesus Mt. also never uses 'Peter,' but always 'Simon' (17 25), or with special solemnity, 'Simon son of Jonas' (16 17).[1]

(e) Similarly, it is in accord with the solemnity of the moment at which Peter confesses Jesus as the Messiah that we find Mt. using here (16 16), though nowhere else, the combination 'Simon Peter.' In Mk. it does not occur at all, in Lk. only in 5 8 (see above, c); in 2 Pet. 1 1 it is found in B, the Ferrar MSS 13 and 69, and other cursives, but Symeon Peter (Συμεὼν Πέτρος) is certainly to be preferred, as the form Symeon is rare and thus cannot easily have been introduced into the text by copyist's error merely.

(f) On the other hand this combination 'Simon Peter,' which as we have seen is so rare elsewhere, is the usual designation in the Fourth Gospel. 'Peter' alone is comparatively infrequent and occurs only where 'Simon Peter' has immediately preceded (1 44 13 8 37 18 11 16-18 26 f. 20 3 f. 21 7 a 17 20 f.), in other words only in order to avoid a quite excessive stiffness; yet even in such cases there are several instances in which the more formal 'Simon Peter' immediately recurs (13 9 20 6 21 7 b). Jn. agrees with Mt. in using 'Simon [son] of John' (1 42 21 15-17) in the two instances where he represents the apostle as directly addressed by Jesus, with Mk. and Lk. in using 'Simon' without addition when the bearer of the name is first mentioned (1 41).

(g) The Aramaic name Kēphā (כֵּיפָא; in AT only in pl. כֵּפִים 𝔊 πέτραι, Jer. 4 29 Job 30 6) is used only by Paul, who employs its Græcised form Κηφᾶς (EV Cephas). Or rather, outside of the Pauline writings it occurs but once; namely in Jn. 1 42 where Jesus gives it as a surname to Simon, with the addition, however, 'which is by interpretation Peter.' Since the name Simon serves perfectly well as a Greek equivalent for Symeon we can all the more readily believe that Peter (and Cephas) was not a name assumed by the bearer himself, that it was bestowed upon him by Jesus. Moreover, Peter was not at all a current name at that time. In Josephus it occurs once (Ant. xviii. 6 3, § 156) according to the testimony of the Epitome which in many instances has alone preserved the true text; all the MSS, however, read Protus (Πρῶτος) which also was a proper name. According to Pape-Benseler (Wörterb. d. griech. Eigennamen), apart from Christian circles Peter would seem to have been first brought into currency through Roman influence.

(h) From what has been said it will be evident that with NT writers the honorific name of the apostle was the only one in general currency, and that they used his proper name Simon (or Symeon) only when there were literary reasons for doing so. This holds good also for the author (not hitherto referred to) of 1 Pet. who calls himself (1 1) Πέτρος. From the epistles of Paul we can gather that the Aramaic form of this honorific name was known even in Galatia (Gal. 1 18 2 9 11 14) and in Corinth (1 Cor. 1 12 3 22 9 5 15 5). And in fact this is not to be accounted for by some such reason as a mere personal habit of Paul's to call him so; rather must we infer from 1 Cor. 1 12 that Peter's own followers had brought his name in its Aramaic form to Corinth; for we may be sure that Paul when he attributes the words

[1] On the form of the name of Simon's father see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 1, middle.

'I [am] of Cephas' to the Petrine party at Corinth is rendering their language with literal fidelity. Yet from Paul's twice saying 'Peter' (Gal. 2 7 f.) we must not conclude that the verses in which the name occurs are from another hand; for along with the Aramaic name we may be sure that the Galatians, precisely because it was an honorific name, not a proper name in the stricter sense of the word, would be apprised, whether by Paul or by some other, of its meaning also.

A. PALESTINIAN PERIOD.

I. ACCORDING TO PAUL AND ACTS.

It the question is asked whither we ought to turn for our most secure data for the life of Peter, the answer must be: neither to the Gospels nor to Acts where there is so much that is open to critical deduction, but to the epistles of Paul.

2. Pauline notices.

As to the genuineness of these see GALATIANS, §§ 1-9; and on 1 Cor. 15 1-11, in particular, see RESURRECTION-NARRATIVES, §§ 10 f. As regards Gal. 2 11-13 it may be added that Völter, although holding Galatians to be entirely spurious, sees in these three verses a real historical record which was known to the author of Acts and by him so made use of for 10 1-11 18 as to make it appear that not Paul, but precisely Peter, was the first to make a stand for table-fellowship between Jewish and Gentile Christians (Kompos. d. paulin. Hauptbriefe, 1890, pp. 149-154).

The following are the facts we learn from these epistles.

(a) Peter was the first to witness an appearance of the risen Jesus (1 Cor. 15 5). As to the fundamental importance of this event, see RESURRECTION, § 37.

(b) Paul, three years after his conversion, found Peter in Jerusalem along with James the brother of Jesus in a prominent position (Gal. 1 18 f.); fourteen years later he again found him along with James the brother of Jesus and John the son of Zebedee occupying the position of leaders of the church who had received from their supporters the honorific title of 'the pillars' (οἱ στῦλοι; Gal. 2 1-10; see COUNCIL, § 6).

(c) On the occasion just mentioned, that of the 'council of Jerusalem,' Peter with James and John was, at the outset, by no means on Paul's side, and in the course of the discussions which took place suffered himself to be brought to concede Paul's contention that heathen ought to be admitted to Christian privileges without circumcision, not on grounds of principle but only in view of the established fact of Paul's missionary success, a fact in which he was constrained to recognise the hand of God (Gal. 2 7-9; COUNCIL, §§ 4, 8).

(d) The fellowship (κοινωνία) with Paul and Barnabas which, along with James and John, he then ratified by joining hands (Gal. 2 9) was a restricted one. It was based upon the arrangement that the mission to the Gentiles should be undertaken by Paul and Barnabas whilst the original apostles restricted themselves to the Jewish field—a restriction which they took in a strictly ethnographical sense, their purpose being to proclaim the gospel thenceforward to circumcised persons only, not also to Gentiles living in the midst of a Jewish population, and thus to be in a position in which they could go on observing the law of Moses which forbade defilement by intercourse with the uncircumcised (COUNCIL, § 9).

(e) Peter took up a somewhat less rigid attitude when after a certain interval he came to Antioch and participated in the common meals of the mixed community of Jewish and Gentile Christians there. All the more harmful was the effect when after the arrival of some followers (or, it may be, direct emissaries) of James he withdrew from this participation, and by his example, at least, if not by express utterances, led the other Jewish Christians, and even Barnabas, to take the same step (Gal. 2 11-21). The charge of hypocrisy which Paul brought against him on this account must in all probability be regarded as unjust and be modified to one of inconsistency. The freedom in relation to the Mosaic law which he asserted by his behaviour on his first coming to Antioch will have been the result merely of a genial temper called forth by the pleasant conditions of that particular community, not the result of any firmly established conviction. Peter was not so strictly legal as James, but essentially he was still unemancipated from the fetters of the law (see COUNCIL, § 3).

(f) That Peter suffered himself to be convinced by Paul's argumentation (Gal. 2 14-21) must not be supposed; for the incident in Antioch was followed by the systematic invasion of the Pauline communities by Jewish emissaries, with which we are made acquainted in Galatians and Corinthians. Had Peter recognised that Paul had right on his side he needed only to assert his authority and to call to mind the arrangement indicated in Gal. 2 9 and all attempts to undermine the influence of Paul in the communities he had founded and to win them back to Judaism would have ceased. The leaders of the primitive church, and among these Peter so long as he was in Palestine, must be held responsible for a share in this action against Paul by the withholding of their veto at least, if not even by overt action—such as, for example, perhaps the issue of recommendatory letters (2 Cor. 3 1). See COUNCIL, § 3.

(g) It will be convenient to take up at this point also the last notices of Peter that are found in Paul, even though these should possibly lie outside the period of Peter's activity in Palestine. In Corinth there was, according to 1 Cor. 1 12 3 22, a Cephas-party. That Peter himself was ever in Corinth is utterly improbable.

No one earlier than Dionysius of Corinth (about 170 A.D.; ap. Eus. HE ii. 25 8; see below, § 25 a) knows anything of Peter's ever having been at Corinth. Cp, as against this assumption, only such a passage as 1 Cor. 4 15. But, further, if Peter had followed Paul in Corinth, Paul who names him with respect in 1 Cor. 9 5 15 5, and in 3 4 f. refrains from naming him also out of respect ('when one saith, I am of Paul, and another, I am of Apollos: are ye not men?') would not have expressed himself so sharply as he does in 3 10-15 with regard to all those who had come after him there.

Nevertheless the rise of a Cephas-party in Corinth is readily explicable. Real disciples of Peter came to Corinth and the followers whom they gained in the community there took up from them their watchword: 'I am of Cephas.' Now, there was also at Corinth, as we know, besides this party the Christ-party which was strictly Judaistic (see CORINTHIANS, § 16). Inasmuch as the Cephas-party remained apart from it, we see here also another evidence that within Jewish Christendom Peter represented the milder school. In 2 Cor. it is only of the Christ-party that we continue to hear (10 7), no longer of that of Cephas.

(h) Finally, we learn incidentally that in his missionary journeys, which in accordance with Gal. 2 9 we are to think of as being made in regions having a Jewish population, Peter was accompanied by his wife, and for her as well as for himself asked and received sustenance from the communities in which he laboured (1 Cor. 9 4 f.).

In the accounts in Acts relating to these same events there is practically no agreement with what we learn from Paul except on the quite general statement that Peter at the time of the council held along with James a prominent position in the church at Jerusalem. All else is absent, or otherwise reported.

3. Parallels in Acts.

(a) As regards the silence of Acts, no one will find it surprising that no express mention is made of the outstanding importance of Peter at Paul's first visit to Jerusalem; the thing is presupposed (but cp c). It is all the more remarkable, however, that the book has not a word to say about the dispute of the two apostles at Antioch, about the Cephas-party in Corinth, or about the Judaistic invasion of the Pauline communities and the part taken by the original apostles in this; and that in fact it substitutes for the first-mentioned dispute another which arose between Paul and one of those engaged in the conflict, only in this case not Peter but Barnabas, and on a question which, dogmatically considered, was wholly indifferent—viz., as to whether John Mark should or should not be taken as a companion on the second missionary journey (Acts 15 36-40). Such a notice is very well adapted, it is obvious, to counteract any representation of the real state of the case that might have been derived from (let us say) the Epistle to the Galatians or from oral tradition, by its substitution of another which deprives the affair of any considerable importance. Furthermore, of any missionary journey of Peter one learns nothing more than the little that is said in Acts 9 32 43; for, in spite of 8 25*b* ('they . . . preached the gospel to many villages of the Samaritans'), 8 14-25 is to be taken less as a missionary journey than as a tour of inspection (see below, § 4 b). In 12 17 we are told merely that after his deliverance from prison Peter went from Jerusalem to another place. Whither he went or what he did there we are not informed. In 15 7 we find him again in Jerusalem as if this were a matter of course. The author of the book has not deemed it necessary in speaking of a person of Peter's importance to give any connected account of his activity.

(b) The account of the council in Jerusalem in Acts is in glaring contradiction with what we read in Paul.

In place of the arrangement with Peter, James, and John for a division of the missionary field we have a decree of the primitive Church which is directly excluded by Gal. 2 6 as well as by 1 Cor. 8 10 14-11 1 (7 12-14) and finds its only historical foundation in a custom of the second century, not at all of the first (see COUNCIL, § 10 f.). In particular, Peter comes forward at the very beginning of the discussions with a discourse the dogmatic portion of which (15 9*b*-11) would be appropriate only in the mouth of Paul; had Peter actually spoken it he would have deserved in the fullest degree the reproach of hypocrisy for his reversion to the Mosaic law at Antioch. The event, however, on which Peter relies in the narrative part of his discourse (15 7-9*a*), had it been really historical, would have made the council an impossibility from the first; for if a Gentile in the full sense of the word, as Cornelius is represented to have been in 10 28 11 3, had been received by Peter into the Christian community, and if the primitive church, by reason of the divine command followed by Peter in doing so, had given its approval (11 5-18), the question would already have been settled and could not again be raised, or if it had been raised must have been answered by a simple reference to this fact without recourse being needed to any council (see CORNELIUS, § 2 f., 5).

(c) Finally, even what has been spoken of under (a) as not open to antecedent objection—the absence of mention of Peter on the occasion of the first visit to Jerusalem—rests upon false information; for in Acts 9 26-30 Paul is represented not, as in Gal. 1 18 f. 22, as having visited Peter and James only, but as having conversed in full publicity with the entire Christian community of Jerusalem.

Thus, in so far as we are able to control Acts by the Epistles of Paul, Acts is seen to have little claim to our confidence in anything it has to say about Peter. We can hardly expect to be able to repose more confidence in it in those portions where it is our sole informant.

The opinion is widely held that the trustworthiness of Acts as regards Peter has been strengthened when it has been pointed out that the first half of Acts has an older source behind it. That we have to reckon with one or more sources becomes particularly plain in the discourses of Peter (see ACTS, § 14), in the pentecost narrative (SPIRITUAL GIFTS, § 10), and in that relating to primitive communism (COMMUNITY OF GOODS, §§ 1-4). It can only be regarded, however, as indicative of the extreme recklessness with which many theologians deal with such questions if we find them taking for granted that, once the existence of a source has been made out, the trustworthiness of its contents has also been forthwith established. If Acts was composed about 100-130 A.D. its sources may easily have been late enough to be legendary in character, and even should many parts—the discourses, let us say—be found worthy of credence, this would not necessarily by any means apply, therefore, to all the other contents as well. The temptation to idealise the primitive Church was only too easy, and, moreover the general drift or tendency of the final composer has also to be taken into account as a very important factor (see ACTS, §§ 3-6).

4. Other data in Acts.

(a) As for the conversion of Cornelius, it is only necessary to recall what has been said already (above, § 3 b) that, regarded as a Gentile conversion, it is an impossibility unless we are to take it as having happened at a date subsequent to the Council of Jerusalem—a supposition, however, which is also impossible (see CORNELIUS, § 2).

The only possible way of saving some historical kernel for the story would be by regarding Cornelius as a Jewish proselyte who had already been circumcised. No such thing, however, is anywhere said in Acts (not even in 10 2 22 25) and the idea is diametrically opposed to the representation as a whole (see CORNELIUS, § 3). The narrative is a conspicuous illustration of the extent to which the author could be led away from historical truth by his tendency or rooted inclination to regard Peter, not Paul, as the originator of every progressive movement in Christianity, and particularly of the mission to the Gentiles. Thus it is not at all necessary for us to dwell upon the special difficulties that attach to the closely corresponding visions of Cornelius and Peter (9 3-16) as integral parts of the far-reaching parallelism between Peter and Paul which is to be observed in Acts (see ACTS, § 4, end).

(b) That Peter and John should have visited Samaria after Philip's missionary labours there (8 14-25) is very conceivable. The main thing reported in this connection, however—namely, that it was by means of the laying-on of hands of the two original apostles that the Samaritans who had already been baptised received the Holy Ghost—cannot be regarded as historical (ACTS, § 10, end; MINISTRY, § 34 c). The statement rests upon a strongly hierarchical idea which, moreover, in virtue of the parallelism just alluded to, is extended to Paul also (19 6), and marks out this journey of Peter and John as one of episcopal inspection. On the unhistorical character of 8 18-24 see SIMON MAGUS, §§ 1, 13 f.

(c) The miracles of Peter—the healing of the man lame from his birth (3 1-11), of Æneas in Lydda who had been lame for eight years (9 32-35), the raising of Tabitha at Joppa (9 36-42), and the many works of healing performed by the apostles which led to the belief that they could be effected even by Peter's shadow (5 12 15 f.)—are all primarily to be viewed in the light of the parallelism with Paul. Since the author of Acts had at his command a larger supply of materials relating to Paul than of materials relating to Peter, with the result that he left out much in order to avoid making Paul appear greater than Peter (see ACTS, § 4, end), it is natural to conjecture that he would be eager to lay hold of any item regarding Peter which came to his hand without subjecting it to any too severe a scrutiny.

The case of Æneas moreover plainly shows how little the author of Acts felt it necessary to form to himself any concrete image of what he was relating. The course of events cannot in reality be conceived as occurring in the manner described: Peter came, looked upon the sick man, and without further preliminary said, 'Jesus Christ heals thee; arise' and so forth. In this form, devoid of any indication of a previous conversation with the sufferer or any enquiry as to his spiritual condition, the story cannot possibly have come from the mouth of an eye-witness; it comes to us in the form of the most meagre extract, where the interest is merely in the bare fact of the miracle without any regard to attendant circumstances or to any psychological features. If, however, the story as we now have it does not come from an eye-witness its historicity also becomes questionable even if it be difficult to suppose that the name Æneas is wholly imaginary. The healing of the lame man in the temple is accomplished with almost equal abruptness. In the case of the raising of Tabitha it is worth observing how widely it differs from its counterpart, the raising of Eutychus (20 7-12). Eutychus comes to life again not long after his accident and Paul expressly says: 'his life is in him.' But here Peter must first be summoned from Lydda to Joppa. As regards the wholesale miracles of healing in 5 12 15 f., finally, apart from their astonishing range it has to be observed that the text in this place is wholly devoid of connection (see ACTS, § 11). Cp further, f, below.

(d) The sudden death of Ananias and Sapphira (5 1-11) comes under a different category in so far as it is capable of being explained, if one so choose, without postulating any miracle. The naturalistic explanation, however, will make it all the more probable that in the course of transmission or at the time when it was fixed in writing the occurrence acquired a more dramatic character than originally and actually it possessed. It can hardly be doubted that the composer of Acts regards it as a miracle; but the credibility of his narrative is just at this point rendered questionable by the circumstance that within the compass of a few verses he sets forth two wholly irreconcilable views on the subject of community of goods in the primitive church (see COMMUNITY OF GOODS, § 3 f.).

(e) With respect to the three imprisonments of Peter (in 4 3 5 18 along with the other apostles, in 12 3-5 without them) and his two miraculous deliverances (5 19 12 6-17), the conjecture has long been current that all the accounts relate to but one occurrence which gradually came to be told in different ways.

By separation of sources also it has in some quarters been deemed possible to show that in the source of chaps. 4 and 5 there was no word of an imprisonment of the apostles (so, for example, Bern. Weiss). In 4 9 f. the lame man who has been healed stands by the side of the apostles before the synedrium. This is conceivable only if he had been cited as a witness before that court or had been arrested along with the apostles. Neither of these things however is said; in fact, both are excluded, for in v. 14 the members of the court take knowledge of his presence as something new. What is apparently suggested is much rather that the members of the court, immediately after the healing had been wrought, betook themselves to the apostles in the temple and that their dealings with them took place here. To escape this Spitta finds himself compelled to regard the mention of the man who has been healed, in 4 10 (end) and in 4 14, as an addition to his source made by the composer himself—certainly not an easy assumption. In 5 28 we should surely have expected to read that the high priest had taken the accused to account not only for their preaching of Jesus but also for their escape from prison, if the source from which 5 28 is taken had also contained 5 18 f.

In chap. 12 on the other hand the picture is very vivid and it would be difficult to believe that, for example, the name Rhoda is a mere invention. In this case in point of fact there is no need to deny the imprisonment and the liberation, or even that the liberation appeared very wonderful alike to Peter and to all the other persons mentioned; and yet it admits of a very intelligible explanation if with Hausrath we suppose that the angel who brought Peter forth from the prison will have been the death-angel of Herod Agrippa (NTliche Zeitgesch.[2], 2 351 f.). With the death of a ruler the prison doors often opened for those whom he perchance had locked up more out of caprice than in any supposed interests of justice.

(f) There is yet another consideration which tells against the historicity of the two imprisonments of the apostles and the miracles wrought by them in Jerusalem. If they had come forward at so early a date into publicity so marked as to call for the intervention of the synedrium, that body would hardly have rested satisfied with merely enjoining them not to preach Christ (4 18 21) or with scourging them (5 40).

The danger which Jesus by his recent ministry had brought upon the ancestral religion was still fresh in men's memories. On the re-emergence of the same danger the synedrium would assuredly have interposed with the utmost vigour and the persecution of the Christians first mentioned in Acts as occurring after the death of Stephen (8 1 3) would certainly have broken out much sooner and threatened the well-being and even the existence of the church just in proportion to its immaturity and want of consolidation. In all probability the Christians found themselves constrained to remain entirely in concealment for a considerable time. That the original apostles whose homes were in Galilee should have removed to Jerusalem at so early a date as is represented in Acts is, moreover, quite unlikely (see MINISTRY, § 21 d). It was only what was quite natural if the spontaneous impulse to present the primitive church in the most favourable light led to the view that the original apostles, and above all Peter, had faced the civil power undismayed and plainly declared that they were determined to disregard the prohibition to preach Jesus, and that they must obey God rather than man (4 19 f. 5 29). It was forgotten that such conduct would certainly have led to their destruction. As to the untrustworthiness of 5 36 f. see, further, THEUDAS, §§ 1-3.

(g) The portion of Acts relating to Peter which seems to possess the largest claim to be regarded as trustworthy is that which records his speeches (with exception of 15 7-11, on which see above, § 3 b). It must not, however, for a moment be imagined that they are verbally or even throughout in substance accurate. What we read in 1 16-22, and the coincidences of the other addresses of Peter with those of Paul, show in the clearest possible way that they all are compositions of the author of Acts

SIMON PETER

(see ACTS, § 14). Observe, moreover, that a main point in their contents, the proof of the resurrection of Jesus drawn from Ps. 16 10 (Acts 2 27), is possible only when 𝔊 (not MT) is followed, and would thus have been impossible in the mouth of Peter (see RESURRECTION-NARRATIVES, § 36 c). If these discourses assigned to Peter agree, in their Christology especially, with what seems to us to be in harmony with the oldest pre-Pauline view, this does not admit of explanation as due simply to the employment of a source of this character. The most important factor is rather that the author of Acts must himself personally have been attached to such a view. As he puts it into the mouth of Paul also, it becomes possible indeed, but by no means provable, that he drew it from an old and trustworthy source when he was making the speeches of Peter.

(h) Thus it appears that on the whole Acts adds extraordinarily little of a trustworthy character to what we already know about Peter from the Pauline Epistles. Relatively speaking the most assured of its additions would seem to be the fact of his imprisonment and liberation about the time of the death of Herod Agrippa (44 A.D.), but without the supernatural features in the narrative. The other remaining facts which are not open to question, as for example his stay for a time at Joppa in the house of Simon the tanner (9 43 10 6), are of but trifling importance. As regards Ananias and Sapphira, Æneas, Tabitha, Cornelius, it may perhaps be safe to suppose that Peter had relations with these persons of such sort as supplied some basis for what we read about them in Acts; but what these relations precisely were remains obscure. Nor are we any better off when we are told that he often came forward as speaker for all the original apostles, for we cannot regard as trustworthy records the reports of the speeches attributed to him in Acts.

II. ACCORDING TO THE SYNOPTISTS.

Turning now to the earlier period of the life of Peter there arises—

(a) First, the question of the credibility of what we read in the synoptists in regard to this. That the books were not written without definite 'tendencies' may be taken as proved (see GOSPELS, §§ 108-114). Moreover, such tendencies could come into play with peculiar readiness where the judgment as to Peter was involved. To a Jewish Christian he must have seemed the leading figure of all Christendom, whereas to a Paulinist he must just as inevitably have seemed the opponent of the true apostle, an unreasonable obstructionist, a narrow-minded resister of the real will of God which required the mission to the Gentiles. Now where tendencies influence the production of gospels their natural effect is that judgments which the author personally holds about a given person or thing are put into the mouth of Jesus himself in the naive persuasion that he could not have held any other view than that which the writer held to be true at the time of writing. If the student is unwilling to go so far as to suppose that whole narratives have been freely invented with no other basis than a desire to exalt or to depreciate Peter, it still remains easy to believe that an author whose disposition towards Peter was friendly would be ready to omit or tone down incidents which told against that apostle, whilst another whose inclination was less favourable would suppress or weaken things which told the other way.

5. Synoptists as sources for life.

(b) In its search for such tendencies, however, criticism has often gone very far astray. To begin with, because the representatives of tendency-criticism have for the most part entirely dispensed with any inquiry as to sources of the synoptics, or any attempt to distinguish earlier from later portions in them. From the standpoint of pure tendency-criticism it is very tempting to suppose that the most honorific passage in Mt. about Peter (16 17-19) was omitted by Lk. and Mk. because they both were—Mk. in a less degree than Lk., it is true—Paulinists. In reality, however, such a supposition must be rejected—not only for Mk. inasmuch as Mk. was not acquainted with the gospel of Mt., but also for Lk. inasmuch as the section in Mt. is exceedingly probably a quite late interpolation (see GOSPELS, §§ 136, 151; MINISTRY, § 4 f.).

(c) Nor is this all; the gospels frequently present us with the opposite of what we should have expected from the point of view of the tendency-critics.

It is tempting to suppose that it was out of reverence for Peter that Mt. (17 4 f.) suppressed what Mk. (9 6) and Lk. (9 33) report, that Peter at the transfiguration knew not (Mk.) what to say or (Lk.) what he was saying; but where the same touch recurs in Mk. (14 40) we find that it is suppressed not only by Mt. but also by Lk. Tempting, again, is it to suppose that it is a result of tendency that Lk. (8 51-53) says, not of the multitude in the house of Jairus, as Mk. (5 38-40) and Mt. (9 23 f.) do, but of Peter with James and John and the damsel's parents that they laughed Jesus to scorn when he said the damsel was not dead but sleeping (cp below, § 12 a). Yet where, according to Mk. (8 33) and Mt. (16 23), Jesus calls Peter Satan it is Lk. (9 22) who omits the whole passage. Once more, it is tempting to suppose that a leading place among the disciples is being given to Peter when according to Mt. 17 24 the collectors of the temple tax approach him with their enquiry why his master does not pay it, or when according to Mt. (18 21) he addresses a question to Jesus whilst according to Lk. (17 4)—the incident does not appear at all in Mk.—Jesus gives the answer unasked. But, on the other side, we find Lk. (12 41) assigning to Peter an interpolated question which is wholly wanting in Mt. (24 44 f.); a saying which Mk. (5 31) assigns to the disciples in general—the passage does not occur at all in Mt.—is by Lk. (8 45) assigned to Peter alone ('Master, the multitudes press thee and crush thee'); and where Mt. (15 15) does the same, attributing to Peter and not, as Mk. (7 17), to the disciples the request for an explanation of a parable—Lk. omits the incident—the answer is recorded in terms not highly complimentary to the speaker: 'Are ye also even yet without understanding?' What, in fine, are we to say to such facts as these—that only Lk. (22 31 f.) has the saying, the latter half of which is exhibited along with Mt. 16 18 f. in letters of gold in the basilica of St. Peter in Rome, and that it is only Mt. (14 28-31) who reports Peter's little faith when he endeavoured to walk on the water? Baur's only resource here (Krit. Untersuch. über die kanon. Evangg., 1847, p. 471) was to regard the event as involving a great personal distinction conferred upon Peter by Jesus, for which reason it was omitted by Lk. As against this we have only to call to mind how high is the position accorded to Peter by the last-named writer in Acts (see ACTS, § 4).

(d) From what has been said it will be seen that it will not be safe to look for tendency in any remaining differences that may be detected in the accounts of Peter given by the synoptists.

In Mt. (10 2) Peter is designated in the list of the names of the twelve as 'first' (πρῶτος), in Mk. (3 16) and in Lk. (6 14) this numeration is absent. In the story of the transfiguration it is only Lk. (9 32) who records that Peter and John and James were heavy with sleep. According to Mt. 26 17 f. Jesus sends forward 'the disciples' to make the passover preparations; in Mk. (14 13) he sends two only, in Lk. (22 8) these are said to have been Peter and John. In Gethsemane according to Mk. 14 33 and Mt. 26 37 Jesus takes Peter, James, and John to keep watch along with him, in Lk. (22 40) this feature is absent. The question as to the date of the destruction of Jerusalem is in Mk. (13 3) attributed to Peter, James, John, and Andrew, in Mt. (24 3) to the disciples generally, in Lk. (21 5-7) to 'some' (τινές). Cp, further, § 7 c.

(e) The trustworthiness of every statement in the synoptists about Peter, even when not open to any special objection, by no means necessarily follows. Whether, for example, it was Peter or another who propounded the question recorded in Mt. 18 21 or gave the answer now to be read in Lk. 8 45 is for the writers of the gospel narrative a matter of so little importance that variations of statement could very easily arise out of mere inattention. Before coming to a judgment, therefore, regarding the share of Peter in any given occurrence, it will be necessary previously to scrutinise the credibility of the occurrence itself, and over and above this to remember that even when this has been satisfactorily established, Peter's share in it does not at once follow, unless, indeed, his part in it be the very essence of the occurrence. In particular, we must be specially on our guard against the view—widely spread though it be—that the second gospel presents in written form oral communications received by the evangelist from Peter (on this hypothesis see GOSPELS, § 148).

We begin with those accounts in the synoptists which may at the outset be set aside as unhistorical.

6. Walking on the water.

(a) With regard to the story, found only in Mt. (14 28-31), that Peter went to meet Jesus on the Sea of Galilee, but through failure of faith began to sink and had to be rescued by Jesus, we find even so conservative a writer as Bern. Weiss (Leben Jesu(2), 2 209) declaring that critical investigation imperatively demands that it be given up as a statement of prosaic matter of fact, whilst Beyschlag (Leben Jesu, 1 306) expresses the opinion that the desire of Peter that Jesus should bid him come to him on the water is, literally taken, simply childish, and that the miraculous power of Jesus was not bestowed upon him in order that he might be able to respond to every childish caprice. Both theologians are at one with the entire critical school in regarding the narrative as having originally been an allegorical-poetical setting forth of an idea, and that it came to be regarded as literal fact only by a misunderstanding on the part of the evangelist or of the writer whom he followed.

At the same time, it is by no means certain that it was Peter's denial of his master that was originally intended to be figured in the story. In that denial it was not his faith but his fidelity that failed the apostle. Had it been his faith, the underlying presupposition of the story would be that if only Peter had frankly confessed himself the disciple of Jesus he would have come off wholly unharmed. As matters actually stood, however, the worst consequences were really to be apprehended as results of such a confession, though nevertheless it was his duty to make it.

(b) We may be sure that the story of Jesus' walking upon the water was originally a parable intended to exhibit in a graphic way the thought that if his disciples have faith they will be able to walk with safety on the troubled sea (of life) (see GOSPELS, § 142 a). The addition relative to Peter then brings in an illustration based on the opposite thesis; he who has no faith necessarily goes down unless he calls upon the Lord and receives help from him. This view itself, however, in which Jesus appears as the Lord of succour, shows by its very nature that it cannot have come from Jesus himself. He would not have designated himself, but, as in his genuine parables, a person by whom God is meant, as Him from whom help comes. Thus the later origin of the narrative, already rendered probable by its absence from Mk., is confirmed from another point of view. If this be so, we may perhaps go on to suppose that the reason why Peter came to be selected as hero of the story was because he was regarded as head of the church, and what is related of him was intended to be taken as applying to the entire church (so Pfleiderer, Urchristenthum, 517, (2) 1 582).

7. Other unhistorical narratives.

There are other narratives also which require no detailed proof of their unhistorical character.

(a) The statement in Lk. 24 12 that Peter visited the sepulchre of Jesus and found it empty is doubtful even text-critically, and when its substance is considered cannot be accepted (see RESURRECTION-NARRATIVES, §§ 2 c and 21; GOSPELS, § 138 e, f).

(b) Along with the historicity of the statements as to the women at the empty sepulchre must also be given up the historical character of the notice, found only in Mk. (16 7), that they received from the angel the injunction to tell the disciples and Peter that they should see the risen Jesus in Galilee. See GOSPELS, § 138 a, e, f, RESURRECTION-NARRATIVES, § 21, and, as regards an allusion in Mk. 16 7 to a fact indirectly referred to in this, ib. § 9 b.

(c) As the withering of the fig-tree cannot be regarded as historical (see GOSPELS, §§ 137 b β, 141, 142 a), the statement in Mk. (11 21) that Peter called attention to the fact on the following day also disappears. In Mt. 21 20 all the disciples together are already aware of it, for the tree at the word of Jesus withers away 'immediately'; the incident is not found at all in Lk.

8. Transfiguration.

It is difficult to form a definite judgment as to the story of the transfiguration of Jesus in Mk. 9 2-10 = Mt. 17 1-9 = Lk. 9 28-36.

(a) The form in which Jesus is here seen is, on the one hand, that of Moses when he came down from the mountain of the law, according to Ex. 34 29-35, on the other hand, that in which the exalted Christ was conceived of, according to 2 Cor. 3 7-4 6, where Paul cites precisely the passage just mentioned regarding Moses, and that of the angel at the empty tomb, according to Mt. 28 3 (cp Lk. 24 4 Mk. 16 5). Looked at on this side, the scene is accordingly designed to represent by anticipation the coming heavenly glory of Jesus, and at the same time, by the presence of Moses and Elijah, to exhibit it as a fulfilment of the OT. Viewed in this aspect, it can make no claim to historicity.

This would be difficult even were one inclined to concede that the 'metamorphosis' of Jesus did not happen as a physical reality but was seen only by the three disciples in a vision; difficult still even were there a disposition to reduce the number to one, say Peter, on the assumption that James and John were named in error partly because in other places also they are mentioned along with Peter on special occasions as being the disciples who were on terms of special intimacy with the master (see below, §§ 11 c, 12), partly because, according to Ex. 24 9, three intimate associates, Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu (along with seventy of the elders of Israel) are also represented as having gone up with Moses to the mountain of the law. Even so, the question would still remain as to how it was that in the midst of the earthly life of Jesus Peter was visited by the thought which at once assumed for him the form of a vision. (On the psychological antecedents of a vision cp RESURRECTION-NARRATIVES, § 34 a.)

(b) The transfiguration scene, however, has yet another main purpose. It contains the divine declaration that Jesus is the Messiah, in the words 'This is my beloved son.' This voice coincides almost exactly with that heard at the baptism of Jesus (Mk. 1 11 = Mt. 3 17 = Lk. 3 22). If, however, Jesus had already, even at that early date, been divinely proclaimed to be the Messiah, this second fact would necessarily rob the other of its value.

To avoid this the following supposition has been made: just as the divine voice at the baptism, according to the most modest, and therefore most trustworthy of the accounts (that of Mk.), was heard only by Jesus, the whole occurrence admitting of being resolved into an inner revelation communicated to him without external physical accompaniments, so also in the vision in which Jesus was transfigured only Peter (or Peter along with James and John) heard that heavenly voice. So, for example, Réville (Jésus de Nazareth, 2 204-206 [1897]), who therefore inclines to place the occurrence at a date shortly before the confession of the Messiahship of Jesus (Mk. 8 27-29 and ||s). Bacon (Amer. Journ. of Theol., 1902, pp. 236-265) goes a step further. He also supposes that it is a vision of Peter that is described, not, however, a vision which he had actually had, but one which is attributed to him through a transformation of the account relating to his confession that Jesus was the Messiah (Mk. 8 27-31). The transfiguration scene breaks the connection between Mk. 9 1 and 9 11, and comes from a source in which were contained this and other modifications of gospel narratives that were taken by the evangelist to be accounts of new facts.

(c) At the same time, there is no indication in the text that the divine voice was directed to Peter alone (or Peter and James and John); it is indicated with at least equal clearness that it is heard by Jesus. If, then, we have reason for believing that in the first period of his public life Jesus did not yet account himself to be the Messiah, but only a prophet and a reformer, this will incline us to recognise in the divine voice at the Transfiguration a reminiscence of the fact that he only received his divine authorisation to come forward as the Messiah at a particular point in the course of his ministry. The similar saying at his baptism will rest in that case upon an anticipation on the part of the narrators, to whom it was inconceivable that the designation by God of Jesus as the Messiah should have been postponed to any later date. On this assumption also, it becomes reasonable to assign the incident that lies at the basis of the transfiguration-story to a time shortly anterior to the confession of Peter; for so long as Jesus was not himself certain by divine revelation of the fact of his Messiahship he could not accept the proclamation of it by Peter.

(d) The occurrence itself admits very easily of being regarded as having taken place in the inner consciousness of Jesus. The participation of Peter, James, and John becomes in that case much less active. That they were present need not be denied; but their activity would then be limited to this—that, after awaking from sleep perhaps, they received a powerful impression of the wondrous majesty with which Jesus came to meet them after he had heard the heavenly voice. The terms in which this had been expressed they would not in that case hear directly for themselves, but would afterwards learn from the mouth of Jesus. The assertion in 2 Pet. 1 16-18 that Peter himself heard the voice upon the 'holy' mountain does not fall to be taken account of in the present connection, in view of the pseudonymous character of this epistle (see PETER, EPISTLES OF, §§ 9-12).

9. Stater in fish's mouth.

In the story of the stater in the fish's mouth (only Mt. 17 24-27), it has above all to be observed that the miracle is only announced, not described as having happened. All the safer, therefore, is the supposition that here we are in presence of a symbolical saying of Jesus.

The section contains two separate thoughts, of which the one would be quite sufficient without the other. (1) Properly speaking, Jesus and his disciples do not require to pay the tax, but in order to avoid offence they do so. The incident contains the presupposition that Jesus is the Messiah alike whether the words attributed to Jesus were actually spoken by him, or whether they are erroneously put into his mouth; along with this it contains (2) also the exhortation to submit to existing institutions, and thus applies equally well alike to the temple tax which was exacted in the time of Jesus, and to the Roman state tax which from 70 A.D. onwards was substituted for the temple tax in the case of Jews (Jos. BJ vii. 6 6, § 218) and, particularly under Domitian, was rigorously exacted from Christians also (see CHRISTIAN, § 6, vii., end).

It is in connection with the second of these main ideas that Peter comes more directly into the story; he is to fish for the means of paying the tax. As he is a fisherman by occupation, the meaning of this symbolical saying at once suggests itself; by the exercise of his craft he will easily be able to earn enough to meet this call upon him. This feature in the story may point to the authenticity of the saying as attributed to Jesus; but it may also quite well have been invented, as every one in later times knew that Peter had been a fisherman. After the death of Jesus it would have been less easy to have invented that other feature—that the produce of Peter's industry was to serve to pay the tax both for himself and for Jesus; for it is not easy to make out any allegorical application to later conditions of this earning of a double tax. Still, it must be admitted that this pericope is one of the most obscure in the whole gospel history.

10. Other doubtful elements.

Passing from these unquestionably unhistorical elements, we come next to a series of others which cannot be rejected at once, but, at the same time, can just as little be regarded as certainly authentic. To this category belong: (a) all those cases in which Peter is represented as having said something which in some other gospel is attributed to the disciples at large (Mt. 15 15 Lk. 8 45 Mk. 13 3; see above, § 5 c, d) or is omitted altogether although the narrative to which it belongs is retained in that gospel (Mt. 18 21 as against Lk. 17 4, and Lk. 12 41 as against Mt. 24 44 f.; see § 5 c).

(b) To this class falls to be added one instance of a subordinate action (the preparation for the passover) which only Lk. (22 8) assigns to Peter (and John); see § 5 d; and also—

(c) The word which according to all three evangelists (Mk. 10 28 Mt. 19 27 Lk. 18 28) Peter is reported to have uttered: 'we have left all and followed thee.' If the evangelists are in other places so little at one as to the authorship of a given saying, agreement in this particular instance cannot here be taken as proving the accuracy of the report, for their agreement comes only from mutual borrowing. In any case, whether the word in question was spoken by Peter or by another the circumstance is too unimportant to allow us precisely here to place unqualified confidence in the eldest of the three who is followed by the other two. If Jesus blamed a questioner this very fact still added to the importance of the latter (cp below, § 17); but such is not the case here. Moreover, the question must not be treated apart from the answer of Jesus ('shall receive a hundredfold,' etc.). If Jesus ever gave any such promise to his disciples, we may be certain at least that it was not in connection with a question so self-seeking as this. If, however, the narrative is open to suspicion on this most important point, it is impossible to feel confidence on such a relatively subordinate matter as the person of the questioner.

11. Minor notices with historical kernel.

Other notices there are to which a historical kernel, or even complete historicity cannot be denied; on the one hand they were important enough to impress themselves on human memories and on the other hand they were not so important as to tempt to a departure from historical accuracy (cp the principle laid down in GOSPELS, § 131, col. 1873, begin.). (a) Thus there is no difficulty in believing that Jesus on a Sabbath day healed Peter's mother-in-law and other sick persons, but on the following day withdrew himself into solitude and was sought out by Peter and his comrades with the view of bringing him back (Mk. 1 29-38 = Lk. 4 38-43; Mt. 8 14-17 has the healings only).

(b) That the name Cephas (Peter) was bestowed upon Simon by Jesus may in view of what has been said in § 1 g be regarded as wholly credible even if the date at which it was bestowed remains uncertain. According to Mk. (3 16) it was at the time when the apostles were first chosen. A more appropriate occasion but not on that account historically established would be that of the confession at Cæsarea Philippi with which Mt. (16 18) connects it (see MINISTRY, § 4, end). If Mt. already when Peter's call is recorded (4 18) and again at the choosing of the apostles (10 2) says: 'Simon, who is called Peter,' he is, of course, not to be taken as intending to indicate the time at which the name was given, but simply as wishing to apprise his readers that this Simon was the man whom they already knew as Peter. Lk. (6 14) likewise has on the occasion of the choosing of the apostles the words 'Simon, whom he also named Peter.' By this, however, he perhaps does not mean to convey that the name was bestowed by Jesus then, but only that it had been bestowed by him at one time or another.

(c) Equally natural is it to recognise faithful reminiscence in the statement that in Gethsemane Jesus took Peter, James, and John to watch with him, and that nevertheless they fell asleep (Mk. 14 32-42 = Mt. 26 36-46), even although we cannot be certain that this last happened three several times. This last doubt, however, is no reason for giving the preference to Lk. (22 40-46) who mentions the incident as having occurred but once, and that in the case of all the disciples, for as he unquestionably was acquainted with Mk. the simplification here must be explained as due merely to absence of interest in the details of the story.

12. Jairus' daughter.

In the case of the raising of Jairus' daughter also—

(a) No difficulty will be felt in recognising true reminiscence in the statement that Jesus suffered no one but Peter, James, and John to go with him to the house or (besides the parents of the girl) to enter the room where she lay (Mk. 5 37-40).

If Mt. (9 23-25) has nothing about this, his silence is to be connected with the fact that here in other particulars also he is notably much briefer than either Mk. or Lk., just as he is in three other miracle narratives: that of the Gadarene and the herd of swine which immediately precedes (Mk. 5 1-20 = Mt. 8 28-34 = Lk. 8 26-39), that of the healing of the man sick of the palsy (Mk. 2 1-12 = Mt. 9 1-8 = Lk. 5 17-26), and that of the lunatic boy (Mk. 9 14-29 = Mt. 17 14-20), where Lk. also (9 37-43) is so short; there is also the story of the imprisonment and death of John the Baptist (Mk. 6 17-29 = Mt. 14 3-12) which Lk. has not at all. Lk.'s divergence (8 51-53) is presumably not so seriously intended as it has been represented above (§ 5*c*) in verbal strictness to be—namely, that it was the parents and the three disciples who laughed Jesus to scorn. Perhaps when he wrote the words (v. 52), 'and all were weeping and bewailing her,' Lk. was thinking not of the five persons named immediately before, but, like Mk., of the multitude assembled within the house, and has only failed to bring this to clear expression. In any case he has retained the separation of the three disciples from the rest.

SIMON PETER

(b) As the occurrence is the only accredited one in the Gospel history which must have presented itself to those who witnessed it as a case of raising of the dead it is very conceivable that the presence of only three disciples should have impressed itself upon the memory. Whilst the raising of the widow's son at Nain (Lk. 7 11-17) and of Lazarus (Jn. 11 1-44; cp JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, §§ 20*a*, 35*b*, 37*a*) cannot be regarded as historical, no more exception need be taken to the raising of the daughter of Jairus than to the resuscitation of Eutychus (Acts 20 7-12), if only one take as literally the words of Jesus, 'the child is not dead but sleepeth,' as one does those of Paul, 'his life is in him.'

According to Mk. Jesus spoke these words before he had seen the girl, and it is very easily conceivable that information received from the father may have enabled him to form this judgment; but it is also possible that this element in the story arises from unconscious modification of the real fact and that it is Lk. who is in the right here when he represents Jesus as uttering the words in presence of the girl, even if this representation does not rest upon the direct testimony of an eye-witness but upon alteration of the text of Mk.

13. Call. The account of Peter's call in Mk. 1 16-20 = Mt. 4 18-22 is an excellent example of shortening and condensation of a fuller narrative by tradition. It is unthinkable that in this scene no words but these of Jesus should have been spoken: 'Come ye after me and I will make you to become fishers of men.' Peter and his comrades Andrew, James, and John must assuredly have had previous opportunity of making the acquaintance of Jesus and must on their side have had some conversation with him. No eye-witness could possibly give so colourless an account as that in Mk. and Mt. The later narrators, however, had no longer any interest in dramatic details or in the psychological processes which resulted in the decision of the four fishermen. The central action, the call given by Jesus, alone engaged their attention, and for the purpose of edification which they had in view when they circulated it, and as an example for the converts whom they wished to incite by it, the narrative may have seemed beautiful and precious just in proportion to the suddenness with which the call of Jesus came to Peter and his comrades, and the absolute promptitude of their obedience. Apart from this, however, Mk. and Mt. unquestionably present the most trustworthy account of the undoubtedly historical call of Peter.

14. Draught of fishes. The story of Peter's draught (Lk. 5 1-11) falls to be adduced here as a parallel although in so far as we are advancing from the less credible to the more credible order of narratives its proper place in the discussion would have been much earlier. It constitutes one of the few examples we have in the Synoptists of a consciously-framed allegory being put forward in the form of a seemingly historical narrative in order to set forth a particular idea; this idea is in point of fact quite clear. (a) First of all it is certain that the scene is intended as a substitute for what we read in Mk. and Mt. about the call of Peter and his comrades; for Lk. nowhere narrates this last, and on the other hand introduces its main point at the end of the passage before us (v. 10): 'from henceforth thou shalt catch men.' (b) At its beginning Lk. places the scene in which Jesus teaches the multitude standing on the shore from a boat (5 3). Now, in Mk. (4 1 f.) and Mt. (13 1-3) this is the scene in which certain parables are delivered; but Lk. avoids giving it in the parallel passage dealing with these parables (8 4). Thus we have in Lk. 5 an artificial composition from various elements and it becomes necessary to inquire into its purpose. (c) Now the function of a fisher of men is exercised by means of teaching; if then we find Jesus engaged in teaching at the beginning of our pericope this indicates to us how the draught of fishes that immediately follows ought to be taken; namely, not as relating to takes of literal fish but in the deeper sense as relating to the capture of human souls. Thus the idea is precisely the same as that in the parable of the net in Mt. 13 47, only without its reference to the subsequent separation of the good fish from the bad. (d) The narrative before us, however, admits of still more definite interpretation in detail. Simon with his comrades has toiled in vain the whole night through; now, on receiving a special command from Jesus, he makes an unexpected haul. This has already been rightly interpreted by the Tübingen school as referring to the difference between the practically fruitless mission to the Jews and the highly successful mission to the Gentiles. In the latter, Peter received a special Divine command and this was necessary in order to overcome his original aversion to such an undertaking (Acts 10 9-22). (e) The launching forth into the deep also will admit of being interpreted as referring to missions to heathen lands as compared with the less venturesome putting out a little from the shore, although it is not said that the fruitlessness of the night's toil is caused by the proximity to the shore. (f) The sin of which Peter becomes suddenly conscious (v. 8) is thus by no means sinfulness in general—reference to this were but little called for by the circumstances—but definitely the sin of failure hitherto to recognise and practice the duty of evangelising the Gentiles as befitting and in accordance with the will of God. (g) We are now able to perceive the significance also of the place where Lk. has brought in the calling of Peter.

He introduces it at a later point than Mk. and Mt. In particular it is preceded in Lk. by the rejection of Jesus at Nazareth (4 16-30), which on a small scale foreshadows the rejection of Jesus by the entire Jewish people (see GOSPELS, § 109*b*). It is appropriate that it should be followed by the command of Jesus enjoining the mission to the Gentiles, and is in harmony with the principle carried through by the same author in Acts (see ACTS, § 4, middle), according to which Paul preaches the gospel to the Gentiles in each city only after it has been rejected by the Jews. In the gospel, by placing the calling of Peter at a somewhat later period, the author has brought about the awkwardness that Peter has to be brought into close relations with Jesus even before his call, at the healing of his mother-in-law (4 38 f.)—even although his name is suppressed in 4 42, the parallel to Mk. 1 36—whilst the occasion of the draught of fishes, in itself considered, appears to be the first meeting of Peter with Jesus.

In this we may perhaps find a hint that Lk. saw the significance of this pericope as referring to the mission to the Gentiles (or perhaps even invented it? see below, i) and in accordance with this gave it the place it now occupies. (h) The naming of James and John as those who, according to v. 10 f., follow Jesus along with Peter is still more noteworthy. Why is it that precisely Andrew, the brother of Peter, is absent—Andrew whom nevertheless Mk. (1 16) and Mt. (4 18) mention in immediate juxtaposition with him? It can hardly be by accident merely that by this omission the names left are the names of the three who according to Gal. 2 9 were the 'pillars' of the primitive church and who at the Council of Jerusalem, though at first averse, in the end gave their sanction to the mission to the Gentiles; it can hardly be mere accident, even although there the James intended is no longer the son of Zebedee but James the brother of Jesus. (i) Further, be it noticed at how late a point they are introduced.

The narrative so runs that almost down to its close Peter alone figures in it along with Jesus. Helpers such as are necessary where many nets are in use he certainly has, according to vv. 4-6 and v. 9 (on v. 7 see below, k); but it is not thought worth while to give their names, and they must therefore be regarded as subordinate persons like the hired servants in Mk. 1 20. After all have been grouped together in v. 9 by the phrase 'all who were with him' (πάντας τοὺς σὺν αὐτῷ) the addition 'as also James and John' (ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ Ἰάκωβον καὶ Ἰωάννην) comes in strangely; but moreover, after they have been named, Jesus goes on to address the words 'fear not, for henceforth thou shalt catch men,' to Peter alone, whilst yet according to v. 11 James and John appropriate it also.

All this would seem to indicate that the narrative originally named Peter alone, and that the reference to James and John was only introduced into it afterwards. The object of its introduction in that case would have been to restore agreement with Mk. and Mt. by the naming of several apostles who had been simultaneously called and yet at the same time to restrict their number to that of the three 'pillars.' It will hardly, however, be safe to attribute any such intention to an interpolator; rather must it be put to the account of the redactor who had the plan of the whole book in his mind. If this be so, we shall have to suppose that Lk. did not himself invent the story of Peter's draught of fishes, but that he had met with it in writing or in oral tradition and that its meaning as denoting that the mission to the Gentiles was the institution of Jesus himself was fully manifest to him.

(k) Now at last we are in a position to form a judgment regarding the second boat mentioned in v. 7 and its occupants.

As they are spoken of as 'fellows' (μέτοχοι) of Peter and his subordinates it might appear at first sight as if they ought to be identified with James and John who are called 'partners' (κοινωνοί) of Simon in v. 10. The inappropriateness, however, which has already been pointed out in the naming of James and John in v. 10 as additions to the 'all' (πάντας) of v. 9 would by no means be got over by this identification; for the 'fellows' (μέτοχοι) also of v. 7 are included in the 'all' of v. 9. But as the 'fellows' (μέτοχοι) of v. 7 exercise an independent activity and have a boat of their own, their names, had they really been James and John, would certainly have been mentioned already in v. 7 and not held over till v. 10 where no independent activity is attributed to them.

Thus we must seek to ascertain their names from their work. They are called in to help because Peter and his comrades—in whose number James and John are thus included—are unequal to their task unaided. This applies to no one but to Paul and those with him. In actuality he was the originator of the mission to the Gentiles, and not one who had merely been called in to assist; but we must reflect that here the dominating presupposition is that it was by the original apostles that this mission was begun, at the direct command of Jesus, or of God. So Acts 10_{9-22} 15_7, so Lk. 24_{47}, so Mt. 28_{19}; so, still, Justin (Apol. i. 39_3 45_5 50_{12}, Dial. 42, begin.). On such a view of the matter, Paul and his comrades can only figure as helpers subsequently called in. The two boats by which the fish that had been caught were brought to land thus signify, not the mission to Jews and to Gentiles respectively, but the mission of the original apostles and that of Paul. That of the former was to the Jews at first but afterwards was extended to the Gentiles also, that of Paul was to the Gentiles only. Jesus from the beginning makes use of Simon's boat; but this eventually proves insufficient. (l) Whether the touch in v. 6 that the nets threatened to break be simply a graphic decoration of the situation, or whether it too have an allegorical meaning—namely, that through the mission to the Gentiles the unity of the church both before and at the Council of Jerusalem, and in the dispute between Paul and Peter at Antioch (Gal. 2_{11-21}) was threatened with disruption, as, for example, is suggested by Carpenter (The First Three Gospels[2], 1890, vi. 5 I, pp. 206-208)—must remain undecided, as no such meaning is unmistakably suggested by the words. So much as this, however, is rightly emphasised by Carpenter—that the author of Jn. 21 found this reference in our passage; for his remark in v. 11 that for all the multitude of fishes the net remained nevertheless unbroken is clearly intended to be set against that of Lk., and indicates that the unity of the church had not come to harm. Already in Mt. 13_{47} we find the net employed as a figure for the kingdom of heaven.

15. Denial of Jesus.

Peter's denial of Jesus is a fact as certain as his call. Even a thorough-going Paulinist would not have invented it against him—quite apart from the question whether in the absence of any tradition he would have found any credence had he done so. (a) On the other hand, it is possible to question whether it happened exactly thrice, or whether the number three belongs to a later development. That the scene gained in dramatic character as it was handed on by one narrator to another is shown by Lk. 22_{60}, according to which the eye of Jesus fell on Peter after the third denial—a circumstance of which Mk. and Mt. know nothing (as to the cause which rendered this change possible see below, § 19 d). Doubtless, merely in order to be able to explain how the whole night was passed, the interval between the second denial and the third is given in Lk. (22_{59}) not as 'a little while' (so Mk. 14_{70} and Mt. 26_{73}), but as 'about one hour.'

(b) Still more insistent is the question as to whether, and if so in what form, Jesus foretold the denial of Peter. From the outset we must regard as later additions the words of Jesus, found only in Lk. (22_{31} f.), which foretell not only the temptation that is about to come upon Peter, but also the ultimate stability of his faith, with the added exhortation: 'Do thou, when once thou hast turned again, stablish thy brethren.'

Their principal theme already is that Peter is to be the first to believe in the resurrection of Jesus (see RESURRECTION-NARRATIVES, § 37), and in presence of such a prediction relating to a more distant future the passing denial of Peter seems like an insignificant intermezzo. It is difficult to regard as probable such gentleness of judgment on the part of Jesus in this so grave a moment, even should one have no difficulty in attributing to him such a foreknowledge of the future as is presupposed by Lk. Besides, in Lk. the prophecy of the denial is placed in the supper chamber, not as in Mk. and Mt. on the way to Gethsemane.

(c) On the other hand, it is by no means improbable that, on the last evening of his life, in conversing about what lay before him, Jesus should have expressed a doubt as to the constancy of his disciples, that Peter should have declared his own with emphasis, and that the doubt should thereupon have been expressed anew and perhaps in very drastic form. If Jesus actually on this occasion uttered the prediction that Peter would in an exceedingly short time deny him, we still are not compelled to suppose that the prediction was meant otherwise than conditionally, to some such effect as the following: 'should it so happen that thou fall into grievous temptation to deny me thou wilt not have constancy enough to resist it.' As for the threefold repetition there is much reason to apprehend that the prediction of Jesus as to this was afterwards made much more explicit than it had been, in view of what was known or believed to have actually happened.

(d) The same holds good of the specification of time: before the cock crows (Mt. 26_{34} = Lk. 22_{34}); and in an intensified degree of that given in Mk. (14_{30}): before the cock crows twice. Indeed, the additional statement—found only in Mk. ($14_{68\ 72}$)—of the fact that the cock actually was heard to crow twice, is a clear sign of the secondary character of our canonical Mk. as compared with Mt. and Lk. (see GOSPELS, § 119 c).

Even the textual criticism of the passage seems to show that this datum is one which crept only gradually into the text of Mk. In v. 68 the addition καὶ ἀλέκτωρ ἐφώνησεν is so weakly attested that it is omitted by WH and does not appear even on the margin; still, there is certainly a hiatus if in v. 72 we read 'and straightway the second time the cock crew' without any previous mention made of the first time.

(e) Lastly, the fact of the cock's having crowed at all has been sometimes called in question by reason of the fact that, according to the Mishna (Bābā Ḳammā 7_7), it was forbidden to keep fowls in Jerusalem.

It was expressly permitted, however, we read, to purchase them to be killed, or to receive them as presents for the same purpose (ib. 10_9), and it is testified that on one occasion a cock was stoned in Jerusalem because it had killed a human being (a child)

('Eduyyōth, 6 1; see all the passages given in Brandt, Evang. Gesch., 1893, 32 f.). Thus, the fact of the cock crowing cannot be shown to be unhistorical; yet neither can it be shown with certainty to be historical. Cockcrowing (ἀλεκτοροφωνία) is, according to Mk. 13 35, the third of the four night-watches into which the night was divided by the Romans (see DAY, § 4). This division into four is current in the NT (Mk. 6 48 = Mt. 14 25 Acts 12 4), although the Israelites originally divided the night into only three watches (Judg. 7 19, cp Lam. 2 19 Ex. 14 24 1 S. 11 11, and, in all probability, also Lk. 12 38). As the second Roman night-watch which ended at midnight is called 'midnight' (μεσονύκτιον), we must suppose that the cockcrowing from which the third took its name originally denoted the time at which it came to an end, that is, about 3 A.M. The saying of Jesus could thus very easily have run in this form: 'before cockcrowing' [i.e., before three o'clock to-morrow morning] thou shalt have denied me,' without any intention to predict that directly after the denial a cock should literally crow; and with equal ease might the view have arisen through a misunderstanding, that Jesus had actually foretold this detail, and that the prediction had been fulfilled.

Amongst the most certainly assured facts of the life of Peter must be ranked that of the confession he made at Cæsarea Philippi (Mk. 8 27-30 = Mt. 16 13-20 = Lk. 9 18-21). (a) Even Wrede (Das Messiasgeheimniss in den Evangelien, 1901, pp. 115-124, 237-239) does not venture positively to pronounce it unhistorical although he also says that one need not shrink from such a view if it seem to be required.

16. Confession at Cæsarea Philippi.

According to Wrede, Mk. believed that Jesus had kept his Messiahship a secret from the people throughout the whole of his life, but had communicated it to his disciples, though without producing understanding on their part. Not till after the resurrection of Jesus, according to Mk., did any real recognition of what Jesus was begin. Wrede believes that this view of Mk. is historically false, but nevertheless considers that it dominates the whole of his gospel, and further, that Mk. is not conscious of the frequency with which it is traversed by his repeated statements, according to which the Messiahship of Jesus all the same did not remain a secret. It must be urged, however, that the confession of Peter is little in harmony with either the secrecy observed about the Messiahship of Jesus or the failure of the disciples to understand it.

(b) Wrede endeavours, therefore, at least to lessen the importance of the confession as much as possible in Mk.'s connection, pointing out that it is only in Mt., which was written later than Mk., that Jesus put a high value upon the confession. It is the fact that in Mt. 16 18 f. only the designation of Peter as a rock can be regarded as historical, and this, too, without our being able to be certain that it was given to him just then (see § 11 b; MINISTRY, §§ 4, 5 a, b). It has further to be observed that by the form in which the question of Jesus is put in Mt. the scene is made unintelligible.

Whilst, according to Mk. (and Lk.), Jesus asks 'Who do the people say that I (μέ) am?' he is represented in Mt. as having asked 'Who do the people say that the son of man is?' Mt. himself allows us to see that this is not the right form; for in the form of the second question of Jesus he coincides with Mk. and Lk.: 'but ye, who do ye say that I (μέ) am?' In so far as 'son of man' is a designation of the Messiah, according to the form of the first question in Mt., the answer—viz., 'Thou art the Christ,' would already have been given by Jesus in the question.

Yet this form of the question presumably is due not to unhistoricity on Mt.'s part, but to intention. Already in Mt. 10 23 12 40 13 41, and especially in 14 33 ('of a truth thou art the Son of God'), all which passages are wanting in Mk. and Lk., the Messiahship of Jesus has been proclaimed. At this stage, therefore, the appropriate question in 16 13 is no longer, Whom do the people say that I am? but only, Whom, more exactly, do the people say that he who is already known as the Son of Man is? Accordingly, in Mt., the answer of Peter does not run simply as in Mk. ('Thou art the Christ,' σὺ εἶ ὁ Χριστός; similarly in Lk. 'the Christ of God,' τὸν Χριστὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ), but there is added, as the most important of all, the addition: 'the son of the living God' (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος). This last title plainly must be regarded as expressing more than 'the Christ' (ὁ Χριστός) or than 'Son of Man,' and therefore denotes Jesus not as, let us say, in an ethical sense a Son of God after the manner of the OT, that is, as one who subordinates his will to the will of God as a son does in presence of his father, but in a metaphysical sense as a being proceeding in a supernatural way from God, a meaning which is not necessarily connected with either 'Messiah' or 'Son of Man.' Thus we have here a dogmatic development.

(c) Granted, however, that Mt. in the points just mentioned goes beyond the original record, it does not necessarily follow that he has also altered the situation in an unhistorical sense by the words assigned to Jesus in 16 17 which are not met with in Mk. or Lk.: 'flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee but my Father,' etc.

Even should Wrede be correct in saying that Mk. attaches to the confession of Peter just as little importance as to the words of the demoniacs who, on his representation, more than once (1 24 5 7) applied to Jesus the same predicate as Peter applies here, and that on this account Jesus does not praise Peter, but, just as in the case of the demoniacs, merely bids him be silent, this way of looking at the matter would simply be in each instance only a consequence of the view attributed by Wrede to Mk. that the Messiahship of Jesus had to be kept secret.

As a historical fact, however, apart from the representation of Mk., the occurrence could in no case have elicited such a judgment on the part of Jesus. For even in the representation of Mk. Jesus assuredly does not act upon the plan of concealing his Messiahship; he studiously seeks to elicit an expression of it from the disciples. It is presupposed in this that they have not as yet recognised him as Messiah. It is thus a moment of the greatest possible importance when the words 'Thou art the Messiah' are for the first time spoken by them.

(d) The injunction to tell no man is also, even without the theory of Mk. spoken of above, very readily intelligible in the mouth of the historical Jesus, inasmuch as he cannot have been without apprehensions lest the people should misunderstand his Messiahship, and perhaps set their hopes on him as one who was to free them from the yoke of Rome. Nevertheless, the scene retains its importance as marking a turning-point in the consciousness of the disciples, and can therefore quite appropriately be spoken of as a divine revelation accorded to Peter. In view of the importance it thus possessed, it is also easy to believe that it should have engraved itself upon the memory of the disciples and taken a secure place in tradition—unless one were to regard it as pure fiction. Against this, however, as Wrede also has perceived, there are various considerations, amongst them this, that it is assigned to a definite locality in the journey to Cæsarea Philippi, which seems to point to definite recollection. On the point that Mt. 11 27 gives no ground for doubting the actuality of Peter's confession, see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 25 b.

Immediately on Peter's confession follows in all the synoptists the first prediction by Jesus of his passion, death, and resurrection (Mk. 8 31 f. = Mt. 16 21 = Lk. 9 22); and in Mk. (8 32 f.) and Mt. (16 22 f.) it is added that Peter had reproved his master, but was in turn rebuked and addressed as Satan. Here it must be again remarked that not only the predictions of Jesus regarding his resurrection, but also the detailed predictions of his passion and death are open to grave doubt, and least probable of all is it that precisely at the moment when Peter had uttered his confession for the first time—a moment which must have been one of the most joyful in all his life—Jesus should have expressed himself as he did (see GOSPELS, § 145 e, f). This is not equivalent to saying that Jesus on no occasion in the later period of his public life ever had or expressed the thought that suffering and death might be in store for him. On some such occasion may very well have happened the scene between Peter and his master which now stands immediately after the great confession. The expression 'Satan' by its very strength is its own guarantee that none of the later narrators could have invented it; in fact, the entire scene is wanting in the evangelist to whom tendency-criticism would have found least difficulty in assigning it (see above, § 5 b, c).

17. Designation as Satan.

III. According to the Fourth Gospel.

18. Less strongly divergent points.

If we turn now to the utterances of the Fourth Gospel regarding Peter, we shall find that some of them rest upon those of the synoptists and have merely received a Johannine colouring; but that others, where they contain new matter, cannot lay claim to historicity.

(a) The nearest approach to the synoptic account (Mk. 14 26-31 and ||) is made by the Johannine in describing the prediction of Peter's denial (Jn. 13 33-38); yet even here we already see clearly the Johannine colouring.

It is not as in Mk. and Mt. the adjoining reference to the dreaded scattering of the disciples that gives Peter the occasion for making his promise never to leave Jesus; it is a specifically Johannine thought which in a quite similar manner has already been brought forward in 7 33 f. 8 21, and which, moreover, as we so often find in the Fourth Gospel, lends itself to misunderstanding as possessing at once an obvious external meaning and a hidden spiritual sense: 'Whither I go, ye cannot come.' Peter, like all the interlocutors of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel, takes it in the surface-meaning: 'Lord, whither goest thou? . . . Lord, why cannot I follow thee even now?' As regards the time at which this was said, Jn. agrees with Lk. against Mk. and Mt. (see above, § 15 b).

(b) In the account of the arrest of Jesus a legendary development is apparent in the Fourth Gospel in so far as here (18 10) the name of Malchus the servant of the high priest is given; it is not mentioned in the synoptists. Equally legendary perhaps, but perhaps also deliberately followed, is the other development according to which Peter is named in the Fourth Gospel as the follower who wielded the sword whilst the synoptists merely say: 'A certain one of them that stood by' (Mk. 14 47), or words to the same effect.

To this, moreover, it has to be added that it is only in the synoptists that any motive can be found for the stroke; it is at the moment when Jesus is being seized (so Mk. and Mt.) or about to be seized (so Lk.) in consequence of the treachery of Judas. In Jn., on the other hand, the entire cohort of 500 (or 1000) men has fallen to the ground; Jesus voluntarily surrenders himself and all that he asks of his captors is that his disciples may be allowed to escape unharmed (18 4-9). Lastly, the word with which Jesus rebukes the sword-stroke receives a Johannine form. In Mk. it is not reported at all; Lk. (22 51) has it quite briefly: 'Suffer ye thus far.' Thus what lies at the basis of Jn. is Mt. 26 52-54; but in Jn. 18 11 this is compressed into the question: 'The cup which the Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?' By this question is set aside from the outset by the Johannine Christ a thought which the Jesus of the synoptists earnestly cherishes for a time—that involved in the prayer that 'this cup' might pass from him—exactly as in 12 27, where the words are to be taken as a question: 'What shall I say? (Shall I say:) Father save me from this hour?' (cp John, Son of Zebedee, § 26 a).

Jn. has left on one side the statement of Lk. (22 51) that Jesus healed the ear of the servant of the high priest. Perhaps the miracle seemed to him purposeless in such a situation, or hardly worthy of the dignity of the Logos.

(c) That the parallel to the confession of Peter (Mk. 8 27-30 and ||s) is to be found in Jn. 6 66-71 is almost universally conceded. It is indeed the only scene in which, as in the synoptists, in answer to a question expressly addressed to all the twelve disciples, Peter as their spokesman makes a confession to Jesus; moreover, it follows soon after the miracle of the feeding of the multitude (in Mk. and Mt. after the second miracle). This makes the variations all the more remarkable.

The place is not in the neighbourhood of Cæsarea Philippi but (according to 6 59) at Capernaum. Peter does not designate Jesus as the Messiah, nor can he; for this has already been done by Andrew (1 41), and indeed still higher predicates have been already employed by the Baptist (1 15 29-34), by Nathanael (1 49), and by Jesus himself (3 13 16 4 26, etc.). The contents of Peter's confession have thus lost, still more completely than in Mt. (see § 16 b), that character of novelty which gives it its historical importance. The expression 'the holy one of God' (ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ) also, employed by Peter, is new only in the Fourth Gospel, but carries neither in the literal meaning of the words nor by virtue of the application made of it in Mk. 1 24 = Lk. 4 34, by the demoniac in the synagogue of Capernaum (cp 'the holy one,' ὁ ἅγιος, Rev. 3 7 1 Jn. 2 20; 'Aaron,' the holy one of the Lord,' Ἀαρὼν τὸν ἅγιον κυρίου, Ps. 106 16; 'the holy and just,' ὁ ἅγιος καὶ δίκαιος, Acts 3 14), a predicate transcending those previously made use of in the Fourth Gospel. Furthermore, the words of Peter are entirely in the Johannine didactic style: 'words of eternal life' (cp 3 34-36 6 63 12 49 f.); 'we have believed and know' (cp 11 27 17 3 1 Jn. 4 16). Finally, we note the absence of any word of recognition on the part of Jesus such as we find in at least Mt. 16 17.

(d) According to Jn. 1 44, Bethsaida is the city of Peter (and Andrew); according to Mk. 1 21 29 = Lk. 4 31 38, as also according to Mt. 8 5 14, it is Capernaum.

In explanation of the discrepancy it is suggested that Peter (and Andrew) originally belonged to Bethsaida; or recourse is even had to the wholly inadmissible exegesis that according to the change of prepositions in Jn. 1 44 Philip was in virtue of his then domicile 'of' Bethsaida (ἀπὸ Βηθσαϊδά) but by birth he was 'out of' Capernaum the city of Andrew and Peter (ἐκ τῆς πόλεως Ἀνδρέου καὶ Πέτρου). In reality it is even uncertain whether the naming of Bethsaida has claim or only makes claim to historical accuracy. Cp Philip, col. 3700, n. 2.

19. Denial.

In the account of the denial of Peter (Jn. 18 15-27)—

(a) The most important differences as compared with the synoptists (Mk. 14 54 66-72 and ||s) are that Peter gains access to the palace of the high priest through the intervention of an 'other disciple,' and that his repentance is not recorded. Upon both these points see § 22, begin. Legendary development is seen in the touch that he who gives occasion for Peter's third denial is said to have been one of the servants of the high priest, being a kinsman of him whose ear Peter cut off. Furthermore, the series of the three denials of Peter is broken, not, however, as in Lk. (22 59) between the second and the third, and not by the simple statement that an interval of about an hour had elapsed, but between the first and the second, and this by the account of the whole proceedings in the palace of Annas and of Jesus's being led away to the palace of Caiaphas.

(b) Spitta (Zur Gesch. u. Lit. d. Urchristenthums, 1 158-168, 1893) conjectures the original order of the verses to have been: 12 f. 19-24 14-18 25 b-27.

That is to say: Jesus was brought from Gethsemane to the palace of Annas; here Caiaphas (not Annas) investigated the case, then Annas sent him to Caiaphas; thereupon arrived first the 'other disciple' and thereafter Peter in the courtyard of Caiaphas (not Annas) and Peter denied his master three times in unbroken succession. When, shortly after the publication of the work of Spitta, the Syr. sin. became known, it was found that in the main it followed the same order, viz. vv. 12 f. 24 14 f. 19-23 16-18 25 b-27. Thus here also the case is heard before Caiaphas, but in his own palace, not in that of Annas; here also Peter comes into the court of Caiaphas not of Annas; here also there is a threefold denial without intervening incident and v. 25 a ('now Simon Peter was standing and warming himself') which coincides with the close of v. 18 falls away, but the entrance of the 'other disciple' into the court of Caiaphas does not immediately precede, but happens some considerable time before.

(c) Notwithstanding this very large measure of agreement neither of these two rearrangements of the verses can be regarded as the original. If it was, as Spitta thinks, Caiaphas who dealt with the case of Jesus in the house of Annas, the expression in v. 24 that it was Annas who sent Jesus to Caiaphas is as awkward as it could possibly be. Syr. sin. has in point of fact avoided this awkwardness by reporting no hearing at the house of Annas at all. In this way, however, the addition in Syr. sin. of 'the chief priest' (τὸν ἀρχιερέα) to Caiaphas (Καϊάφαν) in v. 24 becomes all the more impossible if this verse follows immediately upon v. 13 in which Caiaphas is named as high priest of that year. Before all others, however, this question will obtrude itself: In what way, if it be not the original, could the present order of the verses have arisen?

Spitta's answer is that the copyist's eye wandered from v. 13 to v. 24 and wrote therefore its continuation (the present vv. 14-18) by mistake immediately after v. 13. When he had reached v. 18, that is to say the middle of Peter's threefold denial, he became aware that he had passed over the entire hearing of Jesus, along with his removal to the palace of Caiaphas (19-24), and forthwith introduced these verses into his text immediately after v. 18. Only after he had done this did he proceed to finish the account of Peter's denial (25 b-27); but with a view to this, in order to resume the thread that had been dropped, he had first, in the exercise of his own discretion, to repeat the close of v. 18, and that in the somewhat modified form which we now have in 25 a. It is indeed hard to say in what possible sense we can call a man who goes to work thus a copyist. As if we did not know from a hundred examples how it was that copyists proceeded when they happened to have omitted anything: they placed it on the margin and inserted merely a caret in the text. The same observation holds good, of course, if it was the order of Syr. sin. and not that of Spitta which the 'copyist' altered into that which we now have. All the more does it require to be borne in mind that often the case is plainly the other way; the author of Syr. sin. has allowed himself the most arbitrary changes of the text.[1]

I has to be added, however, that in his case it is possible to perceive a reason for the changes found in his text; he wished to make Peter's denial a unity and to get rid of the repetition which he deemed irksome—of v. 18 end in v. 25*a*. For the converse procedure, on the other hand, the production of our present text out of that of Syr. sin. or that conjectured by Spitta, no reason can be imagined; and thus Spitta had no choice but to have recourse to his untenable hypothesis of a copyist who yet was no copyist nor yet a redactor either.

(d) Although Syr. sin. and Spitta have thought the present order of the text capable of improvement it nevertheless remains intelligible enough even without transposition. The new element in Jn. which neither Syr. sin. nor Spitta could or would remove is the fact that Jesus before being delivered over to Pilate was taken to two separate places, to the house of Annas and to that of Caiaphas.

According to Mk. and Mt. he is brought only to the 'high priest' (Mk. 14 53; Mt. 26 57 adds the name of Caiaphas) and from there taken to Pilate (Mk. 15 1 = Mt. 27 1 f.). Mk. and Mt., however, record two sittings of the synedrium on the case; the first during the night, the second in the morning. Lk. knows only the second of these (22 66-23 1); in his narrative it is not till morning that the synedrium meets; in the night Jesus looks upon Peter after his third denial and thus he is still in the courtyard, not in the court-room, and in accordance with this representation is in the course of the night only mocked and buffeted (Lk. 22 61-65), which likewise is to be pictured as taking place in the courtyard. On this view it remains a possibility that Lk., like Mk. and Mt., thinks of the morning meeting of the synedrium as being held in the same high-priestly palace into which Jesus was brought from the first. The words (Lk. 22 66), 'they led him away into their council' (ἀπήγαγον αὐτὸν εἰς τὸ συνέδριον αὐτῶν), in that case mean only that they led him away (out of the courtyard) into the chamber of the same palace in which the synedrium meanwhile had assembled. This interpretation is favoured by 'their' (αὐτῶν). Yet it is also possible that Lk. thinks of the synedrium as assembling in another house—most easily in the place of their solemn meetings. The 'led away' (ἀπήγαγον) in 22 66 will then mean that they led Jesus into another house; and the word actually is so used in Mt. 27 2, and still earlier in 26 57 = Mk. 14 53, as also are 'led' (ἤγαγον) in Lk. 23 1 and 'led away' (ἀπήνεγκαν) Mk. 15 1.

(e) In any case Jn. was fully entitled so to understand it and accordingly to take from Lk. the transference of Jesus from one house to another.

Only what he thinks of as being the second house to which Jesus was brought is not the meeting-place of the synedrium; and on his premises he is right; for at the time when, according to Lk. (if this be his meaning), the place was being used, viz. in the morning, it was accessible, but it was not accessible in the night-time, when, according to Jn. Jesus was being transferred (before cockcrowing; see Jn. 18 24 27), as it was situated on the temple hill (Schürer, GJV(2) 2 162-164; ET ii. 1 190-195) the gates of which were shut at night. Thus there remains for Jn., as the second house to which Jesus could appropriately be brought, only the palace of the high priest. The house, however, to which Jesus is in the first instance brought is also called (Mk. 14 53 and ||s) that of the high priest. At this point, therefore, came to the assistance of Jn. the statement in Lk. 3 2 Acts 4 6, according to which Annas also was high priest; and that the evangelist was following this is apparent (although he nowhere designates Annas as high priest) in the fact that he calls Caiaphas 'high priest of that year' (11 49 51 18 13). In fact it has even been held that Lk. regards Annas, whom, alike in 3 2 and in Acts 4 6, he places before Caiaphas, as the real high priest in Jesus' time, and thus that he thinks with Jn., that Jesus was brought from Gethsemane direct to the house of Annas.

Be this as it may, in any case Jn. seeks to remove the discrepancies of the synoptists. He follows Lk., as he understands him, in so far as he represents Jesus as having been brought from one house to another; but Mk. and Mt. in so far as he represents some hearing of the case to have taken place during the night, only without the nocturnal meeting of the synedrium affirmed in Mk. 14 53 = Mt. 26 57, and then before the high priest alone—by whom Jn. understands Annas. In all probability therefore Jn. thinks of the meeting of the synedrium as having been in the house of Caiaphas, but without describing it.

(f) These points once cleared up, we are in a position to understand the story of Peter's denial in Jn. In making the denial begin directly after Jesus has been brought in after his arrest, Jn. is simply following Lk., who in fact knows of no hearing of the case at all by night; in representing the denial as having been interrupted he also is following Lk. in so far as in this gospel (Lk. 22 59) the series of the denials is broken by an interval of something like an hour; in Jn., however, the interruption is caused by the account of the first hearing which Jn., departing from Lk., takes from Mk. and Mt. Thus it becomes perfectly intelligible, and not to be regarded as a copyist's error, that the statement about Peter's standing at the fire and warming himself is repeated from 18 18 in 18 25*a* when the story of the denial is resumed. In precisely the same way Mk. 14 67 repeats from v. 54 that Peter was warming himself, and Mt. 26 69 from v. 58 that he was sitting in the courtyard. That Peter's arrival in the courtyard and his denial should at all costs be narrated without interruption cannot in reason be demanded; it is not so related even in Mk. and Mt., and if Jn. allows the interruption to come in at a later point than they do, this is mainly due, as has been shown, to the fact that he is here at first following Lk.

20. Call. The call of Peter is described in the Fourth Gospel (1 35-42) in a manner entirely different from that which we find in the synoptists (see above, § 13).

(a) It occurs, not by the lake of Galilee, but in the neighbourhood of the Baptist, who has not yet been cast into prison (as he has in Mk. 1 14 Mt. 4 12 Lk. 3 19 f.), but himself points his disciples to Jesus; those whom Jesus wins to his side do not appear as fishermen, but—at least the first two (1 35-40) and probably Peter also—as disciples of the Baptist. Peter is not called first, but only after his brother Andrew and an unnamed person by whom is almost universally understood the beloved disciple; of those who are represented in the synoptists as then having been called, John (even if it be he that is intended by the companion of Andrew) remains unnamed, and his brother James is left entirely unnoticed.

[1] Even in the pericope before us, for example, an instance occurs in v. 16 f. The portress is here called first 'the portress' (ἡ θυρωρός) simply, then afterwards 'the maid, the portress' (ἡ παιδίσκη ἡ θυρωρός). This is a noticeable circumstance and finds its explanation only in this, that when she is mentioned for the second time, it is said that she charged Peter with being one of the followers of Jesus. According to the synoptists this was done by a maid (παιδίσκη, Mk. 14 66 and ||s), and in reminiscence of this Jn. subsequently added this expression to his 'portress' (ἡ θυρωρός). Syr. sin., however, has 'porter' for 'portress' in v. 16 and makes 'the maid, the portress' (ἡ παιδίσκη ἡ θυρωρός) in v. 17 into the porter's maid. As other examples of arbitrary alterations which (unless where otherwise stated) are quite peculiar to Syr. sin. we may mention: (Mt. 16 13) 'What do men say concerning me? who then is this son of man?' (on this, cp above § 16 b); or (Lk. 16 6 b), 'and he [i.e., the steward] sat down quickly and wrote them fifty' and (16 7 b), 'he sat down immediately [and] wrote them fourscore'; or (Jn. 8 57—with ℵ*sah), 'thou art not fifty years old and hath Abraham seen thee?' or Lk. 2 4, where as in D the last clause, 'because he was of the house and family of David,' is introduced after v. 5, and, moreover, altered into 'because they were both of the house of David.' Syr. sin. also knows how to make important changes in the text by simple addition. Examples are: Jn. 6 63 (it is the spirit that quickeneth the body: but ye say the body profiteth nothing), or 12 3 (now Mary took an alabaster box of a pound of ointment of pure good spikenard, of great price, and poured it on the head of Jesus while he sat at meat, and she anointed his feet), or Lk. 23 37 (addition: and they placed also on his head a crown of thorns). Of additions arbitrarily made for decoration or smoothing we may give such instances as (Lk. 11 29), 'no sign from heaven shall be given unto them,' or (Jn. 3 6, at close), 'because God is a living spirit' [Tert. and codd. of Itala, etc., have simply: quia deus spiritus est], or (11 39), 'Martha said unto him, Lord, why are they lifting away the stone? Behold, he stinketh'; or (11 41), 'then those men who were standing, came near and raised,' or (20 16), 'and she understood him and answered saying unto him: Rabbuli. And she ran towards him that she might touch him' [last clause also in ℵ[c.a], the Ferrar codd. 13, 346, 543, 826, 828, syr. pal., syr. hkl., Vg. MSS mm, gat, armach, Cyril.

(b) It would be perfectly useless to try to identify the two accounts. Harmonistic efforts confine themselves to the assertion that Jn. is describing an earlier occurrence than that recorded in the synoptists. That in Jn. is spoken of as the 'call to friendship,' that in the synoptists as the 'call to discipleship.' Any such distinction, however, is quite arbitrary. The 'follow me' (ἀκολούθει μοι) which Jesus addresses in Jn. 1 43 to Philip, holds good substantially, it does not need to be said, also for those called before Philip, for it is hard to see why we are to regard them as entering into less intimate relations with Jesus than he. The same verb, however (ἀκολουθεῖν), stands in Mk. 1 18 Mt. 4 20 22 Lk. 5 11, where it is the 'call to discipleship' that is described. And even apart from this it would be quite contrary to history that Jn. should allow it to appear as if those disciples who had been called only to friendship remained henceforward continually in the company of Jesus (as in point of fact he does in 2 2 12 17 22 3 22 4 2 8 27 31-38, etc.), if the actual truth had been that they had again parted from Jesus and thereafter received from him the new call of which the synoptists speak. Similarly it would be quite contrary to history on the part of the synoptists to represent the calling of the four disciples as made at first sight without previous acquaintance on their part with the master, if the truth really were that three of them had already been called to friendship by Jesus.

This unhistorical distinction between the 'call to friendship' and the 'call to discipleship' is carried to the farthest extreme when the 'call to apostleship' is added as a third stage which is seen for the first time in Mk. 3 14-19 and ||s in the choosing of the twelve. If we find Jesus already saying to Peter and Andrew in Mk. 1 18 'I will make you to become fishers of men' (similarly Mt. 4 19 Lk. 5 10), how are we to describe this if not as a call to apostleship? The choosing of the twelve is not to be understood as if the four disciples who had already been chosen were now chosen a second time, and that to a higher dignity, but only in the sense that the other eight were newly chosen, the four who had been chosen already being now enumerated along with the others merely in order to make up a complete list of twelve.

(c) If then the accounts of Jn. on the one hand and the synoptists on the other are mutually exclusive, it is necessary to make our choice between them. The precise specification of day and hour in Jn. (1 29 35 39 43 2 1) might seem here to be conclusive evidence that the Johannine account proceeds from an eyewitness; but this becomes plainly impossible when it is considered how here the Baptist and the first disciples are represented as possessing a knowledge regarding the Messiahship, and indeed also regarding what goes far beyond this, the divine nature of Jesus, such as in actual fact they cannot have possessed at least at so early a period, unless indeed we are prepared to reject as completely unhistorical the whole picture of the synoptists and especially the novelty of Peter's confession at Cæsarea Philippi. The supernatural knowledge also regarding Peter and Nathanael (Jn. 1 42 47 f.) which is attributed to Jesus is quite inconsistent with the synoptic representation.

(d) The unhistorical character of the Johannine account has therefore to be conceded even although we find ourselves unable to explain in detail in every case how it was that Jn. came to his far-reaching divergences from the synoptists. So much is clear—that he takes no trouble whatever to bring himself into line with them, but seeks to give a representation that is based purely on ideal considerations. Just as Jesus is already in the prologue introduced as the Logos of God, and just as the Baptist straightway proclaims his Godhead, so also must the disciples be brought to him from the beginning through their recognition of this truth, and arrive at this recognition through the agency of the Baptist, whereby the latter brings to its most effective fulfilment his function as forerunner of Jesus. 'He must increase, but I must decrease' (3 30); this is the motto of the whole history of the call; in this also lies the reason why the first disciples of Jesus must previously have been disciples of John.

(e) A further object Jn. has in view is the relegation of Peter to a subordinate place. Elsewhere (see § 22) this happens only so far as the beloved disciple is concerned; but here we see it also in operation with reference to Andrew who elsewhere comes forward but little in the Fourth Gospel.

The cause of this feature lies perhaps in sympathy with the story of the walk to Emmaus, with regard to which story Thoma (Genesis d. Joh.-Evang., 406-408 [1882]) supposes that it served Jn. as model. Two disciples come to know Jesus as Messiah; the one is afterwards mentioned by name, the other not; on their return to Jerusalem it is found that Jesus has appeared also to Peter. Thus the last-named takes the third place.

(f) The tenth hour also (Jn. 1 39) Thoma thinks to be derived from Lk. (24 29); 'it is towards evening.'

Such combinations, however, are from the nature of the case uncertain. What is certain is that Jn. reckons the hours of the day in Jewish fashion (19 14) and thus means here 4 P.M. Others consider, in view of 1 Jn. 2 18 ('it is the last hour'), that the author intends to divide the whole development of the world into twelve periods, which he allegorically calls hours, and that what he means to say is that the entire development was already nearing its end when Jesus appeared, whence the pressing necessity for accepting Christianity. Or it is pointed out that according to Philo (1 347 532-536 2 183-185, ed. Mangey) ten is the number of perfection, with which accordingly Christianity as the age of perfection begins.

Such a way of interpreting the 'hour,' however, does not harmonise very well with the specification of individual days in 1 29 35 43 2 1. In this specification one may have much greater confidence in discerning the progress of the narrative from one step in the revelation of Jesus to another. In any case neither it nor the specification of the tenth hour, even if no quite satisfactory explanation of the latter has yet been found, can be urged as evidence that the author was an eyewitness of what he describes.

As with the call of the disciples, so also in the case of the footwashing, the Fourth Evangelist has not supplemented a synoptic narrative but has supplanted it.

21. Footwashing.

(a) Jn.'s silence as to the institution of the sacrament of the supper would otherwise be inexplicable. Equally inexplicable, however, would be the silence of the synoptists about the footwashing had this event actually happened. Even Lk., to whom appeal is made, in 22 24-27 records only the thought which underlies the footwashing, not the fact. One may as well deny the historicity of the synoptists altogether if one is determined to maintain that they had heard nothing of so important an action of Jesus which must have impressed itself so indelibly upon the recollection of those who witnessed it. On the other hand the rise of the narrative of the footwashing out of the passage just cited from Lk. (22 24-27) is very readily intelligible, and that too even without our supposing any deliberate fiction on the part of the evangelist (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 35 [f]). The transaction taken as a whole is the highest activity of ministering love (13 1 15 34 f.); in so far as it occurs at a meal, it stands on a level with a love-feast (ἀγάπη: Jude 12) and thus is a substitute for the sacramental supper which Jn., by reason of the data on which he was working, could not report as having been held on the last evening of the lifetime of Jesus (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 23).

(b) The person of Peter comes into consideration in connection with a subordinate point only. He hesitates, out of reverence, about suffering his feet to be washed by Jesus, but is met with the answer: 'if I wash thee not thou hast no part with me' (13 8). Whereupon Peter would have hands and head washed also, but is told: 'he that is bathed needeth not save to wash his feet but is clean every whit; and ye are clean,' etc. (13 10). From v. 8 it follows that the footwashing is intended to be not a manifestation of love merely, but also at the same time in some sort a means of grace; from v. 10 it follows that this means of grace has been preceded by another of a completer character—by which, especially in view of the expression 'he that is bathed' (ὁ λελουμένος), one can only understand baptism. The meaning would then be: He that is baptised needs only a partial renewal of the effect of baptism.

If the effect of baptism is held to be the forgiveness of sins, the footwashing would represent a means of grace which likewise brings a forgiveness though not so comprehensive as that of baptism but only of particular sins committed after baptism. It is quite impossible that by this means of grace should be meant the sacrificial blood of Jesus. For neither does its action set in only after baptism nor does it admit of being conceived of as partial only; and moreover, in the circle of ideas of the Fourth Gospel it plays no further part (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 62 c, begin.). But also the thought of a second repentance following upon that sealed in baptism, as suggested in Hermas (Vis. ii. 2 4, Mand. 4 3), is quite remote. The forgiveness of sins that constantly needs renewal after baptism is better seen in the sacrament of the supper, in accordance with Mt. 26 28: 'unto remission of sins.' With this it agrees that the eucharist is repeated, baptism not, and that the footwashing as representing the agape is intended to be a substitute for the eucharist.

(c) There is nevertheless the objection that forgiveness of sins does not figure in the Johannine conception of the eucharist (6 26-63) and just as little in the express interpretation of the footwashing, which according to 13 8 is regarded rather as a means of communion with Jesus. This is the effect of the eucharist in like manner according to Jn., and thus we are led by this consideration also to the conclusion that by the footwashing the eucharist is intended. It cannot be denied, however, that here the figure of cleansing which is involved in the idea of washing has disappeared, and the picture thus loses its vividness.

(d) It becomes all the more necessary therefore to note that in Jn. 15 3 we have in all probability an authentic interpretation of the footwashing. As in 13 10 so also here we read: 'ye are clean,' only not 'by baptism,' or 'by the supper,' but, 'because of the word which I have spoken unto you.'

This declaration is very like that made in 6 63. After very great weight has been laid in 6 53-58 upon physical participation in the sacramental meal, we find it nevertheless soon depreciated again in favour of a purely spiritual view which thinks of fellowship with Christ as realised solely by means of his word: 'the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I have spoken unto you are spirit and are life.' Just so in 15 3 also the mere reception of the words of Jesus is given as the means of purification in place of any sacramental act whatsoever. And this reception of the word, according to the connection of Jn. 13, consists specially in fulfilment of the command of love. On this view, 13 10 would mean: he who has been baptised is in need of no further sacramental acts; all that is needed is that he should follow the commandment of love. At the same time this does not perfectly suit either the words or the thought. If it is to fit the words these ought to run somewhat thus: 'he that is bathed needed not save to wash the feet of others'; and as for the thought—that which depreciates the value of sacramental acts—one misses the extension of it which one would expect to baptism also.

(e) The view indicated by 15 3 is thus better suited by the reading of ℵ c, several Vg. MSS Orig. and Tert. according to which 'except the feet' (εἰ μὴ τοὺς πόδας) is wanting. In this case 'he that is bathed' (ὁ λελουμένος) will no longer refer to baptism but to footwashing; he who has received the footwashing, that is to say who has taken to himself the command of love, needs no sacramental act or any other external institution but is quite clean.

Yet this view of the passage also is not wholly just to the tenor of the words. For this one would expect some such text as 'he whose feet are washed needs not to wash hands or head.' And further, even if one finds it possible to understand how the longer reading could have arisen out of the shorter as soon as 'he that is bathed' (ὁ λελουμένος) had come to be taken as referring to baptism and the footwashing to the supper, at the same time the converse also is conceivable—that on account of the words '(he) is clean every whit' it seemed inappropriate that the washing of the feet should still be required, and it was thought necessary to restore the meaning that washing of a wholly clean person is no longer at all needful, by deletion of the words 'except the feet' (εἰ μὴ τοὺς πόδας).

At all events, whatever may be the proper interpretation of the footwashing, it is plain that in it Peter plays no better part than other persons in the Fourth Gospel, as for example Thomas (14 5), or Philip (14 8), or Judas the Cananæan (14 22), or Nicodemus (3 4), into whose mouth an unintelligent saying is put which is afterwards set right by Jesus (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 25 c).

The same thing has already been remarked in connection with the prediction of Peter's denial (13 36-38), where Peter is corrected for a misunderstanding by Jesus; we have found him also shown in an unfavourable light in so far as the sword-stroke is attributed to him (18 10), and neither his repentance after his denial, nor any acknowledgement of Jesus after his confession, is recorded (18 27 6 70).

22. Peter and the beloved disciple.

(a) It is to the beloved disciple, however, in particular, that Peter is subordinated; to him he owes his introduction into the high priest's palace (18 16), and only after him (and Andrew) does he receive his call to the discipleship (1 41 f.), and, further, Peter must avail himself of his aid (13 24) in order to learn who the betrayer is. If, following the figure of speech which we see in Rev. 12 1-6 13-17, it is the Christian church that is to be understood by the mother of Jesus as she stands at the foot of the cross (Jn. 19 25)—a view which is rendered more difficult, it is true, than it would otherwise be by the presence of other women at the crucifixion—we should here find evidence of a very great depreciation of Peter, in the fact that she is committed to the charge, not of Peter, but of the beloved disciple. So also the conferring upon all the apostles of the power to remit sins or to retain them (20 23), if we are to suppose it to have been already known to the Fourth Evangelist that this power according to Mt. 16 19 had been conferred upon Peter alone (on the age of this passage see GOSPELS, §§ 136, 151).

(b) It is to the account of their visit to the sepulchre, however (20 2-10), that we must specially turn, for elucidation of the mutual relations of Peter and the beloved disciple. On the unhistorical character of this incident see GOSPELS, § 138, a, e, f. Being, as it is, unhistorical, we may all the more safely assume that here it is intended to give expression to an idea. This idea would be perfectly transparent if the precedence of the one apostle over the other had been recognised without qualification. In point of fact a certain measure of precedence is assigned to each in turn. Or rather to Peter in one respect, namely that he is the first to enter the sepulchre, but to the beloved disciple in the twofold respect that he is the first to arrive at the sepulchre, and the first to believe in the resurrection.

Let us begin with what is clearest. When it is said of the beloved disciple that he believed in the resurrection of Jesus (20 8), it is included in this that Peter has not as yet come to do so. Now, in view of 1 Cor. 15 5 (and Lk. 24 34) it is quite impossible to assert that any one arrived earlier than Peter at the conviction that Jesus was arisen—unless it had been at the empty sepulchre; but the account of this is, as has been shown, unhistorical. If, nevertheless, a deeper truth is to be sought in it, the solution must be found in the conception of faith. Not in the holding the resurrection of Jesus to be a fact, but only in a right apprehension of the nature of the resurrection and of the risen one, can any one have taken precedence of Peter, a precedence represented as a precedence in time, because the truth has been clothed in the form of a narrative of a visit to the grave.

And if it is to the beloved disciple—that is to say, the ostensible author or guarantor of the Fourth Gospel (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 41 d)—that this precedence is assigned, we also know wherein it consists; namely, in the spiritual view of the resurrection, according to which the risen one is identical with the holy spirit (see RESURRECTION-NARRATIVES, §§ 16 c, 29 b). Only by way of antithesis to this is it possible to gain a good sense for the statement that Peter was the first to enter the grave, and the first to observe all the clothes and their orderly arrangement. In other words, it is not to be denied to him (see 1 Cor. 15 5 Lk. 24 34) that he was the first to ascertain the outward tokens of the resurrection; herein he takes a relative precedence.

What has just been said still leaves unexplained the statement that the beloved disciple was the first to reach the sepulchre. And it would be difficult to say what precedence over Peter is intended to be expressed by this; for when it is stated that he was the first who in the deeper sense 'believed,' all has been said which could secure him a precedence over Peter in the matter itself. It appears, therefore, that in the question as to who arrived first at the sepulchre, it is only a precedence in point of time that is thought of—not, however, as if the beloved disciple actually had taken precedence of Peter in any matter of importance, but only in so far as he was at first held in higher estimation in the church than Peter. The most significant thing in the narrative is certainly this, that the beloved disciple in the beginning has precedence over Peter, but that afterwards Peter takes this precedence from him, and only in the end does the beloved disciple receive a higher valuation.

Now, it assuredly was not throughout the whole church that Peter in the first period was held in less esteem than the beloved disciple, that is to say, than the John of Asia Minor. We must reflect, however, that in the Fourth Gospel it is not the entire church, but only the following of the John of Asia Minor that is speaking. For the latter it really is true that the beloved disciple was looked on as the first witness of Christ, the risen one; but if it is added that Peter took his precedence from him, this can only mean that the estimate, according to which Peter was held to be the most eminent of all the apostles, had gradually found acceptance even in those circles which in the first period had given the first place to John. The purpose of the passage before us, then, is to restrict this high estimate of Peter, and to restore to John the place of pre-eminence.

(c) The last mention in the series of passages which seek to settle the relation between Peter and the beloved disciple, is found in chap. 21. Here, however, the tendency is in the other direction.

Along with other circumstances this also supplies a reason why we should attribute this chapter to a different authorship from that of Jn. 1-20 (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 40; RESURRECTION-NARRATIVES, §§ 5*d*, 9*c*, 29*c*). The history of the external evidence shows that for several decades after its appearance the Fourth Gospel found no recognition (JOHN, §§ 42-49). In chap. 21, vv. 24 f. clearly reveal the purpose to remove the mistrust with which it was regarded. This being so, the remainder of the chapter deserves to be scrutinised, with the view of finding whether it also subserves the same tendency. In point of fact this is actually seen to be the case, as soon as we suppose its depreciation of Peter to have been one of the causes that militated against the general recognition of the Gospel.

Therefore we find Peter now rehabilitated to a considerable extent. It is still the beloved disciple, it is true, who first recognises the risen one in the figure standing in the morning on the shore (21 7); but once he has learned who it is, Peter is the first to hasten towards him. Further, it is Peter who first goes a-fishing and who draws the net with its great take unbroken to the shore (21 3 11). Since this net signifies missions in general, and particularly the mission to the Gentiles, and its remaining unbroken symbolises the continued unity of the church (see above, § 14*c*, d, e, l), it is hereby recognised that Peter was the originator and the most important actor in the missionary activity of the church, including the mission to the Gentiles, and the guardian of the unity of the church. The leading position in the church is still more clearly assigned to him in the words 'feed my lambs' . . . 'tend my sheep' (21 15-17), which are a further development of Lk. 22 32, 'stablish thy brethren.' Finally, martyrdom is predicted for him, and this as an honour (21 18 f.). For the beloved disciple there is left a much more modest part than he has in chaps. 1-20; he too, not only Peter, may follow Jesus, if in another manner than by death; a longer life is allotted to him than to Peter, and he has the advantage of bearing written testimony to the life of Jesus (21 20-24).

Let us now seek to gather together the results of the foregoing discussions of details, and attempt to form some estimate of the character of Peter.

23. Character of Peter.

(a) It is evident, in the first place, that we must refuse to avail ourselves of very much of the material that is usually employed for this purpose.

What value are we to attach to such inferences as that which deduces from his proposal at the transfiguration to build tabernacles for Jesus, Moses, and Elijah, or from the precipitancy with which in Jn. 21 7 he throws himself into the water the 'impulsiveness' of Peter; or from his noticing the withering of the fig tree (Mk. 11 21) his powers of observation; or from his confession in Lk. 5 8, 'I am a sinful man' his humility; or from his hesitation about eating unclean animals (Acts 10 14) his little preparedness to follow a divine leading; or from his action connected with the draught of fishes in Lk. 5 5 the opposite; or from his sinking in the attempt to walk on the water his little faith; or from the opposite wishes he expressed at the footwashing (Jn. 13 6-9) his rapid changes of mood; or from his conduct at the sepulchre his 'practical and impetuous' character, or more particularly from his being second in the race, yet first to enter the sepulchre, his greater age as compared with the beloved disciple, and his greater boldness—if the incidents never really happened? What validity is there in the inference of the liveliness of his interest from the frequency of his questions, of his self-seeking nature from his question as to the future reward for having followed Jesus, of his recklessness from his use of the sword in Gethsemene, if there can be no certainty whether it was Peter at all who said or did the things in question? Or what ground is there for discerning the rapidity of his decisions and the sanguineness of his temperament from his following Jesus without previous acquaintance, if this inference rests not upon actual fact, but merely upon the excessively abbreviated manner in which the matter has been handed down to us? It is not at all impossible that many of these characteristics really did belong to Peter; but it is not permissible to deduce them from the NT data just referred to.

(b) Even when we restrict ourselves to those accounts which may with confidence be accepted, caution is still necessary lest we should take more out of them than we are entitled to do.

The emphatic remonstrance made by Peter against the idea of Jesus' passion is simply an evidence of a praiseworthy love and solicitude, such as assuredly every devoted disciple has in his heart; the reproachful 'Satan, thou mindest not the things of God, but the things of men' (Mk. 8 33) is spoken from quite another point of view, to appreciation of which Peter could not be expected to have at that time attained. As regards the contrast between his promise not to be offended by what was to befall Jesus and his denial so soon afterwards, it will be best for us to say, Let him who is confident that in a like position he would show himself stronger than Peter cast the first stone. Let us refrain, too, from drawing any inference as to character from his sleep in Gethsemane. Nor can we venture to deduce from his confession at Cæsarea Philippi an inclination to sudden inspirations, rapid apprehension, and bold expression of new thoughts; for we do not know how far the confession was prepared for by previous hints of Jesus (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 25 b), or whether it could not have been uttered by the other disciples also.

(c) We can best arrive at the kernel of Peter's personality by contemplating the greatest fact of his whole life,—his faith in Jesus which, in the extraordinary circumstances in which he found himself, led by psychological laws to his vision of the risen Jesus. As to this see, more especially, RESURRECTION-NARRATIVES, § 37. In this one fact is concentrated the whole result of his conviction of the imperishable value of that which Jesus had been to him, of the gratitude and reverence which he owed him, and of the unconditional trust which he had learned to repose in him and in his heavenly father. It is true that the triumphant struggle of his faith against the overpowering impression left by the death of Jesus was helped by something that cannot be reckoned to the character of Peter—by the vision he had, by his illusion; and his denial had a share in the production of this vision. The value of his faith, however, is not lessened by this; for had it not possessed this super-eminent strength, the vision could not by the laws of psychology have arisen.

(d) The stage preliminary to Peter's resurrection-faith was the confession at Cæsarea Philippi. If his obedience to Jesus' call at first bears witness merely to the depth of the impression which the words and person of Jesus had made upon him, and thus shows his soul to have had the religious hunger and the religious receptivity which found their satisfaction in Jesus, the confession carries us still further. It shows that under the influence of Jesus Peter was capable of purifying, elevating, and spiritualising those national and political ideas which as a Jew he, as matter of course, had entertained regarding the Messiah, to such an extent that he was able to discern in Jesus the true Messiah. That he also, in other ways, showed himself steadfast and trustworthy, is shown by the surname Cephas which Jesus gave him; and the leading place among the apostles which he received even during the lifetime of Jesus, and maintained in a still greater degree after his death, is evidence enough that in more than one direction he must have been a very remarkable personality. This does not preclude us from observing that his pre-eminence was also associated with much weakness. It is, nevertheless, certain that he did and suffered far more than we now know.

(e) Both sides, the favourable and the unfavourable, are seen also in his relation to Paul and the mission to the Gentiles. His original line of conduct during his visit to Antioch proves that he was no such bigoted upholder of the Mosaic law as were James the brother of Jesus and the Judaists who made their way into the churches founded by Paul in Galatia (see GALATIANS, § 13). It must therefore be noted to his credit that he had grasped the true inwardness of the religion of Jesus better than they.

Even if, as regards outward conduct, Jesus must, generally speaking and apart from questions of Pharisaic strictness, be regarded as an observer of the law of the fathers—for otherwise the Judaising zealots for the law could not have claimed to be called his disciples at all—in his fundamental principles he was far beyond the position which would have made salvation in any way dependent on conformity with that law. The poverty of spirit, the purity of heart, the love to God and one's neighbour which he required are all of them things for which no observance of any particular precepts is necessary, and moreover he asserted with an emphasis that increased the non-obligatory character of many ceremonial commands (see GOSPELS, § 145*g*). When accordingly Paul preached the admission of Gentiles within the pale of Christianity and the ending of the Mosaic law, he showed a better understanding of the inner meaning of Jesus than the apostles who actually ate and drank with him.

(f) In some measure this understanding had reached Peter also. But, unfortunately, not in sufficient measure. Thus it came to pass that he was outstripped by Paul, and the later development of the church depended only upon Paul not upon Peter. Indeed, instead of following Paul, if perhaps with slower steps, on the new path of freedom from the law, Peter allowed himself to be held back by the power of ancient custom of which James was the embodiment, and to be forced into the ranks of those who were opposed to Paul. In this connection are seen the most serious limitations of his spiritual activities, the absence of consistency in dealing with the new situation, and want of energy in opening up the new path. If it had depended on Peter, he would have preserved Christianity as a Jewish sect and condemned it to a maimed life. The elasticity of soul which was required for drawing and pursuing the consequences resulting from the entrance of Christianity into the Gentile world was certainly not easy of attainment to one in Peter's situation; but for a true leader it was nevertheless indispensable. The conflict with Paul into which Peter was brought by his conservative attitude also unfortunately brought with it the result that, quite apart from the judgment we are called upon to pronounce as to his intellectual endowments, a deep shadow falls upon the character of Peter—deeper than upon that of Paul. Of Paul we know only that in his manner of expressing himself as against his Judaistic opponents he exercised little restraint upon himself (2 Cor. 11 13-15 Gal. 5 12, etc); Peter, on the other hand, can hardly be cleared of the charge of—even by actions, or at the very least by failures to act—having worked against the activity of Paul (see above, § 2 [f]).

B. LIFE OUTSIDE PALESTINE; AND DEATH

In the preceding sections the NT data regarding Peter have been practically exhausted, yet a very important part of his life still remains to be discussed—that relating to his activities outside the limits of Palestine, and to his death. Our information under these heads must thus be drawn almost entirely from the Church fathers and from legendary works of very doubtful trustworthiness. The examination becomes much more complicated and the results much more hypothetical than those we have hitherto had in hand.

24. Missionary fields.

Let us first take a survey of the countries in which outside of Palestine he is represented as having laboured.[1]

(a) Origen is the first who tells us that 'Peter seems (ἔοικεν) to have preached to the Jews of the dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Asia [i.e. the western coast of Asia Minor]' (Comm. in Gen. tom. 3, ed. de la Rue, 2 24 A; ap. Euseb. HE iii. 1 2). The very form in which this sentence is cast shows us that the statement is not based on trustworthy independent information, but is merely deduced from 1 Pet. 1 1.

Nor is this all; the deduction is a very mistaken one, for in 1 14 18 21 2 9 f., 4 2 f. it is clearly said that the readers of the epistle are Gentile Christians and in 1 12 with equal clearness that it was not the writer of the epistle who had brought the gospel to them. Not till we come to 2 Pet. 1 16 is it asserted that they had been preached to by Peter. On this showing we should have to suppose that he had come to them at some time after the composition of the first epistle; for according to 2 Pet. 3 1 the second epistle is addressed to the same readers as the first. This, however, is inconsistent with the address, according to which 2 Pet. is directed to the whole of Christendom; and Christendom is not here to be restricted, on account of (as it might at first sight appear) 3 1, to the five provinces named in 1 Pet. 1 1, which would be inconsistent with the manifest sense of the words, but contrariwise we must believe the author of 2 Pet. to have presupposed 1 Pet. to have been already addressed to the whole of Christendom. This presupposition comes before us in the Muratorian fragment where (ll. 54-59) it is asserted that from the number of the churches to which Paul addressed his nine letters—viz., seven—and from the number of the epistles in the Apocalypse—also seven—we are to perceive that both writers are addressing themselves in their letters to the entire church. There are other reasons also for assigning 2 Pet. to the same date as this fragment, say about 170 or 180 A.D.

(b) The other spheres of activity, in which Peter is represented as having laboured along with other apostles are equally questionable. Alongside of such traditions there is often a simpler form in which Peter is not mentioned. Thus there readily arises the suspicion that Peter has been given as a companion to other apostles by legend merely.

Peter is said to have laboured with Philip in Assakia (Phrygia), with his brother Andrew and Matthias or Matthew in the country of the Barbarians, that is to say, primarily, by the Black Sea, so that this legend coincides with a part of that already noticed under a. As, however, there is also a country of the barbarians by the Red Sea, we find Peter as the companion of Bartholomew in Egypt as well; and finally what is said of this last apostle is transferred to Judas Thaddæus, so that Peter is made to be the companion of this Judas in Syria.

(c) We are told further that from Egypt Peter also made journeys to North Africa and to Britain, but in these cases he was alone.

(d) In Syria Peter appears not only with Judas Thaddæus, but also without any companion, particularly in Antioch. Indeed, according to Eusebius in his Chronicle, or in his source (§ 26 e; Lipsius, ii. 1 25-27), that church was founded by Peter in the second year of Claudius, that is, in 42 A.D. This is in absolute contradiction with Acts 11 19-26. Nor is there any plausible reason for accepting the activity of Peter in Antioch to be found in the consideration that he could easily touch at Antioch in the course of his journeys from Jerusalem to Asia Minor; and just as little can we attach weight to the circumstance that it was precisely in Antioch that SIMON MAGUS (q.v. § 11 b), whom it was one of Peter's tasks continually to confute, made his appearance. Thus it is tempting to conjecture that the statement as to the appearance of Peter in Antioch rests upon Gal. 2 11-21. If this conjecture is correct we shall have here an admirable example of the manner in which in the making of ecclesiastical legend the hostile relations of two apostles are ignored or even changed into a relation of friendly co-operation (cp § 40 b).

We learn even that Peter and Paul together in Antioch consecrated Marcianus as bishop of Syracuse, and Pancratius as bishop of Tauromenium in Sicily (Lipsius, ii. 1 5 8 f.). But it is only late authors who assign to Peter the bishopric of Antioch (Cod. Coislinianus, No. 120 [ed. Grosch, Jena, 1886] for two years, the Liber Pontificalis [6th and 7th cent.] for seven or ten years). Origen does not, even when he designates Ignatius (Hom. 6 in Luc., III. 938 b A, ed. de la Rue) 'episcopum Antiochiæ post Petrum secundum,' for these words are to be understood, in accordance with the expressions of ancient authors cited below (§ 26 g), in such a sense that Peter is not to be reckoned as included: so also Eus. HE iii. 36 2. Euodius, who is represented as having been appointed by Peter himself (Const. Apost. vii. 46), passes for the first bishop of Antioch.

[1] For details here and in what follows we refer once for all to Lipsius, Apokr. Apost.-Gesch. (1883-1890), and especially in the first instance to vol. 2 1, and the Ergänzungsheft, 226 f.

SIMON PETER

(e) It accords with the dating of 1 Pet. (5 13) from Babylon that Peter should be represented as having laboured in Babylonia and Persia. Whilst many accounts have it that he subsequently journeyed to Rome, the Syrian historians assign to him the lands of the Euphrates exclusively as his missionary field (Lipsius ii. 1 6 611-613, ii. 2 145 f. 175). Cp § 43.

(f) The statement which has met with widest acceptance is that Peter laboured in Rome and suffered martyrdom there. As to this, see §§ 25-31, 37-41, 45.

(g) The missionary journeys of Peter through Macedonia, Greece, Sicily, and Italy are open to the suspicion that they have been assumed merely in order to make more clear his migration from Asia Minor to Rome and that for their details the journeys of Paul served as a pattern (Lipsius ii. 1 11).

(h) The representation that Peter laboured also in Gaul and in Spain appears to have arisen out of the desire of the Roman church to secure for itself the supremacy over these countries. Pope Innocent I. (402-417) expressly denies that in Italy, Gaul, Spain, Africa and Sicily, or any of the intermediate islands, churches were anywhere founded by any one except priests who had been instituted by Peter or by his successors (Epist. 25 2, ap. Lipsius, ii. 2 217 307).

(i) We thus obtain as a preliminary result that apart from Rome only the claims of Antioch and Babylon or at most also of the shores of the Black Sea (Pontus) have some measure of plausible support in tradition; but of these that of Antioch is definitely ruled out by the data of the NT; for not only is the founding of the church there by Peter impossible, but also any lengthened stay there on his part, inasmuch as its Gentile Christian character was most marked and moreover it had been witness of his humiliation at the hands of Paul (Gal. 2 11-21). As for the claims of Babylon, see below, § 30*k*, 43.

25. Sojourn in Rome: earliest witnesses.

Let us first inquire what are our earliest authorities for a sojourn of Peter in Rome and his ultimate martyrdom there. (a) The first whom we can date with certainty is Dionysius, bishop of Corinth (about 170 A.D.). From a letter of his addressed to the Church of Rome in the time of the bishopric of Soter there (about 166-174), in which[1] he thanks the Romans for pecuniary help given to members of the Corinthian church, Eusebius (HE ii. 25 8) has preserved the following passage: ταῦτα καὶ ὑμεῖς διὰ τῆς τοσαύτης νουθεσίας τὴν ἀπὸ Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου φυτείαν γενηθεῖσαν Ῥωμαίων τε καὶ Κορινθίων συνεκεράσατε. καὶ γὰρ ἄμφω καὶ εἰς τὴν ἡμετέραν Κόρινθον φυτεύσαντες ἡμᾶς ὁμοίως ἐδίδαξαν, ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ εἰς τὴν Ἰταλίαν ὁμόσε διδάξαντες ἐμαρτύρησαν κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρόν. 'So also by this so weighty admonition[2] ye have brought together that planting made by Peter and Paul of the Romans and of the Corinthians. For, indeed, these two both planted us in our Corinth, and likewise taught us; in like manner also after having taught together in Italy they suffered martyrdom about the same time.'

The meaning of these words is not perfectly clear [cp col. 4145]; but so much can be made out—that Dionysius means to designate the Roman and Corinthian churches alike as foundations of Peter and Paul. This is involved in 'planting' (φυτεία) even if we should prefer for φυτεύσαντες the reading of Syncellus: φοιτήσαντες. At the same time, the expression εἰς τὴν Ἰταλίαν stands, in accordance with a linguistic usage which at that date was widely spread (see Winer,(7) § 50 4*b*), for ἐν τῇ Ἰταλίᾳ, for the participle 'having taught' (διδάξαντες) belongs to it; and thus φοιτήσαντες, even if it ought to be regarded as the right reading, would not furnish the requisite completion to the second member of the sentence. This being so, the suggestion becomes natural that εἰς . . . Κόρινθον stands for ἐν . . . Κορίνθῳ, and thus that φυτεύσαντες ought to be retained—all the more because it is in keeping with φυτεία. Ὁμόσε means properly 'towards one and the same place'; but as we may not bring in φοιτήσαντες, this will not at all suit the context. Here also then we must discern another instance of the same confusion as that between εἰς and ἐν, in other words ὁμοῦ must be meant. Thus Dionysius, even if he does not expressly say that Peter and Paul came simultaneously to Corinth and simultaneously to Rome, nevertheless, as regards Rome at least, states that they taught there simultaneously; in fact 'in like manner also' (ὁμοίως δὲ καί) indicates very distinctly that he assumes them to have taught together in Corinth also.

This last assumption is quite irreconcilable with Acts 18 1-18 20 2 f.; and even were we to suppose that Dionysius thinks of Peter's visit to Corinth as having been at a different date from that of Paul, we should still be at hopeless variance with 1 Cor. 3 10-15 4 15 (see § 2 g). The statement of Dionysius accordingly can only rest on unwarranted inference from what Paul says regarding the Cephas party in Corinth (1 Cor. 1 12 3 21 f.).

Thus it is of no avail when Harnack (ACL ii. [=Chronol.] I 242 f.) seeks to defend Dionysius by arguing that even according to Acts (8 14-17) the founding of a church becomes 'perfect' only after apostolic labours, so that Dionysius does not by the language he uses exclude an activity of other missionaries in Rome before the arrival of Peter and Paul. In the first place, Harnack's exegesis of the passage in Acts is not exact. What can be effected by the apostles alone is the bestowal of the Holy Spirit; that without this the founding of a church is not 'perfect' is not said, and does not at all suit the other case in which the same theory is found (19 1-7). This last passage has nothing at all to do with the founding of a church, but only with the spiritual gifts of speaking with 'tongues' and of prophecy. But, further, Harnack's defence of Dionysius, even were it valid, would apply only to what he says about Rome, not to what he says about Corinth; for, if Dionysius has followed the theory of Acts as this is expounded by Harnack, in the present case at all events Paul has complied with it, inasmuch as he brought about the gift of the Holy Spirit at once in his first ministry there, and thus Peter would have found no field there for his function as a founder of churches unless his arrival had been synchronous with that of Paul.

Thus it is impossible to absolve Dionysius from the charge of having, in the interests of a theory as to the co-operation of Peter and Paul, grievously distorted the history of his own church in a point as to which he of all men must be presumed to have been accurately informed. How then are we to repose confidence in such a 'witness' when he tells us about Rome? Perhaps his whole knowledge regarding Rome rests upon misunderstanding of 1 Clem. (below, § 28), of which he says (ap. Eus. HE iv. 23 11) that it is regularly read at Corinth in public worship.

(b) In Irenæus (about 185 A.D.) the most important passages relating to our present inquiry are the following. According to Hær. iii. 1 2 [1] Matthew wrote his gospel 'whilst Peter and Paul were preaching the gospel at Rome and founding the church' (τοῦ Πέτρου καὶ τοῦ Παύλου ἐν Ῥώμῃ εὐαγγελιζομένων καὶ θεμελιούντων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν). In iii. 3 1 [2] he speaks of the 'very great, very ancient, and universally known church founded and constituted at Rome by the two very glorious apostles Peter and Paul' (maxima et antiquissima et omnibus cognita a gloriosissimis duobus apostolis Petro et Paulo Romæ fundata et constituta ecclesia). Here Irenæus's interest is to prove the apostolical succession of bishops. As it would be too laborious a task to do this for all churches he contents himself with the case of Rome.

(c) The list of bishops of Rome which Irenæus proceeds immediately afterwards to give (iii. 3 2 f.) comes down to his own day (νῦν) and ends with Eleutherus (about 174-189). It may be presumed that it was not drawn up for the first time at the date of his writing.

[1] As Eusebius in his enumeration (HE iv. 23 9) of the epistles of Dionysius known to him mentions only one to the Romans, we must suppose this to be the same as that which he had already made use of (ii. 25 8).

[2] By this is doubtless intended the Epistle of the Roman church mentioned in iv. 23 11, which Dionysius is answering.

It cannot indeed be maintained that Hegesippus—as his words in Eus. HE iv. 22 3 seem to say—drew up, after his arrival in Rome, a list of the bishops there down to Anicetus (about 154-166) as Lightfoot (Apost. Fathers, i. [=Clement of Rome] 1 63 f. 153 f. 202 f. 327-333) would have it (see MINISTRY, § 58 c, n. and Harnack, ACL ii. 1 180-184); but on the other hand according to Harnack (op. cit. 184-193) and Erbes (Z. f. Kirchengesch. 22 2-5 [1901]) it is probable that Epiphanius (Hær. 27 6) for his list of the bishops of Rome made use of the same Roman original source as Irenæus, and that this, as in Epiphanius, ended with Anicetus, and thus perhaps was drawn up during his episcopate, or at any rate during that of his successor, Soter. Whatever its date, the form in which the list is now found gives no certainty as to what is the most important point in this connection—the question, namely, as to when it was that the reference to Peter and Paul was first introduced. Irenæus begins his rendering of it thus: 'The blessed apostles [Peter and Paul], then, after founding and building up the church, committed the office of the episcopate into the hands of Linus. To him succeeds Anencletus, and after him, in the third place from the apostles, Clement is allotted the episcopate' (θεμελιώσαντες οὖν καὶ οἰκοδομήσαντες οἱ μακάριοι ἀπόστολοι τὴν ἐκκλησίαν Λίνῳ τὴν τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς λειτουργίαν ἐνεχείρισαν. διαδέχεται δὲ αὐτὸν Ἀνέγκλητος· μετὰ τοῦτον δὲ τρίτῳ τόπῳ ἀπὸ τῶν ἀποστόλων τὴν ἐπισκοπὴν κληροῦται Κλήμης). Thus we find no mention either of Peter or of Paul as bishop of Rome. If Clement is designated as third 'from the apostles' (ἀπὸ τῶν ἀποστόλων) probably all that is intended is to accentuate the unbrokenness of the succession, not to imply that if one chose to include the two apostles in the reckoning he would be not the third but the fourth or fifth in the series. Epiphanius, however, says: 'In Rome the first were Peter and Paul, apostles and bishops, thereafter Linus, thereafter Cletus, thereafter Clement,' etc. (ἐν Ῥώμῃ γεγόνασι πρῶτοι Πέτρος καὶ Παῦλος ἀπόστολοι καὶ ἐπίσκοποι. εἶτα Λίνος, εἶτα Κλῆτος, εἶτα Κλήμης, κ.τ.λ.). After a short interruption, he resumes: 'The series of bishops in Rome shows the following succession,—Peter and Paul, Linus and Cletus, Clement,' etc. (ἡ τῶν ἐν Ῥώμῃ ἐπισκόπων διαδοχὴ ταύτην ἔχει τὴν ἀκολουθίαν· Πέτρος καὶ Παῦλος, Λίνος καὶ Κλῆτος, Κλήμης, κ.τ.λ.). If, however, Epiphanius makes Peter and Paul bishops of Rome,[1] then Irenæus also, or another shortly before him, can have prefixed their names to the whole list which at an earlier date had begun simply with Linus. The list of bishops can have been subjected to the same supplementing process after Irenæus's time also, before it came into the hands of Epiphanius (died 403), or after that of Julius Africanus (about 220) or of Hippolytus (about 234), the two last mentioned of whom also made use of it, according to Harnack (188). A list of this kind, from the nature of the case, was not allowed to remain long unaltered, but could easily be 'completed' in the course of transcription whenever a copyist believed he had found a gap in it. Moreover, neither Irenæus nor Epiphanius, whose editions of the list lie before us as they wrote them, makes any statement that he is using an external document, and feels himself under obligation to reproduce it scrupulously. Thus for us no exact determination of its date is necessary; so far as Peter and Paul are concerned it does not with certainty take us back to a date before Irenæus.

(d) In Clement of Alexandria Peter's sojourn in Rome is, as with Irenæus, mentioned in connection with the writing of a gospel—in this case, however, Mk. not Mt

From the Hypotyposes Eusebius (HE vi. 14 6 f.) has preserved a piece of information which Clement claims to have received from the presbyters of the olden time (τῶν ἀνέκαθεν πρεσβυτέρων). 'After that Peter had publicly preached the word in Rome, and, filled with the spirit, had set forth the gospel (τοῦ Πέτρου δημοσίᾳ ἐν Ῥώμῃ κηρύξαντος τὸν λόγον καὶ πνεύματι τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ἐξειπόντος), Mark at the request of many hearers set down these discourses in writing.' Similarly in the Adumbrationes on 1 Pet. (ed. Potter, 1007): 'Marcus Petri sectator palam prædicante Petro evangelium Romæ,' etc. In the other passage where Eusebius transcribes the same matter from the Hypotyposes of Clement, though somewhat differently (HE ii. 15 1 f.; with regard to which cp GOSPELS, § 147, end), Rome is presupposed, through the connection with ii. 14 5 f., to be the place. As the Gospel of Mark is alleged to have owed its origin to the evangelist's reports of the discourses of Peter, it is intelligible why Clement should not have mentioned Paul at the same time, even although he was convinced of the apostles having been together in Rome.

(e) Pseudo-Cyprian, De Rebaptismate, 17 (Cypr. ed. Hartel, 390), read in Pauli Prædicatio as follows: 'et post tanta tempora Petrum et Paulum post conlationem evangelii in Hierusalem et mutuam cogitationem et altercationem et rerum agendarum dispositionem [the reference is to Gal. 2 Acts 15] postremo in urbe quasi tunc primum invicem sibi esse cognitos, et quædam alia hujuscemodi absurde ac turpiter conficta' ('and that after such long time, Peter and Paul, after the collation of the gospel in Jerusalem and the mutual consideration and discussion and arrangement of things to be done, had at last in the city, in a certain way, then for the first time become known to one another; and certain other things of this sort, absurdly and basely feigned').

In spite of the title Pauli Prædicatio this quotation is often regarded as coming from the book known by the title of Κήρυγμα Πέτρου, in the belief that the title sometimes ran also: Preaching of Peter and Paul. Were this correct, we should have here the oldest testimony to the Roman sojourn of Peter, it being presupposed that the book was used not only by Clement of Alexandria but also as early as in the Apology of Aristides (see Harris, Apology of Aristides, in TSt. i. 1 86-99; Harnack, ACL ii. 1 472 f.; cp OLD-CHRISTIAN LITERATURE, §§ 11, 36). But the question of the derivation of the quotation from it is so uncertain (it is answered negatively by von Dobschütz, for example, in TU xi. 1 13-15 127-131) that we need not pursue the matter further.

(f) The apocryphal Acta Petri, which relates the activity and death of Peter at Rome with detail, may be mentioned at this point as being possibly a witness of equal age, but must not be taken account of until after it has been carefully discussed (see §§ 32-39). So also with the Πράξεις Παύλου from which Origen (tom. in Jn. 20 12, ed. de la Rue, 4 322, C) quotes: 'as was said by the Saviour, "I am going to be crucified anew"' (ὡς ὑπὸ τοῦ σωτῆρος εἰρημένον· ἄνωθεν μέλλω σταυροῦσθαι) (see §§ 33 g, 34 g, 39 a, c).

We proceed now to the testimonies which come from a somewhat later date.

26. Roman sojourn: later witnesses.

(a) Tertullian supplies new data, if not indeed in adv. Marc. (4 5 begin.) where he says: 'Romani . . . quibus evangelium et Petrus et Paulus sanguine quoque suo signatum reliquerunt,' or in Baptism, 4, where he ascribes the possession of the same salvation to those 'quos Joannes in Jordane et quos Petrus in Tiberi tinxit,' etc., yet certainly in Præscr. haeret. 36: 'habes Romam . . . ubi Petrus passioni dominicæ adæquatur [by crucifixion], ubi Paulus Joannis [the Baptist's] exitu coronatur' [by beheading], and in Scorpiace, 15: 'orientem fidem Romæ primus Nero cruentavit. Tunc Petrus ab altero cingitur [Jn. 21 18 f.] cum cruci adstringitur; tunc Paulus civitatis Romanæ consequitur nativitatem cum illic martyrii renascitur generositate,' 'Paul acquires the Roman citizenship by right of birth when he is born again in the nobility of martyrdom.'

(b) Gaius of Rome (under Zephyrinus, about 198-217) says in his writing against the Montanist Proculus (ap. Eus. HE ii. 25 6 f.): 'But I am able to show the "trophies" of the apostles. For if you will come to the Vatican or to the Ostean Way, you will find the "trophies" of those who founded this church' (ἐγὼ δὲ τὰ τρόπαια τῶν ἀποστόλων ἔχω δεῖξαι. ἐὰν γὰρ θελήσῃς ἀπελθεῖν ἐπὶ τὸν Βατικανὸν ἢ ἐπὶ τὴν ὁδὸν τὴν Ὠστίαν, εὑρήσεις τὰ τρόπαια τῶν ταύτην ἱδρυσαμένων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν). By τρόπαια we are to understand here not 'places of burial,' as Eusebius does, but 'places of death.'

Even the literal meaning of the word ('sign of victory') admits this meaning only; for a martyr gained his victory only at the place of his death, not at the place of his burial. To understand the meaning 'sign of victory' we have only to make the further supposition that those who honoured the martyrs were able to show, at the place of death, some object or other that marked it out for those who visited the spot, and with which was associated some reminiscence, whether real or supposed, of what happened at the martyr's death. Thus in the Vatican was shown a terebinth, on the road to Ostia a pine tree, beside which Peter and Paul respectively breathed their last (Lipsius ii. 1 391).

Even apart, however, from its lexical meaning we may learn that τρόπαια cannot here mean graves. For the bones of the two apostles were not deposited in the places he mentions till long after the time of Gaius; those of Peter after 354, in the Church of St. Peter, which was built at that date; those of Paul, according to the list of the depositio martyrum, in the famous chronicle of the year 354, as early as 258 A.D., by the road to Ostia (and before 354 in the basilica newly built there). In the same year, however (258; June 29), the relics of Peter,

[1] For this very reason if for no other we see that Epiphanius cannot have preserved the original form of the list. It also indicates but little accuracy when he says at one time 'Linus, then Cletus' (Λίνος εἶτα Κλῆτος), at another 'Linus and Cletus' (Λίνος καὶ Κλῆτος), for the latter form of expression denotes, as we see in 'Peter and Paul' (Πέτρος καὶ Παῦλος), contemporaneous tenure of office.

according to the same list, were transferred in catacumbas, that is to say, into the catacombs of the piece of ground beside the Appian Way, half-an-hour outside of the Porta Appia, in other words, hard by the present church of San Sebastiano, which piece of ground was originally the only one that bore the name 'ad Catacumbas,' a name which has never as yet been quite satisfactorily explained. Here an inscription of bishop Damasus (366-384) ran :—

hic habitasse prius sanctos cognoscere debes nomina quisque[1] Petri pariter Paulique requiris.

So far as Peter is concerned, this agrees with the fact that his relics had been removed to the church of St. Peter before this inscription was composed; as regards Paul the statement of Damasus is not easily reconciled with that of the list referred to above. Still, even if the list be correct it is certain that the relics of Paul had not yet, in the time of Gaius, their resting-place by the road to Ostia, and that those of Peter should have been removed to the catacombs would be very unlikely, if already in Gaius's time they had their resting-place at the place of his death, namely the Vatican. On the whole question see Lipsius ii. 1 391-404; Erbes, Z. f. Kirchengesch. 7 (1885) 1-49, and, as regards the special point, otherwise in 'Todestage der Apostel Paulus u. Petrus' in TU xix. (= Neue Folge, iv.), 1 (1899) 67-133. Ficker (Z. f. Kirchengesch. 22, 1901, 333-342) utterly denies that the inscription relates to the burial of Peter and Paul. His opinion is that in the view of Damasus they had during their lifetime resided at the spot where the inscription was found (cp 'habitasse,' and 'nomina' not 'corpora'). The inscription, he holds, was directed against the refusal of the Eastern Church, from 325 A.D. onwards, to accept any decisions from Rome, and against the argument urged in support of this refusal that Peter and Paul came from the East (the inscription in fact says, towards the end: Roma suos potius meruit defendere cives). Only, as the locality where the inscription was found was a place of burial, it is very improbable that Damasus can have believed that Peter and Paul when alive lived here at half-an-hour's distance from the city.

(c) In immediate continuation of the passage relating to Peter cited above (§ 24 a), Origen proceeds: 'Who also in the end, being in Rome, was crucified head downwards, having himself desired to suffer in this way' (ὃς καὶ ἐπὶ τέλει ἐν Ῥώμῃ γενόμενος ἀνεσκολοπίσθη κατὰ κεφαλῆς, οὕτως αὐτὸς ἀξιώσας παθεῖν). The Acta Petri (see § 33 g) deals fully with the reasons why Peter chose this particular manner of death. As regards Paul, Origen goes on to say that he suffered martyrdom in Rome under Nero.

(d) The Philosophumena (dating from about 235 and ascribed to Hippolytus), as well as other later writings, mentions the polemic with Simon, carried on at Rome by Peter (and Paul), with which we are acquainted through the apocryphal Acta Petri (and Acta Petri et Pauli). For details see § 39 d.

(e) Of later writers we at once mention Eusebius. He brings together all that has been hitherto mentioned, and will have it that Peter was bishop of Rome for twenty-five years, namely from 42-67 A.D. He thus places the Neronian persecution, in which according to him also Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom (HE ii. 25 5), three years too late. It is of a piece with this that he supports the theory, which he himself (HE v. 18 14) takes from the Anti-Montanist Apollonius (about 200 A.D.)—a theory which already finds expression in the Prædicatio Petri (above, § 25 e; ap. Clem. Al. Strom. vi. 5 43, p. 762, ed. Potter; for other supporters of it see Harnack, ACL ii. 1 243)—that the apostles had been commanded by Jesus not to go abroad from Jerusalem till twelve years after his death. These twelve years Eusebius reckons as from 30 to 42 A.D. The variations met with in the different translations of his Chronicle, no longer extant in Greek, need not trouble us here. The only point of importance for our inquiry is that the reckoning of twenty-five Roman years was found, not invented, by Eusebius. According to Harnack (ACL ii. 1 116-129) he used the Chronography of Julius Africanus, which closed with the reign of Elagabalus (218-222 A.D.).

(f) Thus, according to Harnack (201, 703 f.), the 'tendency legend,' that Peter sojourned in Rome for twenty-five years, arose and 'became official' between the time of Irenæus, who as yet knew nothing whatever of Peter's twenty-five Roman years, and that of Julius Africanus, that is to say in the episcopate of Victor (about 189-198), or in that of Zephyrinus (about 198-217).

[1] Quisque here = quicunque = whosoever.

(g) The consequence of this is that Peter becomes no longer the founder merely, or joint founder, but the bishop also of the church of Rome, and that Paul, whom we still find even in Irenæus, etc. (§ 26 a-d), at his side and on a level with him, is eliminated. This consequence, however, was developed only gradually.

The Roman bishop Calixtus (about 217-222) claimed, as appears from Tertullian's refutation (Pudic. 21), the power to remit or retain sins, on the ground that he was the successor of Peter who, according to Mt. 16 18 f., had been invested with this power. So also his successors affirmed in Cyprian's time: 'Se successionem Petri tenere' or 'per successionem cathedram Petri habere'; and this is presupposed by Cyprian himself (Epist. 75 17 55 8 59 14 71 3). According to the Epistle of Clement to James (2) that now stands prefixed to the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies, Peter, in appointing Clement bishop of Rome, hands over to him his καθέδρα τῶν λόγων, and confers on him the power of binding and loosing. The author (Hippolytus?) of the 'Little Labyrinth' against the sect of Artemon (ap. Eus. HE 5 28) in § 3 styles Victor as τρισκαιδέκατος ἀπὸ Πέτρου ἐν Ῥώμῃ ἐπίσκοπος—thus no longer, as Irenæus phrases it, ἀπὸ τῶν ἀποστόλων—(i.e., from Peter and Paul; see above, § 25 c). Yet he continues to call Victor the thirteenth as Irenæus had called Eleutherus, Victor's predecessor, the twelfth; thus he does not yet reckon Peter as the first member of the series. Similarly, Eusebius still counts Linus as the first bishop of Rome, and in accordance with this, gives the succeeding bishops the same numeration as Irenæus does. While doing so he nevertheless adds (HE iii. 4 8), μετὰ Πέτρον, yet along with this not only μετὰ τὴν Παύλου καὶ Πέτρου μαρτυρίαν (iii. 2), but also μετὰ Παῦλόν τε καὶ Πέτρον (iii. 21), ἀπὸ Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου (iv. 1) and, precisely as Irenæus has it, ἀπὸ τῶν ἀποστόλων (iv. 5 5 and v. prooem. 1). For more precise details from Eusebius see Kneller, Z. f. kathol. Theol. 1902, p. 229 f.

(h) It is in the Catalogus Liberianus (i.e., the list of Roman bishops brought down to Liberius, A.D. 352 ff.), forming part of the famous Chronicle of 354, that Peter is first spoken of unreservedly as first bishop of Rome: 'post ascensum ejus [Jesu] beatissimus Petrus episcopatum suscepit' (but here from 30-55 A.D.).

The Ascensio Jesaiæ would seem to be a still older witness than any of those we have hitherto discussed, to the fact of Peter's martyrdom at Rome.

27. Ascensio Jesaiæ.

(a) Clemen (ZWT, 1896, 388-415; 1897, 455-465) held it possible to distinguish and isolate in 3 31-(or 3 21)-4 22 an apocalypse put into writing before the death of Nero (4 2 f. 13-18), which related to Nero's persecution of the Christians; and in 4 3 b, which at that date he knew only through Dillmann's Latin translation from the Ethiopic ('e duodecim in manus eius tradetur'), he found an allusion to the death of Peter in that reign.

Harnack (ACL ii. 1 714-716) disputed this hypothesis, including that relating to Peter; Zeller (ZWT, 1896, p. 558-568) accepted the latter, but like Harnack put the date of composition much later than Clemen had done, and therefore denied its trustworthiness as regarded Peter. Clemen at a later date was able to report (Theol. Rundschau, 1901, p. 75) that Vernon Bartlet (Apostolic Age, 1900, p. 524) also had assigned Asc. Jes. 3 13-4 21 to the last years of Nero, but at the same time took the opportunity to add, without further discussion, that he himself no longer regarded that dating as probable in view of the Greek text recently published by Grenfell and Hunt (Amherst Papyri, 1, 1900, 1-22). Charles, who makes use of this Greek text in his edition of Asc. Jes. (1900), holds that a hiatus in 4 3 b ought to be filled by the insertion of εἷς and the clause interpreted as referring to Peter: 'of the Twelve one will be delivered into his hands' ([τ]ῶν δώδεκα [εἷς] ταῖς χερσὶν αὐτοῦ [π]αραδοθήσεται). Harnack also gives his adhesion to this (SBAW, 1900, p. 985 f.), but adds that the value of the statement regarding Peter will depend upon its date, and this he prefers to assign rather to the first half of the third century, than to any time within the second (ACL ii. 1 574-577).

(b) Charles, however, holds that Asc. Jes. 3 13 b-4 18, 'the testament of Hezekiah,' ought to be dated between 88 and 100 A.D., not, as in APOCALYPTIC (above, col. 230), between 50 and 80 A.D. According to him the question turns upon 4 13 (p. 30 f.).

Charles renders the Ethiopic version, here the only text available for us, as follows: 'And many believers and saints, having seen Him for whom they were hoping, who was crucified, Jesus the Lord Christ [after that I, Isaiah, had seen Him who was crucified and ascended], and those also who were believers in Him—of these few in those days will be left as His servants, while they flee from desert to desert, awaiting the coming of the Beloved.' Charles adds: 'we see that two classes of the faithful are discriminated . . . believers who had seen Christ personally, and believers who had not. . . . Of the two classes our text declares that few will be left.' As, however, the first class cannot well have survived into the second century, this passage must have been written before 100 A.D. On the other hand, it has to be remembered that this distinction of two classes could, if really intended, hardly be called a good one. The second class is spoken of as consisting simply of 'those who were believers in Him'; but the first class also consists of 'believers (and saints).' Thus it would hardly seem to have been the writer's intention to distinguish two classes.

(c) In a private communication Charles now prefers to read: 'and many believers and saints who had seen Him . . . and who also kept believing in Him,' etc. By this conjectural substitution of οἵ for the ὅτε which the Ethiopic translation presupposes 'all reference to a second class disappears.' Charles continues to maintain, however, that the reference is to Jewish Christians who have personally known Jesus. But in this case we are compelled to ask: Is the persecution of the last days really to be confined to these alone, and are they alone to look for the Messiah, and other Christians not? Besides, the text even as restored by Charles still contains a very disturbing tautology, 'many believers and saints . . . who also kept believing in Him.'

Bousset (Antichrist, 1895, p. 87 f.) regards our passage as more largely interpolated than Charles does. But neither is his conjecture at all satisfying. As long as we hold by Charles' text, Zeller's interpretation remains the most probable one, that 'seeing' means a knowledge of Christ possessed by all Christians and not merely by those who were eye-witnesses of his earthly life (cp Jn. 14 7 1 Jn. 3 6 3 Jn. 11). On this interpretation however all necessity disappears for dating the passage before 100 A.D. There are signs of a later origin, such as, for example, the distinction of bishops from presbyters (MINISTRY, §§ 46, 47, 54 b, c), which as matter of fact is clear in the πρεσβύτεροι καὶ ποιμένες of 3 24 (and also 3 29 according to the Ethiopic version), or the representation of the circumstances of the resurrection of Jesus (3 15-17), which, at least in so far as it names Michael (and Gabriel), goes beyond that of the gospel of Peter even (see RESURRECTION-NARRATIVES, § 7 e).

(d) Finally, it does not seem to have occurred to any one to ask whether or no the most important clause of all in the passage before us really belongs to the original text (4 3*b*: 'of the Twelve one will be delivered into his hands.' Charles (pp. lxix-lxxiii) has rightly perceived that it is not the living Nero who is regarded as Antichrist, but the dead one: in the form of Nero, we read in 4 2 4, Beliar (=Satan; 2 Cor. 6 15, and cp BELIAL) will appear and will rule for 3½ years, immediately after which will be the end of the world (4 5-18). Of this Nero it cannot be intended to say that Peter is to fall into his hands in the year 64 A.D. Except in this one clause—if indeed it is to be referred to Peter—the whole of the rest of the description is purely apocalyptic; Christians will become godless (3 21-31), Beliar will come in the form of Nero (4 2) and will persecute the plant which the twelve apostles of the Beloved have planted (Gk. 'will plant': φυτεύσουσιν, 4 3*a*; as to this clause, cp below, e); he will work miracles, will cause himself to be worshipped as God, and will be cast into hell by the Lord (Christ?), who will come down from the seventh heaven (4 4-14). If in the middle of all this it is said of one of the twelve that he will fall into the hands of this Beliar (4 3*b*), the one intended must, if the clause is to fit the context, be one who has survived the death of Nero.

The only notorious instance which the readers could have found referred to in these purely allusive words would be that of John with his cup of poison and his bath of boiling oil (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 8*b*). Yet it is not easy to see why this atrocity should be referred precisely to Beliar coming in the form of Nero. This Beliar is a purely apocalyptic form, whose deeds are with good reason described in quite general and indefinite terms. As real prophecy a prediction of any such detail would be not only bold but also out of keeping with the apocalyptic character of the representation of the time of the end; as vaticinium ex eventu it is equally out of keeping; and, besides, the martyrdom of John is not a historical fact but first came to be believed at so late a date after the time of the emperor under whom it is alleged to have occurred (Domitian is usually named) as to make it absolutely impossible that at the time of the writer this emperor should be spoken of as the last to reign before the end of the world or that a reign of no more than 3½ years should be assigned to him.

Thus it becomes in fact probable that it is Peter rather than John who is intended. In that case, however, the clause must be regarded as a gloss. It is so regarded, it will be seen, not with the object of getting rid of a text that is inconvenient for the view of Peter's life taken in the present article, but purely for reasons affecting a right understanding of Asc. Jes. The deletion of the clause would be necessary even if it related not to Peter but to some other of the apostles who had suffered martyrdom under Nero.

(e) There are two ways by which the extent of the gloss can be determined.

If in the entire text the Antichrist is the subject, then it consists only of the above cited words in 4 3*b*. If, on the other hand, we should find ourselves constrained to understand the living Nero as being the subject of v. 3 (the subject according to v. 2, end, is 'Who himself (even) this king,' ὅστις αὐτὸς ὁ βασιλεὺς οὗτος), then the immediately following expression, v. 3*a* ('will persecute the plant which the twelve apostles of the Beloved have planted') must also be reckoned as belonging to the interpolation; for it is quite improbable that between two utterances regarding Antichrist there should stand one relating to the living Nero who must nevertheless be dead before Antichrist comes forward in Nero's form.

Why the clause should have been added by some ancient reader will become very intelligible if only we suppose such reader to have understood by Beliar the actual Nero—as was done at first by Clemen in 1896 f. It thus appears that Asc. Jes. cannot be adduced as an earlier witness for the belief of the martyrdom of Peter under Nero than the documents dealt with in preceding sections.

Contrariwise all the writings of an older date are profoundly silent on the subject of Peter's Roman sojourn. A detailed examination of 1 Clem. is at this point called for, partly on account of its fundamental importance, and partly because it is often taken in the other sense.

28. 1 Clem.

(a) After having pointed to the instances in the OT in which jealousy and envy are seen to have led to the most direful results, Clement proceeds: V. 1. Ἀλλ' ἵνα τῶν ἀρχαίων ὑποδειγμάτων παυσώμεθα, ἔλθωμεν ἐπὶ τοὺς ἔγγιστα γενομένους ἀθλητάς· λάβωμεν τῆς γενεᾶς ἡμῶν τὰ γενναῖα ὑποδείγματα. 2. Διὰ ζῆλον καὶ φθόνον οἱ μέγιστοι καὶ δικαιότατοι στῦλοι ἐδιώχθησαν καὶ ἕως θανάτου ἤθλησαν. 3. Λάβωμεν πρὸ ὀφθαλμῶν ἡμῶν τοὺς ἀγαθοὺς ἀποστόλους· 4. (5 1) 'But, not to dwell on the ancient examples, let us come to those champions who lived nearest ourselves. Let us take the noble examples of our own generation. (2) By reason of jealousy and envy the greatest and most righteous pillars were persecuted, and contended even unto death. (3) Let us set before our eyes the good apostles; (4) Peter, who by reason of unrighteous jealousy endured not one nor two but many labours, and thus having borne his testimony went to his due place of glory. (5) By reason of jealousy and strife Paul showed the reward of patient endurance. (6) After that he had been seven times in bonds, had been driven into exile, had been stoned, had preached in the East and in the West, he won the noble renown of his faith; (7) having taught righteousness to the whole world and having come to the limit of the West and having borne his testimony before the rulers, he thus departed from the world and went unto the holy place, having become a very great example of patient endurance. (6 1) Unto these men of holy lives was gathered a vast multitude of elect ones who, suffering by reason of jealousy many indignities and tortures, became a most admirable example among us. (2) By reason of jealousy women being persecuted as Danaids and Dircæ, after that they had suffered cruel and unholy insults, safely reached the goal in the race of faith and received a noble reward, feeble though they were in body.'

(b) The word μαρτυρήσας applied to Paul (5 7) will be most fittingly interpreted as meaning, not 'having suffered martyrdom' (his death is indicated rather by the words ἀπηλλάγη τοῦ κόσμου) but rather 'having borne (oral) testimony' or, at most, 'having suffered tortures.' In the case of Peter, however (5 4), the first of these two renderings does not fit well: for οὕτω μαρτυρήσας seems intended to convey 'after that he had borne testimony' by the 'labours' (πόνοι) just mentioned. These, however, extend over his whole life as an apostle. That precisely his death was occasioned by some such 'labour' and thus was a martyrdom is not expressly said and therefore might be disputed. Still, since Peter is here cited as an instance of how the greatest 'pillars' 'contended even unto death' we refrain from doing so.

(c) In like manner it will be well to concede that 'among us' (ἐν ἡμῖν) in 6 1 does not mean 'among us Christians'—which would be tolerably vague—but 'among us Romans.' The reference is to the victims of the Neronian persecution (6 2) who were made use of for the presentation of mythological pieces. Still when it is said of the Neronian martyrs in Rome that they were gathered together with Peter and Paul, we are by no means to draw it as a necessary inference that Peter and Paul also died in Rome. To 'was gathered' (συνηθροίσθη) in 6 1 what we ought rather to supply will be 'to the due place of glory' (εἰς τὸν ὀφειλόμενον τόπον τῆς δόξης) or 'to the holy place' (εἰς τὸν ἅγιον τόπον) of 5 4 7. Thus the common meeting-place referred to is not Rome but heaven, and accordingly the present passage says nothing as to the place of death.

(d) Neither in 5 1 does the author give any reason to suppose that he is thinking of all as having one and the same place of death. The oneness that unites those about to be mentioned and separates them from those who have been mentioned already is characterised as a oneness of time only: 'who lived nearest . . . our own generation' (τοὺς ἔγγιστα γενομένους . . . τῆς γενεᾶς ἡμῶν).

(e) As the writer is at Rome, by the 'limit of the west' (τέρμα τῆς δύσεως, 5 7) to which Paul came it would seem as if Spain must be meant. The fact, however, of a journey of Paul to Spain is, if the present passage be left out of account, nowhere asserted before the fourth century except in the Muratorian fragment (ll. 38, 39) and in the pre-Catholic Acta Petri (see below, § 33*a*), and in view of the silence of the other witnesses is very much exposed to the suspicion of being merely an inference from Rom. 15 24 28, where Paul expresses the intention of extending his journey from Rome to Spain. Eusebius (HE ii. 22 2) speaks of a missionary activity of Paul after the captivity spoken of in Acts 28 30 f., but does not say where, and adds that thereafter Paul came once more to Rome and suffered martyrdom there. In the immediately following context (22 3-8) he refers the 'first hearing' (πρώτη ἀπολογία) of 2 Tim. 4 16 to the first Roman captivity. Here too, in view of the silence of other witnesses, there arises inevitably a strong suspicion that the discrimination of two captivities may have been suggested by this passage merely, whilst nevertheless πρώτη ἀπολογία in the nature of things ought to mean merely a first 'appearance' or 'hearing' as distinct from a second in the course of the same captivity, since the whole passage 4 9-18 is speaking of the details of a single captivity. For this inference not Eusebius but some one who preceded him must be held responsible; he himself introduces the whole story with a λόγος ἔχει ('the story goes'). If, however, Eusebius, who elsewhere puts forth so much that is false with the greatest assurance, here uses so cautious an expression as this, the matter, we may rest assured, is questionable in the highest degree.

Harnack (ACL ii. 1 239 f.) characterises the liberation of Paul from his first Roman captivity (and the journey to Spain) as an 'assured fact' (gesicherte Thatsache). His reasons are—apart from τὸ τέρμα τῆς δύσεως here—certain genuine fragments of Paul preserved in the Pastoral Epistles (2 Tim. 1 15-18 4 9-21 Tit. 3 12 f.), for which one can find no room in the earlier life of Paul (a very precarious hypothesis, to say the least) and also chronological considerations according to which the first captivity came to an end in 59 A.D. whilst the martyrdom of Paul in the Neronian persecution (July, 64 A.D.) is an 'ascertained fact.' This last fact has no other 'secure' basis on which to rest than Harnack's interpretation of our present passage in 1 Clem. and the 'definite pieces of information' (ACL ii. 1 710) referred to above (§ 25 f.) of which Harnack himself wrote not so very long ago (on 1 Clem. 5 4: 1876): 'posteriore tempore auctores martyrii Petri vel itineris Romani, quorum testimonium nullius fere pretii est, sunt Dionysius Corinthius, Gajus Romanus, . . . Irenæus,' etc. If these testimonies are of hardly any value with reference to Peter it is difficult to see that they are entitled to much confidence in what they say about Paul,—so far at least as the persons of the witnesses are concerned. The reckoning, however, which is suggested alternatively for adoption under CHRONOLOGY, §§ 64-80, according to which the first Roman captivity ends in 59 A.D., Harnack is able to maintain (238) only at the cost of assuming that Tacitus is wrong by a year as to the age of the imperial prince Britannicus. Spitta (Zur Gesch. u. Lit. d. Urchristenth. i. [1893] 1-108 iii. 1 [1900]) postulates the liberation of Paul from his two-years' Roman captivity in the interests of a very bold division of the Epistle to the Romans into two separate epistles, the first of which was written by Paul before, and the second (12 1-15 7 16 1-20) after, his first sojourn in Rome. Conservative theology with almost complete unanimity postulates this liberation in the interests of the genuineness of the Pastoral Epistles. In that case, however, the journey into Spain is only an embarrassment, as the Epistles in question presuppose rather fresh journeys of the apostle in the East (1 Tim. 1 3 3 14 f. 4 13 Tit. 1 5 3 12): but these in turn are excluded by Acts 20 25 ('I know that ye all . . . shall see my face no more'), a saying which the author, even if it had reached him by tradition as a genuine utterance of Paul, would certainly have altered or omitted if it had not come true.

(f) The expression 'the limit of the west' (τὸ τέρμα τῆς δύσεως) itself would necessarily denote Spain only on the assumption that it cannot be taken otherwise than in a purely geographical sense. Since Paul, however, is the subject of the sentence, the writer can very possibly have meant a point that was for him the westward limit of his activities, in which case there is no longer any necessity to hold that Spain—otherwise so poorly attested as a field of Paul's activities—is meant. The writer, indeed, had he been very anxious to make it quite clear that Rome and Rome alone was intended, could have added 'his' (αὐτοῦ) to 'limit' (τέρμα); but it so happens that it is good Greek precisely to refrain from doing so. The passage is as every one sees highly rhetorical in character.

This being so it could surprise no one if the author, although himself a Roman, with Paul's starting-point in mind, calls Rome 'the limit of the west,' just as in Acts 13 47 it is called 'the uttermost part of the earth' (ἔσχατον τῆς γῆς), and just as in Ps. Sal. (17 14 [12]) Pompeius sends his captive Jews 'as far as the west' (ἕως ἐπὶ δυσμῶν) or as Ignatius (ad Rom. 2 2) is transported 'to west from east' (εἰς δύσιν ἀπὸ ἀνατολῆς). In 1 Clem. itself 'east and west' (ἀνατολὴ καὶ δύσις) are used shortly before (5 6) as geographical indications of the range of Paul's activities, but from this it by no means follows that 'the limit of the west' must here be taken in an absolute sense and without any reference to the apostle's point of departure. In 1 Clem. 5 7 'having taught righteousness unto the whole world' (δικαιοσύνην διδάξας ὅλον τὸν κόσμον) only repeats what was expressed in the preceding clause by 'having preached in the east and in the west' (κῆρυξ γενόμενος ἔν τε τῇ ἀνατολῇ καὶ ἐν τῇ δύσει) and similarly the phrase immediately following this last 'won the noble renown which was the reward of his faith' (τὸ γενναῖον τῆς πίστεως αὐτοῦ κλέος ἔλαβεν) gives already a hint of his martyrdom which is more fully described in the succeeding section. Thus it is entirely in accordance with the structure of the whole writing if by 'having come to the limit of the west' nothing new is intended but only a renewed reference to the apostle's sojourn in Rome. Another important point is that none of the church fathers has found Spain in our present passage; otherwise Eusebius at least would not have left unnamed the place where Paul was believed to have laboured between his first and his second captivity, and the others would not have kept complete silence as to his liberation from the first.

(g) If on the other hand Spain were meant it would in that case become almost necessary to understand by the rulers (ἡγούμενοι) before whom Paul bore his testimony the Spanish civil authorities. There is not a single tradition, however, in favour of Spain as the place of Paul's martyrdom. That Rome was the place is nowhere doubted. The rulers (ἡγούμενοι) can, according to the usage of 1 Clem. (see MINISTRY, § 47*b*, middle), mean any high political authority; but if Rome is referred to, the emperor and his advisers will be meant.

(h) We now come to the most important point—which is, that the entire passage before us is designed to set forth a parallel between Peter and Paul. Thus it becomes necessary to pay special attention to the points in which the parallel is not carried out. Now, at the very outset, we notice that the sufferings of Paul in the service of the gospel are much more fully particularised than those of Peter. We may be certain that the author would have been equally detailed in the case of Peter had this been in his power. Is it possible that in Rome so little that is definite should have been known if he had actually died there? In the case of Peter, further, no parallel at all to Paul's 'coming to the limit of the west' and his 'bearing testimony before the rulers' is offered. Had it been Spain that was in question, we should not have wondered to find that the same things could not be said of Peter as of Paul; but from what has been said in the foregoing paragraphs of this section, it will be seen that it is with Rome that we are dealing, and in this case it naturally becomes a point of great importance to notice that what is said is said of Paul alone. Yet, even if 'the limit of the west' were to be taken as meaning Spain, we should still have to reckon with the fact that the author of the epistle was not in a position to say of Peter that he had borne testimony 'before the rulers.' Even should 'the rulers' denote, not the emperor and his advisers but some other high authority, it is clear that the author knew nothing of any 'witnessing' (μαρτυρεῖν) of Peter before such an authority. How willingly would he not have adduced it had any such tradition been within his reach! For he names Peter even before Paul. The phrase 'rulers,' however, makes it still more clear than does 'limit of the west,' that as regards Paul both must be sought in Rome. This being so, the fact that only of Paul is it said that he was 'a preacher in the east and in the west' (κῆρυξ ἔν τε τῇ ἀνατολῇ καὶ ἐν τῇ δύσει) acquires a new significance. In short, this writer was ignorant, not only of any 'witnessing' (μαρτυρεῖν) before the authorities (in Rome) on Peter's part, but also of any missionary activity of his at all in the west; yet he wrote in Rome about 93-97 A.D. (at latest, but not probably, about 120 A.D. See GALATIANS, § 9 [but cp also OLD-CHRISTIAN LITERATURE, § 26]).

(i) This conclusion, however clear in itself, is often resisted on the ground that no other place than Rome is ever mentioned in tradition as the scene of Peter's martyrdom, and that it would be too extraordinary if Clement, while knowing the fact of Peter's martyrdom, should be ignorant of the place of it. But neither objection is conclusive.

If, let us suppose, Peter had perished while travelling in a distant land, at some obscure place, not as the result of ordinary process of law, but perhaps in some popular tumult, and if also such companions as he may have had perished along with him, then information of his death could reach his fellow-Christians only by report; and if, even at a later date, no Christian church arose at the place where it occurred, no local tradition as to his end had any chance of surviving. Let us only suppose, for example, that Paul had died of the stoning at Lystra (Acts 14 19) or of that with which he was threatened at Iconium (14 5), and either was unaccompanied or was accompanied even in death—what should we, what could Clement—have known as to the place of his death? Yet, indeed, there is no need for supposing such an extreme case as this. It is very conceivable that Clement actually did know the place of Peter's death, and yet did not name it because this was not required for his purpose. In the case of Paul he does not judge it in the least important to name the place; all he thinks worth commemorating is that his appearance was made before the 'rulers' (ἡγούμενοι), and in this way only indirectly do we learn the locality. That of Peter's death he could pass over all the more easily because he could take it for granted that his readers at Corinth knew it just as well as himself. It must not be forgotten that his object is not to tell them anything new, but to draw profitable exhortation for them from known facts.

(k) It is therefore quite useless to conjecture that Peter and Paul alone are selected out of the number of the apostles (notwithstanding that James the son of Zebedee might also have been mentioned: Acts 12 2), only because they were specially well known in Rome. Even if this were the reason, it still would be no proof of Peter's having ever been in Rome: even without this he was famous enough. What is more to the point is that both apostles were known in Corinth—in a general way as well known as at Rome—and over and above this in a special manner, because the church there had been founded by the one, whilst the other had been chosen by a party there as its head (1 Cor. 1 12 3 22).

(l) If Peter's death was not at Rome, then neither was it during the Neronian persecution, which so far as we know did not extend beyond that city. Even if it had so extended, however, Peter could not be regarded as one of its victims, according to the passage now under discussion, for in the provinces the persecution would naturally break out later than in Rome, whilst Peter and Paul, according to the order followed, and the 'gathering' (συνηθροίσθη) of 6 1, preceded the great multitude of Nero's martyrs. If they died in Rome we should have to think of this as happening immediately on the outbreak of the persecution. This, however, as we have seen, does not apply to Peter; and even in the case of Paul we have no right to assume it, although he did die in Rome.

The prevailing opinion, that if it was in 64 A.D., it was in consequence of the Neronian persecution that Paul was condemned to death, is very rash. The judicial procedure of Rome was not so utterly arbitrary as would be implied were it true that a prisoner who was kept day and night chained to a soldier should be found guilty of fire-raising, or of incitation thereto. The process against Paul followed its own course. That in the general hostility to Christians it was hurried on is likely enough, but hardly so rapidly that Paul should have preceded the great bulk of the Neronian martyrs.

29. Other mentions of martyrdom with place unspecified.

At a date subsequent also to that of 1 Clem. we find allusions to the martyrdom of Peter, but without mention of the place. (a) It is not certain, it is true, whether Jn. 13 36 belongs to this category. When Jesus says: 'Whither I go thou canst not follow me now' he means his going to heaven, as is clear from 7 34 8 21 (to both of which passages express reference is made in 13 33); and that it is into heaven that Peter is to follow him has its parallel in 17 24. Nevertheless, it is open to us to understand also that the manner of the entering into heaven, that is, the manner of death, is to be the same for Peter as for Jesus. 13 37 may contain an allusion to this when Peter says 'I will lay down my life for thee.' It would be quite in keeping were we to understand the words of Jesus as meaning: 'Thou canst not follow me in this manner now, but later thou shalt be able.' The question, therefore, comes to be whether the writer already knew of the martyrdom of Peter. On the assumption that the martyrdom is historical, it is very probable that he did. But even if it was legendary, the author, who wrote about 132-140 A.D., could very easily have heard about it. The question, however, whether he thought of the death of Peter as having happened in Rome, will depend for its answer on our determination of the date at which this opinion arose. He himself gives no indication.

(b) Jn. 21, the addition of a later hand (§ 22*c*), certainly speaks of the martyrdom; whether at Rome or no is a question to be decided in the same manner as in a.

(c) 2 Pet. 1 14 refers back to Jn. 21 18 f. Nowhere else, so far as we know, did Jesus say to Peter that 'the putting off of his tabernacle cometh swiftly,' and in view of the late date of 2 Pet. (see § 24 a) its author's acquaintance with Jn. 21 is very possible, as also his acquaintance with the tradition that Peter had suffered martyrdom in Rome.

(d) In the Muratorian fragment the passio Petri

is referred to in l. 37, and that, according to the almost universally accepted restoration of the text ('semota passione Petri evidenter declarat'), as one of the events by his silence as to which the writer of Acts makes it clear that he has incorporated in his book only such occurrences as had happened in his presence. Thus here also the martyrdom of Peter is regarded as a known event, and can very easily have been conceived of by the author (who wrote between 170 and 200 A.D.) as having happened in Rome. Only, as he says nothing as to this, the passage before us is not any more decisive on the question in hand, than the other three which have been already considered.

(e) In Rev. 18 20 ('rejoice over her, thou heaven, and ye saints, and ye apostles, and ye prophets') the apostles seem to be thought of as in heaven, and must therefore, according to 6 9-11, have been thought of as martyrs. We may be certain, however, that not all the twelve apostles became martyrs, not to speak of the saints and Christian prophets of whom this would equally hold good. The passage is thus too exaggerated to justify us in inferring the martyrdom of Peter with certainty.

(f) In Macarius Magnes (Apocrit. 3 22; about 400 A.D.) the heathen with whom he is in controversy says that Peter made a disgraceful escape from prison in Jerusalem (Acts 12 5-19), and was afterwards crucified after having been able to carry out the command of Jesus, 'feed my lambs' (Jn. 21 15), for only a few months. Harnack (TLZ, 1902, 604) will have it that this heathen was Porphyry, the learned opponent of the Christians in Rome (ob. A.D. 304) and that what he says regarding the few months and the death by crucifixion has reference to Rome (in 4 4 the same opponent of Macarius mentions the beheading of Paul in Rome, and thereafter, without specifying the place, the crucifixion of Peter) and is drawn from satisfactory Roman tradition. Carl Schmidt (below § 49), 167-171, observes, however, and with justice, that in Porphyry's time Peter's twenty-five years' sojourn in Rome had long been a recognised belief (so also Harnack himself; above, § 26 [f]), and on this ground supposes that Porphyry is drawing from the Acta Petri, according to which Peter arrives in Rome and dies in the interval between Paul's departure from Rome and his return; and in fact the divine prediction of the death of Paul in Rome (below, § 33 a) is the answer to the request of his followers that he (Paul) should not absent himself from Rome for more than a year.

All the more important in our present investigation are those writings which are silent upon the sojourn in Rome, and, so far as they were written after 64 A.D., also upon the martyrdom of Peter, although some such reference might have been expected in them. At the same time, this does not hold good of all of them in an equal degree.

30. Silence on Roman sojourn (and martyrdom).

(a) The Epistle to the Romans excludes with the utmost decisiveness the idea that at the time of its composition Peter was in Rome, or even without staying in Rome was exercising any sort of supervision over the church there. Had it been otherwise, Paul would most certainly have referred to the fact. He is at very great pains to indicate his right to labour in Rome. We may not here refer to his arrangement with the three 'pillar' apostles at the council of Jerusalem (Gal. 2 9: 'you to the Jews, we to the Gentiles'); for this arrangement not only was capable of various interpretations, but had also shown itself to be unworkable (COUNCIL, § 9). The practice of the Judaists, however, who forced their way into the churches founded by Paul and sought to turn them against him, had led him to formulate another principle by which division of labour in the mission field might be regulated—this, namely, that no missionary ought to invade the field once taken possession of by another ('not to glory in other men's labours'; 2 Cor. 10 15 f.). When, however, he excuses and justifies his intention of visiting Rome, notwithstanding this principle, he always does so, 1 5-15 15 20-29, as towards the church, whilst if Peter had been its head he ought to have done so in the first instance as towards him.

On the assumption that 15 20-24, along with the whole, or parts, of chap. 15 (and 16) comes from a later time, it has sometimes been thought possible that here already the opinion of Peter's bishopric of Rome is presupposed. The expressions, however, are worded so generally that any such conjecture does not admit of verification, even when the late date of the section is assumed.

(b) The Epistle to the Philippians, which according to 1 13 4 22 was very probably written in Rome, makes no mention of Peter. True, Paul had not exactly any urgent occasion to mention him in this particular epistle. Nevertheless, one may hazard a conjecture that 1 15-18 would have been somewhat less sharply worded had Peter been then at the head of the church in Rome (the still sharper passage 3 2-6 does not come into account here, as in all probability it is directed, not against Jewish Christians as 1 15-18 is, but against non-Christian Jews, and, in fact, against Jews of this class in Philippi).

(c) If the Epistles to the Colossians and Ephesians were written during the captivity in Cæsarea, they do not need to be referred to here. On the assumption of their genuineness, however, it is equally possible that they may have been written from Rome. In that case, however, the apostle had no more pressing occasion, so far as his correspondents were concerned, for mentioning Peter (on the supposition that he also was at Rome) than he had in writing to the Philippians (the Epistle to the Ephesians, if we are to maintain its genuineness, we must necessarily regard as a circular writing). If, on the other hand, these epistles are not genuine but really date from the period of Gnosticism between 100 and 130 (see MINISTRY, § 25 a, n.), it has to be noticed that in Col. 4 10 there is a greeting from Mark who is held to have been the interpreter of Peter, yet none from Peter himself. We cannot, nevertheless, securely infer from this that the Roman sojourn of Peter was unknown to this writer.

Not only does he not say that the epistle which he is writing under Paul's name is meant to be taken as having been written from Rome (the place of composition remains obscure); the absence of mention of Peter can also have its explanation in the fact that the writer cared only for Paul, not for Peter, and that he therefore introduced into his letter greetings only from such persons as, like Mark, had been fellow-labourers with Paul (unless, indeed, the list of greetings in 4 10-15 be a genuine fragment of Paul, for the details of which we must not hold the post-apostolic author of the whole epistle responsible).

The case of the Epistle to the Ephesians is similar. It too says nothing regarding its place of composition. In presence of the great interest it expresses in the unity of the church, and especially in the complete fusion of Jewish and Gentile Christians (1 22 f. 4 3-6 2 11-22, etc.), there was, in point of fact, an opportunity for allusion to the common activities of Paul and Peter. But as it avoids personal matters almost entirely, and designates the apostles and NT prophets in general as the foundation of the church and as holy (2 20 3 5), we cannot venture on any far-reaching inferences from the absence of any mention of Peter, and in particular must not infer with confidence that the author knew nothing of Peter's Roman sojourn.

(d) The second Epistle to Timothy is expressly dated from the captivity in Rome (1 8 16 f. 2 9), and names Mark along with other missionary companions of Paul (4 11), although perhaps (just as with Colossians) in a genuine fragment of Paul. Some mention of Peter (if his Roman sojourn was already known) would have been appropriate alike in the case of the genuineness of the epistle and in that of its spuriousness, but cannot be expected with certainty even on the latter alternative—which is certainly the one to be chosen (see MINISTRY, § 54 [cp also TIMOTHY, ii. § 16])—since 2 Tim. unreservedly declares itself to be a 'Pauline' writing and an instruction addressed to a disciple of the apostle, and sees the unity of the church in its doctrine and organisation, not in what can be said about the persons of its founders.

(e) In Acts one of the main objects is to draw a parallel between Peter and Paul (see ACTS, § 4). A joint activity of the two in Rome would have been the best crown which the author could possibly have given to this work. Indeed, even without the contemporaneous presence of Paul, the arrival in the metropolis of the world of Peter, who with Paul passes as the real originator of missions to the Gentiles (10 1-11 18 15 7-11), must have seemed equally important with that of Paul, which is even made the subject of repeated predictions (19 21 23 11). If Peter is to be held to have come to Rome nevertheless, this is conceivable only as having happened after Paul's death, which the author did not wish to refer to for political reasons (see ACTS, § 5 i.), or on the supposition that the meeting of the two was a hostile one, and therefore will have been passed over by the author in the same silence with which he passed over the encounter at Antioch (Gal. 2 11-21). As for this latter supposition, however, it is surely an odd procedure to excogitate a possibility, in order, thereby, to support a tradition which declares precisely the opposite of the possibility supposed—namely, a harmonious co-operation between the two apostles. If we disregard this attempt, we must infer that in the author's time, that is to say, somewhere between 105 (110) and 130 (see ACTS, § 16), nothing was known of a contemporary activity of the two apostles in Rome. On the other hand, there remains the possibility that Peter arrrived in Rome after the death of Paul; only, neither is this vouched for by any tradition.

(f) The Shepherd of Hermas, which was written in Rome about 140 A.D., makes no mention of Peter. Nor yet, it must be added, of Paul. A book of so apocalyptic a character is, in fact, not to be supposed to concern itself with personal details from a past time. It is worthy of note that the rock (and the doors) of the tower which represents the church, are interpreted as meaning the Son of God (Sim. ix. 12 1, in agreement with 1 Cor. 10 4 and Jn. 10 7 9). This, however, proves only that the author was still unacquainted with Mt. 16 18—or that he has not allowed himself to be influenced by it.

(g) All the more eloquent is the silence of Justin Martyr, who wrote in Rome about 152, as to the Roman sojourn of Peter. He has much to say regarding the sojourn there of Simon Magus, but nothing of Peter's polemic against him, of which we are to hear so much by and by (§§ 33, 34, 40 a).

(h) Papias (ap. Eus. HE iii. 39 15) reports, as one of the communications of 'the presbyter,' that Mark accompanied Peter as interpreter; but it is very rash to assume that in making this statement Papias had Rome in his mind (see MARK, col. 2939, n. 1). If Papias wrote late enough he could have heard of the presence of Peter there; but of this he in point of fact says nothing. In particular, the agreement of Papias with the statement about Mark which Eusebius (HE ii. 15 2; cp GOSPELS, § 80 b) records has to be taken merely in accordance with the words cited in the other passage and by no means to be extended to everything which Eusebius introduces here with a 'they say' (φασίν), and which, by the connection with ii. 14 5 f., must in fact be interpreted as referring to Rome (§ 25 d). Still more certainly wrong would it be to extend the agreement of Papias also to what follows in ii. 15 2 after the mention of his name, where we read 'it is said' (φασίν) that Peter in his First Epistle means Rome by 'Babylon.'

(i) Ignatius writes to the Romans (4 3): 'I do not enjoin you, as Peter and Paul did' (οὐχ ὡς Πέτρος καὶ Παῦλος διατάσσομαι ὑμῖν). If this was in 170-180 A.D. (see MINISTRY, § 53, b-i), we might suppose the phrase quoted to rest on the assumption that Peter and Paul had personally laid their oral injunctions upon the Roman church, since, so far as written precepts are concerned, this could be said only of Paul, not of Peter. When Ignatius is addressing other churches he expresses the same thought without mention of Peter and Paul (ad Eph. 3 1, ad Trall. 3 3). Nevertheless we cannot positively affirm that the expression in the Epistle of Ignatius to the Romans inherently, and thus even if written at an earlier date, contains the presupposition that Peter had once personally visited Rome. As what he means to say is simply, 'I do not address myself to you as one having authority,' it was very natural to mention by way of example two famous names that did carry authority, even if they had not personally quite equal importance for the readers.

(k) 1 Pet. may here be noticed by way of appendix. Whether it is relevant to the discussion will depend on our interpretation of it, and this we are not yet able to settle (cp § 42). Babylon is in the Apocalypse 'the great city' (Rev. 18 10 21), 'the mother of the harlots and of the abominations of the earth, drunken with the blood of the saints, ruling over the kings of the earth, sitting upon seven hills' (17 5 f. 18 9)—in other words, Rome. It is certain, however, that no such mysterious name could have been bestowed upon the world-metropolis before the beginning of the Neronian persecution, and we may conjecture that it first owed its currency among Christians to the Apocalypse itself. Should 1 Pet., therefore, have been written before, or at the beginning of, the Neronian persecution, we may conclude either that the writer could not possibly have intended Rome by Babylon or at least that in referring to it by this name he could not count upon being understood. This he could do, if he wrote at a later date. But this possibility by no means excludes the other, that he may have meant the literal Babylon on the Euphrates.

That this city was at that date wholly uninhabited rests upon a too literal understanding of Pausanias (viii. 33 3 [cp i. 16 3]): οὐδέν τι ἦν εἰ μὴ τεῖχος, 'nothing is left but the walls') and Pliny (HN vi. 26 [30] 122): 'ad solitudinem rediit.' Cp Lucian, Charon, 23: 'Yonder is Babylon, the city with the noble towers, the city of vast compass; but soon it too, like Nineveh, will be sought for in vain.' According to Strabo (xvi. 1 5, p. 738 or 1073) the city was only 'desert for the most part' (ἔρημος ἡ πολλή); according to Diodorus (ii. 9 9) a small portion was inhabited. To understand rightly what is meant one must bear in mind the enormous compass (360-385 stadia, some 40 m.) of the city according to Diodorus (ii. 7 3) and Strabo (l.c.). Under Claudius the hatred of the Babylonians compelled the Jews in Babylon to take refuge in Seleucia; but there also their arrival stirred up fresh hatred and they were put to death to the number of more than 50,000 (Jos. Ant. xviii. 9 8 f., §§ 371-376).

Before entering upon the difficult field of the apocryphal literature it will be convenient to sum up the results of the preceding discussions of passages in the NT and the fathers.

31. Provisional conclusions.

(a) A twenty-five years' sojourn of Peter in Rome is out of the question. Romans and Acts are decisive against it (§ 30 a, e). Further, the manner in which Peter's presence in Jerusalem as a resident is taken for granted in Acts 15 and Gal. 2 1-10 in connection with the Council of Jerusalem, as also in Gal. 2 11-21 in connection with his subsequent visit to Antioch, cannot be satisfactorily explained by the favourite theory of prolonged interruptions of his Roman sojourn.

(b) As Rom., Acts (and Phil.) show (§ 30 a, b, e), Peter had never been at Rome at all at any date before or during Paul's sojourn there.

(c) Peter's bishopric in Rome (§ 26 g, h) is excluded by the fact that throughout the first century and indeed even down to the time of Hermas (about 140 A.D.), and particularly in Rome, no such thing as monarchical episcopacy existed at all (see MINISTRY, §§ 46 b, 47), as also by this, that according to Gal. 2 9 Peter's wish was to associate only with Jews and Jewish Christians, and according to vv. 11-21 he was not in a position to take any tenable place in a mixed community. As bishop of the mixed community in Rome he would have been exposed to the same difficulties as in Antioch, and would soon have made himself as impossible in the one place as in the other.

(d) The theory also, that along with the other original apostles Peter remained for twelve years in Jerusalem and thereafter set out on missionary journeys is false, not only because it leads chronologically to a displacement of the Neronian persecution (bringing it down to 67 A.D.; see § 26 e)—an error which would admit of rectification by a curtailment of the twenty-five Roman years—but also because it presupposes that the original apostles, contrary to Gal. 2 9, had carried on missions to the Gentiles. The twelve years, however, are themselves open to suspicion, not merely because twelve is a sacred number, but also because it could be easily arrived at by computation from Acts 12 3 17-24. Herod Agrippa I. died in 44 A.D.; shortly before, after his liberation from prison, Peter left Jerusalem. Thus it was possible to arrive at a sojourn of twelve years in Jerusalem for Peter in the first instance, and then, schematically, to extend the same determination of time to all the rest of the original apostles.

(e) Of all the spheres of activity assigned by tradition to Peter outside of Palestine, the only one that deserves serious consideration along with Rome is Babylonia (§ 24). In virtue of its large Jewish population Babylonia was very well suited to be a mission field for the apostle, and in a certain view of the passage is also presupposed to have been so in 1 Pet. 5 13 (§§ 30 k, 42, 43).

(f) Clement of Rome, incomparably the most important witness (§ 28), is decisively against a Roman sojourn of Peter. All that can be deduced from him is—not indeed as anything certainly attested but yet as something which need not be gainsaid—only Peter's martyrdom, but outside of Rome and away from the western world altogether. Nor are we carried any further by the notices of his martyrdom enumerated in § 29 where no place is specified.

(g) If Peter suffered martyrdom it by no means follows from this mere fact, as Harnack represents the matter (ACL ii. 1 710), that the martyrdom was in Rome.

We cannot even assent to Harnack's first sentence as certain, 'if the fact of the martyrdom was at that time notorious, the place of it was also known' (see § 28 i); and his second sentence, 'but never has any other church than the Roman laid claim to the martyrdom of Peter,' loses its demonstrative force as soon as the event is for a moment supposed to have happened at a place where, during, say, the next hundred years, no Christian church existed. The assumption is often made that for the martyrdom of any apostle a Christian persecution, or at least some formal process against the individual martyr, was requisite. Surely it would be well to remember 2 Cor. 11 25 f., 'once I was stoned . . . in perils from my countrymen, in perils from the Gentiles.' At a place where an apostle had died in this manner memory of the occurrence would naturally be less vivid and tenacious than it would be in a place where there was a Christian church, and could easily drop into the background and finally fall into complete oblivion when the opinion became widely diffused that Peter had died in Rome. See, further, under (p), and § 40 b.

(h) Justin (about 152 A.D.) knows nothing of the Roman sojourn of Peter (§ 30 g). This circumstance ought also to induce caution in finding a testimony for such a sojourn in Clement of Rome.

(i) Of the authors dealt with up to this point Dionysius of Corinth (about 170 A.D.) is the first to assert a Roman sojourn. Only, he does it in connection with so much matter that is fabulous that his 'distinct statement' (so Harnack, 710) must thereby be held to lose all credibility (§ 25 a). The other statement, in all respects parallel to the assertion of Dionysius, that Peter founded the church of Antioch (§ 24 d), is characterised by Harnack himself (705 f.) as 'a gross falsification of history.'

(k) The list of Roman bishops seems to have the advantage over Dionysius that it rests on local tradition. Yet we have no certainty that it bore the names of Peter and Paul at its head before the time of Irenæus (§ 25 c).

(l) No value can be attached to the statements of Gaius as to the places of death of Peter and Paul (§ 26 b) because in his time, or even ten years before his time, the second stage of the Roman Peter-tradition, the 'tendency legend' of the twenty-five years' duration of his sojourn, had already, according to Harnack, 'become official' (§ 26 e, f).

(m) It is not of Peter alone, but almost without exception, of Peter and Paul together, that the exponents of the above tradition affirm a sojourn (eventually even, in fact, an arrival together) and a martyrdom in Rome (§ 25 f.). If Clement of Alexandria mentions only Peter, there is a special reason for this (§ 25 d), and also in Origen (§ 26 c) we have no reason to doubt that he thought of Peter as having died at Rome under Nero just as he expressly asserts that Paul did. If one decide in favour of Rome as the place of Peter's death (but see above, f-h), there is no longer any direct possibility of disproving that this event was practically contemporaneous with the death of Paul. This circumstance, however, is of no significance; for the presence together of Peter and Paul in Rome during the period described in Acts (and Philippians; see § 30 e, b) is practically excluded, and thus can continue to be affirmed only when the hypothesis of a second captivity of Paul is called in—a hypothesis which is quite unhistorical (§ 28 e, f). See further, under p, and § 41 b.

(n) Our decision must therefore decidedly be that Peter never was in Rome at all.

We read in Harnack (709 f.), 'it is here presupposed [that is to say, throughout the whole of ACL], and never once has it been sought to prove that Peter really did come to Rome and suffered martyrdom there. This fact, so far as I am aware, is not disputed save by those who give credence to a certain ancient Simon-romance, and in accordance with this affirm that Peter was brought to Rome by 'tendency-legend' in order to controvert, in the world-metropolis also, Simon-Paul who had taken his journey thither' (see below, § 40 a, b). This assertion must now so far, at any rate, be qualified by the fact that at least one profane historian of repute, namely, Soltau (below, o), has come forward in support of the condemned thesis. Also, the preceding discussion shows thus much at least, that our conclusion has been arrived at without any resort at all to the Simon-romance.

It rests essentially upon a particular view of 1 Clem. and Ignatius (§§ 28, 30 i) whom Harnack himself calls 'two very strong, though not absolutely secure, supports of the martyrdom, or of the sojourn of Peter in Rome,' upon a distrust of the 'testimony' of Dionysius of Corinth and his companions which was formerly shared (see above, § 28 e) by Harnack himself, and upon a due regard to Justin's evidence, upon which Harnack is quite silent. Just as, according to Harnack, the 'tendency-legend' of Peter's twenty-five years' sojourn in Rome became official between 189 and 217 A.D., so also in our view the fable of the simultaneous presence of Peter and Paul in Rome and the martyrdom of Peter there became official between 152 and 170 A.D.

(o) A point upon which the foregoing discussions have shed but little light is the question as to how this result came about, and as to whether this fable also deserves the name of tendency-legend. Soltau, who uses the above sources only, points out (pp. 26 f. 41 = 494 f. 509; below, § 49) how strong was the effort on the part of individual churches to be in a position to claim an apostle as their founder (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 6).

Now, the Jewish Christians in Rome, in their lively struggle against the Paulinists there, had chosen Peter after his death as their spiritual head, and thus the belief was nourished that he had really once been in Rome at least as a martyr. According to the theory of Acts (8 14-17), upheld also by Harnack, he thereby came at the same time to appear to be the founder of that church. Towards this belief another element, Soltau thinks, may have co-operated, namely, that Mark the interpreter of Peter lived subsequently in Rome, and thus through him the Romans possessed the pure doctrine of Peter. Mark, however, figures in Rome in tradition only in his quality of interpreter of Peter. The historian who, like Soltau, denies a sojourn in Rome to Peter cannot maintain it for Mark. That the use of Acts 8 14-17 in this connection is illegitimate has been already argued above (§ 25 a).

Soltau's other conjectures of a special kind have also but little probability, and in the interests of his point of view it would perhaps be better to rest satisfied with the general contention that churches were eager to have apostles as their founders, and in the case of Rome, the world-metropolis, there was a special reason for wishing to be able to claim the two most prominent names of all, especially as these represented the two main currents of doctrine and practice within the church (see MINISTRY, § 36). To this Erbes (Z. f. Kirchengesch. 22 [1901] 215-224) adds, besides fuller elaborations of this fundamental thought, the easy misunderstanding of 1 Clem. 5 and of 'Babylon' in 1 Pet. 5 13 (see §§ 28, 30 k; but also §§ 39 e, 44 a). In fact even in the absence of still more special reasons for the rise of the fable of the Roman sojourn and martyrdom of Peter it would be necessary to maintain its fabulous character; for, rightly understood, all the witnesses testify with overpowering weight against it. The apocryphal literature, however, regarding Peter, with which we have not yet dealt, will yield perhaps more light.

(p) The points on which further light would be specially welcome are these: Did the belief in Peter's Roman sojourn and martyrdom exist earlier than 170? Did it exist, outside of Rome, even before Justin? In fine, did it exist so early that it can already lie at the foundation of 1 Pet. 5 13? Is it possible to account for its origin in spite of its erroneousness more completely than has up to this point been done; and, particularly, to explain also why hitherto we have met with Peter in Rome almost always only in association with Paul, and why his martyrdom is reported from no other locality than Rome (see above, m, g)?

32. The Apocryphal Acts on Peter: literary.

Of the apocryphal writings relating to Peter the first to be considered are those which admit of being grouped under the general designation of Acta Petri, in other words, as accounts of the missionary activities of Peter and of the close of his life. Of these, three groups are to be distinguished.

(a) The first group is pronounced Gnostic by Lipsius (ii. 1 84-284, and particularly 258-270), and Zahn (Gesch. d. NTlichen Kanons, 2 832-855 [1892]), but Catholic by Harnack (ACL ii. 1 549-560), Erbes (Z. f. Kirchengesch., 1901, 22 163-171), and Carl Schmidt (below, § 49), 111-151. That they are wholly Catholic, however, the three last-named scholars are unable to affirm. As the settlement of the question is not indispensable for our present purpose, let us call them—to choose a neutral designation—the pre-Catholic Acta Petri. The employment of this designation must not be taken as meaning that the Acts in question are actually of earlier date than the Catholic ones—a question which in point of fact is doubtful (see §§ 35-37, 39 b)—but only that their standpoint is less in correspondence with the Catholic than that of the Catholic Acta Petri et Pauli. Another widely spread, though not completely prevalent, name for them is Περίοδοι Πέτρου. A characteristic story from them—that of a talking dog (§ 33 b)—is known to Commodian (about 250 A.D.; Carm. Apol. 617-620 [623-626]). The date is assigned concurrently by Lipsius (275) and Zahn (841) to 160-170 A.D., whilst Erbes gives it as 190, Carl Schmidt (pp. 99-109) as 200-210, i.e., shortly before the Philosophumena (above, § 26 d), and Harnack places it as late as the middle of the third century.[1] At the same time, it has to be noted that, in assigning the date he does, Lipsius means only that of the origin of the writing that lies at the foundation of our Acta Petri, the date of their present form being in his opinion later: for example the Acts of the so-called Pseudo-Linus (see below, no. 7) he places (172 f.) between 400 and 450 A.D. Zahn (833) as against this disputes the contention that the Acta at an earlier date had a different form from their present, and Harnack holds that there is no reason at all for assuming a Gnostic basis for them; it is merely an abstract possibility (559). Now, Eusebius (HE iii. 3 2) includes the Acts of Peter (Πράξεις Πέτρου) among those writings which were never handed down in Catholic circles, and with this agrees his general survey of the NT literature in iii. 25 4 6, according to which the Acts of Paul (Πράξεις Παύλου) belong to the Antilegomena, in other words to his middle class (so also iii. 3 5), whilst on the other hand the 'Acts of Andrew and John and the other apostles' (Πράξεις Ἀνδρέου καὶ Ἰωάννου καὶ τῶν ἄλλων ἀποστόλων)—those of Peter thus included—belong to his last class, that of books written by heretics in the name of apostles, and never cited by any Catholic writer, but 'altogether strange and impious' (ἄτοπα πάντῃ καὶ δυσσεβῆ). In accordance with this is the very close relationship, if not identity of authorship which Lipsius (265 f., 272 f.) and Zahn (860 f.), again in agreement, find between our Acta and the Gnostic Acts (Πράξεις), or Circuits (Περίοδοι) of John and other apostles, attributed to Leucius (Charinus). James (Apocr. Anecd. 2 pp. xxiv-xxviii; in Texts and Studies, 5 1, 1897) positively affirms the identity of the author of the Leucian Acta Johannis with the author of the Acta Petri, whilst Carl Schmidt, 90-99, explains the agreement from use of the Acta Johannis by the author of the Acta Petri. Franko (ZNTW, 1902, 315-335) seeks to support the Gnostic character of the original form of the Acta Petri by means of a pronouncedly Gnostic fragment which he translates from the Ecclesiastical Slavonic. Thus for every one who does not hold the present form of the Acta Petri to be Gnostic, there is very urgent occasion for finding, if possible, a Gnostic primary form of it. So far as our present purpose is concerned, however, we may dispense with further detailed inquiry as to this point.

The principal writings in which those pre-Catholic Acta Petri have been preserved for us are as follows: (1) Actus Petri cum Simone, from Paul's departure from Rome for Spain, and the arrival of Peter in Rome, until the death of Peter; in Latin, in a MS at Vercelli, therefore known also as Actus Petri Vercellenses. (2) The conclusion of these Acta, namely the end of Peter's contention with Simon, and the entire martyrdom of Peter, exists in Greek in a Codex at Mount Athos. (3) The martyrdom alone, also in Greek, is found in a Codex at Patmos. To the same family belong further (4) an Ecclesiastical Slavonic, (5) a Coptic, and (6) an Ethiopic translation. All six have been edited (or collated) in Acta Apost. Apocr. 1,(2) ed. Lipsius (and Bonnet), 1891, 45-103; no. 3 for the first time in JPT, 1886, pp. 86-106 175 f. Of the other family, which, apart from its divergences, is distinguished by its more copious style of narration, we possess (7) the martyrdom of Peter which is ascribed to Linus the first bishop of Rome (see above, § 25 c) (in Acta Apost. Apocr. 1-22). Lastly there is—closely related as regards details of the text—(8) the Passio Apostolorum Petri et Pauli which is incorporated with the Latin recension of Josephus' Jewish War, dating from 367-375 (or about 395?) A.D., and which also includes certain events before the martyrdom of Peter.[1] As for the contents, everything of a non-Catholic nature has been so carefully removed that the text belongs rather to the next following class. The mutual dependence of the texts just mentioned has been determined by Zahn (834-839, 845, n. 2), followed by Harnack, otherwise than it is by Lipsius (109-173, 194-200); this, however, may be left out of account in our present investigation.

(b) The Catholic Acta (see Lipsius, 284-366) are, as already seen in Pseudo-Hegesippus (see above, a [8]), not Acts of Peter only, but Acts of Peter and Paul. Both contend conjointly with Simon Magus in Rome and there suffer martyrdom.

(1) The Latin form, in which this writing is wrongly attributed to a certain Marcellus who is named in it, dates from the sixth century (Lips. i. 169). It begins: 'Cum venisset Paulus Romam.' The parallel is (2) the Greek text in a codex of the library of St. Mark in Venice, beginning: ἐλθόντος εἰς τὴν Ῥώμην τοῦ ἁγίου Παύλου. Both are met with in juxtaposition in Acta Apost. Apocr. 1 118-177. Ibid. 178-222 is found (3) a longer Greek text in which, in particular, at the beginning occurs a description of Paul's journey through Italy, beginning: ἐγένετο μετὰ τὸ ἐξελθεῖν τὸν ἅγιον Παῦλον ἀπὸ Γαυδομελέτης (this name is obtained by combination of Καῦδα or Κλαῦδα and Μελίτη, Acts 27 16 28 1). No. 2 exhibits, according to Lipsius (284-296), the relatively original form, which, however, is not older than about 450 A.D. (310-313). On the other hand he supposes that there had been a Catholic original form of this account of Peter and Paul, which arose soon after the middle of the second century, and thus approximately at the same time with the pre-Catholic Acta Petri, and may have been known, of the Fathers cited in § 26, to at least Tertullian, Origen, and Eusebius (pp. 331-358). Erbes (Z. f. Kirchengesch. 22, 1901, 174-182) tries even to make it out to be older than the pre-Catholic Acta Petri which he assigns to about 190 A.D, and would fain find traces of its employment as early as in the Prædicatio Pauli in Pseudo-Cyprian (above, § 25 e), whilst according to Lipsius (325-327, 337-339) it has only in isolated points preserved traditions of older date than the pre-Catholic Acta Petri.

1 Apart from other indications, Harnack relies upon the argument that the end of Simon Magus is told in a different way in the Philosophumena (6 20; about 235 A.D.) from that in which it is told in the Acta Petri (he caused himself to be buried by his disciples, promising that he would rise again on the third day; but he did not rise after all; cp below, § 34 g, SIMON MAGUS, § 5 [f]). All that this proves, however, is that the author is following another tradition, not that the Acta Petri were not yet in existence. The author of the Philosophumena as a zealous confuter of heretics had even strong reason for mistrusting the information of the Acta.

1 This Latin recension is entitled 'Hegesippus [a distortion of Josephus] de excidio Hierosolym.' edd. Weber et Cæsar, 1864. The section forms bk. iii., chap. 2, and is to be found also in a Marburg Universitätsprogramm (20th Aug. 1860; cp Lipsius, 194-200; Schürer, GJV 1(2) 73 f.).

(c) The third main group is made up of the following three compilations.

(1) A Latin Passio Petri et Pauli in a MS of the Laurentian Library at Florence, relating to the conflicts with Simon, and the martyrdom of the two apostles, beginning with the words 'in diebus illis, cum introissent Romam beatus Petrus et Paulus': in Acta Apost. Apocr. 1 223-234; (2) a 'Passion of the holy and chief apostles Peter and Paul,' which forms a special section of the Ecclesiastical Slavonic translation mentioned above (under a 4); (3) the 'Virtutes Petri' and the 'Virtutes Pauli' in the collection of apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, wrongly attributed to the alleged disciple of the apostles Abdias and entitled 'Historia certaminis apostolici,' or 'Historia apostolica,' bks. 1 and 2, printed, e.g., in Fabricius, Codex apocryphus NT, 2, begin. All these pieces are, according to Lipsius (366-390), too recent to be of importance for our present investigation.

Of the abundant contents of this literature only the most important points can here be noted.

33. Contents of pre-Catholic Acta Petri.

(a) According to the pre-Catholic Acta Petri, Paul journeys at the divine command from Rome into Spain, after it has been proclaimed by a voice from heaven that he will afterwards be put to death in Rome by Nero (ch. 1). After some days it becomes known in Rome that a wonder-worker named Simon, who calls himself the great power of God (magnam virtutem dei) is at Aricia. On the following evening he appears before the gate of Rome, over which he has promised to fly, disappears and then appears once more on the other side of the gate. Shortly after, he gains so great repute that even almost all the Christians go over to him (4).

(b) Simultaneously God lays his command on Peter, on the expiry of the twelve years during which he had been ordered to stay in Jerusalem after the death of Jesus (above, §§ 26 e, 31 d), to journey to Rome by way of Cæsarea in order to contend with Simon (5). Here Peter, who has been eagerly awaited by those who have remained faithful, and is joyfully welcomed, goes to the house of Marcellus a former disciple of Paul and present follower of Simon, and by means of a dog that speaks with human voice, causes Simon to be summoned forth (§ 32 a). Marcellus comes out and acknowledges his sin, that he has been devoted to Simon and has even set up to him a statue with the inscription, 'Simoni juveni deo' (9 f.). The dog, which Simon within the house has asked to deny his presence, foretells to Simon the inimicus et corruptor viæ veritatis the impending curse, but outside the house promises Peter a hard struggle with Simon, and dies (12). Challenged to a further miracle, Peter takes from a window a 'sarda' (pickled sardine), throws it into a pool and makes it swim (12 f.; something very similar is related of Jesus when he was three years of age in the Latin Gospel of Thomas [14; see Evangg. apocr. ed. Tischendorf,(2) 164 f.]).

(c) Peter tells that while he was still in Jerusalem, Simon had stayed with a rich woman in Judæa, named Eubola, and by means of two of his companions whom he had made invisible, had robbed her of all her gold, and soon afterwards had offered a portion of it, a golden Satyriscus, to a goldsmith named Agrippinus, for sale. Peter, warned beforehand in a vision, had them arrested; Simon thereupon disappeared altogether from Judæa (17).

(d) A disputation between Simon and Peter in the presence of senators, officers of state, and the whole people, is arranged for in the forum. Peter begins to the effect that Simon is condemned (reprehensum: cp SIMON MAGUS, § 4 a). He reproaches him with concealing the fact that for his theft from Eubola (above, c) he has been driven from Judæa. 'Didst thou not' he continues, 'in Jerusalem (sic) fall at my feet and at those of Paul (sic) when thou beheldest the healings wrought by us, and say: I beseech you accept from me a price, as much as you will, that I may be able to lay on my hands and do like deeds of power' (virtutes: cp SIMON MAGUS, § 1 c). Simon makes answer by disputing the divinity of Jesus inasmuch as one who is born and crucified, and has a Lord, cannot be God (23).

(e) Peter now again challenges Simon to work a miracle, saying that he himself will then counterwork it (24). The prefect Agrippa causes one of his people to come forward and bids Simon put him to death, but Peter to bring him to life again. Simon whispers into the ear of the youth, who thereupon dies. Peter bids Agrippa take the hand of the dead man who again returns to life (25 f.). Peter also raises from the dead the son of a widow (25, 27), but when requested by the mother of the dead Senator Nicostratus to do the like for her son, suggests that this should be undertaken by Simon. Simon accordingly bends over the dead man's head and shows the people how he raises himself up, lifts his head and moves, and opens his eyes. Peter further demands, however, that Simon shall cause him to speak and walk. After Simon has been driven away from the corpse by the prefect, it lies lifeless as before. Peter brings Nicostratus back to life after having begged the people not to burn Simon as they were proposing to do (28).

(f) After some days Simon promises to fly to God in presence of all the people. Next day he actually does fly aloft above all the temples and hills of the city. Peter prays to Christ to make him fall, but allow only one leg to be broken. And this is what actually happens. Simon dies of his injury at Terracina (32).

(g) Induced by Peter's preaching, the four concubines of the prefect Agrippa—namely Agrippina, Nicaria (Linus: Eucharia), Euphemia, Doris (Linus: Dionis)—break off their relations with him (33 = Linus 2, where, however, Peter has previously been thrown into prison by Nero, because the time of his heavenly reward drew nigh). In like manner Xantippe the wife of Albinus, a friend of the emperor, withdraws from the society of her husband. The two men accordingly resolve upon the ruin of Peter (34 = Linus 3). Xantippe causes him to be informed of this, and Peter agrees to flee. Outside the city gate Jesus meets him. Peter asks: Domine, quo vadis? Jesus answers: Romam venio iterum crucifigi. Peter changes his mind and joyfully turns back (35 = Linus 3-6). Agrippa sentences him to be crucified (36 = Linus 8). Arrived at the cross, Peter begs to be fastened to it with his head downwards, and, his request having been carried out, expounds at some length the mystery of the cross, especially that of crucifixion with head downward (37 f. = Linus 12), and dies. Marcellus carries off the body and buries it in his own (Marcellus's) tomb (40 = Linus 16).

(h) Nero is wroth with Agrippa for acting on his own responsibility, he himself having meditated still worse things for Peter (according to Linus, on account of the loss of his friend Simon), and for a time refuses to speak to him (according to Linus, Agrippa loses his office and dies under the torments of the divine judgment). Nero's rage flames forth against the Christians who remain; whereupon there appears to him in the night an angel who severely chastises him (according to Linus, at the instance of Peter who likewise appears to him), so that he ceases from his persecution of the Christians (41 = Linus 17).

In the case of the Catholic Acta Petri et Pauli we shall pass over, along with many other things, the additions of the longer Greek text.[1] Of the common points the most important are the following.

34. Contents of Catholic Acta Petri et Pauli.

(a) When Paul comes to Rome (from Spain, according to the shorter Greek text; from Gaudomelete, according to the longer; see § 32 b) the Jews beg him to vindicate his ancestral faith and to controvert Peter, who is doing away with the whole Mosaic law (ch. 1). Paul declares himself a true Jew who holds by the Sabbath and the true circumcision (below, § 39 c), and promises to bring Peter's doctrine to the test (2). The two have a joyful meeting (3 f.). Next day Paul reconciles the Jewish and Gentile Christians, who have been disputing about the pre-eminence in the Kingdom of God, by pointing to the promise to Abraham which applies to both (5-7). To the same effect Peter preaches (8 f.), and with great results, so that the Jewish rulers of the synagogue and the pagan priesthood stir up the people against them and seek to bring Simon the magician into honour.

(b) In consequence of the preaching of Peter, Livia (Octavia perhaps is meant) the wife of Nero, and Agrippina the wife of the prefect Agrippa (in § 33 [g] she is his concubine) withdraw themselves from the society of their husbands (10).

(c) Simon performs feats of witchcraft, also before Nero (he flies, for example, through the air); Peter works miracles of healing, casting out of devils and raising of the dead (11-15). Nero causes both, along with Paul, to be brought before him, and hears them. As Peter appeals (16-18) to the written report of Pilate to the emperor Claudius (sic), Nero causes it to be read aloud (19-21). Peter asks that Simon shall read his thoughts, but this Simon is unable to do (22-27), complaining also that Peter had already treated him thus in Judæa and all Palestine and Cæsarea (28). Simon reminds the emperor that he (Simon) had caused himself to be beheaded and had risen from the dead, thus proving himself to be Son of God. The fact, however, was that in the dark place where the beheading happened he brought it about that a ram was beheaded in his stead (31 f.).

(d) At two separate points in these proceedings Nero asks Paul why he is saying nothing. On the first of these occasions Paul simply warns the Emperor against Simon (29); on the second, in answer to Nero's express question, he gives information as to his doctrine which consists in inculcation of all the virtues and of monotheism (33-38). Peter confirms all this (39) and Paul again in turn confirms the words of Peter (41).

(e) Simon continually brings forward new charges, amongst others the charge that Peter and Paul are circumcised (40-42). Peter propounds the counter-question, why then is Simon also circumcised, and himself answers it to the effect that he had to deceive the people in order to succeed with them and that he had to give himself out to be a Jew (42 f.). Simon declares that he was circumcised because such was at that time God's command (44). Paul asks why, if, according to this, circumcision is a good thing, Simon has given over circumcised persons to judgment and to death (45). When Peter describes the Christian doctrine as being faith in God the Father in Christ along with the Holy Ghost, and the creator of all things, Simon declares that he himself is this God (48).

(f) Simon pledges himself on the following day to fly into heaven (49 f. and also 30). At Simon's wish Nero for this purpose causes a wooden tower to be erected on the Campus Martius and on the following day the whole people and all the official persons, with Peter and Paul, come together (51). Paul says to Peter that his own task is to pray but that Peter is to carry out all that is needful since he has been first chosen by the Lord to be an apostle (52). Simon promises, when he shall have flown into heaven, to cause Nero also to be carried thither by his angels, and begins to fly (53 f.). Paul says to Peter: Why delayest thou? Do that which thou hast in mind (55). Peter adjures the angels of Satan who are bearing up Simon, to let him fall. Simon falls upon the Via Sacra and breaks into four pieces (56; the Latin and the longer Greek text add that thereby [by his blood, is doubtless meant] he joined together four flint stones which can still be seen to the present day in proof of the triumph of the apostles).

(g) Nero causes Peter and Paul to be put in irons, and Simon's body in the expectation of his rising again to be carefully attended to for three days (57). He orders Peter and Paul to be chastised with iron rods and then to be put to death in the 'naumachia' (or circus, in which also naval displays were given), but finds the advice of the prefect Agrippa very reasonable, that Peter as the author of the death of Simon ought to be crucified, but Paul as comparatively innocent to be beheaded. In Paul's case this sentence is carried out on the road to Ostia (58 f.); Peter at his own request is crucified head downwards (60). From his cross he reproves the people, who are wishing to kill Nero and relates how a few days before, in his flight from the devices of Agrippa, he himself had been met by Jesus, who had said he wished to be crucified in place of Peter (61). Peter then dies (62).

(h) Forthwith come on the scene prominent men who had journeyed from Jerusalem on the apostles' account; these along with Marcellus, the former follower of Simon, bury the body of Peter under the terebinth hard by the Naumachia on the Vatican (63). These Jerusalemites foretold the soon approaching death of Nero. In point of fact, in consequence of a popular tumult, Nero had to fly into the wilderness, where he died of hunger and cold; his body was devoured by wild beasts (64 f.).

(i) Certain pious men from the East sought to carry off the relics of the martyrs; with the result that an earthquake immediately ensued in Rome, and the inhabitants attacked the Orientals, who at once took flight. The Romans deposited the relics 3 R. m. outside the city (the Latin and longer Greek texts add: at a place named Catacumbas on the Appian Way) and watched over them for one year and seven months; at the expiry of which time they brought them to the final resting-place which had meanwhile been in preparation (66). The death-day of both apostles was June 29 (67).

Many points in these interesting compositions invite inquiry; but we must here confine ourselves to the one fundamental question, that, namely, as to the relative priority of the pre-Catholic and the Catholic Acts. If we are to settle the point as to whether Peter ever was in Rome, it is of the utmost importance to know which of the two assertions, that he was there along with Paul, and that he was not, was the original one.

35. Conclusion from the Catholic Acts.

(a) Now here it would be quite useless to put the question as if it were whether the priority belongs altogether to the pre-Catholic Acts or altogether to the Catholic. In a literature which exhibits so little inward unity almost every indication of posteriority admits of being regarded as a later interpolation, and so can be deprived of its evidential value.

In the pre-Catholic Acts Agrippa and Marcellus are two leading figures, in the Catholic their appearance is quite incidental; at the same time, however, in the Catholic Acts the machinations of Agrippa against Peter, and the fact of the earlier attachment of Marcellus to Simon are mentioned, although it is only in the pre-Catholic Acts that they are really described (§§ 34 b, g, h, 33 b). Peter's flight and his meeting with Jesus are in the Catholic Acts introduced in an awkward way as told by Peter himself while on the cross; in the pre-Catholic Acts they are related by the author himself in their proper place. But all these and similar unevennesses in the Catholic Acts can be traced back to later interpolation.

(b) One such interpolation is plainly seen in the episode of the men who come from Jerusalem 'on the apostles' account' and bury Peter (§ 34 h, i).

According to the representation as it stands at present, the pious men from the East who wish to carry off the relics appear to be distinct from these. Piety, it must be said, shows itself much less in robbing than in burying; but on the other hand the coming from the East suggests much less the motive of burial than that of plunder. If this be so, not two classes of persons from the East were intended, but only one, and the story is an indication that the body of Peter had not originally its resting-place in Rome but in the East. It is only from the Roman point of view that the proposed removal is thought of as a robbery; in reality it is a veiled reminiscence of the fact that the apostle died in the East. But as the whole story is an appendix merely, and moreover has been distorted by redactions, it is impossible to build anything on it. It would seem to be meant to explain either why for a while it was impossible to show any burial-place of Peter in Rome or why it was shown not at the spot where he died but outside the city in the piece of ground ad Catacumbas (see further, Erbes, Z. f. K.-G. 22 [1901], 196-200).

(c) The difference between Peter and Paul in the manner of their death and in the place of it (also according to Gaius, see § 26 b) is noticeable, especially as for the beheading of Paul his Roman citizenship which could have been adduced, is not. After Nero has ordered (κελεύω) the same manner of death for the two apostles, the opposite advice of Agrippa and its success cannot but seem strange. It seems intended to explain the fact that two separate places of death of the apostles were known. This fact raises doubts as to the simultaneity of their deaths and thus tells against the priority of the contents of the Catholic as compared with the pre-Catholic Acts. Against the priority of the whole book it cannot, however, have this effect, as this feature can easily have been introduced later.

(d) Let us therefore fix our attention in the first instance upon one point that is really central, namely the tendency of the Catholic Acts. It is quite manifestly Petro-Pauline. The appearance as if Paul will have to come forward against the preaching of Peter we may be sure has been deliberately produced at the outset, in order that the complete agreement between the two may afterwards become all the more conspicuous. Peter confirms all that is said by Paul, and conversely. The controversies between Jewish and Gentile Christians are set to rest by both. Both carry on a joint polemic against Simon, and both are on this account together condemned to death.

(e) Although, however, Paul in the doctrinal discussions is represented as completely on a level with Peter, it cannot at all be denied that in the conflicts with Simon the part he plays is quite subordinate. In these everything of importance is said and done by Peter. In order to have any part at all, Paul has to be twice asked by Nero why he says nothing, and even then he does not intervene in the action with Simon, but merely expatiates upon his own doctrine. The few words which are put into his mouth in the further dealings with Simon cannot alter our judgment that his figure came only at a later stage into the picture which originally brought Peter alone face to face with Simon. This conclusion is confirmed in the best possible way by what Agrippa says in arguing for a different sentence, that Paul is relatively innocent and therefore deserves a milder punishment, as it is also by the facts that only eleven words, neither more nor fewer, are devoted to the account of his beheading, and that it is nowhere said that he was buried. Here accordingly we have one point at any rate in which the posteriority of the main contents of the Catholic Acts as compared with the pre-Catholic is clearly discernible. Cp further SIMON MAGUS, § 5 c.

Or are we to suppose, nevertheless, that the pre-Catholic Acts, on this principal point at least—that of Peter's presence in Rome without that of Paul—are the more recent? The circumstance that, in their beginning as it has come down to us, Paul travels from Rome to Spain shortly before Simon, and after him Peter, come to Rome, and that Peter dies before the return of Paul to Rome, which has already been predicted (§ 33*a*), can be taken as showing that the author deliberately wished to set aside the contemporaneous presence of the two in Rome as that was reported in the Catholic Acts. At the same time, should one choose to take it so, it would be necessary to be able to show some reason which could have led him to wish this.

36. Conclusions from the pre-Catholic Acts.

(a) No such reason is to be found in the dogmatic sphere, as if Peter and Paul were not at one in their doctrine and the author therefore did not wish to make them come upon the scene together. Of any incompatibility in their doctrine this author knows as little as does the writer of the Catholic Acts; on the contrary, Peter is anxiously expected in Rome by Paul's disciples (§ 33*b*).

(b) On the other hand there is much that is attractive, at first sight, in the view of Erbes (Z. f. Kirchengesch. 22 [1901], 176-179) that Paul was in the pre-Catholic Acts taken away from Rome from the same motive as we have already (above, § 26 g) seen to be operative in the time after Irenæus. Peter had to be the sole head of the church of Rome, in order to be able to figure as the first bishop there. If, however, the author really had this interest at heart, we shall have to pronounce his mode of giving effect to it to be very unskilful; for in the account he gives Paul is in Rome both before and after Peter, and after an explicit prediction suffers the death of a martyr there (§ 33*a*).

(c) On the assumption of so specifically Roman an interest as this we should further expect to find that the pre-Catholic Acts would in other respects also betray the same interest. But of anything of the sort there is surprisingly little. The burial-place of Peter is here the private tomb of Marcellus (§ 33*g*), not, as in the Catholic Acts (see § 34 h), a famous site like the terebinth on the Vatican, where he is said to have died. Further, we find nothing about any functions of Peter which could be regarded as episcopal.

(d) It is clear, on the contrary, that the author's interest is in his stories as such, without reference to the scene where they were enacted. He takes manifest delight in the grotesque miracles of his hero, of which only a limited selection has been given above (§ 33, b, e, f); but these could just as well have been transferred to any other place without diminution of the author's interest in them. Moreover the detailed parts of his narrative are but little united by any common idea.

The death of Peter is, strictly speaking, traced to his conversion of Agrippa's concubines and Albinus's wife to sexual abstinence; his action against Simon is added as a motive for it only in Pseudo-Linus (§ 33 h); indeed, the imprisonment of Peter, related only by Pseudo-Linus, before the conversion of those ladies is simply traced back to the consideration that the time has now drawn near in which his faith and his labours claim their reward (§ 33*g*).

(e) The author's interest really attaches itself to Rome in two points only. The final issue of the whole is that Nero desists from persecution of the Christians (§ 33*h*), and the controversy with Simon brings Peter to Rome for the reason that Simon is presupposed as active there before him. Yet even here it is hard to discover anything which might answer to the episcopal position of Peter in Rome. The cessation of the persecution is not brought about by the living Peter, but only after his death (and only according to Pseudo-Linus through the appearance of Peter in Nero's vision by night); the bringing of Peter to Rome is connected with the person of Simon, and Simon is controverted by Peter everywhere, not in Rome merely; he is expressly stated (§ 33*c*, d) to have been already controverted by him in Judæa.

(f) Further it has to be remembered, that the contents, in respect alike of doctrine and of presuppositions, though by some designated as Catholic, are nevertheless by others regarded as Gnostic (§ 32*a*) and thus cannot easily be brought into connection with the main Catholic 'tendency' already alluded to, to establish for Rome some sort of episcopal dignity of Peter. Elements to be taken into account in this connection are such as these: the mystery of the cross, the docetic Christology, the background of miracle, the use of apocryphal citations, and the like, of but little of which were we able to take account in § 33. See in Lipsius, ii. 1 258-270.

(a) There is a further point, in connection with which one might be inclined to suppose that a simultaneous presence of Paul along with Peter in Rome had been deliberately suppressed by the author of the pre-Catholic Acts in the interests of his theory about Peter as the head of the church of Rome; the point, namely, that Peter is represented as having come to Rome as early as in the second year of Claudius, in other words, in 42 A.D.

37. Arrival in Rome according to Apocryphal Acts.

So Lüdemann, Prot. Kirchenzeitung, 1887, p. 959 f.; similarly also Harnack, ACL ii. 1 705, with the difference that he mentions no definite name (least of all the author of the pre-Catholic Acts, which he assigns to about 250 A.D.), but only a drift of things that began to set in about 200 A.D., and that he seems to assume with less definiteness than Lüdemann a conscious purpose in the alteration of the history. This view is worthy of attention, if only because by means of this dating the twenty-five years of Peter's Roman sojourn are made possible (§ 26 e), yet also because such an artificial separation of two persons would find an analogy in the procedure, which in all probability the writer of the canonical book of Acts has followed in antedating the appearance of Simon (8 9-24), and the collection brought by Paul to Jerusalem (11 27-30 12 25). See SIMON MAGUS, § 14 a, e.

Only, here also we must call attention, as before (§ 36 b), to the unskilfulness with which in that case the author of the pre-Catholic Acts has carried out this purpose, supposing he had it. Not only, according to him, is Paul by express prophecy to come to Rome after Peter's death and suffer martyrdom there, but he is represented as having also been in Rome before Peter, in other words, before 42 A.D. (§ 33 a). What, therefore, can be clearly made out here is not any tendency but only gross ignorance or indifference regarding chronology; for before 42 A.D. Paul had at best only entered upon his first missionary journey, and not even the Council of Jerusalem had yet taken place.

(b) Therefore, also, no value can be attached to the conjecture of Erbes (above, § 36 b), that the author betrays his knowledge of the conjoint activity of Peter and Paul against Simon at Rome and his purpose to deny it, by the statement that it was in Jerusalem that the two together encountered Simon (§ 33 d).

If Jerusalem can be a slip of memory for Samaria, equally well can Paul be a slip of memory for John. If any such tendency as is supposed by Lüdemann and Erbes was operative, it must have led not merely to the obliteration of traces of Paul's presence in the conflict with Simon in Rome, but to the obliteration of his presence in Rome altogether, or—if this was no longer possible, in view of the too firmly established tradition of his death there—at least of his presence in Rome before Peter.

(c) As for the real origin of the fundamentally erroneous dating of Peter's arrival in Rome in 42 A.D., it has, in the first instance, to be noted that we first hear of such a date in the Chronicle of Eusebius, but must carry this back to its source (§ 26*e*). From an earlier period we have the datum established, that for twelve years after the death of Jesus, in other words, from 30 to 42 A.D., Peter remained along with the other apostles in Jerusalem (§§ 26 e, 31 d). About the same time, or perhaps still earlier, Justin informs us, but without specification of any definite year, that Simon the Magician came to Rome in the reign of Claudius; this is repeated by Irenæus (i. 16[23]1), and, indirectly, by Eusebius when (HE ii. 14 6) he says of Peter, without fixing the year, that 'he came to Rome in that same reign of Claudius' in which Simon came. According to ii. 17 1, Peter in the reign of Claudius must there have met Philo, who, according to ii. 18 8, had already come to Rome in the reign of Gaius Caligula.

(d) On this point the most important views are as follows:—

Investigation would be superfluous, if Kreyenbühl (Evang. d. Wahrheit, 1 [1900] 200) were right in his conjecture that by Claudius it was Claudius Nero who was originally meant (Nero was adopted by his predecessor Claudius). This, however, is surely too bold. Harnack (ACL ii. 1 242) thinks the definite date of 42 A.D. for the arrival of Peter in Rome cannot come from the date given for Simon Magus, since for the latter no definite year was assigned; but that it can only be derived from the tradition of the twelve years' sojourn in Jerusalem (30-42 A.D.). On p. 705 he says that the twenty-five years' sojourn in Rome 'is derived from the admittedly questionable Simon-Magus-Peter-Clement tradition which brings Simon to Rome in the reign of Claudius. . . . Legend brought Peter as his opponent to Rome in like manner under Claudius, and then left him there.' If this latter view is not in contradiction with that quoted immediately before, the reference back to the tradition concerning Simon Magus cannot apply to the exact period of 42-67 A.D., and therefore neither also to the precise year of 42 as the date of Peter's arrival, but only to the vaguer statement that his arrival fell in the reign of Claudius; the precise year, as we have seen, must, according to Harnack, be computed merely from the twelve years in Jerusalem. Lipsius (ii. 1 68) had merely stated this last view, adding that with this datum for Peter the approximately similar date of Simon Magus was also given. Lüdemann (above, a), starting from the view shared by him with Lipsius, that Simon's appearance in Rome was unhistorical, and that all that is said regarding this had been derived from statements regarding Paul (see SIMON MAGUS, §§ 4 f., 12, end), insists that the Simon legend must have assigned the appearance of Simon Magus in Rome, like that of Paul, to some date under Nero, and finds just for this reason a 'tendency'-change in the dating under the reign of Claudius. Only, when it is the meeting of Peter with Simon that is in question, there come into competition, on Lüdemann's presuppositions also, two conflicting dates, as soon as that of Paul, which determines that of Simon, and that of Peter do not from the first coincide. In shaping the tradition, therefore, a choice had to be made, and this in the present instance can easily have fallen in favour of that of Peter, should the author have judged this view the more trustworthy.

(e) For our present main purpose, that of determining the question of priority as between the pre-Catholic and the Catholic Acts, it results anew from what has been said that we are under no necessity to ascribe with Lüdemann a 'tendency'-change of dates to the pre-Catholic Acts, or with Harnack even to regard the statement of Dionysius of Corinth (above, § 25 a) as to the (approximately) contemporaneous arrival and martyrdom of Peter and Paul in Rome as fitting in with history and as supported by earlier testimony. Even from the side of the Catholic Acts no objection can be raised against the date 42 A.D., as having been assigned without 'tendency,' for Peter's arrival in Rome. According to the Catholic Acts Peter is in Rome before Paul; for how long before is not stated. This can be taken as an after-effect of the statement that he was there from 42 A.D., and the subsequent arrival of Paul can be explained by means of the 'tendency,' which we shall discuss in a later section (see § 40 b), to make him appear in Rome along with Peter, just as the statement of Dionysius of Corinth is capable of being understood as a further development of the same tendency, to the extent of making the arrival of the two (nearly) simultaneous. Justin alone constitutes a serious objection against Lipsius's derivation of the date 42 A.D.; for all that he does is to place Simon in Rome in the time of Claudius without saying a word about his conflict with Peter. Upon this point, however, we shall best be able to form a judgment in another connection (see (§§ 39 [f], 40 d).

38. Day of death according to the Apocryphal Acts.

The statements as to the day of death of Peter and Paul also promise light on the question as to the relative priority of the pre-Catholic and Catholic Acts. (a) 29th June, which is given at the close of the Catholic Acts for both apostles, not only fits in exceedingly ill with the Neronian persecution to which the martyrdoms are so readily referred—it arose out of the burning of Rome in July 64—but also rests upon a confusion. For 29th June is the day of the removal of the relics of the two apostles which took place in 258 A.D. (above, § 26 b). The confusion is found first in the Martyrology of Jerome. Another commemoration is on 22nd February. So far as Peter is concerned, the day on which he assumed the episcopal office, in Rome or in Antioch, is said to be intended (cp Lipsius, ii. 1 404-408). According to Erbes (TU 19 1), it is the true anniversary of Paul's death (a rather bold assumption), whilst for Peter its historical character cannot be at all established.

(b) It would be natural to suppose, if the same day of the same month is given for the death of the two apostles, that the year must, of course, be also the same. A whole series of ecclesiastical writers from Prudentius onwards (last half of 4th cent.), however, place the death of Paul exactly a year later than that of Peter, others only a day later, namely on 30th June (see Lipsius, ii. 1 236-244).

Harnack (ACL ii. 1 708 f.) leaves the last-mentioned date (a day later) unnoticed, and argues from the identity of the month-date that the difference of the year-date is incredible. He therefore supposes that the death year of the one apostle was from the fourth century onwards for some unknown reason separated from that of the other. He himself sees that this is a very difficult hypothesis, and would be inclined rather to hold the identification of the two years to be the secondary stage, 'were it not that the legend has as a constant element the identity of the days.' In making this remark, then, he has simply left out of account not only the dating, which separates the two events by only a single day, but also the pre-Catholic Acts altogether, for these not only presuppose quite different years for the deaths of Peter and of Paul, but also quite different days, since they do not name any day at all. In order to suggest something or other which could possibly have led to a later separation of the years originally regarded as identical, Harnack refers to 'various sorts of legends about the death of the apostles which are unknown to us,' and adds: 'Lipsius thinks of old Gnostic περίοδοι Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου, but none such ever existed.' Whether they existed we do not need to inquire here, for it is by no means the case that Lipsius relies upon writings that can only be hypothetically inferred; he builds upon our pre-Catholic Acts, which even for Harnack himself exist, if not from a date earlier than about 250 A.D., yet at all events from more than 100 years before Prudentius.

(c) As soon as due heed is paid to this, it becomes clear that the separation of the deaths of the two apostles by a year or a day is nothing but a compromise between the church's assertion of the simultaneousness of the two events, and the opposite tradition set down in the pre-Catholic Acts. On Harnack's own principle, accordingly, we must regard the coalescence of the days as the secondary stage, and on this point also the pre-Catholic Acts have preserved the older stage as compared with the Catholic Acts.

Whoever regards the simultaneousness of the two apostles' appearances in Rome and their conjoint conflict with Simon as the secondary form of the tradition (§ 37 e) is all the less in a position to doubt that this form of the tradition must necessarily have carried with it that of the coincidence of their deaths. That the difference of the days goes back to non-Catholic sources (to which our pre-Catholic Acts are to be reckoned according to § 36 [f]) is expressly stated in the decree of Pope Gelasius (2 2, ap. Credner, Zur Gesch. d. Kanons, 1847, pp. 190 f. = 198 f.) dating from the year 494, yet perhaps even from the time of Damasus, 382 A.D.: [Paulus] qui non diverso, ut hæretici garriunt, sed uno tempore, uno eodemque die gloriosa morte cum Petro in urbe Roma sub Cæsare Nerone agonizans coronatus est.

39. Conclusion from Apocryphal Acts.

Having reached this point, let us now endeavour to sum up the provisional conclusions that seem to be deducible from our study of the Apocryphal Acts, in the same manner as has already been done in § 31 from the data of the NT and Church fathers. (a) In the most important points we have seen that the contents of the pre-Catholic Acts are the more original as compared with those of the Catholic; namely, that Peter without Paul engaged in controversy with Simon in Rome and suffered martyrdom. This, however, is confirmed by the Catholic Acts also, inasmuch as we can see that in them Paul has been introduced into the picture as the fellow combatant of Peter against Simon only by an after-thought (§ 35*e*). In view of this fact, one would have to postulate the existence of some such representation as that of the pre-Catholic Acts as a foundation for that of the Catholic, even if it were not actually extant. All the less is there any reason for trying to discover in the pre-Catholic Acts 'tendencies' by which they would be shown to be secondary as compared with the Catholic Acts.

Let it be added that the Acta Pauli do not alter our judgment upon the two Acta now under discussion. They tell us (in Acta apost. apocr. 1 104-117) that Paul, awaited by Luke and Titus, came (returned?) to Rome, revived from the dead Patroclus the cup-bearer of Nero, preached Christ to Nero himself, and was for this sentenced by him to death; all this without any mention at all of Peter and Simon.

(b) Even if we refrain from trying to frame a hypothesis as to the relative priority of the several Acts (or their sources) regarded as literary monuments (§ 35*a*), the priority of the most important points in the contents of the pre-Catholic Acts is, nevertheless, a result of very great importance. In spite of this priority it remains open to us to hold that the oldest forms of pre-Catholic and Catholic Acts alike arose approximately at the same date, but in different Christian circles (§ 32*b*), and both of them in the time before the rise of the idea of the Roman bishopric of Peter, and thus before about 189-217 A.D. (§ 26 [f]). This last idea is discountenanced, not only by the pre-Catholic Acts (§ 36*b-f*), but also quite as much by the Catholic with their co-ordination of Peter and Paul (§ 35*d*).

(c) The theological views and presuppositions also alike of the pre-Catholic Acts (§ 36 [f]) and of the Catholic, fit into the same period (from about 160 A.D. onwards). The essence of Christianity is in the Catholic Acts summed up in belief in one God and his son Jesus Christ, and in an earnest morality, and salvation is sought, quite as in Didachè, 9 3 10 2 f., in recognition of the truth and in the life eternal; Peter, precisely as in the canonical book of Acts (see ACTS, §§ 4, 7), does away with the Mosaic law, and Paul appears as a true Jew, with the sole difference that he substitutes for the fleshly circumcision the circumcision of the heart (Rom. 2 28 f. 4 11 f. against Gal. 5 2 f.), etc. (§ 34 a, d, e, and more fully in Lipsius, ii. 1 350-358). The interest also in composing the differences of view between Jewish and Gentile Christians (ibid. 340-349) was no longer a lively one in the later time. The Acta Pauli (above, a) likewise belongs to this same period.

(d) Thus it is in itself a possible thing that many, even of the older of the Church fathers mentioned in §§ 25 f., 29, may have drawn upon our apocryphal Acts: e.g., Dionysius of Corinth, Irenæus, Tertullian, Gaius from the Catholic; the Muratorian fragmentist and Clement of Alexandria, who do not name Paul along with Peter, from the pre-Catholic Acts (as for Clem. Alex., however, cp §§ 25 d, 41 b), the Philosophumena from both, since in a very significant way we find it following both traditions within the compass of a single line (6 20): Simon 'journeying as far also as Rome, fell in with the apostles, whom Peter opposed in many ways' (ἕως καὶ τῆς Ῥώμης ἐπιδημήσας ἀντέπεσε τοῖς ἀποστόλοις πρὸς ὃν πολλὰ Πέτρος ἀντικατέστη).[1] At the same time in no single case can one be sure that the fathers named had really come by their information by reading and not by oral communication, and thus it becomes impossible to fix the date of composition of the Acts by that of any of these Fathers.

1 The Didascalia apostolorum (6 9), the Apostolic Constitutions (6 9), Eusebius (HE ii. 14 6-15 1), and others (see Lipsius, ii. 1 321, n. 5) also mention Peter alone as the controverter of Simon.

SIMON PETER

(e) It has already been stated in § 31 n as one of our results that, so far as the evidence of the NT and the Church Fathers goes, Peter never was in Rome at all. The question now emerges anew, whether our examination of the apocryphal Acts supplies any fresh material which might help us to understand how it, nevertheless, came about that tradition carried him there. The new element we find in these Acts is the importance which is attached in them to the conflict with Simon. On this account, Erbes (Z. f. Kirchengesch. 22, 1901, pp. 12-16, 177-179) makes the following combination:—Since Simon was, according to Acts 8 9-24, confuted by Peter in Samaria and, according to Justin (see SIMON MAGUS, § 2 a), attained to divine honours in Rome, in the conviction that these could not have continued for any time, it was assumed for Rome also that Simon was confuted by Peter there. As further, according to the Epistle of the Corinthians to Paul, which together with the (apocryphal) third Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians belonging to it, has been shown to be a constituent part of the Acta Pauli,[1] Simon made his appearance in Corinth also, and led astray members of the church there, on which account Stephanus (so here for Stephanas: cp 1 Cor. 1 16 16 15 17) and his fellow-writers beg the speedy return of Paul, it was found fitting to represent Paul as the opponent, not here only, but also in Rome. Such motives can, indeed, have been operative, and must be added to those mentioned in § 31 o.

(f) Nevertheless, these motives do not solve every question. According to Erbes, they can have become operative only when, through Justin, there had become widely spread the mistaken notion that a statue had been erected to Simon in Rome. The question whether the formation of a legend of this kind was possible at a still earlier date is thus wholly foreclosed. Rightly, it would seem, since Justin mentions only Simon in Rome, but neither Peter nor Paul as his opponents (§ 37 e, end). It will be shown, however, later (§ 40 a, b) that there are conditions which point to a much earlier date for the origin of the legend. Their investigation is only hindered by the position of Erbes.

(g) All that has hitherto been said still leaves unexplained one matter which, nevertheless, is plainly one of primary importance in the Catholic Acts: the Petro-Pauline interest. Why was it so urgently necessary to accentuate the harmonious agreement of Peter and Paul? Who was there to dispute this after the middle of the second century had been passed? With this, in turn, is connected the further question: Why was it so urgently necessary to controvert Simon? Why is it that we learn from the NT so little concerning him if he had been in the East, and in Rome, even from pre Pauline times, so formidable an enemy of Christianity? Are the two questions perhaps so intimately connected that one and the same cause rendered necessary the confuting of Simon, and the bringing into prominence of the harmony between Peter aud Paul? For further light upon this, we must try to find new material. Thus, our examination of the apocryphal Acts ends not so much in solution of our main problem, as in the raising of new questions regarding Peter's Roman sojourn.

40. Inference from ps.-Clem. Hom. and Recog.

The body of literature still remaining for our consideration with reference to the question whether Peter was ever in Rome, consists of the pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions. (a) We begin with the following results derived from a careful examination elsewhere (see SIMON MAGUS, §§

1 Carl Schmidt has obtained this result from a Coptic translation not yet published. See his communication in the Neuen Heidelberger Jahrbb., 1897, pp. 117-124, and Harnack's review of it in TLZ, 1897, pp. 625-629. For the Corinthian correspondence, see, for example, Carrière et Berger, La correspondence apocryphe de St. Paul et des Corinthiens, Paris, 1891 (reprint from Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie, 1891, pp. 333-351). Cp Zahn, Gesch. d. NTlichen Kanons. 2 592-611 1016-1019 [1892].

3 f., 9-11). The Simon who is opposed in these writings by Peter was originally the apostle Paul, yet in a form which has been distorted by the hostility of the authors. Only later were Gnostic features added to him, and thus in his figure the Gnosticism of the second century was controverted. This does not concern us here. The fundamental idea was that Peter must everywhere follow 'Simon' (who seeks in his travels to win adherents for himself everywhere) in order to refute his pernicious doctrines by disputations, and to outdo his magical arts by still greater wonders. If not in writing, yet at all events orally, there was current a coherent, comprehensive form of this romance in which Peter followed 'Simon' to Rome also.

(b) The thesis which has been based on this foundation since the days of Baur is the following. Peter was never in Rome. It was merely the idea of the romance—that he had to follow 'Simon' everywhere—that led to the assertion of his having come to Rome also. This was, in the end, accepted for a fact in churchly circles also, and this all the more readily because it subserved churchly interests. For, since Paul had notoriously been in Rome, it now became possible to appeal to the activity of both these leading apostles in the metropolis. Their mutual relation was, of course, represented as one of the most absolute agreement. Thus, to the assertion that Peter had withstood Simon, it ceased to be possible to attach the original meaning, according to which Simon stood for Paul; Simon must figure as a third person, and Paul could range himself on the side of Peter. So the Catholic Acts and the Church fathers from Dionysius of Corinth (about 170 A.D.) onwards. Some of them name only Peter as the opponent of Simon in Rome (§ 39 d), just as the pre-Catholic Acts do. This stage in the development of the legend is now definitely perceived to be the earlier.

(c) The whole development, however, is seen to present a perversion of historical truth such as it would be almost impossible to surpass, and which throws a lurid light upon the hostility to history, as well as upon the power, of the idea of a Catholic church. For something analogous see § 24 d. Even although we are not at this distance of time able to say with certainty how far the churchmen who had a hand in this transformation were conscious of the falsification of history which was being brought about by their action, the effect of it, at all events, was that the Catholic church, while gratefully accepting from sources so questionable as in its view the Clementines were, the statement of the presence of Peter contemporaneously with Paul in Rome, at the same time changed the mutually hostile attitude of the two apostles into a friendly one, and gained from a very hostile and embittered exaggeration of the real antagonism between Peter and Paul the best foundation it could show for its claim to world-wide dominion.

(d) To many students this combination appears from the very outset inadmissible, because they are unable to believe in the possibility of a falsification so gross and audacious as that of representing Peter as having been in Rome if this was really not the fact. As against this, however, it must be borne in mind that the statement in question was not at first put forward as the assertion of a fact, but merely as an incident in a romance the authors of which had not the remotest notion that strict adherence to historical fact could be reasonably demanded of them and whose only thought was as to how they could give fullest utterance to their hatred of Paul.

It is Justin, in particular, who shows how this romance came to be regarded as actual history only by slow degrees. Justin took from it the datum that Simon had actually appeared in Rome, and in fact he was able to credit it because it seemed to him to be attested by the statue which he found in Rome. The other datum, that Peter also had been in Rome and come into conflict with Simon, he did not accept—in all probability because it did not seem to him to be supported by the traditions with which he had become acquainted in Rome itself (cp §§ 30 g, 31 h, 37 e, 39 [f], SIMON MAGUS, § 11 e, f).

How this feature in the romances should on the other hand afterwards have come to be accepted as history is not difficult to understand, when we reflect how admirably it subserved the idea of the Catholic church and remember, further, that the Pauline features of the figure of Simon had already been greatly disguised by the Gnostic touches that had been added to them.

(e) Soltau, who does not accept this whole combination nevertheless concedes (p. 35) that the Simon-legend if it did not give rise to that of Peter's Roman sojourn, at all events favoured its spread; and Harnack (above, § 37*d*), who accepts Peter's Roman sojourn as historically true, declares nevertheless that the Simon legend had the effect of causing Peter's arrival in Rome to be assigned along with that of Simon himself to about 42 A.D. That mere ideas, though historically unfounded, were enough to produce a false representation that Peter had come to Rome is assumed by Soltau and Erbes (above, §§ 31 o, 39 e) in a process of reasoning which is not nearly so simple or cogent as that by inference from the Homilies and Recognitions which is now under discussion. Thus we need not shrink from it. Soltau (p. 10) says further that the Roman sojourn of Peter is incredible also because according to the apocryphal Acts it is full of the wildest fables about the conflict with Simon. The combination we are now contending for goes only a single step farther and finds in these fables the foundation and not merely the adornments of the unhistorical statement that Peter had been in Rome.

The only assertion calling for serious attention here is that which claims for the tradition as to Peter's Roman sojourn that it arose independently of the Simon legend.

41. No counter testimony.

(a) First of all, it is pointed out that no Church father affirms that Peter and Paul came to Rome simultaneously. We shall not insist, in reply, that Dionysius of Corinth (above, § 25 a) is not very far from making this affirmation. What is more to the point is that neither also does the Simon-legend say, or need to say, that Peter's arrival at all places was simultaneous with that of Simon. In fact it rather gives to Simon in each case some space of time within which he may win the people over to his side, and only after this has happened does it bring Peter upon the scene (cp, for the pre-Catholic Acts, above, § 33 a, b). Moreover, as soon as it is Peter and Paul who have to be dealt with, there come into consideration a variety of historical data which cannot be brought together at one point of time so easily as would be the case with incidents in a mere romance (above, § 37 d). Besides, for the Catholic use that is made of this romance, it is no longer a simultaneous arrival but merely some sort of contemporaneous activity of the two apostles that is of interest. Thus even considerable intervals between the arrivals of the two apostles would not of themselves be any evidence that the allegation of their having been in Rome together does not rest upon the Simon romance.

(b) What would be more important would be the existence of a tradition which spoke only of the presence of Peter in Rome, without mentioning that of Paul. Such a tradition seems to be found in Clement of Alexandria; but, as has already been shown (above, § 25 d), since Clement in the connection in which he was writing had no occasion to mention Paul, it does not follow that he was not aware of his activity contemporaneously with Peter. In the pre-Catholic Acts (above, § 33 a) Paul sets out from Rome before Peter's arrival there, and is represented as returning only after the death of the latter. Here accordingly is a case where we actually find Peter without Paul in Rome. Not, however, without Simon; and this is the important thing. In one form or another Paul in Rome is always by his side, as a foe or as a friend. There exists no tradition regarding Peter in Rome, which rested content with bringing him personally to Rome; every such tradition connects with his presence there some declaration as to his relations with Paul. It is this circumstance that gives so great inherent probability to the supposition that the allegation of his peaceful co-operation with Paul in Rome (which, even irrespective of the pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions, we have already found to be inadmissible: see § 31 n) arises from a transformation of the tradition as to his conflict with Paul in the same place.

The transformation cannot possibly have taken place in the opposite direction. In such a case the conflict with Simon would have first begun to be alleged at a date so late as would render it impossible that Simon could be Paul, Paul having by this time come to be held in general reverence. If, therefore, the transformation in this direction were to be insisted on, it would be necessary first of all to set aside everything that has been brought forward in SIMON MAGUS (§ 4 f.) with a view to showing that Simon is a caricature of Paul.

(c) Thus we are precluded also from attaching value, as evidences for a tradition independent of the Simon legend, to those passages of the Church fathers which mention the contemporaneous activity of Peter and Paul in Rome without at the same time mentioning Simon Magus.

In those passages it is already the transformed Simon legend which we have. It can take the form of representing Peter and Paul as making common cause against Simon (so the Catholic Acts, the Philosophumena, etc.; above, §§ 34, 26 d, e); but it does not need to do so. Inasmuch as on this presupposition Simon at once appears as a Gnostic merely, he loses for the Church fathers all that independent interest which he possesses in the Simon romance. Moreover, in many cases the connection does not admit of his being mentioned. Such passages accordingly prove still less than do the converse cases in which Simon is spoken of as being in Rome without Peter (see SIMON MAGUS, § 11, e, f).

(d) The only kind of evidence that would be conclusive in the matter, would be the production of a statement relating to the presence of Peter in Rome, which could be shown to belong to a time when the Simon-legend could not yet have exercised an influence on the shaping of the history. Such a statement, however, is to be found neither in Clement of Rome (above, § 28), nor in any of the other writers named in § 29 f. At the same time, if one reflects that the Simon legend could have begun to exert its influence even in its oral form (see SIMON MAGUS, § 10 e), and thus during and shortly after the lifetime of Paul, it will be seen that the attempt to find a testimony to the presence of Peter in Rome which shall be wholly independent of it must be regarded as hopeless from the outset.

Only 1 Pet. offers any inducements to any such attempt (cp above, § 30 k).

42. Babylon of 1 Pet. 5 13 = Rome?

(a) In fact, however, this epistle cannot supply us with a decisive answer that Rome is meant by Babylon. Neither, indeed, it is true, with a secure negative answer. Stress has often been laid upon the consideration that the order of the provinces to which it is addressed—Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia (i.e. the W. coast of Asia Minor) and Bithynia—is not a suitable one if the epistle was written from Rome. But neither is it suitable if Babylon was the place of origin; it is not arranged in such a way that the five provinces can be brought into line on any hypothesis as to the writer's view-point. Yet neither does the mention of Babylon (5 13) contain the slightest hint that the name is to be taken in any secondary sense.

The case is quite different when in 4 Ezra 1 1—that is to say, in an apocalypse—Babylon on the Euphrates, where Salathiel, the father of Zerubbabel, is living in the thirtieth year after the destruction of Jerusalem, i.e., in 557 B.C., is named with some sort of suggestion that the statement is to be taken as a veiled one, and that in reality, the book having been written towards the end of the first Christian century, Rome ought to be understood. In like manner the case is different from that of 1 Pet., if, according to a Sibylline prophecy (5 137-142 158 f. [138-143 159 f.]) Nero, 'the great king of great Rome . . . shall flee from Babylon' (τῆς μεγάλης Ῥώμης βασιλεὺς μέγας . . . φεύξεται ἐκ Βαβυλῶνος), and a great star shall fall into the sea, 'and shall burn up the deep sea and Babylon itself and the land of Italy' (καὶ φλέξει πόντον βαθὺν αὐτήν τε Βαβυλῶνα Ἰταλίης γαῖάν τε). Here care is taken by the naming of Rome and Italy to warn the reader that he is not to suppose Babylon on the Euphrates to be meant, just as in Rev. 17 15 by the note that the many waters on which the great whore—i.e., according to 17 5, Babylon—sits (17 1) are nations, and not literal waters.

(b) In the case of 1 Pet. the position of matters is that a decision as to the presence of Peter in Rome cannot be gained by interpreting Babylon one way or other, but contrariwise our interpretation of what is intended by Babylon will be determined by our independent conclusion on the other point. If now we bear in mind that in Rome itself, as late as 152 A.D., Justin knew nothing of Peter's having been there (above, § 30 g), and thus that the Simon-romance which brought Peter to Rome was not yet at that date in church circles taken for history, it becomes extremely improbable that this romance should have been accepted in 112 A.D. by the author of 1 Pet. (on the date see CHRISTIAN, § 8) and made the basis of his designation of the place of writing, although it had been in circulation in strict Jewish Christian circles from a time when Paul was still alive, or at any rate shortly after his death. If this be so, then the dating from Babylon tells us at once where it was that about 112 A.D. Peter's chief activity was supposed to have been exercised between his departure from Jerusalem and his death; and it tells us so even if it should so happen that the Epistle was really after all composed in Rome.

Thus we are thrown back upon the scattered notices referred to above (§ 24) regarding the various fields of activity, apart from Rome, which tradition has assigned to Peter.

43. Babylonia and adjoining countries as Peter's mission-field.

(a) Among all these, only Babylonia and perhaps also the Black Sea coast can be considered seriously. According to Lipsius (1 611 613) the tradition that Peter laboured along with his brother Andrew on the shores of the Black Sea goes as far back as to the second century. 1 Pet., however, in its allusion to Babylon as a mission-field of Peter takes us still farther back than any of the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles made use of by Lipsius.

(b) It is specially interesting to observe that according to late redactions (for example, in Epiphanius Monachus in the 9th cent.) Peter takes leave of Andrew in order to travel westward, and that thereafter the other apostle called Simon, surnamed Zelotes or the Canaanite, suddenly appears as Andrew's companion. The journey into the West plainly originates in the wish to bring the tradition of Peter's activity in Asia into connection with that regarding his labours in Rome. The appearance of the second Simon on the other hand, points to a substitution for Simon Peter. Whilst at first there was no idea that any other than Simon Peter was intended, it was inevitable, as soon as the later idea of his departure for the West had come to be accepted, that the Simon who was named in the subsequent course of these tales of the apostles should be taken to be Simon the Canaanite.

(c) The same vacillation between the names of Peter and the Canaanite recurs also in what is said about Babylonia. According to the Acts of Judas Thaddæus, Peter laboured with Judas in (Syria and) Mesopotamia; according to other accounts (chiefly western), Simon the Canaanite laboured along with Judas in Babylonia as well as in Persia, and they suffer martyrdom together in Suanir in Colchis. By this last statement the tradition as to Babylonia and Persia is thus brought into combination with that as to the coast lands of the Black Sea (above, a). Lipsius conjectures that here also Simon the Canaanite was erroneously taken for Simon Peter after the triumph of the tradition that Peter had laboured in Rome (i. 27 30 611-613, ii. 2 145 f. 175-177).

(d) Seufert (ZWT, 1885, 150 f.) urges against this, that the combination would be convincing only if evidence for the Babylonian sojourn of Peter earlier than the date of 1 Pet. could be adduced; otherwise, it remains possible that in 1 Pet. Rome is meant by Babylon, and thus that Peter's sojourn in Rome was at that time presupposed, but that afterwards in consequence of a literal interpretation of 1 Pet. 5 13 his place of sojourn was removed to Babylon, while at a still later date, with a view to harmony with the tradition of his Roman sojourn, Simon the Canaanite was put in his place as sojourning in Babylon. We shall not here urge how difficult must at any time have been a literal interpretation of 'Babylon' in 1 Pet. 5 13, if Rome had already come to be so generally accepted as the scene of Peter's labours, that the author could have counted on being understood, although he chose to designate it by the word Babylon. The essential point is this: on the view which is being here upheld, Babylon must have been meant literally by the author of 1 Pet., because at that early date he had not as yet any idea of Peter as having ever been in Rome; in harmony with this view are those apocryphal Acts which represent him as labouring in Babylonia, so that the substitution of Simon the Canaanite in his place is found to be due to a subsequent alteration.

Even if Babylonia was Peter's most important field of labour, it does not by any means immediately follow that he died there. If it is certain that he did not die in Rome, there is all the more reason for asking whether any other place can be named with any probability.

44. Where did Peter die?

(a) Erbes (Ztschr. f. Kirchengesch. 22, 1901, 180-219) names Jerusalem.

In the pre-Catholic Acts it is not Nero who sentences Peter to death but the city-prefect Agrippa. By Agrippa, it is argued, cannot be intended the M. Vipsanius Agrippa who died in 12 B.C. Along with Agrippa is mentioned, as a persecutor of Peter, the emperor's friend Albinus, whose wife withdrew herself from his society from motives of chastity (above, § 33*g*). In this Albinus Erbes discerns the procurator Albinus who succeeded Festus in Judæa in 62 A.D., and who had a faithful high-toned wife; while Agrippa on the other hand he identifies with King Agrippa II. who was master of north-eastern Palestine from 53 to 100 A.D. (see HEROD, § 13). King Agrippa is not known to have been married, and Erbes presumes his domestic circumstances to have been similar to those of the Agrippa of the pre-Catholic Acts. It is in Palestine only, not in Rome, that the two men can be shown to have been contemporaries; the city-prefect of Rome in a Latin recension of the Passio Petri et Pauli (chap. 13, in Acta Apost. Apocr. 1 233; also, we add, in cod. M of the principal form of this Passio Petri et Pauli [chap. 58] discussed above, § 32*b* 1) is named not Agrippa but Clement. But further, King Agrippa II. has been confused with Herod Agrippa I. who, according to Acts 12 3, cast Peter into prison in Jerusalem. It is his liberation from this captivity, Erbes thinks, which constitutes the basis of what is related in the Catholic and pre-Catholic Acts as to Peter's flight from Rome (above, §§ 34*g*, 33*g*). As to his death, on the other hand, Erbes conjectures that in reality Peter suffered crucifixion under Albinus towards the end of 64 A.D., and that Mt. 23 34 contains an allusion to this fact. Among the messengers of Jesus of whom he says to the Jews, 'some of them shall ye kill,' allusion is made to James the elder (Acts 12 2): it is Paul who is alluded to in the words 'some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues and persecute from city to city,' and he whom the Jews 'shall crucify' is not the second bishop of Jerusalem, Simeon the son of Clopas, whose crucifixion (under Trajan, according to Hegesippus in Euseb., HE iii. 32 2) falls too late to allow the possibility of its being referred to in Mt., but Simon Peter. Erbes, that is to say, accepts as historical the statement which Eusebius (HE 3 11) introduces with a λόγος κατέχει—on the force of which formula see above, § 28*e*)—that after the death of James the Just in 62 A.D., all the surviving apostles met in Jerusalem in order to choose a successor to James—namely the Simeon referred to above. Peter after this continued in Jerusalem until the outbreak of Nero's persecution of the Christians in Rome, and in Jerusalem as a result of the activity aroused in zealous procurators by this persecution, he was crucified by Albinus. It was in this manner, it is urged, that it became possible for Peter to be regarded as one of Nero's victims, and his death to be at the same time transferred erroneously to Rome. The twofold destruction of Jerusalem, first by Titus and afterwards by Hadrian, explains how it was possible that the fact of its having been the scene of Peter's death should pass out of memory. The whole combination, however, notwithstanding other arguments, brought by Erbes to its support, which cannot be recapitulated here, is much too bold for acceptance.

(b) On the other hand, there is no difficulty in the supposition already set forth (§§ 28 i, 31*g*), that Peter met his death in an unknown and obscure place, perhaps without legal process, perhaps on a journey, perhaps without any companion, so that no tradition regarding it survived which could have asserted itself against the steadily advancing belief that he had died in Rome. Here accordingly we must rest, as we have no more detailed accounts, in particular none from Clement of Rome, from whom we should most naturally have expected them. When Soltau lays it down (pp. 23 25) that no one disputes the martyrdom of Peter in the time of the Neronian persecution, though it was not in Rome, the date is by no means to be accepted.

But neither have we any other means of learning the date of Peter's death. In particular, we may not say with Krenkel (Josephus u. Lucas, 1894, p. 183, n. 3) that he must have died before Paul's last journey to Jerusalem because Paul, according to Acts 21 18, at that date found no one but James at the head of the Church there.

That Peter never was in Rome has already been inferred from the NT and the Church fathers (§ 31). Discussion of the apocryphal Acts showed, further, that Peter's presence in Rome was presupposed in Church circles not merely after 170 A.D. but perhaps even from as early a date as 160 A.D., that the purpose of his presence there is to be sought entirely in the conflict with Simon Magus (and in the martyrdom), and also, so far as the Catholic Acts are concerned, in the desire to bring into prominence his harmonious accord with Paul (§ 39). Not till we came to the pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions, however, were we able to perceive that under the name of Simon it was originally Paul that was controverted, and that nothing but the fundamental idea of the Simon-romance that Peter must necessarily follow 'Simon' everywhere gave rise to the allegation that he had come to Rome also. It is these writings, moreover, that first point the way clearly to a recognition of the fact that in the apocryphal Acts also the figure of Simon has an anti-Pauline basis (SIMON MAGUS, § 5). At the same time it was also through the Homilies and Recognitions that we first became aware that the harmonious co-operation of Paul with Peter in Rome was a fundamentally altered form of their hostile meeting in Rome reported in the romance—an alteration made in the interests of the Catholic church. Lastly, they showed us that this romance had already arisen and begun to take shape in the lifetime of Paul and the period immediately following. In church circles, however, it did not find acceptance until Gnostic features also had been given to Simon and thereby the Pauline features had been so greatly obscured that it became possible to assume a harmonious instead of a hostile conjunction of Paul with Peter in Rome. Thus we see that the key to the whole riddle is found only in the Homilies and Recognitions, and how great is the injustice done to themselves in the complete neglect of these by those scholars, like Erbes and Soltau, who seek to reach the right conclusion that Peter never was in Rome by other and much less conclusive arguments, or who like Harnack accept the tradition of the presence of Peter in Rome as true history.

45. Conclusion as to Peter's activity and death outside of Palestine.

But also the anti-Pauline basis of the Acta Petri is completely misknown when Carl Schmidt (below, § 49), 88-90, arguing correctly from the view of Harnack, declares it to be an 'assured result' that the whole legend contained in it about the meeting between Simon Magus and Peter has been derived by the author from combination of what Justin says about Simon with the fact of the Roman martyrdom of Peter, adding that Simon is exclusively the magician, and that the author remains without any idea that Paul is concealed under this mask, because the Pseudo-Clementines were not yet in existence.

In truth the interest of the Catholic church succeeded very well, thanks to great skill, persistence, and unscrupulosity, in obscuring the actual facts of the case (cp the suppression of the tradition according to which Barnabas was the first preacher of the gospel in Rome; BARNABAS, § 4); yet it is not wholly impossible for us to bring them again to light.

46. Importance for the Roman Church.

Still, the whole question, after all, is a purely historical one. A claim on the part of the bishop of Rome to supreme authority over the world would not be established even if it were a fact that Peter had been in Rome or that Mt. 16 18 f. as well as Lk. 22 32 or Jn. 21 15-17 were genuine. In § 26*g*, h it has been shown how late was the date at which Peter came to be regarded as bishop of Rome in spite of this presupposition. In Peter's lifetime there were no monarchical bishops at all (MINISTRY, §§ 46*b*, 47), and even if there had been, his office was that of an apostle, never that of bishop. And even if he had been bishop, his special dignity would not have passed over to his successor; for apart from the fact that the apostolical succession was not believed in till a date long after the lifetime of Peter (MINISTRY, § 37), it is in itself an empty doctrine. Tertullian has well expressed this as against Calixtus of Rome (Pudic. 21, middle): 'qualis es, evertens atque commutans manifestam domini intentionem personaliter hoc [Mt. 16 18 f.] Petro conferentem?'

47. Later traditions. Only a brief account of later traditions can be given. The wife of Peter (1 Cor. 9 4 f.) is said to have been a daughter of Aristobulus, brother of Barnabas. Peter by prayer inflicts gout on his own daughter Petronilla in order to preserve her from danger with which she is threatened on account of her beauty. To show that he has the power to do so he heals her, but forthwith permits the malady to return. This is related in a Coptic fragment with the subscription πράξεις Πέτρου (discussed by Carl Schmidt [below, § 49], 1-25 and already in SBAW, 1896, p. 841 f.) Thus the conjecture of Lipsius (ii. 1 203-206) is confirmed that the Acts of Nereus and Achilles and the Acts of Philip from which he adduces the same story derived it from the old πράξεις Πέτρου. Yet the Coptic fragment gives the beginning to the effect that a heathen, Ptolemæus, had carried off the daughter of Peter (here she does not yet bear the name 'Petronilla'), but brought her back when she had lost her health. Clement of Alexandria clearly knew the story, as he says (Strom. 3 6, § 52, p. 535, ed. Potter; also ap. Eus. HE iii. 30 1), 'for Peter indeed and Philip both became fathers,' and only with regard to Philip adds, 'Philip also gave his daughters to husbands' (see PHILIP, § 4 c, col. 3699). According to Strom. 7 11, § 63, p. 869 (ap. Eus. HE iii. 30 2) Peter's wife suffered martyrdom before his eyes. He himself is said to have been bald (cp the 'tonsura Petri'). For a detailed description of his appearance, from John Malalas after older authorities, see Lipsius, ii. 1 213, n. 1. Of the miracles of Peter reference may be made here to that mentioned in the 'Acta Petri et Andreæ' according to which, in order to convince a certain rich man named Onesiphorus of the truth of Christianity, he causes a camel to go twice through the eye of a needle, and afterwards, again twice, another camel with a woman of loose character on its back.

48. Writings attributed to Peter. We possess no genuine writings of Peter; nor can the speeches attributed to him in Acts lay any claim to authenticity notwithstanding their archaic colouring (§ 4 g, ACTS, § 14). On the Canonical Epistles see PETER (EPISTLES), and CHRISTIAN, § 8; also, on 2 Pet., above, § 24 a. As apocryphal writings of Peter, a book of Acts (not, however, claiming to be by him), a Gospel, a 'Preaching' (Κήρυγμα) and an Apocalypse are enumerated by Eusebius (HE iii. 3 2). Cp APOCRYPHA, §§ 26 4 30 1 31 2; Zahn, Gesch. d. NTlichen Kanons, 2 742-751, 810-832; Harnack, ACL, ii. 1 470-475, 622-625. On the 'Preaching' of Peter see also above, § 25 e. Of the gospel of Peter the second half is fully considered under RESURRECTION-NARRATIVES, § 5 et passim. Lastly, mention must be made of the Epistle of Peter to James prefixed to the pseudo-Clementine Homilies, on which see SIMON MAGUS, § 15.

49. Literature. On the life of Peter generally see the Bible Dictionaries; also Harnack in EB(9) and the literature relating to the life of Jesus and the apostolic age. SIMRI (שִׁמְרִי), 1 Ch. 26 10 AV, RV SHIMRI (q.v.).

SIN (סִין; for 𝔊's readings see below) an Egyptian city, Ez. 30 15: 'and I will pour my fury upon Sin (AV^mg., Pelusium), the strength of Egypt.' It stands parallel to Noph-Memphis (v. 13), Pathros, Zoan-Tanis and No-Thebes (v. 14), in direct parallelism to No (Cornill: Noph-Memphis after 𝔊). Verse 16 groups together Sin (but 𝔊—except Q which has Σαϊς as in v. 15—Syene, and thus with great probability Cornill, סְוֵן; see SYENE), No, and Noph; in vv. 17 f. less important cities are enumerated. As in v. 16 𝔊 seems to be right, only v. 15 remains for Sin. Nothing can be concluded from the parallelisms, especially because the text (No occurs 3 times in the present Hebrew text) has been corrupted in several places, except that Sin must have been a very important city; in view of the parallelism with Memphis (𝔊, see above), it would seem to belong to northern Egypt. More important is the designation 'strength (RV stronghold, מָעוֹז) of Egypt,' which seems to point to the eastern frontier of the Delta. 𝔊^B renders Σαιν (accusative of Sais or transliteration?), 𝔊^A Ταvιν (of course incorrectly, as Tanis is ZOAN, q.v.), Vg. Pelusium. Modern scholars have always adhered to the Vulgate's identification with Pelusium, because Pelusium would meet the requirements best and because of the Aramaic word sᵉyān, Syriac sᵉyānā 'mud,' which seemed to furnish the Semitic equivalent for the Greek Πηλούσιον—i.e., mud-city (cp Lutetia). This identification has been often repeated by Egyptologists (still by Steindorff, Beiträge zur Assyr. 1 599 as late as 1890), but on the basis of erroneous conclusions Brugsch (Dict. Geogr. 1091; cp Dümichen, Gesch. Aeg. 263) had assumed that Coptic ome, 'dirt, mud,' furnished the etymology for the great fortified frontier-city Ame(t), and that the latter, consequently, was Pelusium. The city in question—Ame(t)[1]—had its official etymology rather from a word meaning 'prince of Lower Egypt'; but this might have been artificial. The city itself was, however, discovered by the excavations and investigations of Petrie and Griffith, at the modern Nebīsheh, 8 miles SE of Tanis; cp Petrie, Tanis II. (On the proposed identification with Tahpanhes, see TAHPANHES.) For the identification Pelusium-Sin there remains only the fact that Pelusium (or a fort near it?) is called by some Arabic sources (et)-Ṭīneh (i.e., piece of clay, lump of mud); but this seems to be only a translation of the Greek name or a popular etymology of Pelusium which also Strabo (803) derives from the muddy surroundings.[2] At any rate, a comparison of the words Sin or the Aramaic sᵉyān with Arabic ṭīn is inadmissible for the Semitist. Pelusium, besides, does not seem to have had any importance before Greek times; Herodotus (2 141, etc.) knows it as the entrance to Egypt, and in this capacity it appears in many Greek writers; but no hieroglyphic name for it has been found so far, and it is not unlikely that cities more to the East (see above on Amet-Nebīsheh) had formerly the strategic position of Pelusium. According to Strabo (803), Pelusium was 20 m. distant from the sea; in his time it was much decayed, although later it was still the seat of a Coptic bishop. The Coptic name was ⲡⲉⲣⲉⲙⲟⲩⲛ, Arabic Far(a)ma. The easternmost branch of the Nile was known as the Pelusiac; the Pelusiac mouth is now dried up completely, and the insignificant ruins of the ancient city are situated in the desert.[3]

It will be seen, therefore, that the popular identification with Pelusium rests on very feeble grounds. Jerome (see above) was most likely guided by the Aramaic etymology given in his time to the old name by Jewish scholars. It seems quite plausible that Ezekiel's Sin was a fortress similar to (perhaps not very far from) Pelusium, but of a somewhat ephemeral importance. In the critical sixth century B.C., fortifications and garrisons along the entrance to Egypt between the sea and the modern Ballāḥ-lakes seem to have changed considerably, and even before the great revolution caused by the Persian conquest in 525 B.C., the withdrawal of the large garrison to a better location may have reduced a populous city to the position of an obscure village. This must have been the case with Ezekiel's Sin, as 𝔊 could no longer identify it.[1] W. M. M.

Sinai is the usual name for the mountain where, according to one tradition, Yahwè had his seat and where, accordingly, Moses received the divine commands. Sinai is, therefore, the mountain of the giving of the law.

Even the most superficial observation does not fail to note that the mountain where Yahwè dwells has also another name—Horeb. In pre-critical days the explanation offered and accepted was either that Horeb was the name of the whole range and Sinai that of the individual mountain, or, alternatively, that Horeb designated the northern part of the range and Sinai the southern, and more especially the highest point of this. Criticism shows that the various sources can be sharply distinguished. (a) Horeb is the name of the mountain where Yahwè has his seat in E (the principal passage is Ex. 3 1; next come 17 6, where it occurs in a passage of the nature of a gloss, and 33 6. In the last cited passage, however, the words 'from Mt. Horeb'[2] are out of place, having been introduced into the text from the margin; it properly belongs to the E section 33 7-11, and more particularly to v. 9: 'when Moses entered into the tent the pillar of cloud descended from Mount Horeb and stood at the door of the tent'). In this as elsewhere E is followed by D, and the mountain is called Horeb throughout in Dt. (1 6 4 10 etc.) except in the older non-deuteronomic song (33 2), the opening portion of which is a counterpart to the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5 3 ff., cp Ps. 68). (b) On the other hand the mountain of Yahwè is called Sinai—generally Mt. Sinai (הר סיני)—in J (Ex. 19 11 34 4) and P (Ex. 16 1 24 16 34 28 32 Lev. 25 1 26 46 27 34). A 'wilderness of Sinai' (מדבר סיני) is spoken of only in P (Ex. 19 1 f. Lev. 7 38 Nu. 1 1 19 9 1). This is in agreement with the fact that Sinai came to be the more usual name, the later form of the tradition having as usual gained the upper hand.

1. The two names.

We have no information from the older times regarding the Sinaitic Peninsula and the adjacent parts (see below), and it is, therefore, impossible to speak with any definiteness as to the relative frequency of the two names or their connotations. On the other hand, we are able to arrive at a quite clear perception of the idea that was connected with their use in the circle of legend and of the facts which caused the change of usage.

In the thought of the ancient East every land that can be looked upon as a geographical or political unity —and so also 'the promised land'—is regarded as a reflected image of the earth and of the cosmos (KAT(3) 176); the points which fix the limits of the earth as a whole must, therefore, reappear also in the lesser cosmos, the country, and once more, again, in the district. It is precisely by this that the land is shown to be a natural unity—i.e., a unity determined and ordained by God. According as a twofold or a fourfold division is adopted, the earth is defined by two or four points: E. and W., or N. and S., or else E., S., W., and N. So also the year and the day are divided into two halves or four quarters in accordance with the corresponding points in the course of the sun. Any one of these two or four points can be taken as the beginning of the year or of the course of the sun; the year can begin in spring as in Babylon, or in winter as with us (following Egyptian-Roman reckoning), in autumn as in the time before the rise of Babylon (end of the third millenium B.C.) in Hither Asia, and, therefore, with the Canaanites and the Israelites; lastly, in summer. The beginning selected corresponds with the nature of the divinity who is principally worshipped. Because Marduk is the god of spring the year is held to begin with spring, and because in the W. the western (i.e., the autumn) god prevails, an autumn new year prevails in western lands, including Canaan, as long as there is independence.

2. Cosmological theory expounded.

In this connection between the year—i.e., the course of the sun—and geographical conceptions we can already discern the essential character of all oriental religion and science, which is to regard all that is and all that happens as flowing from the activity of the deity. But the deity reveals himself primarily and before aught else in the heavenly bodies and their motions; for the deities of Babylon and of all Hither Asia—as the OT itself abundantly shows—without exception bear an astral character.[1] The heavenly bodies which most plainly reflect the deity in its working, in other words the most conspicuous forms of the divine manifestation, or, in ordinary language, the gods principally worshipped are the moon, the sun, and the five planets. Their periods of revolution mark the divisions of time—month, year, and larger cycles—and compel attention by their importance for the course of natural life (Gen. 1 14 8 22). In the Babylonian view of these seven great divinities the planet Venus is associated with the moon and the sun, so that the three together become rulers of the Zodiac (the šupuk šamê—i.e., the highway of heaven, along which the seven travel). 'He (Bel) appointed Sin, Samaš, and Ištar to rule in the Zodiac.' These three have each of them four quarter or two half phases; for Venus, as an inner planet, shows the same phases as the moon, and the positions of the sun in the two or four seasons of the year are reckoned also as phases. The four remaining planets represent each one phase (one quarter) of the greater stars; thus Jupiter (Marduk) = the spring-sun, Mars (Ninib) = the summer sun, Mercury (Nabu) = the harvest sun, and Saturn (Nergal) = the winter sun.

To each of these four planets accordingly belongs one of the four points which regulate the sun's course and thus the universal order. When the division is by two, Mars and Saturn are eliminated; the reckoning in that case is by the two solar phases from equinox to equinox (spring to autumn, or autumn to spring). The sun, [1] 𝔊's reading Saïs (*סי) for סין would furnish a good emendation, but is forbidden by the place being described as a fortress.

[2] מֵהַר חוֹרֵב. There is nothing in the Hebrew corresponding to RV's 'onward.'

[1] For what follows cp Wi. AOF 3 185 ff., and in Der alte Orient, 3, parts 2 and 3.

moreover, is regarded as the god of the underworld, for the stars as they approach the sun become invisible, in other words, have their abode in the underworld. Now, this 'underworld' aspect of the sun corresponds to Saturn (Nergal), the winter sun or the god of the underworld (Pluto). To the moon accordingly (since the full moon is in opposition to the sun) belongs the opposite pole of the universe and the opposite planet Mars (Ninib), which represents the summer sun. By a complete reversal of all our modern notions, the sun is the deity of winter or the underworld, the moon the deity of summer and the upper world.

Now when the sun takes up the position which properly belongs to it in the universe, that is, when it is a winter sun, it is at the most southerly point of its course in the zodiac; and the corresponding full moon being in opposition is at the most northerly point. In other words, the sun is at the Saturn-sun point, the S. pole of the ecliptic, the moon at the Mars-moon point, the N. pole of the ecliptic.

The course of nature shows a similar cycle; day is succeeded by night, summer by winter, and in the larger periods of time, the æon, a similar procession is repeated. Everything that happens is divine ordering, the godhead is constantly manifesting itself anew in changed attitudes and changed activities. Thus Marduk becomes Nabu in autumn, and conversely. The same holds good of the N. and S. phase (summer and winter) of the sun or of the godhead in general; they pass each into its opposite. Further, the four (or two) quarters of the world present themselves in various aspects according to the character of the worship exercised at each given place, and according to the different methods of reckoning there employed. The Babylonian view, with the Marduk (or spring-) cult, takes as its point of orientation (Mohammedan ḳibla) the E. (=that which is before, קדם), and thus for it the N. is to the left, the S. to the right, and the W. behind. To the older view, which faces westward, the N. is to the right and the S. to the left. Thus arises for a later time the possibility of an interchange of diametrically opposite points, according to the point of view assumed by each writer in his theory. Hence the phenomenon constantly observed in all forms of mythology, and therefore also of cosmology, that opposites pass into one another, that a given form bears also the marks of its antithesis.

The selection of the two names, Horeb and Sinai, and their cosmological meaning thus become clear. As soon as scholars discovered the importance of the moon worship in ancient Babylonia, and the name of the moon-goddess Sin, the explanation of the name Sinai as Mountain of the Moon became natural. Proof, indeed, for this explanation of the word can be had only when the significance of this mountain in the cosmic scheme as a whole has been made out; but this is accomplished precisely by means of the other name of the mountain of Yahwè—Horeb.

3. Bearing on Horeb and Sinai.

The earth—and so also on a smaller scale each land and each separate district—is imagined as a mountain with two summits,[1] the 'mountain of the countries' of the Babylonians and Assyrians (šad mâtâte, ursag kurkurra). According to the orientation in each case (and as regulated by this the time at which the year was held to begin, and so forth) these two points are conceived of as E. and W. (equinoctial), or as N. and S. (solstitial). The E. (or N.) point is that of the light half of the day or year, the W. (or S.) that of the dark half. For when the sun is in the E. the day (or the year) begins, when it is at the northern point of its path it is midday or midsummer, and so on. This is the thought which lies at the bottom of the religious observances on Ebal and Gerizim[2] (Dt. 11 29 27 11 ff. Josh. 8 30 ff.); Gerizim is the mount of blessing, Ebal that of cursing, that is, of the light and dark halves respectively, of good and evil omen (right and left are the lucky or unlucky sides according to the orientation); on each mountain stand six tribes, for each half of the year has six signs of the zodiac or six months.[1]

When the two summits of the šad mâtâte are the N. and S. points of the cosmos they belong respectively to the moon and to the sun. If Sinai takes its name from the moon-goddess Sin, Horeb is derived from the sun, for the name means Mountain of Glowing, Heat (חרב and חורב), the sun at the most northerly part of its course (our sign of cancer, summer-solstice) is the glowing sun. Thus Sinai and Horeb both express like cosmological conceptions.

Making the moon point the most northerly of the ecliptic belongs to the old Babylonian order of ideas, according to which the moon stands at the head of the pantheon and the sun is regarded as god of the underworld. The opposite is also equally admissible, the moon being regarded as the star of the night and the sun as the power that quickens nature, as the star of the upper world, and as supreme deity. In this last interpretation, and, indeed, as the sole expression of the godhead, Chuen-aten (Amen-ḥotep IV., see EGYPT, § 56) sought to carry out a monotheistic worship of the sun. This would be of importance if it were held proven that it is Chuen-aten that is intended by the Pharaoh of Joseph.[2] It would seem, in any case, as if a like view underlay the designation of Sinai (as of Horeb), for the mountain upon which Yahwè reveals himself lies on the S. of the promised land. If, now, Yahwè has his dwelling on the moon-mountain situated in the S., clearly the underlying cosmic orientation is the Egyptian one which regards the S. as being above (corresponding to the course of the Nile), whilst the Babylonians had the conception (corresponding also to the course of the Euphrates) according to which it is the N. that is above —the N. pole of the cosmos, as also of the ecliptic (this last the moon-point). For the highest godhead dwells above on the summit of the šad mâtâte. To it, therefore, belongs the highest part of the ecliptic (the path of the sun) as of the sky; the portion which lies to the N. of the zodiac and thus around the N. pole. The Egyptian view presupposes the opposite conception, and, therefore, looks for all these things in the S.

4. Babylon and Egypt.

The assumption, accordingly, which should look for the seat of the highest godhead in the S. of the country, would rest more upon Egyptian conceptions, though at the same time for the present we must hold fast that the Egyptian doctrine and the Babylonian alike are daughters of a common view of the universe, and that their relation to this is somewhat the same as that of the political doctrine of two modern European civilised states to European culture and conception of the universe; diverse in details, the views of the two are on the whole identical. It is in agreement with this that the rise of the nation of Israel is carried back by legend to Egypt; and that the region where the nation found its god—i.e., the expression of its political unification and its political-religious right to an independent existence as a people, in other words, to sovereignty—was still known to legend as Muṣri (see MIZRAIM, MOSES). Egypt and Muṣri alike are also in the Babylonian con-

[1] Cp Hommel, Aufsätze u. Abhandlungen, 344 ff.; Winckler in MVG, 1901, 241, 283.

[2] Both are brought into connection with the goddess worshipped at Shechem, who is identical with Tammuz—i.e., the god of the two halves of the year. Joseph and Joshua are the corresponding heroic figures: Wi. GI 2 75 ff. 96 ff. Joseph is mentioned principally in connection with Shechem, Joshua's life-work culminates in Shechem (Josh. 24). For Joshua the attainment of Shechem is what the arrival at Mt. Nebo was for Moses; Marduk (Moses) dies when the sun reaches the western point where the kingdom of Nabu (winter half of the year) begins.

[1] The number twelve always symbolises the twelve signs of the zodiac.

[2] The deduction would be that the doctrine of Yahwism consciously links itself on to this monotheism as its predecessor: see KAT(3) 211.

SINAI AND HOREB

ception the land of the sun, representing as they do the S. so far as the earth is concerned; but the S. of the sky is the celestial underworld where the sun has his place during winter, and thus in the Babylonian conception in the case of a revelation of the deity in Muṣri a reference to the Egyptian doctrine of the sun is presupposed.

5. Muṣri. Fresh light would certainly be shed on this side of the question should we ever come into possession of fuller information as to the state of civilisation and the religious and political conditions of the region in question (Muṣri) in early times. In the present state of our knowledge all that can be affirmed is that, the higher the antiquity we reach, the higher also the civilisation so far as the ancient orient is concerned. The Amarna period—that which comes under consideration in the present discussion—already seems to presuppose a retrogression so far as Palestine is concerned, and this would imply like conditions for the S. also. It is quite a mistake to picture to oneself the Sinaitic peninsula and the adjoining parts of Arabia as having then been under the same conditions as prevail to-day. We already know enough to justify us in affirming that these parts in ancient times were not wholly given up to nomads, and that the country possessed ordered institutions and seats of advanced civilisation. The Nabatæan state about the time of the Christian era, and that of the Ghassanids at a later period had their earlier predecessors (see KAT$^{(3)}$ 136 ff.). All of them were states in touch with the civilisation of their respective periods—pre-eminently with that of Egypt and Assyria-Babylonia—just as much as that Nabatæan kingdom with which we are in some measure acquainted through the monuments that have come down to our day and through the notices in classical authors. It is by no means impossible that we may yet come into possession of monumental evidence with regard to the region of ancient Muṣri dating from times which we at present ordinarily think of as completely without either history or civilisation. This, at least, is even already clear, that long before the period assumed for the sojourn of the Israelites oriental civilisation had been at work in these parts in a higher degree than was at a later date shown by Islam.[1]

6. Minæans and Sabæans. Above all, it has to be pointed out that we are in no position to decide definitely as to the state of civilisation of those regions during the times in question, as long as the countless records of S. Arabia, the inscriptions of the Minæans and the Sabæans, have not been made accessible and investigated. The commercial states of S. Arabia exercised political ascendency also in these regions at the time when they flourished; they extended their civilising influence as far as to the havens of the Philistines and the gates of Damascus,[2] and even left behind them in those parts a civilisation that can be directly traced to them.[3] Very specially it is from the Minæan-Sabæan inscriptions that, after what the cuneiform inscriptions and Egyptian documents have yielded or may yet yield, we may hope for glimpses alike into the political relations of the Sinaitic peninsula and adjacent regions, and still more into their civilisation—in other words into the spiritual development of the peoples and times by which the occurrences of the period of Israel's sojourn in Sinai were determined. It is chiefly on these inscriptions that we must depend for any knowledge as to the civilisation and manner of thinking—the 'genius' (geist, génie)—of the Semitic peoples in that quarter, where they received their purest development, and from which, in a certain sense, the tribes of Israel also took their origin (KAT$^{(3)}$ 8).

1 Against the notion of Arabia and the 'Arabian spirit' as being the sole basis of 'Semitism' see Winckler, 'Arabisch-Semitisch-Orientalisch' in MVG, 1901, 4-5.

2 The 'Harra' inscriptions are in an alphabet which shows a prevailingly S. Arabian influence.

3 Cp the 'Liḥyān' inscriptions (ed. D. H. Müller, Epigraphische Denkmäler aus Arabien, 1889).

All that we as yet have come to know in the way of actual historical fact regarding the Sinaitic peninsula and adjacent regions, is still in the highest degree inadequate. The oldest monuments are the Egyptian inscriptions in Wādy Maghāra and those of Ṣarbūṭ el-Khādem (EGYPT, § 45). The Pharaohs designate the people whom they have subjugated there by the name of Mentu. The still extant mines show how it was that the much prized mafkat (malachite, or 'kupfergrün') was obtained. The oldest known Pharaohs exploited the country for this: Snefre (first king of the Fourth Dynasty), Chufu (Cheops, the builder of the Great Pyramid), various kings of the Fifth and the Sixth Dynasty, Usertesen II. and Amenemḥe't of the twelfth; the last whose name is recorded in any inscription is Rameses II.

7. Magan and Meluḫa. Babylonian references can be adduced only in a general way in so far as already in the earliest times we have evidence of a lively commerce between Babylonia and the whole of Arabia; the information in our possession does not enable us to go into details. The Babylonian designation for Arabia is 'Magan and Meluḫa' and the two expressions are used distinctively, the one (Magan) to denote the eastern and southern part—that situated nearest to Babylonia, the other (Meluḫa) to denote the N. and W. The district of Sinai would thus form part of Meluḫa. It need hardly be said that in the many centuries of Babylonian-Assyrian history the relations with the two countries waxed and waned in importance with the fluctuations in political power and in the developments of trade; so also did the degree of knowledge regarding the regions of which we are speaking vary and the connotation of the names grow or shrink. Thus at certain times what was spoken of as Meluḫa will have been not much more than the northern fringe and the road to Egypt. The derivation of the name of the characteristic product of the Sinaitic peninsula—malachite—from Meluḫa seems obvious.

The ideas of antiquity as to the form of the earth are very far removed from the actual facts. Thus it is an essential element in the Babylonian conception that the whole of the southern part of the earth is regarded as a continuous territory stretching from utmost Nubia (Ethiopia) through South Arabia to India. The Red Sea and the Persian Gulf have nothing like their true importance assigned to them. Thus if 'Magan and Meluḫa' in the widest sense covers the whole of what lies to the S. we must include in Magan India and in Meluḫa Ethiopia (KAT$^{(3)}$ 137). This will explain how it is that Cush, the name of the upper valley of the Nile—thus the land to the S. of Muṣri = Egypt—designates also those lands which in Arabia are situated to the S. of Muṣri.

It is often possible, therefore, in cases where there are no special indications to guide us, for us to be in doubt as to what special regions ought to be understood by the names Magan, Meluḫa, Kuš, Muṣri—precisely as we are when we hear 'America' or 'Africa' vaguely mentioned. It is thus beyond our power to determine with precision whence it was that Gudea prince of Lagaš derived the material for his buildings which was brought (we are told) from 'Magan' and from 'Meluḫa.' We cannot be sure whether the usual opinion, which takes Sinai with its malachite to be meant by Meluḫa as the mountain of the samtu stone (II. R. 51 a b 17), is correct, for we are not in a position to say what the samtu stone really is.

8. Amarna period. The Amarna Letters seem to show that, essentially, the Egyptian sovereignty did not extend beyond the borders of southern Palestine. This is in agreement with the supposition that it was precisely in these times that the newly immigrating tribes of the 'Hebrews' from North Arabia, to which also the Israelites belonged, pressed forward into the regions of civilisation. We may take it, accordingly, that this period was marked by a retrogression from the prosperity of a somewhat earlier time. It is impossible to tell with any certainty who were the 'Meluḫa-people' whom Rib-Addi, prince of Gebal, summoned to his aid along with the Egyptians; it is, however, likely, in the known circumstances, that the Egyptian troops did not consist in the main of bands of Bedouins from Sinai and Midian; more probably Nubians are intended.

9. Ma'īn. With the single exception of the inscription of Rameses II. in Wādi Maghāra we have no information from these times relating to the regions at present under consideration; but this is precisely the period which covers the time of Israel's sojourn in Sinai. It is what usually and naturally happens; of times during which great states have not dominated the border lands we hear nothing. So far as our present light carries us, however, it would seem that to this period also belongs the development of the power of the S. Arabian kingdom of Ma'īn (Minæans). For this kingdom was annihilated sometime in the eighth or seventh century B.C., and its beginnings must therefore be carried back at least as far as to the thirteenth century.[1] A period of weakness in the great civilised states has also always been favourable to the rise of petty states and to the development of separate kingdoms on the borders of the region of civilisation; and a period of prosperity in the trading states of S. Arabia so far as we are able to trace their history also occurred precisely at such a time. We may venture, therefore, to hope some time or other to obtain some information regarding the regions of Sinai from the inscriptions of the Minæans just as we are indebted to a Minæan inscription of about the ninth century for an illustration of the conditions prevailing on the S. Palestinian borders (Halévy, 535 = Glaser, 1155).[2] We must, accordingly, figure to ourselves the Minæan rule in those parts as having been after the manner of that of the Nabatæans. Just as these bore rule in the Sinaitic peninsula and left settlements and inscriptions behind them, so we may be certain that the rule of the Minæans had a determining influence on the civilisation and therefore also on the religion of those parts. As the Minæan rule in el-'Ula in N. Arabia has left its traces in numerous inscriptions, so we must suppose Minæan settlements to have existed all along the caravan routes to Palestine and to Egypt.

We must conceive of the relations between the regions of Sinai and S. Arabia in those days, then, somewhat after the analogy supplied by Islam; they were not a mere El Dorado of Bedouin tribes who had remained stationary in some primitive phase of development and had remained wholly untouched by the civilisation of the orient and its knowledge (which is identical with its religion). Of course we are to believe that Bedouin tribes also did live there, and these were doubtless not genuine representatives of old oriental civilisation exactly as the peasant of to-day does not represent modern science and philosophy; but they were just as far from remaining untouched by it as any section of a population can be from remaining altogether outside of the influences of an enveloping civilisation. And the higher the oldest civilisation, the more lasting must have been its effect upon all sections of the population. True, the Bedouin is never anything but a bad Moslem; still he is one; his religious and other conceptions are influenced by Islam, and if anywhere among the Bedouins of Arabia any intellectual or political movement, any impulse towards higher forms of development arises, it must in these days associate itself with Islam, just as in those days any similar movement was inevitably associated with the doctrines which then dominated the East and Arabia with it.

10. Hebrew tradition. Tradition itself brings this out very clearly in so far as it has not been artificially shaped with the design of representing the nation of Israel as a purely religious community, but still proceeds upon the ordinary presuppositions as to the national conditions of national life; the older tradition does so. To the sphere of Muṣri belongs the region of Midian and this last comes within the sphere of influence of the S. Arabian states. The Elohist[1] here also exhibits the original and natural view. He presupposes that Israel was heathen before Moses[2] and that Yahwè first revealed himself to Moses during his sojourn at Horeb before the Exodus (Ex. 3 9-14). In E JETHRO the father-in-law of Moses—whom, however, the author never calls priest of Midian[3]—still appears quite clearly in a rôle which connects him with the worship of the god of the place—the Yahwè of Horeb (Ex. 18). When the Yahwist proceeds to make him priest of Midian he is giving true expression to the dependence of Mosaism on the civilisation prevailing there (writing of course from the standpoint of his own time—the eighth century—when Muṣri actually was a state; see KAT(3)) although in turn he suppresses the old representation, made by the Elohist, of a connection between Yahwè and the older culture of these regions in favour of a more spiritualised doctrine thrown into stronger contrast with the ancient religions.

11. Value of traditions. Every historical delineation, however, can only depict past conditions in terms of the conceptions of the historian's own time. Our oldest source can indeed conceive and set forth the subjects it deals with in the lively colours of its own age; but the question as to the value of the historical contents of its narrative is to be carefully distinguished from that as to the correctness of its apprehension and representation of the milieu. The historical value of the accounts themselves is to be judged of solely by the antiquity of the date—i.e., by the possibility of a genuine historical tradition. The date at which the sources E and J were finally fixed in writing is to be sought somewhere in the eighth century; how far these in turn rest on written authorities—the only ones possessing historical validity—we do not know; but in no case can they be supposed to go so far back as to the days before the monarchy. An oral or popular tradition about earlier times possesses no direct historical value; no people preserves definite recollections of its career going more than two or three generations back. What any Israelitic or Judahite source hands down to us from the tradition of its own people must always be judged therefore by reference to the possibility of historical—i.e., written—sources having been used (KAT(3) 204 ff.). What does not rest upon these possesses no other value than that of the purely theoretical doctrine of an ancient writer upon a subject of which he knew nothing. And such theories are of course of less value, not more, than those of modern science.

A Judahite-Israelite historical tradition in the sense just indicated is excluded for the times of the sojourn in Sinai; even were we to regard these as historical we could not carry the tradition back to the Sinaitic time. On the other hand, in the present case, as with the whole body of tradition relating to the patriarchal period

[3] Whether his name was Jethro in E, or whether he was not rather called Hobab the Kenite may be left an open question. On Hobab see Nu. 10 29 Judg. 1 16 4 11. For our present inquiry it is indifferent which name belongs to E and which to J. The view which speaks of him as a Kenite appears to be the older and in that case would belong to E. This, however, would imply that Horeb was thought of as being not in the Sinaitic peninsula but much nearer the Israelite territory, in the region of the tribe of Kain (cp § 15).

SINAI AND HOREB

(KAT(3) as above), we have always to apply the distinction drawn between 'nation' in the ethnological sense and the same word in its kulturgeschichtlich and therefore also its religious sense. In the view of antiquity and therefore of Judah there was no such distinction, and hitherto the tradition has always been followed. The nation is alone the bearer of religion, of truth, of civilisation, and thus of the right that alone is divine, and all tradition as all thought is valid for this people alone, alongside of which no others possess any right in any truth. In reality every nation, like every individual, belongs to the world around it in all its ideas and in the treasures of its material and spiritual possessions. The nation of Israel is therefore in an ethnological sense to be distinguished from that spiritual movement—or religion—of which it is represented by tradition as having been the bearer, but in which in its purity neither a complete nor an exclusive part can be claimed by the nation as an ethnological whole. The religious idea in its purity was grasped only by the spiritual leaders in Israel, and these, as we now know, and as indeed is in itself self-evident and in accordance with the nature of things, stood in spiritual connection with those of the great civilised nations. It is therefore possible that for the Sinai-period, as well as for the rest of the body of patriarchal legend, the historical tradition at bottom has a connection with older extraneous sources, a connection, the object of which is to set forth the relations between the religion of Yahwè in its principles and the religious and spiritual movements of the leading lands of civilisation: Abraham comes from Babylon; Joseph goes to Egypt; the revelation of religion, the close of the development, takes place in the region of a third civilisation, and is brought into clearly expressed connection therewith in the oldest tradition by means of the figure of Jethro. Thus for the special question as to how we are to picture to ourselves the life of the tribes of Israel before the immigration we are again led back to investigation of the history of the oldest Arabian civilisation.

12. Oldest Arabian civilisation.

Whether we may venture to hope for a satisfactory answer to this question, whether we shall ever find in that quarter the definite starting-point for those movements of a combined religious and political nature which are presupposed in the figure and the activity of a Moses, may perhaps seem doubtful when it is considered how far we still are even in the case of the Babylonians, notwithstanding the much greater fulness of the information we actually possess or may still hope for, from having reached any indication as to the historical facts of which perhaps tradition is taking account in what it hands down to us respecting Abraham and Jacob. Possibly we are somewhat better off in the case of Joseph (see JOSEPH, col. 2591).

Thus, for any conception as to the general lie of things, the conditions under which this great movement (to assume its historicity) may possibly have been brought about, we must be content to fall back upon historical parallels; and these are very numerous. The first rise of Islam, and many of the religious political movements within Islam, enable us to form a conception of the manner in which also the national unification of Israel must have come about. The nation must have a god, and therefore also a worship; in this manner only does it come to possess a claim to an independent existence as a political unity. The law according to which it lives and without which a nation cannot exist is in all oriental antiquity revealed by God and in every case rests upon (divinely imparted) knowledge. All knowledge and all law is thus of divine origin,—is religion. Hence political movements generally assume a prevailingly religious character, the secular demands being based upon divine right. So it was with Mohammed and many other prophets in Islam; so also in our own Middle Ages down to the Reformation.

13. The Moses story.

The activity of Moses—or, if you will, the political developments which form the groundwork of the Moses legend—must be regarded as having been a movement of this sort. The Sinai-period would in that case represent in some sense the crowning of the work, the giving of the charter, in a word the political organisation of the movement. As such it is represented even in the legend, and there can be no doubt about the matter. For the theophany, etc., see MOSES, § 13.

The attempt at a historical criticism of the Exodus legend and its culminating point the legislation at Sinai, proceeds on the assumption that the Bedouin manner of life with its forms of organisation must supply also the key to any historical contents this episode may have as also to those of the whole legend of the early history of Israel. The 'Semitic peoples' are regarded as 'nomads' who develop their distinctive views and so also their religion from the midst of their primitive surroundings. The essence of their forms of organisation is held to find its clearest expression in the Arab Bedouin life as this is disclosed to us in Arabian poetry and in the tradition of Islam based upon this.

On this view the form of organisation that lies at the root of the Israelite national consciousness is the tribal. It is indisputable that this is the view presented also in the OT, and that Israel also in actual fact, exactly like other peoples of the East in a similar comparatively low stage of culture, is not unacquainted with this view and this form of organisation. This being so, the god who was to be the God of Israel, had of necessity to be the god of the leading tribe which laid hold on the hegemony, and thus made its tribal god into a national god in the same way as its chief or sheik raised himself to the position of king of the nation. Stade (GVI 1 131) supposes Kain to have been such a tribe, because the father-in-law of Moses (see above) the priest is brought into connection with Kain. Carrying this further, we should then have to suppose that the sanctuary of the god, and thus the tribal centre of worship, must be thought of as being at the place which the corresponding legend thinks of as Sinai (Wi. GI 1 29 ff.).

This, however, would give only the one side of the legend, that which corresponds to the ethnological character of the entire conception, and looks upon the nation of Israel through the eyes of antiquity. All that follows from this is that in Judah-Israel, that is to say in the historical period or period of the monarchy, a tribe, royal house, and worship was in the ascendant which traced its home to the Sinai-region. The religious or kulturgeschichtlich side of the question will have to be kept quite separate. Whence did the worship, which is that of the nation of Israel in the kulturgeschichtlich sense, receive its real contents, its doctrine? Legend answers the question with the word revelation; but if the matter is looked at from the historical and genetic point of view, it is necessary to assume a doctrine which had grown up on the soil of the ancient civilisations. For it is peoples of civilisation, not nomads and peasants, that develop new and higher ideas in the struggle with those of a lower and now no longer sufficient view of the world—Religion, i.e., ethic and law.

14. Sinai-Horeb variously placed.

The question which arises out of the possibility that Sinai or Horeb had been the centre of worship of a clan or tribe that had the predominance in Judah-Israel leads us to consideration of the position of this mountain. For even though we are able to prove that cosmological ideas are here involved, many analogous phenomena show that the localities so viewed need not necessarily be pure figments of theory, that, on the contrary, a localisation of these theoretical ideas is the general rule. As is usually the case, however, so also in the present instance, a comparison of the different sources shows that relative objects of worship, or the earthly copies of heavenly places, are located by the various sources or traditions in very diverse situations. This holds good of the mountain upon which Yahwè dwells, exactly as it holds good of any other seat of deity. Every nation, or every tribe, must necessarily point to it within its own domain; but, as in every nation and state various strata of culture and population are represented, and in the course of time also various doctrines arise, so, in like manner, different localisations can be handed down in the various strata of the tradition. A classical example of this is presented by Mts. Ebal and Gerizim (see above, § 3). The tradition (J) which places them beside Shechem has held its ground victoriously. In their cosmic meaning, however, as the two summits of the Mountain of the World, they can be shown to have been held in reverence also in other seats of worship, in the territory of other gods as well as at Shechem (Ephraim). So, for example, in the domain of worship of the once more extensive tribe (Winckler, GI 2) of Benjamin, in the region of Bethel. This is the meaning of the gloss in Dt. 11 30 (cp GERIZIM, § 2): they are situated near the Gilgal, the political centre of Benjamin which stands in connection with the sanctuary of Bethel. Ebal and Gerizim are other names for Jachin and Boaz in so far as these stand for definite cosmological ideas (N. and S., or E. and W. point) precisely as Sinai and Horeb do. Thus no difficulty ought to be felt if the mountain of Yahwè also is placed in various localities.

15. Pre-exilic. The view which brings it into connection with the Kenite tribe and which we must regard as the oldest, doubtless has in mind not the Sinaitic peninsula, but the region to the S. of Judah, that is to say Edom. This still finds clear expression in the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5 4): 'Yahwè, when thou goest forth from Se'ir and comest down from the mountain (שׂרה = Ass. šadû; see FIELD, 1) of Edom'; similarly also in Dt. 33 2[1] (see PARAN, and cp We. Prol.(3) 359, and Di. ad loc.). In like manner 1 K. 19 8 originally placed Horeb (thus belonging to E, the oldest source on which Dt. rests) in the region of Edom, that is, of Ken, for Elijah cannot have undertaken any remote desert journey when he is already at the point of fainting at the close of a single day.[2] The forty days were first introduced in order to establish a parallelism with the Moses-legend.[3] The words of the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5 5) indicate that even the tradition which used the name Sinai was influenced by the same view with regard to its situation. This would go to show that the Yahwistic tradition also—for Dt. follows E (cp. § 1)—looked at matters in the same light. J and E, however, comprise the whole tradition which comes from the times of Judah's national existence. This would be in entire agreement with all that we have to presuppose for a period, the conceptions of which must have confined themselves within the limits of the actual and possible.

16. Post-exilic. The free play of fancy, as well as the enlargement of the claims of Judah to territory outside of its proper limits, could first come to their rights only after the nation had been torn away from its native soil, when Judah had come to be no longer a nation but only a religious community, the sphere of whose activity was limited only by the bounds of the civilisation of Hither Asia.

The writing which arose out of such ideas as these is what is now known as P; we could, almost, therefore, have guessed beforehand that the transference of the cosmic idea of Sinai as the seat of Yahwè to the Sinaitic peninsula proceeds from this source or from the view upon which this source is based. It finally became the basis for a conception of Israel—of its proper significance and of its past—which could never have arisen in the times in which Judah had a national existence. All those alterations and transpositions of geographical ideas which extend Israel's power far beyond its historical frontiers[1] are post-exilic. With this it would agree that the list of stages, the precise itinerary of Israel's journey to Sinai and from Sinai to Canaan, is peculiar to P.

The localisation of the Mt. of God in the Sinai peninsula must thus at the earliest belong to a late—that is, post-exilic—date. Thus we cannot assign to it a historical value, nor can it prove anything for the knowledge of the older views of Israel, or of the religious and cosmographical conceptions of Judah before the exile. For the intellectual contents of the Judaism codified by P, however, the inquiry as to the site assumed for the mountain by P would be unimportant; the essential thing to notice is that it has been transferred from regions which the national consciousness had regarded as adjoining (in the S.) to regions more remote.

Yet in this case we must also leave it open as a possibility that the transposition was not made in a wholly arbitrary manner. The old orientals knew their world, and even the waste mountain massif of Sinai was not for them a mere land of fairy tales in which all things are possible. Just as little as the localisation of Ebal and Gerizim beside Shechem or beside the Gilgal (Bethel) was possible without some definite point of attachment in the adjacent cults, would it have been possible for the mountain of Yahwè to be transferred to the Sinaitic peninsula without a similar reference.

On this point, also, history fails us as well as the data of archæology; we possess no fact from the older time which would enable us to prove the existence of a centre of worship in the peninsula of Sinai. About this time, in all likelihood, Ḳedar (KAT(3)) ruled in the then Muṣri and Meluḫa as predecessors of the Nabatæans. In view of the likeness of all oriental worships in their fundamental thought, it is very easily possible that in pre-Christian times also the same spots which Judaism pointed to as its Sinai, and Christianity afterwards took over were already holy. What we can learn of the cults of those regions shows the same forms of worship and secret doctrine as Christianity has taken over from the ancient East. The worship of the morning-star (Lucifer—i.e., the 'Athtar of the southern Arabs) is to be supposed to have existed there from the earliest Minæan times, and all subsequent conquerors successively took it over in its essential features.

17. Early sacred places. 'Athtar, however, is, alike in substance and in form, essentially identical with the Marduk of Babylon. Marduk is the spring sun and the morning sun, which is also represented by the kindred body which is the morning star, according as the sun is regarded—as in Babylon—as a masculine divinity, and the morning planet Ištar as the feminine, or 'Athtar is regarded as masculine and the sun as feminine—as with the Arabs (see KAT(3)). The worship of the morning star is borne witness to by St. Nilus about 400 A.D. as being that of the Saracens of the Sinaitic peninsula, and the Nabatæan Dušara merely gave to the primeval deity a Nabatæan name. The mystic doctrines of his worship are exactly the same as those of the vernal god at all his seats and the same as were taken over by Christianity. Thus Isidore

1 The conception of Aram as Damascus, of 'eber ha-nahar as Syria, and so forth. See Wi. GI 2.

Characenus (see Hesychius, s.v. Δουσαρης) knows him as 'Dionysus,' that is, the son of the virgin Semele, who as summer and winter deity is the Tammuz of the Canaanites—i.e., the Marduk (and Nebo) of the Babylonians, the Horus of the Egyptians (MVG, 1901, p. 278). This is not, as might perhaps be thought, a copying of Christian doctrine; on the contrary, both alike spring from the same root, the primeval oriental one. So too, we hear in the regions of the Sinai peninsula down to the time of Mohammed, at Elusa (= Ḥalaṣa) of the worship of the alone God who is worshipped as dhu-'l-ḥalaṣa and whose designation ultimately means, as indicated, the only God.[1] Here, also, the assumption of 'Christian influence' is merely a distortion of the question; we are dealing with ancient oriental doctrines and seats of worship which, with new masters, changed only their names, not their forms or the fundamental thoughts underlying them. If, accordingly, that writing and body of doctrine of Judaism which sets forth monotheism in its strictest and most abstract presentation, namely P, removed the seat of Yahwè to the peninsula of Sinai, it may very well have connected it with actual seats of worship which in their worship set forth doctrines similar to those of Elusa.

Thus arises, finally, the question as to the value to be attached to the identification of the mountain in the Sinaitic peninsula for which the claim is made that it was the mountain of revelation. If what has already been said be accepted, the only possible question is as to an identification of the doctrine of late exilic Judaism with localities that had already, at an earlier date, been rendered sacred by a worship that was analogous so far as outward form was concerned.

18. Serbāl and J. Mūsā.

By tradition two mountains have from the first been put forward, each as having been the mountain of revelation, and the question between them has continued under discussion down to the present day; these are Mt. Serbāl in the W. and Jebel Mūsā in the heart of the mountain massif of the peninsula.

If we are to attach any value to the tradition at all, then unquestionably Mt. Serbāl has most to be said in its favour. The oldest witnesses, from Eusebius down to Cosmas Indopleustes, testify to it, and the numerous lauras or monastic settlements show that the first centuries of Christianity paid honour to the holy sites in Serbāl and in Wādy Fīrân near the episcopal town of Pheirân situated there (which is mentioned by Ptolemy in the second century). Jebel Mūsā was first declared to be a holy place by Justinian (527-565), who there founded a church in honour of St. Mary the Virgin. There is no earlier tradition in its favour. On the other hand, the reasons are transparently clear why, from henceforth, the dignity thus conferred upon the new site should remain with it.

The monastic settlements on Serbāl were exposed to the attacks of the Saracens and were more than once devastated by them (so, for example, in 373 and again in 395 or 411, of which latter incident Ammonius and Nilus have given us accounts as eye-witnesses). Justinian supplied to his argument in favour of the sacred site the necessary support by erecting a fort also which gave the monks the protection they needed against the Bedouins, so that they gradually withdrew from Mt. Serbāl to the safer neighbourhood of Jebel Mūsā. The true reason for the abandonment of Serbāl and the transference of its associations elsewhere, however, is most likely to be sought in the fact that in the fifth century the monks of Pharan were threatened by the orthodox synods as Monothelete and Monophysite heretics. Justinian's measure was therefore dictated by policy and was simply a confirmation of the decisions of the councils.

Even if we choose to assume a connection of the post-exilic but pre-Justinian identification with the institutions of an older cultus, the sole witnesses that we have, the Nabatæan, testify decidedly for Serbāl.

[1] See MVG, 1901, p. 278, on the meaning of dhû'l-ḫalaṣa in the same sense as Mohammed's aḫlaṣ (Sur. 112). Elusa = Ḫalaṣa according to Tuch (cp WRS, Rel. Sem.(2)). On Ḫalaṣa see Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, 423 [also BERED, NEGEB, § 7, ZIKLAG].

SINAI AND HOREB

Many Sinaitic inscriptions,[1] which essentially contain merely the names of passing pilgrims and date from Nabatæan times onwards, are found in by far the greatest numbers in the Wādy Mokatteb (Valley of Inscriptions) of the Serbāl group; the Mūsā group comes far behind it in this. The inscriptions cannot, however, be regarded as the idle scribblings of passing trade caravans; without a doubt they are connected with the sanctity of the spot, and for the most part are the work of pilgrims.

If in these circumstances the question as to what mountain was thought of in later times is, in itself considered, one of little profit, we have the additional difficulty which stands in the way of the identification of the other sites which might be supposed to be made certain by the narrative of Exodus (Rephidim, etc.). It is doubtless true, indeed, that Judaism, like the ancient East in general, had a definite conception regarding the lands of which it spoke. If, accordingly, any one wanted to describe a definite route as that of the Exodus, he was quite able to do so. But the Exodus-legend, like all OT narratives, is full of mythological allusions, and in order to bring in these there is never any aversion to that arbitrariness which is so irreconcilable with our modern ideas of geographical fidelity. If Sinai was thought of as the earthly image of a definite cosmical idea then must also the legend—which also lay before P—indicate on the way to Sinai the corresponding phenomena of the heavenly path to the culminating point of the universe; but it may well be questioned whether, when this was being done in a representation so condensed and so excerpt-like as that of P, sufficient points of attachment would be given to render possible a comparison between the writer's representation and the actual geographical facts.

For the partisans of Jebel Mūsā there still remains the secondary question whether the actual Jebel Mūsā itself was the mountain of the giving of the law, or whether (so Robinson) this is not rather to be sought in the Rās eṣ-Ṣafṣâf, NW of Jebel Mūsā.

From the point of view of historical criticism the Sinai question has, in common with so many other questions of biblical archæology and geography, received but little attention. That the separate particulars regarding the occurrences and dates of the Sinai episode have but a limited attestation lies in the nature of the legends themselves, and in the form of their development. It is, however, upon an uncritical faith in these that all those researches and constructions rest, of which the most important are those of Lepsius (Reise von Theben nach der Halbinsel des Sinai), and the works of travel by Burckhardt, Rüppell, Fraas, Robinson, Palmer. The geographical details are presented clearly but uncritically in Ebers (Durch Gosen zum Sinai). As the Sinai-peninsula is pretty frequently visited by tourists, the handbooks also (see, e.g., Baed. Pal.,(5) 1901) give the needful particulars as to the topography of the region. An attempt to apply the principles of geographical and historical possibility to the explanation of the biblical narratives was made by Greene, The Hebrew Migration from Egypt (2 ed. London, 1883). The stay in Egypt is, as usual, taken to be historical, and then it is conclusively shown that a 40-years stay in the desert and the march through the Sinaitic peninsula are impossible, that therefore an exodus from Egypt to Palestine cannot have been achieved otherwise than by the ordinary caravan-route (Greene proves his point; only, the real historical impossibility lies rather in what he assumes: the stay in Egypt). Although he takes no account of variety of sources (cp § 10) Charles Beke (Discoveries of Sinai in Arabia and of Midian, London, 1878) is led so far by his sound sense on the right track in his attempts at identification as to find Sinai in the territory of Midian. Only, here too, all the data of the legend are treated as available for geographical definition.

The allegorical interpretation of Sinai as Hagar by Paul in Gal. 4 25 rests doubtless upon the same astrological and cosmological identifications as does the double name of the mountain.

19. Gal. 4 25.

For if there is also a play upon the name of Hagar, that in the writer's mind cannot be the Arab. ḥagar ('stone')—for this does not mean rock—but the

[1] The Sinaitic inscriptions are discussed by M. A. Levy in ZDMG 14 (1860), 363-480, after the copies of Lepsius in Denkmäler aus Ägypten u. Äthiopien, etc., 6 Blatt 14-21 (Inscriptions of Wâdy Mokatteb). The inscriptions have been collected by Euting, Sinaitische Inschriften, Berlin, 1891.

Arab. hagr, 'midday,' i.e., culmination point.[1] Thus it becomes synonymous with Horeb. The culmination point—i.e., the N. point of the ecliptic—corresponds, however, in the old cosmology to the N. point of the Universe (the N. pole), and this is represented upon earth by the terrestrial Jerusalem, of which the heavenly antitype is the heavenly Jerusalem (συνστοιχεῖ δὲ τῇ νῦν Ἰερουσαλήμ). 20. Various views. [Von Gall (Altisr. Kultstätten, 15) regards the identification of Horeb and Sinai as a post-exilic confusion (see Mal. 3 22 Ps. 106 19). Originally they were distinct. Horeb lay in the Sinaitic peninsula, Sinai in Midian, on the W. coast of Arabia (cp We. Prol.(3) 359; Moore, Judges, 140, 179; Stade, Entst. des Volkes Israel, 12). But see remarks above on 1 K. 19 8, and cp MOSES, § 5. Not all critics, however, admit that the prevalent opinion is free from serious objections. Holzinger (KHC, Ex., p. 66) remarks that there are difficulties attending all attempts to locate the mountain of legislation. If we had only Judg. 5 4 before us, we should naturally seek for the mountain near Kadesh; at any rate, 1 K. 19 8 does not favour a site in the Sinaitic peninsula. Captain A. E. Haynes, R.E. (of the Palmer Search Expedition) placed Mt. Sinai in the desert of Et-Tīh, on the way from Egypt to Kadesh (PEFQ, 1896, p. 175 ff.). Sayce (Crit. Mon. 263 ff.) considers a site in the Sinaitic peninsula to be excluded by the presence of an Egyptian garrison in charge of the mines, and places Sinai in the eastern mountains of Seir. Cheyne (E. Bib., col. 3208) prefers some mountain-group near Kadesh on text-critical grounds, which favour the supposition that the Moses-clan was admitted to the jus connubii and to religious communion by a tribe of Miṣrites (not Midianites) or Kenites which dwelt near Kadesh.[2]

As to the names 'Sinai' and 'Horeb' the most different theories have been offered. Gesenius (Thes. 948*a*) suggests 'muddy' as opposed to חָרֵב 'dry.' The usual critical theory connects סִינַי with סִין, 'Sin,' the moon-god; the plausibility of this is manifest (see § 3), even without referring to the fact that as late as the end of the sixth century A.D. moon-worship was practised by heathen Arabs in the Sinai peninsula (Bäthg. Beitr. 105; ZDMG 3 202 ff.). The article ZIN, however, suggests another explanation; both צִן and סִין may be corruptions of ישמעאל (parallel corruptions are frequent); consequently סיני may be a corruption of ישמעאלי.[3] This would correspond to חֹרֵב, regarded as a corruption of ירחמאל (see MOSES, § 5); tradition knew no other name for the sacred mountain than 'Jerahmeelite,' 'Ishmaelite.' A more obvious explanation is 'drought' (from √חרב, 'to be dry'), or as Winckler explains, 'glowing (heat)'; see § 3, end. Lagarde, however (Uebers. 85), connects with Aram. כְּרַב, 'to plough.'—T. K. C.] H. W.

SINIM, THE LAND OF (אֶרֶץ סִינִים; ΓΗ ΠΕΡΣΩΝ [BℵAQ]; terra australis; Pesh. ܣܝܢܝܡ), Is. 49 12†. Formerly biblical geographers were inclined to see here a reference to China—the land of the Sinae or Thinae of the geographer Ptolemy (Ar. and Syr. ṣīn). It was not supposed that the writer knew of Jewish exiles in China, but that he wished to express the idea that from the very farthest possible point the children of Zion should return. The theory, first suggested by Arias Montanus (16th cent.), has been both defended and opposed with much learning (see Strauss-Torney in Del. Jes.(3) 688 ff., cp (4) 488 ff.; Che., Proph. Is.(3) 2 20 ff.; Terrien de Lacouperie,[1] BOR 1 [1886-7], 45 ff. 183 ff.), but the philological and historical difficulties have decided recent critics against it (see Dillm.-Kittel, Duhm, Che. in SBOT, Marti). China became known too late, and we should expect צִינִים. In accordance with his theory of the place of composition, Duhm thinks of the 'Phœnician Sinites' mentioned in Gen. 10 17; Klostermann, Cheyne (in SBOT), and Marti would read סְוֵנִים, and see a reference to SYENE [q.v.]—i.e., Assouan on the Nile.

If however (1) the view expressed elsewhere (PROPHET, § 43) is correct, and the Prophecy of Restoration relates to the return of the Jews from a N. Arabian captivity, and if (2) the geographical horizon of Gen. 10 has been expanded, so that only a keen observer can discern its original limitation to the Negeb and Arabia, the problem of 'Sinim' is solved, and the remark of Skinner and Marti that it is a hopeless enigma is refuted.

Critically investigated, the ethnic names of Gen. 10 15-18*a* (which have been transformed by the redactor) are probably as follows:—

Ḳenaz (or Ḳain), Miṣṣur, Reḥoboth, Ishmaelite, Arammite, Geshurite, Horite, Jeraḥmeelite, Sinite, Aradite (or Arpadite?), Miṣrite, Maacathite.

That the name 'Sin' was firmly rooted in the Negeb is shown by the occurrence of 'Sin' for a wilderness (Ex. 16 1) and of 'Sinai' (in Muṣri; see MOSES, § 14, SINAI, §§ 4, 15) for a mountain. From this point of view, Duhm's theory was a step towards the true solution. Whether, however, Sin, Sini, Sinim are original, and connected with Sin the Babylonian moon-god, may be questioned. Analogy favours the view that Sin like Zin (צִן) is a corruption of ישמעאל (Ishmael); see SINAI, § 20, and cp SHEM.

Filling up one obvious lacuna, the passage now becomes—

> Lo, these come from Jeraḥmeel (מירחמאל),
> And lo, these from Zaphon,[2]
> And [lo, these] from Arabia (מערבים),
> And these from the land of Sinim (or, Ishmael?).

SINITE (הַסִּינִי—i.e., the Sinite; ΑΣΕΝΝΑΙΟΝ [AEL], ΣΕΙΝΑΙΟΥ [Jos. Ant. i. 6 2]; SINÆUM), a Canaanite (Phœnician) tribe, Gen. 10 17 = 1 Ch. 1 15 (om. B, ΑΣΕΝΝΕΙ [L]). In Ass. inscr. (Siannu), as well as in OT, the name is grouped with Arḳa (ARKITE), and Ṣimirra (ZEMARITE), in the former sometimes also with Usnu (e.g., KB i. 172 ii. 27 26) which Fried. Del. (Par. 282) proposes to find in Ḳal'at el-Ḥoṣn NE. of Tripoli and W. of Ḥomṣ. In spite of the different sibilant it is no doubt the same as the land of Ši-a-na-ai,[3] mentioned in the monolith of Shalmaneser II., immediately after Irkanat (ARKITE, n. 1), Arvad, and Usanat (cp Usnu); the king bears the characteristic name Adunuba'li (cp ארנבעל CIS i. no. 138, etc.). It is less certain whether Sin is to be found in the list of N. Syrian cities visited by Thotmes III.[4]

Apart from such help as the above evidence yields, the site of 'Sin' is uncertain. The identification with Syn near the Nahr 'Arḳa (see GEOGRAPHY, § 16 [2]) finds some support in the Targ. rendering 'Orthosia,'

[1] [On the reading of Gal. 4 25, and on the bearing of the text-critical problem on the question here discussed, see HAGAR, § 3.]

[2] The theory is that this is the view of things out of which the representation in our Hebrew text has arisen. It is based on a new criticism of the form of the Moses-narrative.

[3] The alternative would be to connect שמעאלי with the name of the Babylonian Moon-god. The same connexion would then have to be supposed for the other members of the group of (probably) related names—שמואל, שבואל, שובל, שאול (cp SAUL, SHOBAL, SHEMUEL). On the ground of numerous phenomena, not all of which are indicated in the present work, the writer hesitates to suppose this connection.

[1] This clever and much-regretted scholar thought of the tribes of the Šina on the slopes of the Hindu-cush. 'They are enumerated in the laws of Manu, in the Mahabhârata, the great epos of India, in the Lalita vistara, in the Ramayana, the Puranas, and elsewhere, a body of evidence which goes back to the times before the Christian era.' They are now, it is added, five in number, and still live in the same or nearly the same region.

[2] Duhm and Marti (cp also SBOT) omit מִצָּפוֹן, as an interpolation from Ps. 107 3. This arises from their not rightly understanding צפון (see ZAPHON), and involves inserting a new stichus, ואלה מקצה הארץ. See Crit. Bib.

[3] So Craig, KB 1 172 l 94; the older reading is Si-za-na-ai, cp KAT(2) 196.

[4] Viz.: Sai-na-r-ka-y (207) and Sai-'no-ra-g-n-na (211): the former may mean 'Sin the hinder' (cp Ass. arka, 'behind'); see WMM, As. u. Eur. 289.

the ruins of which town are probably situated a little to the S. of the Nahr 'Arḳa (see ORTHOSIA). This, however, seems too close to 'Arḳa, and it might be better to look further N. and find a trace of the name in the Nahr es-Sîn (or Nahr-el-Melek)[1] about two hours N. from Bāniyās on the road to el-Lādiḳiyeh (Laodicea); so Baed.(3) 411. But the Ass. siannu (=siānu) presupposes the form סִיָנִי (cp Fr. Del. l.c.), which is certainly older and presumably more correct than the MT סִינִי (with which 𝔊 Vg. agree), and the difficulty of reconciling the two forms is a grave objection to the identifications hitherto proposed. The same applies also to the suggested connection with the fortress of Sinna (Strabo, xvi. 11 18; Di.; BDB). S. A. C.

SIPHMOTH (שִׁפְמוֹת [Gi.], שְׂפָמוֹת [Bä.]), one of the places where David, when in Ziklag, had allies, 1 S. 30 28 † (CΑΦΕΙ [B], but also, in a doublet [see v. 29] CΑΦΕΚ; CΑΦΑΜωC [A], CΕΦΕΙΜωΘ [L]). The idea that the name may be connected with שְׁפָם (Nu. 34 10 f.) is rejected by Wellhausen as impossible. But there is reason to think that the geographical references both of Nu. 34 2-12 and of 1 S. 30 27-31 have been misunderstood and consequently misrepresented by the editor; originally both passages referred probably to the Negeb (cp RIBLAH).

In Nu. 34 11 Shepham and Riblah (i.e., probably Jeraḥmeel) are mentioned together. So too in 1 S. 30 29 (𝔊B) σαφεκ, which corresponds with Siphmoth, is mentioned after κειμαθ (= Maacath, a region in the Negeb), and in v. 28 MT and 𝔊 agree in combining Siphmoth (σαφει) with Eshtemoa (εσθειε [v. 28], θειμαθ [v. 29]) and Racal (καρμηλος)—i.e., Jeraḥmeel. We also find a gentilic SHIPHMITE [q.v.], which certainly belongs to the far S. This view may require us to substitute 'Rehoboth' for 'Hebron' as David's first centre after leaving 'Ziklag,' and to suppose 'Eshtemoa' to be identical with SHEMA [q.v.]. It is at any rate plausible. T. K. C.

SIPPAI (סִפַּי), a Rephaite slain by Sibbechai the Hushathite: 1 Ch. 20 4 (CΑΦΟΥΤ [B], CΕΦΦΙ [A], CΑΠΦΙ [L]). In 2 S. 21 18 he appears as Saph (סַף; σεφ [B], σεφε [A]). The Pesh. in the superscription prefixed to Ps. 143 [144] has: 'To David, when he slew Asaph [Saph] brother of Gulyād [Goliath]' (cp 𝔊). In 2 S. 21 18 𝔊L reads ἐπάταξε . . . τοὺς ἐπισυνηγμένους τῶν ἀπογόνων . . . which, as Klostermann has shown, presupposes the form אֲסַפַּי (a name analogous to the further abbreviated ASAPH), and this may be near the correct reading, א being easily dropped after the final י of סבכי.

SIRACH. The present article will deal with those portions of the Hebrew text of Ben-Sira that have been published since the completion of the article ECCLESIASTICUS (March 1900). To the list of new fragments given there (col. 1166, n. 4) we have up to this time (Jan. 1903) to add only 18 31-33 19 12 20 5-7 13 37 19 22 24 26 published, with facsimile, translation, and annotations, by M. Gaster in JQR for July 1900. The material now published includes 3 5*d*-16 26 18 31-33 19 12 20 5-7 13 25 8*b* 13 17-24 26 1 2*a* 30 11-33 3 35 9-38 27 39 15-51 30: about two-thirds of the whole book.

1. Extent of Heb. material.

2. New fragments.

The new fragments agree in the main in character with those previously known, but also differ from them in some interesting particulars.

(a) Adler fragment.—The passage published by Adler, 7 29-12 1 (A^Adler), is written astichometrically, agreeing in this regard with MS A of Schechter and Taylor (A^Sch.). The text is corrupt; but in most cases it is possible to emend it with considerable probability. It has one ḳĕrē (8 2) and one marginal note (10 13), and over several words (10 1, etc.) are placed dots indicating the necessity of correction. 9 3 f. 10 2 11 6-8 are provided with vowel-points and accents, and a few other words are pointed in whole or in part.[1] It thus appears that the passage has been revised by a scribe who, unfortunately, did not possess the material or the ability to correct the more serious errors of the text. Doublets occur in 8 1 9 3 10 30*c*,d-31 11 25 27*a*,b 11 27*c*,d-28; in 8 1 the second clause is corrupt in the first couplet, correct in the second, and, as the first clause of the second couplet is nearly identical with the Syriac (S)—employing the word קשה in a Syriac non-Hebrew sense—the verse may have been revised in accordance with the Syriac, or it may offer a variant reading which was followed by S; 10 30*c*, d is defective, v. 31 is complete and independent of 𝔊 and S; 11 25=S, v. 27*a*, b=𝔊 nearly (emend H עלי to מעשי); 11 27*c*, d=S, v. 28=𝔊 nearly (𝔊 renders אחרית badly by 'children'). The agreement of the two couplets of a doublet with 𝔊 and S respectively may suggest imitation of these versions by H, and in some cases doubtless there has been imitation.[2] On the other hand, in a number of couplets, as 7 33 (unless חן is error for חן) 8 6 7*b* 11 14 16 9 4 11 15 10 5 7 10 17 f. 22 11 28, in spite of the occurrence of a couple of Syriasms, it is clear that the text of H is not dependent on 𝔊 or S. The obvious cases of dependence are rare, and the impression made by the passage as a whole is that it represents a genuine, though corrupt, Hebrew text.

That the MS has passed through the hands of an Aramaic-speaking scribe is shown by the occurrence of Syriasms: קשה (8 1), חווה (8 11), ענה apparently (9 14), and probably משא על פיהו (9 18, cp S נסב על פומה).[3] There is no case of an Arabism in the present text; but there is an indication that in the text from which our S was made the word חלק occurred in the sense of 'create': in 10 18 H reads: 'pride is not becoming' (נאוה), for which 𝔊 has, 'pride was not created' (נברא), whilst the פלג of S represents Heb. חלק; it would seem, therefore, that in some Heb. MS or MSS חלק was employed in the sense of ברא.[4] An example (8 1) of apparent translation from Syriac is given above, and a probable second example is found in 11 25*c*, which seems to be a corrupted doublet (תהיה for יגיד). For quotations from this portion of Ben-Sira in Saadia and the Talmud, see below (§ 3).

(b) Lévi fragment.—The fragment 36 24-38 1 (C^Lévi), edited by Lévi in REJ, Jan.-March 1900, with facsimile, translation, and annotations, offers a new recension of material already published (by Schechter and Taylor in their 'Ben-Sira,' and G. Margoliouth in JQR, Oct. 1899). Unlike the latter it is written astichometrically; this, however, is a difference to which no importance can be attached. It abounds in scribal errors, has harsh constructions (as in 37 1), and employs late Hebrew expressions (for example, דין, 37 2, in the sense of 'grief, misfortune').[5] In general, however, it is superior to the text of MS B of Schechter and G. Margoliouth. It sometimes accounts for the errors of the versions; for example, its נדור צבא in 36 26 shows how the readings εὐζώνῳ and ܕܨܒܐ ܠܟܠܗܘܢ arose. In a couple of cases

[1] This suggests that Sin has derived its name from the moon-god (Sin).

[1] Saadia remarks that the text of BS known to him was provided, like the biblical books, with vowel-points and accents. If the statement is to be taken literally it points to a MS written more carefully than those that have come down to us.

[2] On the interpretation of doublets see the remarks of Nöldeke in ZATW, 1900, p. 1. D. S. Margoliouth in Exp. T, April 1902, calls attention to a doublet in Ben-Zev's translation of Ben-Sira (40 16), in which one couplet agrees with S, and the other with 𝔊.

[3] חרמך (9 4) is probably scribal miswriting for תמסך.

[4] So Lévi in JQR, Oct. 1900. Nöldeke (ZATW, 1900, p. 1) and Houtsma (Th. T, 1900) hold that חלק='create' is a genuine Hebrew stem. The fundamental sense of the stem may be 'divide, cut up' (as Nöldeke suggests), whence, on the one hand, 'number, arrange, create,' and, on the other hand, 'destroy.' These meanings are variously distributed in the Semitic languages; but no North-Semitic dialect, as far as our documents go, employs the stem in the sense 'create'—this particular sense is found only in Arabic, in which it is the usual one. Still the possibility of this sense in Hebrew must be admitted. Cp König, Die Originalität d. heb. Sirachtextes, 69 f., and Ryssel in St. Kr., 1901, p. 579.

[5] דין here appears to be identical with Aram. דון 'anxiety' ܕܘܢ; the writing דין may represent a local pronunciation, or may be a scribal error for דון.

(37 26 28) L agrees with H against 𝔊. The most interesting feature of this fragment is that in many cases its text is identical with the marginal readings of MS B, whence it appears that these readings are not the emendations of the scribe but are derived from another MS. This MS was not identical with C^Lévi since it sometimes differs from this latter; but the two are derived from one earlier text. It is probable (as Lévi points out) that the marginal readings in the rest of B (the Cowley-Neubauer fragment) come from the same or a similar source, and we thus have an indication of the existence of a third family of Ben-Sira manuscripts in addition to those represented by A and B.

(c) Selections.—Still a different type of text is presented by three fragments containing selections from Ben-Sira: one, containing 4 23*b* 30 f. 5 4-7 9-13 36 19*a* 25 17-19 22-24 26 1 2*a* and bits of 25 8 13 20 f. published, with annotations, by Schechter (in JQR, April 1900); a second, containing 6 18*d* 19 28 35 7 1 4 6 17 20 f. 23-25, published, with translation and annotations, by Lévi (in REJ, Jan.-March 1900); and a third, containing 18 31 (one word) 32 f. 19 1 f. 20 5-7 37 19 22 24 26 20 13, published, with facsimile, translation, and annotations, by Gaster (in JQR, July 1900). Possibly a number of such selections existed; this would be a natural result of the popularity of the book. Groups of couplets, taken from different parts of Ben-Sira, occur in the Talmud; for example, in Sanhedrin, 100*b*. In such cases the object is to bring together the aphorisms relating to some one subject (women and the household in Sanh. 100*b*); these need not have been taken, and probably were not taken, from a book of extracts; but they may have suggested the compilation of such books. In the fragments under consideration, whilst the couplets show a variety of subjects, a certain unity is observable; in that of Schechter the chief points are the desirableness of moral firmness and the wickedness of women; in that of Lévi, the pursuit of wisdom and the cultivation of humility; in that of Gaster, the characteristics of the wise man. For the sake of distinction these books of extracts may be designated by the letter E.

The Schechter fragment (E^Sch., = his C) is in tolerably good form, having only two badly corrupted passages, 5 11 and 5 13 (1)a (= 36 19*a*). It accords now with the Greek, now with the Syriac, differing in this regard sometimes in the same couplet.[1] Often it goes its own way, being sometimes (as in 5 12) of a curtness that suggests originality; and its irregular oscillation between 𝔊 and S indicates that it is not based on either of these versions. It is in general agreement with the Greek in several cases in which MS A^Sch. agrees with the Syriac.

The Lévi fragment (E^Lévi, = his D) coincides in material with part of MS A^Sch., and gives a better text than that of the latter. From 6 18 to 7 20 it is nearer to 𝔊 than to S, and in the remaining couplets is nearer to S. It is carefully written; there are two or three scribal mis-writings of letters, and a word is omitted in 7 6 and probably also in 7 21. It contains no Syriasms or Arabisms, and has the tone of an independent text.

The Gaster fragment (E^Gaster) resembles E^Sch. in agreeing sometimes with 𝔊, sometimes with S. In several couplets (18 32 f. 19 1 20 6) it serves to explain the errors of one or both of the versions; clearly in some cases these last are free renderings of H. The Hebrew text is corrupt or defective in 19 2*b* 20 5, and has apparently one Syriasm (37 19, נחכם for יחכם).

With the light got from the new fragments we may now speak more definitely than was possible two years ago of the conclusions to be drawn from the whole of the Ben-Sira Hebrew material. In the first place, we may consider the facts that make for the genuineness of the

3. Genuineness of the Heb.

Hebrew text—that is to say, against the supposition that it is a translation from versions.

(a) Talmud.—The question of the quotations from Ben-Sira in the Talmud is complicated by the corruptions of the Talmud text as well as by the peculiar habits of the Talmudic doctors: their frequent disregard of literalness, and their fondness for grouping clauses or couplets from different parts of the book and adding or interweaving passages from the canonical books. Their citations are not necessarily authority for the wording of the original, but may testify to a form or forms current in the Talmudic period, and may help to establish the original text.[1]

There are indications (though, for the reasons mentioned above, these are not clear) that the two Talmuds, the Jerusalem and the Babylonian, had, in some cases at least, different texts of Ben-Sira. Thus in 3 21 Talm. Jer. Hag. 77*c*, agrees with H in the first word (where Talm. Bab. and Saad. have a different word) and also in the last word, but in the rest of the couplet has a wholly different reading (perhaps based on Job 11 8)[2]; in the same passage Bab. Talm. Hag. 13*a* (and so Midr. Rab., Gen. 8) has a doublet, in which the first couplet is identical with the form in 𝔊 and S, whilst the second, although diverging from Jer. Talm., 𝔊, S, and H, agrees with H and Saad. in one peculiar expression (מכוסה); in this doublet we may have an indication of at least two forms of the Ben-Sira text in the fifth century, one of which is here represented by 𝔊 and S, and the other by H (there being also in this latter scribal variants); possibly, however, both couplets are original, and H has taken one, and 𝔊 the other. In 7 17 the 'hope' of H is supported by Āb̄ōth 4 7 (against 𝔊 and S 'fate'), but Āb̄ōth and the versions agree in reading 'humble thyself' instead of H 'humble pride'; in both cases the readings of the versions are the better. A noteworthy group of selections from Ecclus. 9 occurs in Talm. Bab. Sanh. 100*b*, Yĕbām. 63*b*, the order of lines being: 8*a*, 3*b*, 9*a*, b (in part), 8*c* (to which is added Prov. 7 26*b*); 8*a* = H (emended), 𝔊 (S being different); 3*b* (where H has a doublet) agrees in part with one form of H, in part with the other; in 9 the text of Bab. Talm. seems to be in disorder, or to be very free; it has 'beside her' (אצלה)[3] instead of 'with a married woman' (𝔊, S, and, by emendation, H בעולה), and 'to mingle' instead of 'do not drink'; 8*c* is a slightly expanded form of emended H (= S). In 11 1*b* 29*a* 13 25 the Talmudic text is substantially the same as that of H and 𝔊, S. It is in general more correctly written than H, which is full of scribal blunders; yet the two are sufficiently alike to suggest that our H rests on a genuine Hebrew text. We cannot be surprised at scribal errors, doublets, omissions, and additions in a text of the tenth or the eleventh century when we find similar occurrences in the Talmud as well as in the versions.[4]

(b) Saadia.—The resemblance between Saadia and H is very close, the differences between the two being little more than variations of diction, and the advantage lying sometimes with one, sometimes with the other; in 5 5 f. (H רגנו, Saad. עוו) and 6 6 (H בעל, Saad. גלה) the wording of H is the better, but in 6 6*a* the order of words in Saadia is the more correct; on the other hand, in 6 7 13 11 the Aramaic נסיון of H is probably to be emended into the מסה and מנסה of Saadia. He appears to have

1 In 25 17 it agrees with 𝔊^ℵAVL in the expression 'like a bear,' while 𝔊^B and S read 'like sackcloth'; if ἄρκος is Gk. corruption of σάκκον, H here follows a Greek text.

1 On the quotations in the Talmud and Saadia, in addition to the authors mentioned above, col. 1172, n, 2, see Bacher (JQR, Jan. 1900), Edersheim (in Wace), Lévi (Comm. and REJ and JQR) and Ryssel (in Kautzsch's Apokryphen and St. Kr., 1901-1902); cp Schechter in JQR 3 and 4.

2 Bacher suggests that Jer. Talm. חרע is an erroneous completion of the abbreviation חר׳, which should be read חדרש.

3 Rashi, אצל בעלה. The text of Bab. Talm. should perhaps be emended after H and the versions. But in v. 9, where H has only 'strong drink' and 𝔊^BNAC only 'wine' (S 'old wine'), Bab. Talm. has both terms, possibly accounting for the differences between H, 𝔊, and S.

4 On the Syriac of Ecclus. 9 8 f. see Lévi, in JQR, Oct. 1900 p. 8 f.

had a text that was substantially identical with ours; his citations may be considered to establish, as far as they go, a text of the tenth century, though of its history we know nothing.[1] Its special similarity to that of our Hebrew MSS may be a result of the proximity in time of the two. Saadia also quotes as from the 'Wisdom of Eleazar ben Irai' a passage that is found in our Ben-Sira (3 21 f.), and the text quoted by him differs from that of our Hebrew in only a couple of unimportant forms (H פלאות, Saad. כמופלא; H בַמה ש, Saad. באשר);[2] the natural conclusion is that the book of Eleazar ben Irai (if this name really belongs to a separate author and is not a corruption of 'Eleazar ben Sira') contained extracts from Ben-Sira or from some work based on Ben-Sira.

(c) Relation of H to $\mathfrak{G}$ and S.—It is a common remark that the Hebrew MSS of BS fall into two divisions: those that more resemble the Greek, and those that are nearer the Syriac; to the former division belongs the B-group, to the latter the A-group. This classification holds in a general way, but may easily be pressed too far. Even in the earlier A and B material there are a number of passages that are adverse to such a classification, and many more appear in the new fragments. The division into these two classes has, however, been held to indicate that our Hebrew is a translation from the Greek or the Syriac. With the new material at our disposal it may be said that this supposition, as an explanation of the Hebrew as a whole, seems to be definitely excluded. It appears to be set aside by the irregularity of the accordance of H with $\mathfrak{G}$ or S, by its not infrequent divergence from and correction of both the versions, by its relation to the quotations in the Talmud and Saadia, and by its tone, which in many places is free and independent and is characterised by an aphoristic curtness that a translator would not be likely to attain. We must rather account for the general relation between H and the versions by supposing that H is the descendant of early texts, some of which were the basis of $\mathfrak{G}$, others the basis of S. The omissions in S call for fuller treatment than they have yet received. They may be due in part to the frequent fondness of this version for clearness and condensation, in part to the defectiveness of the MS from which it was made.

(d) Diction.—The testimony of the new fragments confirms the judgment of the language expressed under ECCLESIASTICUS. After allowance has been made for obvious scribal errors the diction of H does not differ materially from that of Koheleth. Aramaisms and New-Hebrew forms and expressions may well have been employed by Ben-Sira himself (such forms occur even in the Book of Proverbs), and, as regards the fragments, there was no time, from 200 B.C. to 1000 A.D., when Jewish scribes would not be likely to insert familiar Aramaic words—the more that the text of Ben-Sira was not protected by canonical sanctity. The vocabulary of the fragments furnishes abundant material for lexicographical research.[3] The limits of the 'New-Hebrew' vocabulary are not sharply defined; at present it is hardly possible to draw the line distinctly between 'Neohebraisms' and 'Syriasms,' and there is a similar indistinctness (though a less clearly marked one) as to Arabisms. In respect of purity of style the fragments differ among themselves:

1 The question whether the 'Sefer ha-Galuy' (in which the citations occur) is the work of Saadia is discussed by D. Margoliouth, Harkavy, and Bacher in JQR 12 (1899-1900). There seems to be no good reason to doubt its genuineness.

2 Here, as elsewhere, Saadia is nearer than H to the classic usage; the scribes of H (except in $C^{Lévi}$ and A^{Adler}) are fond of the short rel. pron. ש. But this usage, though distinctive for a given MS, is not a mark of the date of a Ben-Sira text, since it is common in late OT writings and in the Talmud.

3 On this point cp the Comms. of Lévi and Ryssel; the articles of Nöldeke and Houtsma (see above, col. 4632 n. 4); Schwally, Idioticon d. Christl.-pal. Aram. (1893); Fraenkel, in MGWJ, 1899; Jacob, in ZATW, 1902; art. ARAMAIC LANGUAGE, above, col. 281 f.; and various discussions in JQR and REJ.

SIRACH

$C^{Lévi}$ is relatively free from faults; parts of A and B are greatly disfigured. The blemishes testify mostly to the number of hands through which the MSS have passed, not to the work of a translator. The aphoristic curtness of style of the fragments has been referred to above.

On the other hand, whilst the fragments produce a general impression of originality, the text appears in some passages to have been translated from or conformed to that of a Version or of the Talmud. Some instances of probable and apparent imitation of Versions are mentioned above (ECCLESIASTICUS, § 5), and others have been pointed out by critics; most of the examples cited relate to the Syriac, a few only to the Greek.[1] These cases, which are relatively not numerous, do not prove a general translation or imitation, but exhibit the procedures of particular scribes in the passages in which they occur. The same remark is to be made of cases in which H appears to follow the Talmud;[2] such imitations by late scribes are natural. The corruptions of the BS text began early and continued a long time; there was little to restrain the fancies and the negligence of copyists. Taking into consideration the two sets of facts—the evidences of originality and the evidences of slavish imitation—the more reasonable conclusion seems to be that the text of the fragments is in general genuine, but full of corruptions.

4. Employment of Versions and Talmud.

It is hardly possible at present to make a helpful classification of the Heb. MSS of Ben-Sira; for such a classification we need more Heb. material. An obvious and simple principle of division would be the relation of the fragments to the two main groups of Greek texts ($\mathfrak{G}^{\aleph a.c\ etc.}$ and $\mathfrak{G}^{B\ etc.}$) or to the two Greek and the Syriac. But, in addition to the fact that the relations of the versional texts to one another and to the original Hebrew are not clear, there is the difficulty that the fragments show a confusing variety of similarity and dissimilarity to the Versions and to one another. This is true of all the Heb. MSS so far published: in the same paragraph, and even in the same couplet, the text sometimes turns from one version to another, or, abandoning both, goes its own independent way. It is obvious that it has experienced a variety of fortunes, and that, whilst it sometimes corrects the Versions or is corrected by them, it in some cases goes back to sources different from theirs. It can be, therefore, only a rough classification that is based on resemblances to the Versions. The direct testimony to the Hebrew text is contained in the Talmud (about 700 years after the composition of Ben-Sira's book) and Saadia (about 400 years after the Talmud). The Talmudic readings differ a good deal from our H, but Saadia is substantially identical with the latter; the differences between the citations in the Talmud and those in Saadia may be taken to represent roughly the changes undergone by the Heb. text in the interval between the two. The text of the Talmud is in general accord with the unglossed Greek ($\mathfrak{G}^{B}$), but is free from the scribal variations that crept into the latter; it may, thus, represent a Hebrew text (perhaps as early as the 2nd cent. of our era) which was in substantial accord with the Gk. text that underlay our two main Gk. recensions. This Heb. text was probably the basis

5. Classification of Heb. MSS.

1 On the acrostic, 51 13-30, see Taylor, in Schechter and Taylor's Wisdom of Ben Sira, p. lxxvi ff. Lévi, in REJ, 1899, gives a number of cases of imitation. But 46 20 is not a case in point. H דרך is not a translation of corrupt S, but a variant of earlier H ארח, which was a scribe's corruption of original H אחרית. If H had translated S (אורחה), it would have written ארח. See REJ 39 188.

2 A probable example is given by Professor Lévi, in JQR, Oct. 1900, p. 15, and another by Professor Margoliouth, in Exp.T, April, 1902. Cp Bacher, in JQR, vol. 12 (1899-1900), p. 286 ff.

of our fragments. We may suppose that the Heb. (handed down through Jewish circles) and the Gk. (made 132 B.C., and transmitted by Alexandrian Jews and by Christians) did not differ materially from each other in the second century A.D. After that time they went their separate ways: the Gk. (under what circumstances we know not) fell into two divisions, with one of which the Syriac stood in some close relation;[1] the Heb. was not similarly divided into families, but was roughly treated by scribes, who obscured its readings, and in a few cases copied or imitated the Versions, especially the Syr.[2] Our Hebrew fragments, after they have been freed, as far as possible, from scribal errors, must be classified according to the degree of their purity or impurity, and according to their peculiarities of diction.[3] Such a classification, however, yields no very striking or important results—the differences between the fragments in correctness and style are not great. They must be examined and judged every one for itself. So far, they have not contributed much to the restitution of the original text in passages in which the Versions are obscure. They often confirm one or more of the Versions, and sometimes correct or explain words or lines; but in general the text of Ben-Sira remains nearly as it was before the discovery of the fragments. These, however, apart from the emendation of the text, have called forth renewed study of the book, and have added to the vocabulary of the Hebrew language.

6. Literature. In addition to the works on Ben-Sira given above (col. 1178) the following may be mentioned:—Raebiger, Ethice apocr. (1838); Daubanton, in Theol. Stud. 4 (1886); Houtsma, in Th.T 343 (1900); Ryssel's Comm. in St. Kr. (1900-02) (completion of his comm. on the Hebrew text); Grimme, Mètres et strophes d. l. fragments heb. d. Manuscrit A. d. l'Ecclés. (Fr. trans.) (1901); Kartz, Die Scholien d. Greg. Abulf. Bar-Heb. z. Weisheitb. d. Josua b. Sira (1892); and various short arts. in JQR, REJ, ZATW, Rev. Bibl., Th. Rundschau. C. H. T.

SIRAH, WELL OF (בּוֹר הַסִּירָה, 'walled cistern'? cp on סהר, PRISON, § 2 (9)), 2 S. 3 26, the name of the spot from which Abner was enticed back to Hebron, after he had concluded his interview with David (see ABNER), and had set out on his return journey northward. Josephus calls it βη[ρ]σηρα—i.e., בְּאֵר סִרָה—and says that it was 20 stadia from Hebron (Ant. vii. 1 5). Rosen has called attention (ZDMG 12 486) to a spring and reservoir, situated about a mile out of Hebron, a few steps to the W. of the old northern road, and now called 'Ain Sāra. Grove (DB,(2) s.v. 'Sirah') and Conder (Tentwork 286) agree that this may be the ancient 'well of (the) Sirah'; indeed, Conder goes so far as to say that 'this may be considered one of the few genuine sites in the neighbourhood of Hebron.' It is true, the original form of the name may have been סְהִירָה, Sehirah (i.e., 'enclosed'?), for 𝔊^BA gives (ἀπὸ τοῦ φρέατος) τοῦ σεειραμ, where μ may of course be disregarded (cp σηλωμ = Shiloh), 𝔊^L . . . φρ. σεειρα, Vg. a cisterna Sira; Targ. מגובא דסירתא; Aq. ἀπὸ τοῦ λάκκου τῆς ἀποστάσεως (הַסָּרָה). It is more probable, however, that 'Hassirah' covers over some gentilic or ethnic, and if 'Hebron' is a corruption of 'Rehoboth,' and David's first kingdom was really in the Negeb (as some recent articles in the present work assume), some gentilic or ethnic of the Negeb—such as אשחור, Ashḥur (cp חרס, Ḥeres)—is to be expected.

SIRION (שִׁרְיֹן, שִׂרְיוֹן; ϲⲁⲛⲓωⲣ [BAFL] in Dt.; ⲟ ⲏⲅⲁⲡⲏⲙⲉⲛⲟϲ [BℵARTU]—i.e., יְשֻׁרוּן, in Ps.), a 'Sidonian' or Phœnician designation of Hermon, Dt. 3 9 Ps. 29 6. It is also recognised by Pesh. in Dt. 4 48 (שִׂרְיֹן for שׂיאן); and in Jer. 18 14*a*, by Grätz and Cornill, according to whom, to show the unnaturalness of Israel's desertion of Yahwè, Jeremiah asks, 'Does the snow of Lebanon melt away (הֲיָזוּב) from the rock of Sirion' (read מִצּוּר שִׂרְיוֹן for מ׳ שָׂדָי, 'from the rock of the field')? It is not clear, however, that 'Sirion' is the right form; it is hardly confirmed by the Ass. sirara (KAT(2) 159, 184; cp Del. Par. 101, 103 f.).

It is probable that 'Hermon' was also a designation of the mountains of 'Jeraḥmeel.' Dt. 3 8 ff., in its original form, seems to have described the territory of Cusham, where OG (q.v.) reigned; similarly Dt. 4 48. 'Sirion' can now be explained. Like 'Hermon,' it represents an ethnic—perhaps ישׂראל (Israel).

SISAMAI, RV SISMAI (סִסְמַי, or סִסְמַי [see Gi.]; ϲⲟϲⲟⲙⲁⲓ [BA], ϲⲁϲⲁⲙⲉⲓ [L]), a Jeraḥmeelite; 1 Ch. 2 40†.

Baethgen (Beitr. 65) and Kittel on 1 Ch. l.c. call attention to the Ph. name ססמי in a bilingual where Gr. has σεσμαος; and Baethgen, following Renan, accepts ססם as a divine name. But in spite of Kittel's implied suggestion (see SHALLUM, 3) it may well be questioned whether Sismai can be = עֶבֶד ססם 'servant of (the god) Sisam.' Of all the other names in 1 Ch. 2 34-41 there is hardly one which cannot be at once with some confidence pronounced to be a clan-name. The names which follow Sismai are Shallum, Jekamiah, and Elishama, names which may plausibly be regarded as related to Ishmael and Jerahmeel. סוס and סוסים have sometimes arisen by corruption out of כוש and כושים; it is possible that ססמי represents כֻּשְׁמִי, 'one from Cusham' (= the N. Arabian Cush). Cp ששן (Sheshan??), v. 34, the name of a Miṣrite slave, which may represent כשן (Cushan); see, however, SHESHAN. T. K. C.

SISERA (סִיסְרָא, § 51; on meaning, see below; ϲⲉⲓϲⲁⲣⲁ [B], ϲⲓϲⲁⲣⲁ [AL]; in Judg. 5 20, ⲓⲏⲗ [A]).

1. The leader of the Canaanites opposed to Deborah and Barak (Judg. 4 f.). The narrative, however, is inconsistent, and presents Sisera in a twofold aspect; according to the poem (5) he is the greatest of the confederate Canaanite kings, whilst the prose account (4) represents him merely as the general[1] of Jabin king of Hazor, and as having his abode in Kadesh (so Marq., see HAROSHETH). See further DEBORAH and SHAMGAR. In the latter article the difficult name Sisera is considered; it has probably not a Hittite but a N. Arabian origin. If the Nethinim are really (see Che. Amer. J. of Theol., July 1901, pp. 433 ff.) Ethanites or N. Arabians, the explanation here offered will be confirmed (see, however, NETHINIM). See 2, below. The royal city of Sisera (or Jabin) is (ex hyp.) not the Hittite city Kadesh (see HAROSHETH) but the place known as Kadesh-barnea (Kadesh-jeraḥmeel).

2. The name of a family of (post-exilic) Nethinim: Ezra 2 53 (B om. σισαρα[α] [AL]); Neh. 7 55 (σεισαραθ [A], σεσει. [Bℵ], om. L]); 1 Esd. 5 32 (σεραρ [BA], ASERER [AV], SERAR [RV]).

SISINNES (ϲⲓϲⲓⲛⲛⲏϲ), 'governor of Syria (Cœlesyria) and Phœnicia,' 1 Esd. 6 7 7 1. The name is also that of a faithful courtier of Darius, Arr. i. 25 3 vii. 6 4 (Σισινης). On its possible origin, see TATNAI (the corresponding name in Ezra, Neh.).

SISTRA. See MUSIC, § 3 (3).

SITNAH (שִׂטְנָה; ⲉⲭⲑⲣⲓⲁ [ADL, om. E]), the name of one of the contested wells in the story of Isaac and Abimelech, Gen. 26 21. The name still lingers; see REHOBOTH.

SLAVERY. The word does not occur in EV. 'Slave' is found only twice in AV (Jer. 2 14, and here only in italics as an explanation of יְלִיד בַּיִת ['home-born slave']; Rev. 18 13 for σωμάτων), and twice in RV (Dt. 21 14 24 7, הִתְעַמֵּר בְּ, 'deal with as a slave [marg. chattel]'; AV 'make merchandise of'). The Heb. עֶבֶד, 'ebed, is rendered 'servant' (1 K. 2 39 etc.).

1. Hebrew meaning. Among the Hebrews, as in the ancient world in general, there was no such thing as free labour in the modern sense; men-servants and maid-servants were the property of their masters—in other words, were slaves. We must carefully dissociate this word, however, from certain ideas inseparably connected with it in the modern Christian world. In the Hebrew conception there was no such profound difference between the slave's relation to the head of the house, and that held by the other members of the family. Free-born wives and free-born children are legally all alike under the power of the master of the house. The father can sell his children as well as his slaves to another Israelite. The slaves are not regarded as beings of an inferior order, but are true members of the family, and, though destitute of civil rights, are nevertheless regarded as fellowmen, and, indeed, if of Israelite descent, are held in as high esteem as freemen who at the same time are foreigners. Considered in itself, therefore, there is no degradation attaching to slavery. This is sufficiently shown by the one notorious fact that a man would not infrequently sell himself into slavery, and voluntarily remain in that condition.

2. Slaves: their position, etc. In the legal and actual standing of the slave the point whether he was an Israelite or not was exceedingly important. The bulk of the slaves in ancient Israel would seem to have belonged to the non-Israelite category. In the main they had become slaves—as all ancient law sanctioned—through the fortune of war. There existed, indeed, also in Israel the barbarous custom of the ḥērem (see BAN). The war being regarded as a war of Yahwè, the entire booty was often devoted 'to Yahwè'; that is to say, every living thing was put to death, and every lifeless thing destroyed (see, e.g., 1 S. 15). In the otherwise humane Dt. even, only the women and children of conquered towns are to be spared—i.e., made slaves. Desire of gain doubtless often interposed as a practical corrective of this cruel precept, and it is probable that, as a rule, the custom was to turn to account as slaves the men as well as the women (1 S. 15 1 K. 20 39 f. etc.). Israelites also, we may be sure, had frequent opportunities, if so minded, for buying slaves in foreign markets. Their Phœnician neighbours, with whom they always had active commercial relations, were famous throughout antiquity as slave-dealers (cp Am. 1 6). The 'strangers within the gates' must also, occasionally at least, have found themselves compelled to sell themselves or their children. And, lastly, the slave population was constantly augmented by the birth of children to slaves in the home of their master—the yělīdē bāyith (יְלִדֵי בַיִת) of Gen. 14 14—children who, of course, were themselves also slaves.

3. Master and slave. The master's right of property in his slaves of foreign origin was unlimited. He could sell them, or give them away to Israelites or non-Israelites as he chose. Yet these slaves, too, were by no means left absolutely defenceless to the caprice of their owner. The old consuetudinary law interposed energetically on their behalf. The master was not entitled to kill them; the killing of a slave was a punishable offence—a provision which becomes all the more noticeable when it is remembered that in the case of children the father did possess a limited power of life and death (see LAW AND JUSTICE, §§ 10 14). With the Greeks and Romans this power was, as regards slaves, a matter of course. The master's right of punishment was, in Israel, further restricted, and the slave protected from serious maltreatment, by the rule that the slave became entitled to his freedom if his master in chastising him had done him some lasting bodily injury, such as the loss of an eye or of a tooth (Ex. 21 26 f.). Even in such cases, indeed, the principle that the slave was the property of his master was not lost sight of. The law exempted the master from punishment if an interval of at least a day had elapsed between the maltreatment of the slave and his death. The presumption was that the death had not been intended, and it was held that the master had suffered penalty enough in the loss of his property, 'for he is his money' (Ex. 21 20 [21]). The killing or maiming of another man's slave was also regarded only as injury done to property, for which compensation was required. Thus, if a slave were gored by a vicious ox the owner of the ox had to pay a compensation of thirty shekels to the owner of the dead slave for his negligence in not looking after an ox known to be dangerous. (The sum mentioned clearly represents the average value of a good slave at the time of the enactment.) The owner of the ox was not liable to any further penalty, however, though when a free man was killed in like circumstances the case was one of murder and the owner of the ox was punished with death (Ex. 21 28 ff.). The runaway slave also enjoyed the protection of ancient custom. The prohibition of extradition indeed is not met with in express terms earlier than Dt. (23 15 f.); but we may safely take it that ancient custom, at least, did not require extradition as a matter of course. The decision in each case, as it arose, lay in the discretion of the city to which the fugitive had betaken himself. Shimei, for example, must in person come and fetch his slaves who had fled to Gath (1 K. 2 39 f.). Lastly, the slave was protected against over-driving by the institution of the Sabbath, which, in the view of the ancient law-giver, aimed specially at the benefit of slaves and the lower animals (Ex. 23 12 Dt. 5 12 ff.).

The legal position of the foreign female slave was still better. She was often her master's concubine—as is shown by the loan-word pīlegeš (פִּלֶגֶשׁ; Gr. παλλακίς), which the Hebrews doubtless got from the Phœnicians. Dt. (21 10 ff.) gives precise regulations for the case of an Israelite owner who seeks thus to appropriate a female captive. He is not allowed to take her at once; she must after coming into his house shave her head and pare her nails and bewail her father and mother for a full month, after which her master may espouse her. This regulation, also, we may safely assume to have rested on ancient custom.

It must further be remembered that to ancient feeling there was nothing degrading in the idea of the master of a female slave being lord also of her body, any more than there now is in modern Islam. As is shown elsewhere (see MARRIAGE, § 1), the freewoman also became a wife by purchase, and there is no essential difference in the position of a secondary wife. The position of the concubine is superior to that of the ordinary slave in this, that her master is not at liberty to sell her again. As regards the foreign concubine indeed this is expressly laid down only in Deuteronomy: her master must free her if he desires to put her away. But this also certainly comes from ancient practice common to the Israelites with other Semitic peoples. Even now it is held among the Arabs to be a shameful thing for a master to sell a slave who has been his concubine, especially if she have borne children to him; and this had the sanction of antiquity even in Mohammed's time (cp WRS, Kin. 73).

Slaves of Israelite descent were in the minority. Kidnapping of slaves within the tribes of Israel was severely prohibited both by law and by ancient usage (Ex. 21 16), though this did not prevent its occasional occurrence (Gen. 37 26 ff.), in which case, however, it was prudent to send the victims abroad. There were, however, other ways in which Israelites could become the property of Israelites. The Hebrew parent was at liberty to sell his children into slavery, only not to a foreigner; and doubtless there were many cases in which poor men availed themselves of this right (Ex. 21 7 ff.). The insolvent debtor also was sold (2 K. 4 1 Am. 2 6 8 6 Neh. 5 5 8). So too the convicted thief, who was unable to make good his theft (Ex. 22 2 f.); according to Josephus (Ant. iv. 8 2) he was in this case given to the person he had robbed (cp a provision in the law of the twelve tables). Finally, in cases of great poverty, a last resort was for a man to declare himself and his family the property of some well-to-do person (Lev. 25 39 47). What is related of the patriarch Jacob may also have frequently occurred; a suitor who was unable to pay the mōhar or purchase-money demanded for the bride would voluntarily hire himself as a slave for a fixed time to the father of the girl (Gen. 29 18; cp MARRIAGE, § 1).

The position of such Israelite slaves was considerably better than that of those of foreign origin. The main difference, so far as the law was concerned, lay in this, that the foreign slave remained a slave all his life, whilst the Hebrew slave had a legal right to manumission, and within a definite time had to be released for nothing. According to the Book of the Covenant the slavery of an Israelite lasted six years; in the seventh year he again became free (Ex. 21 1 ff.). The story of Jacob warrants the conjecture that in the original custom the Hebrew slave served for seven full years, and that later, under the influence of the Sabbatical idea, the beginning of the seventh year was taken as fixing the date of the release (cp Stade, GVI 1 378). By the seventh year of course is meant, not the Sabbatical year of a still later time, but a relative term reckoned from the date of the beginning of the bondage. If the slave had brought a wife along with him, she, and doubtless also their children, became free along with himself. If, however, he had entered into bondage alone and afterwards as a slave had received a wife from his master, she and also the children remained the property of the master (Ex. 21 7 ff.). Manifestly, in the case of a wife being given to a slave, only a foreign woman could be intended; for the Hebrew female slave the master had either to take to himself or give to his son (see below). A characteristic light on the whole position of the Hebrew slave is shed by another fact; the law can presume that in many cases the slave will prefer not to use his legal right to his liberty, but will voluntarily elect to remain in bondage. The rule just mentioned, regulating the retention of wife and children, must frequently have produced such cases; another cause will be mentioned later. If the slave desired to remain with his master in perpetuity, his master was to bring him before 'ĕlōhīm' and there fix his ear with an awl to the door-post (Ex. 21 5 f.; cp Dt. 15 16 f.). Interpreters are not agreed as to whether by 'ĕlōhīm' we are to understand the sanctuary, and that the declaration could only be duly made there. See col. 3224, note 2. Deuteronomy says nothing about the sanctuary, but doubtless assumes that the ceremony will be in the house of the master. This might be a result of the concentration of the cultus at Jerusalem; but it might equally well be held to show that neither also did the ancient custom reflected in the Book of the Covenant prescribe a ceremony at the sanctuary, and that by 'ĕlōhīm' are meant the household gods,[1] the Penates which in old times were found in every house (cp e.g., 1 S. 19 13; see TERAPHIM). The ceremony can have had no other meaning than that the ear of the slave—that is, his obedience—is firmly nailed to this house and pledged to it for all time coming.

4. Manumission.

Elsewhere also boring the ears is met with as a sign of slavery; e.g., among the Mesopotamians (Juv. 1 104), Arabs (Petr. Sat. 102), the Lydians (Xen. Anab. iii. 1 31), and others (see Di. on Ex. 21 5 f.).

Deuteronomy advances a step (15 13 f.), and requires of the master that he shall not send his slave away empty but shall give him a liberal present from flock and threshing-floor and winepress. Here we catch sight of another motive which may have often induced the slave to remain in voluntary bondage: the emancipated slave, if quite destitute, was in worse case in a state of freedom than before—left to his own resources, exposed to every hardship and oppression. To the man who had no land of his own the position of a free working man, or any other favourable opportunity of earning a livelihood, was hardly attainable at all, or, if attainable, only to a very limited degree. Many a man might therefore prefer slavery with comfort to freedom with destitution. The precepts of Deuteronomy are not complied with. The legislator himself feels that he is leaving much to the discretion of masters, and therefore exhorts them all the more earnestly (v. 18): 'It shall not seem hard to thee; . . . for Yahwè thy God shall bless thee [therefore] in all that thou doest.' What we read in Jer. 34 8 ff. is significant of much; in the time of a great distress, when Jerusalem was under siege, Zedekiah ordered the inhabitants of the city to free their Israelite bondmen and bondwomen, and so to fulfil the commandment that had been so neglected. But hardly had deliverance come and the siege been raised before the liberated slaves were again reduced to bondage.

5. Year of Jubilee.

P will not have any such thing as slavery for an Israelite. If an Israelite finds himself driven by poverty to sell himself into slavery, he is not in reality to be regarded as a slave, but as a free wage-earner or gēr (Lev. 25 35 39 f.). For all Israelites together are the servants of Yahwè, who brought the nation up out of the land of Egypt; they must not therefore treat one another as slaves (Lev. 25 42). In the matter of emancipation, indeed, the law had to yield to the force of custom; but the emancipation of the Hebrew slave was no longer to occur in the seventh year of his slavery, but only in the year of Jubilee, every fiftieth year. In this year (see JUBILEE) all land reverts to its original owner; the liberated slave thus has the means of subsistence secured for himself and his family.

The attempt (Oehler, PRE(2) 14 341 f.) to interpret this law as having in view only those slaves who, when the year of Jubilee came, had not yet been six years in bondage, and that thus the Jubilee release coexists as an institution with that of the seven-years' release, finds no support in the text itself; neither can we (so Di.) interpret the law as relating only to those slaves who, previously, at the seventh year's release, had voluntarily remained in bondage, and who now in any case have to go free in the year of Jubilee; had this been meant, it would have been said.

It is only in the case of his having been compelled to sell himself to a gēr or foreigner in the land that the law offers the Israelite the possibility of an earlier release (in such a case he cannot reckon on the same brotherly treatment as with a brother Israelite). Here a redemption was possible, the right of which belonged not only to the nearest kinsman, the brother or uncle on the father's side, but also to the bondman himself if in the meanwhile he had come into possession of means. The price of redemption also was fixed by law, and in a sense very favourable to the slave or his redeemer. The purchase-money originally paid by his present owner was to be regarded as a sort of hire paid in advance for the years of service from the date of purchase till the next jubilee,[1] and above this a sum proportionate to the time which may have been spent up to the time of the Jubilee year was to be paid as redemption-money, so much for each year (Lev. 25 47 ff.). Such a regulation clearly presupposes post-exilic conditions. Before the exile the case of an Israelite being compelled to sell himself to a foreigner was hardly conceivable. The foreigners in the land were few, and were themselves in a position more closely approaching that of the slave than that of the freeman (see LAW AND JUSTICE, § 14 b). Since the exile, however, a large non-Jewish population had settled in Judæa, and, to the great mortification of the Jews, had attained a position of wealth and prosperity in marked contrast with that of the poor returning exiles.

In so far as these laws are bound up with the idea of a year of jubilee they of course were never carried into practical effect any more than the year itself was observed. But the idea underlying them nevertheless gained the upper hand; the idea, namely, that for an Israelite to own his brother Israelite as a slave is irreconcilable with the essential nature of the theocracy. The poor who had sunk to such a degree of poverty realised the ignominy of such a position as they had never done before; essentially they knew themselves the equals of their rich brethren and the possessors of equal privileges. When in Nehemiah's day the severe stress of the times had compelled numbers of the poorer people to pledge themselves and their children to their richer brethren to save themselves from starvation, the situation was shocking to them, and they turned to Nehemiah. Nehemiah took their part, censured the nobles and wealthier classes for their impiety, and succeeded in inducing them to free their poor brethren from their mortgages (Neh. 5 1 ff.). This fundamental principle—that no Jew can ever be a slave—was taken over by the later Talmudic law; even the thief, who had been sold for his crime, was not to be regarded as a slave (see Winter, op. cit. 10 ff.). And when the manifold wars of Seleucids and Ptolemies again and again reduced multitudes of Jews to slavery under heathen masters, their redemption was regarded as a sacred duty and a meritorious service (1 Macc. 3 41 2 Macc. 8 11).

The same legal principles apply substantially to the Israelite female slave; but in the older period the release at the end of the seven years could not apply, the woman being her master's concubine. If an Israelite girl was sold by her father to a master—which of course happened only when he was unable to sell her to a husband—the purchaser was bound to treat her as his wife in respect of 'food and raiment and duty of marriage.' If he failed in any of these respects, he had to set her at liberty for nothing. If the purchaser did not desire to marry her at all, he could give her to his son as concubine. If, however, he did not wish this either, then he could sell her only to a purchaser who wished her for a concubine, not to a foreigner; but, holding this position, she could not become a freewoman in the seventh year. Not till we reach the time of D do we find the privilege of release in the seventh year claimed for her with the option of voluntarily remaining in slavery. It appears that in the time of D the ancient custom according to which the female slave had the position of concubine no longer prevailed. According to Talmudic decisions a wife can never be sold as a slave; but the father had the right to sell his daughter as long as she was under marriageable age (cp Winter, op. cit.).

6. Retrospect. From what has been said it will be manifest that the lot of slaves, in its legal aspects, was not specially hard, and custom, even if in various respects often coming short of the law, in other important respects demanded more. From everything that we read about slaves we gather that they were treated as members of the family, and that the head cared for their well-being as for that of his own children. The whole manner of their relations with their masters shows that they were treated, not as dumb, driven creatures, but as men with minds of their own which they were free to express.

Saul is indebted to his slave for his information about Samuel the seer and his importance, and it is his slave who lends him the prophet's fee (1 S. 9 6 ff.). It is a slave who advises Abigail to make peace with David—quite against the will of the master of the house—and she follows his advice (1 S. 25 14 ff.). Eliezer in the patriarchal legend figures as the comptroller of the household, and is invested with a sort of guardianship over Isaac, the son of the house (Gen. 24 1 ff.). Compare also the relation of Ziba to Meribbaal, Jonathan's son (2 S. 9 1 ff. 16 1 ff.). The slave could even marry the daughter of the house (1 Ch. 2 34 f.), and, failing a son, become the heir (Gen. 15 2 ff.).

In the last resort this favourable position of slaves arose from the fact that as members of the family they were admitted to the family worship. To the ancient view this came as a matter of course. The slave could not have his own worship, his own god; as housemate he must necessarily participate in the worship of the master of the house. So Eliezer prays to 'the God of his master Abraham' (Gen. 24 12, etc.). The Priestly Code expressly demands the circumcision of slaves (Gen. 17 12). This, too, must have been in ancient times a matter of course. Otherwise the alien slave would have been a continual source of religious pollution for the whole house. This also is the tacit presupposition of Deuteronomy when in its humane concern for the slave it requires that he be allowed to participate in sacrifice and feast (12 18 16 11). The non-Israelite, the uncircumcised person, could not possibly be admitted to a share in the sacrificial meal. The slave, being admitted to the family worship, becomes (in the earliest times when ancestor-worship comes in) capable of continuing this worship and thus of inheriting (see above). It is in this standing which the slave enjoys as a co-religionist and fellow-worshipper that the most powerful possible motive is found for his master to treat him with kindness and fatherly care, just as to-day, in Islam, slaves as fellow-believers are treated with all humaneness. The brotherhood in the faith in Islam now, as in Israel of old, is not, as unfortunately it has come to be in the Christian world, a mere empty phrase, but a very real force.

SLING. Two Hebrew words have been so rendered.

1. קֶלַע, ḳéla', σφενδόνη [πετροβόλος in Job 41 20], funda; 1 S. 17 40 50 25 29 2 Ch. 26 14 Job 41 20 Zech. 9 15 Ecclus. 47 4.

2. מַרְגֵּמָה, margēmāh, σφενδόνη, Prov. 26 8†, AV and RV[mg.] (RV 'heap of stones'; so Frankenberg). 'The least improbable translation is that of AV' (Toy, ad loc.); but the sense of 'sling' seems incapable of proof. Like רגמה in Ps. 68 28 the word is probably corrupt.

3. σφενδόνη, 1 Macc. 6 51 ('instruments for casting fire and stones, and pieces to cast darts and slings'). See SIEGE, § 4.

[In 1 S. 14 14 b, the text of which in MT is corrupt (as a reference to AV and RV will suggest), 𝔊 introduces a mention of 'pebbles,' apparently meaning sling stones. The words are ἐν βολίσι καὶ [ἐν πετροβόλοις καὶ ἐν] κόχλαξιν τοῦ πεδίου. For צמד שדה 𝔊 seems to have read וּבְצֻרֵי הַשָּׂדֶה, 'and with flints (of the plain).' But this does not at all suit. We must look further. There are many parallels for this correction of צמד שדה (RV 'in

Out of מצב המצב, by transposition and corruption, צמרשרה arose. 'Pebbles' (κόχλαξ) also appears in 1 Macc. 10 73; slingers, it is implied, would find a lack of sling-stones in the Philistian plain (cp FLINT).—T. K. C.]

From its simplicity, it might have been inferred that the sling (קלע), an improvement upon the simple act of throwing stones,[1] was one of the earliest forms of weapon. It is not surprising, therefore, to find that it was employed in quite remote times by shepherds as a protection against wild animals, by agriculturists to drive away birds (Wilk. Anc. Eg. 1 381), and also by hunters (Dennis, Cities and Cemeteries of Etruria, 1 312 [1878]), and by the light-armed soldier in warfare (ibid. 1 210; for the Arabians cp Doughty, Ar. Des. 2 176). In Palestine the shepherd carried a sling, in addition to his staff, and a bag to hold his smooth stone bullets (1 S. 17 40); and the Benjamite warriors are supposed to have been renowned for their effective use of this weapon, employing it as well with the left hand as with the right (cp Judg. 20 16 1 Ch. 12 2). In Judith 9 7 it is mentioned as one of the weapons in which the Assyrians trusted.

We possess illustrations of the sling from Egypt, from Assyria (Layard, Nineveh [1852], 332), and from Rome. The Egyptian slinger is in the act of throwing (Wilk. 1 210). The sling is made of a plaited thong,[2] the centre being broad enough to form a receptacle (כַּף, kaph, 1 S. 25 29) for the stone.[3] One end seems to be attached to the hand, the other being simply held; the part of the sling in which the stone is lodged is loosely supported by the other hand. The sling is swung over the head (cp Ecclus. 47 4), apparently with some such motion as in bowling, the loose end flying into the air. The stones are carried in a bag which hangs from the shoulder. In the illustration from Rome the sling (funda) seems to be of the same kind (see Rich, Dict. under 'funda'); but only one hand is employed, whilst the stones are held in a fold of the slinger's mantle by the other.[4] The slingers seem to have worn, as a rule,[5] no armour, and to have carried no other weapons (Erman, Anc. Eg. 524; cp Rich, under 'Funditores'). A. Lang (Homer and the Epic, 375 f.) explains why there are so few references to the sling in Homer (see Il. 13 599 716) by the remark that Homer 'scarcely ever speaks at all of the equipment of the light-armed crowd'; the sling 'was the weapon of the unarmed masses, as of David in Israel.'

The sling is still used in Syria, in Egypt, and in Arabia. You may still come upon young Syrian shepherds practising with their slings (see, e.g., Harper, In Scripture Lands, 140); Doughty speaks of Arab boys 'armed as it were against some savage beast with slings in their hands' (Ar. Des. 1 432), but Thomson (Land and Book [1894], 572) only saw it used at Ḥâṣbeiya, on Mount Hermon, by boys in 'mimic warfare.'

It was long in use among Europeans, too, even the simplest form of it (see above) surviving. Thus it was used by the Anglo-Saxons, though 'whether for warfare or the chase alone, it is not easy to determine' (Hewitt, Ancient Armour in Europe, 1 58 f., fig. on p. 59). Hewitt also gives later instances (1 156; see the interesting plates, xxvii. l. li.); it was used in battle as late as the sixteenth century (3 605). M. A. C.

American Indians (Schoolcraft, as quoted in Keller, Lake Dwellings [ET], 1 141; 'there is evidence to show that, as an amusement, it was "very common amongst the ancient races"'). The practice seems to have continued, even among the Romans, in addition to the other; the accensi, as distinguished from the funditores, threw the stones with their hands (see Rich, Dict. under 'Funditores').

[2] Slings were also made of 'twisted hair, sometimes human hair' (Schliemann, Ilios, 437 [1880]).

SMYRNA (CMYPNA WH, ZM. Ti, Rev. 1 11; ἐν Σμύρνῃ, Rev. 2 8).[1] Smyrna is a very ancient town; its history falls into two distinct periods, associated with two distinct sites. Old Smyrna (ἡ παλαιὰ Σμύρνα, Strabo, 646; cp Paus. vii. 5 1) stood at the NE. corner of the bay under Mt. Sipylos above the alluvial plain of the mod. Burnabat. It was said to have been built by the Amazons (Strabo, 550), in whom we may trace a tradition of the Hittite occupation of Lydia. To them also was ascribed the foundation of Ephesus, Cyme, and Myrina.[2]

1. History of old city.

The Amazons were primarily the priestesses of that Asiatic nature-goddess whose worship the Hittites introduced into western Asia Minor (see EPHESUS, DIANA). Upon the arrival of the Greeks in Asia Minor the town was occupied by the northern section, who are called the Æolians; but the Colophonians seized it by treachery, and thenceforth it ranked as an Ionic city (Herod. 1 150). Its position gave it the command of the trade of the valley of the Hermus which flows into its gulf, and made it the most powerful rival of the Lydian capital, Sardis, which lay on the middle Hermus, about 54 R. m. to the East. Hence a primary object of the policy of the Lydian dynasty of the Mermnadæ was to make themselves masters of Smyrna and the other Greek towns on the coast (see LYDIA).

Smyrna successfully resisted the attack of Gyges (Paus. iv. 21 5 ix. 29 2), but succumbed to that of Alyattes (about 580 B.C.; Herod. 1 16). Smyrna was destroyed, and its inhabitants dispersed in villages; 'it was organised on the native Anatolian village system, not as a Greek πόλις' (Rams. Hist. Geog. AM 62, n.; cp Strabo, 646, Λυδῶν δὲ κατασπασάντων τὴν Σμύρναν περὶ τετρακόσια ἔτη διετέλεσεν οἰκουμένη κωμηδόν). The trade of Smyrna was taken over by Phocæa, which, like the other Greek towns, was absorbed in the Lydian empire; when Phocæa in its turn was destroyed by the Persians, Ephesus became the chief commercial city in this region. Some of the extant early electrum or gold coins with the lion type, usually classed as issued by Sardis, may really be mementoes of the early commercial greatness of Smyrna (so Rams. op. cit. 62).

Alexander the Great, warned, it is said, by a vision (Paus. vii. 5 1), conceived the design of restoring Smyrna as a city. This design was actually carried into effect by his successors Antigonus and Lysimachus; the earliest undoubtedly Smyrnæan coins are in fact tetradrachms of Lysimachus, bearing the turreted head of Cybele with whose worship Smyrna was always prominently associated. New Smyrna thus arose, nearly three hundred years after its destruction. The new site, about three miles (Strabo, 634, περὶ εἴκοσι σταδίους) S. of the old site, was on the shore of the gulf, at the foot of Mount Pagos, the last western member of that chain of hills which, under various names (Olympus, Tmolus), divides the valley of the Hermus from that of the Cayster. The natural beauty of the mountain-girt plain was remarked by the ancients.[3]

2. The new city.

The architecture of the city was worthy of its setting. The streets were laid out in straight lines at right angles

[1] Σμύρναν is read in the 'western' text for Μύρρα in Acts 27 5 in D. The more ancient form of the name, down to the end of Trajan, was Ζμύρνα or Ἰμύρνα; later it was written in the familiar form Σμύρνα (Cμύρνα). See the coins, and cp Furneaux, note on Tac. Ann. 3 63.

[2] The part of Ephesus which owed its foundation to the Amazons was called Samorna or Smyrna (Strabo, 633 f.). And Myrina is evidently the same word, initial Σ being lost, as in μικρός for σμικρός (Sayce on Herod. 1 15).

[3] Pliny, HN 5 31 'montes Asiæ nobilissimi in hoc tractu fere explicant se'; Strabo, 646, καλλίστη τῶν πασῶν, μέρος μέν τι ἔχουσα ἐπ' ὄρει τετειχισμένον, κ.τ.λ.

to one another, after the system of Hippodamus of Miletus, who had so laid out Thurii (443 B.C.) and the Piræus for Pericles (for the Ἱπποδάμειος τρόπος see Aristot. Pol. 4 (7) 11 = 1330 b, 21 f.). Extending from the temple of Cybele, the 'Golden Street' ran right across the city to the opposite temple of 'Zeus upon the Heights.' The only drawback was that, being unprovided with drains, the streets were sometimes flooded by storm-water (Strabo, 646). Many temples (those of Cybele, Zeus, the Nemeses, Apollo, Asklepios, and Aphrodite Stratonikis were the chief), a Stadium, an Odeum, a Public Library, an Homerium dedicated to Homer, a Theatre (one of the largest in Asia Minor), and several two-storied Stoai (Strabo, l.c. στοαί τε μεγάλαι τετράγωνοι, ἐπίπεδοί τε καὶ ὑπερῷοι) made Smyrna one of the most magnificent cities of the East. Few remains of this ancient splendour survive.

Smyrna also possessed a good harbour, which could be closed (Strabo, l.c. λιμὴν κλειστός). Apart from the prosperity arising from the fact that the bulk of the trade of the Hermus valley passed through its port, the territory of Smyrna was very fertile and produced much wine.

The people of New Smyrna were gifted with political sagacity which stood them in good stead in dealing with the Seleucidæ and afterwards with the Romans. The decree is still extant (243 B.C.) in which mention is made of the temple of Aphrodite Stratonikis, which was (by a sort of false etymology or play upon words) associated with the honour paid by the Smyrnæans to Stratonice, wife of Antiochus I. (see CIG 3137 = Hicks, Manual, no. 176). In return, Seleucus II. declared both the temple and the city to have rights of asylum. By this pronouncement the city was removed from his jurisdiction and probably exempted from the necessity of providing troops or of receiving his garrisons (see Holm, Gk. Hist., ET, 4 449). During the war with Antiochus the Great the Smyrnæans embraced the Roman cause and were, upon its conclusion, granted the privileges of a civitas (sine fœdere) libera et immunis for their loyalty (cp Polyb. 21 48 and CIG 3202, 3204 f.).

When the Romans finally occupied Asia, Smyrna became the centre of a conventus juridicus which embraced the region from Myrina to Teos and the skirts of Mount Sipylos as far as Magnesia (Pliny, HN 5 31; Cic. Pro Flacc. 29). In the war with Mithridates it retained its loyal attitude (cp Tac. Ann. 4 56). The sole exception to the course of prosperity arose when Trebonius, one of Cæsar's murderers, took refuge within its walls and was besieged by Dolabella, who finally captured the city and put Trebonius to death (Strabo, 646; Dio Cass. 47 29 Cic. Phil. 11 2).

According to Tacitus (Ann. 4 56), the Smyrnæans had, as early as the consulship of Marcus Porcius Cato (195 B.C.), erected a temple dedicated to Roma. On the ground of their constant loyalty, and this display of it, they made claim before Tiberius in 26 A.D. to the privilege of erecting a temple to the emperor. Out of the list of the contending Asiatic cities Sardis and Smyrna were preferred, and Smyrna won the day (see NEOCOROS). There is extant a Smyrnæan coin bearing on the obverse a figure of Tiberius in the centre of a temple, with the inscription Σεβαστὸς Τιβέριος (Eckh. 2 547).

It is not surprising to find, therefore, that, Asia Minor being under the Empire the 'paradise of municipal vanity' (Mommsen, RG 5 302), Smyrna vied with its neighbours in the accumulation and assertion of empty titles. Like Sardis, Pergamos, and other cities (see Momms.-Marq. Röm. Staatsverw. 1 343), she held the title of metropolis.

Her great rival in this respect was Ephesus, who enjoyed the high-sounding titles πρώτη πασῶν καὶ μεγίστη, and μητρόπολις τῆς Ἀσίας. What exactly the possession of the title πρώτη implied that the mutual strife for this 'primacy' (πρωτεῖα) should have been so keen (cp Aristides, Or. 1 771, Dind.; Dio Chrys. Or. 2 148 R.) is not certainly known; but probably it was connected with the question of precedence at the games of the κοινὸν Ἀσίας (see ASIARCH). The strife between Smyrna and Ephesus continued until the emperor Antoninus settled the dispute (Philostr. Op., ed. Kayser, p. 231 24, καὶ ἀπῆλθεν ἡ Σμύρνα τὰ πρωτεῖα νικῶσα).

The coinage of Smyrna richly illustrates the above points. From the time of its ruin by Alyattes to that of its restoration, there was of course no issue of coins. The usual silver coins of Roman Asia, the Cistophori, in the case of Smyrna bear the legend ZMYP, with the head of Cybele as a symbol. The imperial coins bear the honorary titles Νεωκόρων; πρώτων Ἀσίας, or πρώτων Ἀσίας γʹ νεωκόρων τῶν σεβαστῶν κάλλει καὶ μεγέθει (the third Neocorate here asserted begins towards the end of Sept. Severus). Certain coins bearing a figure of Homer seated were called Ὁμήρεια (Strabo, 646), and perhaps reproduced some statue in the Homerium. In addition to the worship of the Sipylene Mother (Cybele) to which the epithet Σιπυληνή on certain coins refers, the cult of the Nemeses was largely practised in Smyrna, and on some coins are seen figures of two Nemeses appearing in a vision to Alexander and charging him to restore the city (Paus. vii. 5 1 f.). The Griffin, a frequent Smyrnæan type, symbolises this worship, just as the Lion symbolises that of Cybele.

3. NT references.

Points of contact between the above and the address in Rev. 2 8 f. are not very obvious, though not entirely wanting. Probably many phrases would fall upon the ears of those for whom the message was intended, with a force which is now quite lost. Especially may this have been the case at Smyrna, where much importance was attached to a method of divination from chance phrases (Paus. ix. 11 7, 'divination by means of voices . . . is, to my knowledge, more employed by the people of Smyrna than by any other such people'). Outside the walls there was a 'sanctuary of voices.' It has been suggested, therefore, that the words with which the message opens would come with peculiar force to those who perhaps had heard similar phrases in the pagan mysteries. Similarly, the phrase 'crown of life' (v. 10, τὸν στέφανον τῆς ζωῆς) must inevitably have suggested or have been suggested by a prominent feature of life at Smyrna—the public Games (cp Paus. vi. 14 3 f. for a striking incident occurring at one of the celebrations held at Smyrna, in 68 A.D.). It was on such an occasion that the Asiarch Philippus was forced by popular clamour to doom the aged Polycarp to death (155 A.D.). The Games were characteristic of pagan life, and socially, though not politically, they would serve as an effective touchstone of sentiment. The fact that on the occasion of Polycarp's martyrdom the Jews also took part in accusing him of enmity to the state religion, is strikingly in accord with the words of Rev. 2 9, where the Jews of Smyrna are called 'a synagogue of Satan.' 'He that overcometh' must also be used with reference to the gymnastic and other contests familiar to the Smyrnæans. It would, however, probably be a mistake to confine the suggestiveness of the phraseology too narrowly.

The 'crown of life,' for example, may also have associations connected with the complimentary crown bestowed upon municipal and other officials for good service. It is also noteworthy that many Smyrnæan coins show a wreath or crown within which is the Lion symbol, or a magistrate's name or monogram (see illustration in Head, Hist. Numm. 509). This emblem also might enter into the complex associations of the words, which it is the task of historical imagination to revivify.

SNAIL occurs twice in the OT as the translation of two terms.

1. חֹמֶט, ḥōmeṭ (Lev. 11 30), where, however, some kind of LIZARD (q.v.) is meant (RV 'sand-lizard').

2. שַׁבְּלוּל, šabbĕlūl (Ps. 58 8 [9]), a word of uncertain etymology, which is found in the Targ. under the form תֵּבְלְלָא. The rendering 'snail' is probable and is supported by the Talm. Shabbāth, 77 b, where Rashi, in his commentary, explains it by limace. Ewald, with less probability, follows 𝔊 and Vg. (κηρός, cera) and renders 'melted wax.' Some land snail is probably referred to, and the allusion to its melting away may have reference to the trail of slime which the mollusc leaves behind it as it crawls, or may refer to the retirement of these animals into cracks and crevices, where they are no more seen, at the approach of the dry season. The land and freshwater mollusca of Syria are fairly numerous and varied, and it is interesting to note that the Dead Sea contains no molluscs, whilst the sea of Tiberias has a rich molluscan fauna. Bliss (A Mound of Many Cities, 110) found a quantity of snail shells; 'snails had doubtless been used for food.' [A strong protest is raised against the prevalent view of the text of this passage by Cheyne, Ps.[(2)].]

SNOW (שֶׁלֶג, šéleg; Bib.-Aram. תְּלַג, tĕlag; Ass. šalgu; χιων). Like rain and hail, the snow was traditionally supposed to be kept in store-chambers in the sky (Job 38 22). It is at God's command that it falls (Job 37 6 Ecclus. 43 13); it is he who 'plucks out snow like wool' (Ps. 147 16, read הַנֹּתֵק). Its sure effect in fertilising the ground supplies a figure for the certainty of prophecy (Is. 55 10 f.); its brilliant whiteness, for the clear complexion of those exempt from agricultural toil (Lam. 4 7), for a conscience free from the sense of guilt (Ps. 51 7 [9] Is. 1 18), for the appearance of lepers (Ex. 4 6 Nu. 12 10 2 K. 5 27), for the shining raiment (Dan. 7 9) and hair (Rev. 1 14) of a heavenly or divine being. No less than five references to snow occur in the Book of Job. In describing the treachery of his friends, Job refers to the ice and snow which help to swell the streams from the mountains in spring[1] (Job 6 16); and twice again he refers to the snow water (9 30 24 19 [not in 𝔊]).

The phrase 'it snowed on Zalmon' (so Driver, Par. Ps.) in Ps. 68 14 [15] is puzzling; we should have expected 'on Hermon.' Appearances point strongly to the view that the passage is corrupt. See ZALMON.

A beautiful proverb (Prov. 25 13) reminds us how enduring Oriental customs are.

Like the cooling of snow [in a drink] in time of harvest,
Is a trustworthy messenger to him who has sent him;
He refreshes the soul of his lord.

One could think that this proverb had been written in Damascus; sherbet cooled with snow was hardly a summer drink at Jerusalem. Indeed, 'snow' and 'summer' to an ordinary citizen of Jerusalem suggested incongruous ideas (see Prov. 26 1, 𝔊 δρόσος). Jeremiah refers to the eternal snows of Lebanon (Jer. 18 14; see SIRION), and in the eulogy of the pattern woman it is said (Prov. 31 21[2]) that she needs not to be afraid even of 'snow' (i.e., of the coldest days of winter) for her household because 'they are clothed with scarlet' (or, 'with double clothing'; see COLOURS, § 14). In a famous passage (2 S. 23 20 = 1 Ch. 11 22) Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada, is said to have slain, not only two lion-like men of Moab (so AV) and a 'goodly' Miṣrite (see MIZRAIM, § 2 b, col. 3164), but also 'a lion in the midst of a pit in time of snow.' Why the snow is referred to, however, is not clear. An old French Hebraist (Vatable in Crit. Sac. 2 2462) says it is because lions are strongest in the winter. The Hebrew, however, has not 'in time of snow,' but 'in the day of the snow'—i.e., on some one day on which heavy snow had fallen.'[3] Such a snowfall might be mentioned as something remarkable from its rarity. In 1 Macc. 13 22 we read of 'a very great snow' which hindered the movements of Trypho, the opponent of Jonathan and Simon the Maccabees. It is conceivable that a lion 'had strayed up the Judæan hills from Jordan, and had been caught in a sudden snowstorm' (GASm. HG 65), and that Benaiah went down into the cistern into which the animal had fallen and killed it; but the passage is full of textual errors.

Klostermann and Budde read thus (cp ARIEL)—
'The same (Benaiah) slew two young lions near their lair;[4] he also went down and slew the (parent) lion in the midst of the pit on the day of the snow.' More probably, however, the passage records the slaying of two Jerahmeelites (הארִיה, אראל) in Maacath-'arab—i.e., Arabian Maacath, on the day (i.e., famous battle) of Ishmael. See Crit. Bib.

South of Hebron snow is rare, and along the seaboard of Philistia and Sharon, as well as in the Jordan valley, it is altogether unknown. In Jerusalem it is to be seen in the streets two winters in three; but it soon disappears. Very snowy winters, however, do occur.

In the winter of 1857 the snow was 8 inches deep and covered the eastern plains for a fortnight. The results were disastrous.[1] Nearly a fourth of the houses of Damascus were injured, and some of the flat-roofed bazaars and mosques were left in heaps of ruins. The winter of 1879 was still more remarkable; 17 inches of snow, even where there was no drift, are recorded.[2]

SO (סוֹא; ϲηγωρ [B], ϲωα [A], on 𝔊ᴸ see below; Vg. Sua). In 2 K. 17 4 we read 'the king of Assyria found conspiracy in Hoshea, for he had sent messengers to So, king of Egypt.' This happened in, or directly before, 725 B.C. Egyptologists formerly looked to the first two names of the Ethiopian or twenty-fifth dynasty of Egypt, Shabaka or his successor Shabataka. In accordance with an erroneous chronology, that dynasty was believed to have begun in 728, and the conquest of Egypt and Hoshea's embassy seemed to coincide very remarkably.[3] In the first place, however, the names of Shaba(or bi)ka (Šabaku in cuneiform transcription, Sabakōn in Herod 2 137, and in Manetho) or Shaba (or bi)taka (Sebichos, Manetho) could not satisfactorily be compared with So, which would have been an unparalleled mutilation, not to mention the insuperable difficulty of Egyptian š as Semitic s. In the second place the chronology must now be considered impossible. We know, as the only firm point for the chronology of the Ethiopian kings, that Tirhaka-Tah(a)rḳō died in 668/67 and that his successor (Tandamani) was expelled from Egypt during the following year. Manetho gives to the first three Ethiopian kings, 40 (Africanus) or 44 years (Syncellus), Herodotus 50 years to the only Ethiopian king whom he knows, Diodorus 36 years to all four kings. The monuments insure 12 + 26 (not more) + 3 + 3 (alleged, and not counted) years to the dynasty. The maximum for the beginning of the Ethiopian family in Egypt would thus be 712; probably it is rather to be assumed some years later (about 709?). Consequently, Samaria had been destroyed and Hoshea had perished before the Ethiopians conquered Egypt. As kings of Ethiopia alone, they could not come into consideration for Syrian politics. Winckler (MVAG, 1898, p. 29) has made it probable that Shabaka, the Ethiopian conqueror of Egypt, lived in peace with Assyria, exchanging presents with Sennacherib. Furthermore, we should expect the title 'king of Kush-Ethiopia' in the case of the alleged Ethiopian ruler, or Pharaoh in the case of a true Egyptian prince.

The cuneiform inscriptions of Sargon tell us of Sib'e, a turtanu—i.e., general or viceroy—of Pir'u, king of Muṣri, who vainly assisted the rebellion of Ḫanunu of Gaza against Assyria and suffered a complete defeat at Raphia (Rapiḫi) in 720 by Sargon. We see from the cuneiform orthography that the biblical form So ought to be vocalised Sewe or, better still, that the w is a corruption for b and the original reading was Sib'e. Winckler's first suggestion of the possibility that this Sib'e was not a petty Egyptian prince but a Muṣrite, a representative of the king Pir'u (not Pharaoh) of Muṣri —i.e., Northern Arabia—was in AOF 126 (cp GI 1 170); in MVAG, 1898, pt. i., he finally treated it as certain (see now KAT(3) 146). The correctness of this view is evident (cp HOSHEA, col. 2127), although the old, impossible theory (see above) is still frequently found repeated.

Very remarkable is the form of 2 K. 17 4 in 𝔊ᴸ, which substitutes for So, 'Adramelech, the Ethiopian, residing in Egypt' (Ἀδραμελεχ τὸν Αἰθίοπα τὸν κατοικοῦντα ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ). Seductive as this piece of information looks —only the name Adramelech could never be treated as an Egyptian or Ethiopian name—it is shown by the data of the cuneiform inscriptions to be an exegetical addition, quite in harmony with the paraphrastic character of 𝔊 which presents such an analogy to the Targum. It is quite remarkable that the Jewish scholars who inserted this addition knew enough about the history of Egypt to think of that Ethiopian dynasty (the date of which they, like modern Egyptologists, put too high, see above) and to conclude that an Egyptian ally of Israel could have been only a governor under the king, residing in remote Napata. This imperfect (cp the date and the impossible name Adramelech) knowledge cannot be accepted, however, as historical evidence outweighing the direct testimony of the monuments. [See further Crit. Bib.] W. M. M.

SOAP, or SOPE, in modern language, means a compound of certain fatty acids with soda or potash, the potash forming the 'soft,' the soda the 'hard' soaps of commerce. Soap is believed to have been invented by the Gauls, and became known to the Romans at a comparatively late date. Pliny says fit ex sebo et cinere, and that the best is prepared from goat-tallow and the ashes of the beech-tree. A soap-boiling establishment with soap in a good state of preservation has been excavated at Pompeii.

The word 'soap' is used in EV to translate the Heb. bōrīth (בֹּרִית, a derivation of √ברר, cp בֹּר, 'cleanness') in two passages (Jer. 2 22 Mal. 3 2†)[1] which allude to the cleansing of the person and of fabrics respectively. It is not possible to ascertain exactly what substance, or substances, are intended. As a rule the ancients cleansed themselves by oiling their bodies and scraping their skins, and by baths, and they cleaned their clothes by rubbing with wood ashes and natural earths, such as fuller's earth, carbonates of sodium, etc. They cleansed their wine and oil casks and their marble statues with potash lyes.[2] Natural carbonate of soda (see NITRE) was also used, as well as the juices of certain plants (see below) which, owing to the presence of saponin, form a soap-like lather with water. See LYE, NITRE.

Canon Tristram states that considerable quantities of soft soap are, at the present day, manufactured in Palestine by boiling olive oil with potash, procured by burning several species of Salicornia (glass wort) and Salsola (salt wort), especially S. Kali, which abound in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea and in the salt marshes which fringe the coast. Cp Lōw, 43. A. E. S.

SOCHO (שׂוֹכוֹ), 1 Ch. 4 18 AV, RV Soco, a name in the genealogy of the b'nē JUDAH, cp SOCOH, 1.

SOCOH (שׂוֹכֹה in Josh. Kt.; but Kr. שׂוֹכוֹ as in Ch., where RV has Soco; in S. and K. שֹׂכֹה [Kt.] שׂוֹכוֹ [Kr.]; σωχω [BAL]).

1. A town in the Shephelah of Judah, grouped with Jarmuth, Adullam, Azekah, etc.; (Josh. 15 35 σαωχω [B]), and mentioned with Azekah in the description of the encampment of the Philistines in 1 S. 17 1 (cp EPHES-DAMMIM), where AV has Shochoh ([εἰς] σοκχωθ[3]

[1] In both passages 𝔊 has ποία or ποά, ℵ* by a curious mistake in Mal. 3 2 πλοῖα ('grass'); Vg. in Jer. has herbam borith, in Mal. herba fullonum.

[2] Fullers also used putrid urine, which was so offensive that they were compelled to live beyond the walls or in remote parts of the city of Rome.

[3] The reading Σοκχωθ represents a plur. form; cp Eus. OS(2) 293 32 (Σοκχω· κῶμαι εἰσί δύο . . . ἡ μὲν ἀνωτέρα, ἡ δὲ κατωτέρα Σοκχωθ χρηματίζουσαι) and Jer. ib. 151 21 . . . unus in monte et alter in campo situs, qui Sochoth nuncupantur. Both Eusebius and Jerome strangely confuse Socoh with Succoth-benoth (2 K. 17 30).

[BL], εισογχω [A], Jos. Ant. vi. 9 1 σωκους). Socoh was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11 7 Shoco AV, σοκχωθ [BA], σοκχω [L], σωχω [Jos. Ant. viii. 10 1]), but, according to the Chronicler, was taken by the Philistines in the reign of Ahaz (2 Ch. 28 18 [Shocho AV, σοκχωθ [L]). The site intended is no doubt esh-Shuweikeh (as if a diminutive form of שׂוֹכָה). The ruins which bear this name occupy a strong position (1145 ft. above the sea level) on the S. side of the great valley of Elah (see ELAH, VALLEY OF), at the point where the Wādy eṣ-Ṣūr becomes the Wādy es-Sanṭ (cp GASm. HG 228 ff.; Che. Aids, 85). Perhaps this Socoh was the birthplace of the Antigonus who came after Simon the Righteous and preached disinterested obedience (Pirḳē Ābōth, 1 3, אנטיגנוס איש סוכו). The gentilic is plausibly found in the 'Sucathites' (Socathites) of 1 Ch. 2 55; see JABEZ.

[The trend of the present writer's criticism, however, is to show that the geography of the OT narratives has often been misunderstood and consequently misrepresented by the redactors spoken of above. Saul's struggle with the arch-enemies of his people (the Zarephathites, miscalled the Philistines; see SAUL, § 4 c) was in the Negeb. The fight described in 1 S. 17 was in the valley(?) of Jeraḥmeel ('ēmeḳ hā-'ēlāh, and 'ēphes dammīm) near Maacah—'which belongs to Jeraḥmeel'—and Azekah. A Socoh, or perhaps rather Maacah, in the Negeb was probably meant in the other passages referred to above, as they were originally read. The Sucathites too (1 Ch. 2 55) should rather be designated the 'Maacathites.' See SHABBETHAI. T. K. C.]

2. A second town of this name is grouped with Shamir, Jattir, etc., in the mountain district of Judah (Josh. 15 48 σωχα [B]), and is identified with another esh-Shuweikeh, situated 10 m. SW. of Hebron and E. of the Wādy el-Khalīl (BR 2 195). According to the ordinary view of the sphere of action of Solomon's twelve prefects (see, however, SOLOMON, § 6, note 1) this is probably the Socoh which formed part of the prefecture of BENHESED [q.v.] (1 K. 4 10 RV, AV Sochoh, σοχλω [A], σομηνχαζα [KAL]? σαμηνχα [B], αμηχα [L?]).

The Egypt. sa-a-kà, ša-o-kò in the list of Šošenḳ can hardly be identified with either of the above. From its position in this list a more northerly situation seems necessary (cp WMM As. u. Eur. 160 f. 166).

SODA (נֶתֶר), Prov. 25 20 RVmg., EV NITRE (q.v.). Cp SOAP.

SODOM AND GOMORRAH

'Sodom and Gomorrah'[1] (virtually equivalent to 'Sodom'); (2) the circumstances leading up to the culminating act of wickedness committed in Sodom; and (3) the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah and other cities, and the escape of Lot and his two daughters. The sin of Sodom is often referred to as typical of horrible and obstinate wickedness, Is. 1 10 3 9 Jer. 23 14 Dt. 32 32; and its destruction as a warning, Is. 1 7 9 13 19 Jer. 49 18 Zeph. 2 9 Dt. 29 22 Am. 4 11 Lam. 4 6 (for EV's 'iniquity' and 'sin' read 'punishment'). Sometimes, too, it is mentioned alone as the destroyed guilty city, Gen. 19 13 ('this place' = Sodom) Is. 1 7 3 9 Lam. 4 6 (cp Gen. 14 17 ff. [but in v. 17 𝔊^L inserts καὶ βασ. γομ.], where the king of Sodom figures alone); but Gomorrah is often mentioned too, Gen. 13 10 18 20 19 24 28 Is. 1 9 f. 13 19 Jer. 23 14 Am. 4 11 Zeph. 2 9 Dt. 32 32. 'Neighbour cities' are also referred to in Jer. 49 18 50 40; cp Ezek. 16 46 ff. ('Sodom and her daughters'). In Hos. 11 8 Admah and Zeboim, and in Dt. 29 23 [22] Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim are given as the ruined cities; cp Gen. 10 19 and 14 2, where in like manner these four cities are mentioned together. In Wisd. 10 6 the inexact phrase 'Pentapolis' is used (see RV). The description of the sin of Sodom in Ezek. 16 49*b* 50*a* is evidently based on the legend known to us from Gen. 19, and similarly that of the punishment in Dt. 29 23 [22] agrees with that given in the traditional text of Gen. 19 24-26. Allusions to the fate of Sodom appear to occur in Ps. 11 6 [but see below] 140 10 [11] Job 18 15 Is. 34 9 f. Jer. 20 16 Ezek. 38 22. Curiously enough, in a geographical passage (Gen. 10 19), Sodom and Gomorrah and Admah and Zeboim are spoken of as if still in existence. These are the data relative to the history of Sodom and the other cities supplied by the traditional text.

The references to Sodom (Gomorrah is rarely added) in the Apocrypha and in the NT are as follows—2 Esd. 2 8 5 7 7 36 Ecclus. 16 8 Wisd. 19 14 Mt. 10 15 (Mk. 6 11 [not in best texts] Lk. 10 12) Lk. 17 29 Rom. 9 29 (quotation) 2 Pet. 2 6 Jude 7 Rev. 11 8 (cp Ezek. 23 3, etc.).

Before proceeding further it is necessary to refer briefly to the critical analysis of the section in which the Sodom-story is contained (Gen. 18-19 28). That v. 28 belongs to the Priestly Writer is admitted; its true place is probably after 13 12*a* (P), which states that 'Lot dwelt in the cities of הכבר' (rather ירחמאל, 'Jeraḥmeel'). With regard to the rest of the section, it is admitted that there has been a prolonged process of editorial manipulation. Only thus indeed can we account for the singular combination of passages which refer to Yahwè as the speaker and actor with other passages which indicate three men as charged with representative divine functions, and for the not less singular fact (1) that whereas Abraham's hospitality is claimed by 'three men,' Lot receives into his house only two men, who are called in the present text of 19 1 'the two mal'ākīm (EV 'angels'),' and (2) that in 19 17, whereas the first verb is in the plural ('when they had brought them forth'), the second is in the singular ('he said'; so again, v. 21). It was long ago suggested (and the same idea has lately been worked out by Kraetzschmar[2]) that there have been imperfectly fused together two versions of the story of 'Sodom,' in one of which Yahwè was said to have appeared in a single human form, and in the other in a group of men; whether we regard these men as 'ĕlōhīm' (cp Gen. 1 26 3 22 11 7) or divine beings, the chief of whom is Yahwè, or as 'mal'ākīm' (commonly rendered 'angels'), does not affect the critical inquiry. It is impossible, however, to work out this theory to a satisfactory result; the original narrative may have been modified by editors, but we cannot to any large extent admit the theory of independent literary strata. Fripp, therefore, was justified in attempting to show[1] that in the earliest form of the story Yahwè himself was the only speaker and agent. Comparing this story, however, with analogous stories in Genesis and elsewhere, it is much more natural to suppose that in its original form three men—i.e., three 'ĕlōhīm'—were spoken of, and that the distinction between Yahwè (who remained—see 18 22*b*—to talk with Abraham) and the 'two mal'ākīm' who went to 'Sodom' was due to the same later writer who, as Wellhausen (CH 27 f.) has rendered probable, introduced 18 17-19 and 22*a*-33*a*, a passage which reveals the existence in the writer's mind of doubts as to the divine justice, such as we know to have been felt among the Jews in later times. There is also reason to think that the references to Lot's wife (19 15 f. 26; contrast v. 12) and the whole of the Zoar episode, together with the account of the birth of Moab and Ben-ammi (?), are later insertions, though by no means so late as the two insertions in ch. 18 mentioned above.[2]

2. Critical analysis.

Here, however, we are chiefly concerned with the contents of the Lot-story (ch. 19). We are told that as a punishment for disregard of the sacred law of hospitality, and for a deadly sin committed at least in intention, 'Yahwè rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire from Yahwè out of heaven, and overthrew those cities, and all the Plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground' (19 24 f. RV). Is it possible to explain the origin and meaning of this story, accepting provisionally the form in which it is given in the traditional text?[3]

3. Lot-story not historical.

That the story is historical (however laxly the word be interpreted) ought to be at once denied by those who have read the earlier legends of Genesis in the light of the comparative critical method. If the Deluge is not historical, and if Abraham and Lot are ultimately the creations of the popular imagination, how can the strange story in Gen. 19, for which, as we shall see, there are so many parallels in folk-lore, be regarded as historical? It is surely no answer to appeal to the accordance of the phenomena of the catastrophe of Sodom with those which have happened elsewhere in 'similar geological formations,' or to the justification of the traditional description of that catastrophe by 'authorities in natural science' (but not in historical criticism) and by some competent critics of the OT. For the narratives of the Hebrew Origines must be accepted or rejected as wholes. Plausible as Dawson's view[4] may be, that the description of the catastrophe of Sodom is that of 'a bitumen or petroleum eruption, similar to those which on a small scale have been so destructive in the region of Canada and the United States of America,' and the more ambitious theory of Blanckenhorn,[5] that the catastrophe, which was a real though not a historical event, began with an earthquake, continued with igneous eruptions, and ended with the covering of the sunken cities by the waters of the Dead Sea, it would require great laxity of literary interpretation to assert that this is what either the Yahwistic narrative, or the earliest references in the prophets, intend. As Lucien Gautier remarks (above, col. 1046), 'The text of Genesis speaks of a rain of fire and brimstone and a pillar of smoke rising to heaven, but neither

[1] Regretfully we abstain from drawing out the beauties of the story in chap. 18. For parallels to the divine visit see Grimm, Deutsche Mythologie, pp. xxxiv-xxxvii, and 312 f.; cp also Hom. Od. 17 485 ff.

[2] In an essay in the New World, 1 243, only the geological myth in v. 26 relative to the pillar of salt is regarded as an accretion. Gunkel (HK, Gen. 188 ff.) holds that Lot's wife played no part in the original story, and that the Zoar episode is also a later insertion, but he claims vv. 30*b*-38 for the original story.

[3] Knobel has, at any rate, noticed that the Sodom catastrophe closes the second stage in the early narrative, corresponding to the Deluge.

of an earthquake, nor of an igneous eruption, nor of an inundation.' Nor can we venture to pick and choose among the details of the story in Gen. 19.

It is of no more use to justify with some plausibility two or three expressions in a part of the Sodom-story by means of 'scientific' lore than to make it out to be, modestly put, not impossible that 'Chedorlaomer, king of Elam,' may have invaded Palestine at a time when Abraham may have lived. If 'authorities in natural science' sometimes speak as if Gen. 19 were in part historical[1] (more plausibly, based on a tradition of a real occurrence), we must remember that historical criticism and natural science are both studies which require a special training, and if critics of the OT even in the nineteenth century have thought that they could (here and in the Deluge-story) disengage a true tradition of a prehistoric natural fact from the mass of superimposed legend, one may remark in explanation that these critics belong to a transitional period, and that the criticism of to-day has to throw off the weaknesses which it has inherited from the past.

The chief extra-biblical passage in which distinct reference is made to the destruction of the cities as historical is in Strabo (xvi. 2 44), where, after describing the rugged and burnt-up rocks, exuding pitch, round about Μοασάδα (i.e., the stupendous rock-fortress Masada, near the SW. shore of the Dead Sea), the geographer mentions the native tradition that here thirteen cities once flourished. The ample circuit of Sodom their capital can, he says, still be traced. In consequence of an earthquake, and of an eruption of hot springs, charged with bitumen and sulphur, the lake advanced suddenly (ἡ λίμνη προπέσοι); some of the cities were swallowed up, and others were deserted by as many of the inhabitants as could flee. Josephus (BJ iv. 8 4), speaking of the lake Asphaltitis, upon which the country of Sodom borders, uses similar language:—'There are still the remains of the divine fire, and the shadows (σκιάς) of five cities are visible as well as the ashes produced in their fruits.'[2] It is hardly possible to avoid taking these reports together, and assuming that Strabo's informant was of the Jewish race. If we reject the claim put forward by critics in behalf of the statement in Gen. 19 24 f., we must still more certainly reject the statement of Strabo as historical evidence.[3]

[1] E.g., besides the late Sir J. W. Dawson, Canon Tristram (The Land of Israel, 356). Describing a valley at the N. end of the salt-range of Usdum, he says 'The whole appearance points to a shower of hot sulphur, and an irruption of bitumen upon it, which would naturally be calcined and impregnated with its fumes; and this at a geological period quite subsequent to all the diluvial and alluvial action of which we have such abundant evidence. The catastrophe must have been since the formation of the valley, and while the water was at its present level—therefore probably during the historic period.' Blanckenhorn, however, is more in touch with biblical critics. In his second article he expresses his adhesion to the views (then just published) of Kraetzschmar, and says, 'This makes it plain that while it is certainly very probable that the account in Genesis points to a natural occurrence which was real but not "historic," the Yahwistic form . . . is altogether different from the original tradition, which is rather to be sought in the references and figurative statements of the prophets' (ZDPV 21 69 [1898]). Whether this stress on the prophetic references, only two of which can be at all early, is justifiable, need not here be discussed.

[2] See also Tacitus, Hist. 5 37. The reference may be (1) to the fruit of the 'osher-tree ('ušar, Calotropis procera, of the family Asclepiadaceæ), which Hasselquist (Travels, 1766) calls poma sodomitica, and found in abundance about Jericho and near the Dead Sea. He says that they are sometimes filled with dust, but 'only when the fruit is attacked by an insect which turns all the inside into dust, leaving the skin only entire, and of a beautiful colour.' The tree, says Tristram (NHB 484), grows to a height of from twelve to fifteen feet, and the fruit is 'as large as an apple of average size of a bright yellow colour, hanging three or four together close to the stem.' It easily bursts when ripe, and 'supports a very singular orthopterous insect, a very large black and yellow cricket, which we found in some plenty on all the trees, but never elsewhere.' But (2) Tristram's suggestion that the fruit of the colocynth is meant deserves attention. See GOURDS [WILD]. The fruit, though fair of aspect, has a pulp which dries up into a bitter powder, used as medicine. But to suppose that the phrase 'the vine of Sodom' (Dt. 32 32) has any reference either to the colocynth or to any other botanical plant, is plainly a mistake (see the commentators).

[3] Still more obviously worthless for critical purposes is the statement of Trogus (Justin, xviii. 3 3) that the Phœnicians were forced to leave their home beside the Assyrium stagnum by an earthquake. Bunsen took this stagnum to be the Dead Sea. But, as A. von Gutschmid (Beitr. zur Gesch. des Orients, 26) pointed out, the Assyrium stagnum is certainly not the Dead Sea, but the lake of Bambyke (Mabug or Hierapolis).

SODOM AND GOMORRAH

From the point of view which is here recommended it is all-important to bring the Sodom-story into the right class of myths or semi-mythic legends. It is not necessary that mythic stories of the same class should all give the same particulars; it is enough if they agree in some leading 'motive.' Lack of space prevents us from mentioning more than a few such stories. Let us refer first to the story of the punishment of the guilty city Gortyna. 'The people of this city led a lawless existence as robbers. The Thebans, being their neighbours, were afraid, but Amphion and Zethos, the sons of Zeus and Antiope, fortified Thebes by the magic influence of Amphion's lyre. Those of Gortyna came to a bad end through the divine Apollo.'[1] 'The god utterly overthrew the Phlegyan race by continual thunderbolts and violent earthquakes; and the survivors were wasted by a pestilence.'[2] Usually, however, it pleases the creators of folk-lore to represent the punishment of wicked cities as consisting in their being submerged by water. Homer (Il. 16 384 ff.) speaks of the pernicious floods which Zeus brings by autumnal rain-storms on godless, unjust men. The well-known story of Philemon and Baucis (Ovid, Met. 8 611-724) belongs to the same subdivision. Similarly a place on the Lake of Thun is popularly said to have been destroyed because a dwarf was refused hospitality during a storm by all the inhabitants except an aged couple who dwelt in a miserable cottage.[3] A French journal of folk-lore contains a long series of folk-tales about these swallowed-up cities, most of which have a moral.[4] It is true, the moral may be omitted. Thus, according to Prof. Rhys,[5] each of the Welsh meres is supposed to have been formed by the subsidence of a city, whose bells may even now sometimes be heard pealing merrily.

4. Possible classification.

For further European examples see Tobler, Im neuen Reich, 166 ff. (1873); Grimm, Deutsche Mythologie, 546 f., and cp Usener, Religionsgeschichtl. Untersuchungen, 3 246. A story similar to that of Lot told by the Chinese Buḍdhist pilgrim, Hiouen Thsang, who travelled in India (7th cent. A.D.), may be added. There was a city called Holaolokia, which was very rich but addicted to heresy. Once an Arahat (one made free by insight) came there, and was treated inhospitably: earth and sand were thrown upon him. Only one man had pity on him, and gave him food. Then said the Arahat to him, 'Escape; in seven days a rain of earth and sand will fall upon the city, and no one will be left, because they threw earth upon me.' The man went into the city and told his relations; but they mocked him. The storm came, and the man was the only one who, by an underground passage, escaped (Paulus Cassel, Mischle Sindbad, 7 [Berlin, 1888]).

A similar story is also told in Syria. The well-known Birket Rām, two hours from Bāniās, which is evidently the crater of an extinct volcano, is said to cover with its waters a village, whose population, under aggravating circumstances, refused hospitality to a poor traveller. Usually, however, such villages or cities in Arabian legend are classified as maḳlūbāt 'overturned ones,' which at any rate implies destruction by other means than a flood; one thinks at once of the technical term mahpēkah ('overturning') used in the OT for Sodom and Gomorrah, and of Job 15 28 where the wicked man is described as dwelling in 'desolate cities . . . which were destined to become heaps.' E. H. Palmer tells us[6] how the Arabs of the neighbourhood account by a myth for the blocks of stone at the base and on the summit of Jebel Madara; stones here take the place of the brimstone and fire in our present form of the Sodom-story. Nor is it only in et-Tīh that stories of ruined cities are handed down among the Arabs, and that the desolation is accounted for by the infidelity and the abominable deeds of the former inhabitants.[1] Wetzstein (in Delitzsch's Job, Ger. ed. 197) gives a number of such stories; one of them contains a detail illustrative of the 'pillar of salt' which was once Lot's disobedient wife. At the source of the Raḳḳād (in the Jaulān) this explorer saw some erect and singularly perforated jasper formations, called el-fārida, 'the bridal procession.' Near them is its village, Ufuna, which, in spite of repeated attempts, can be no more inhabited. It remains forsaken, according to the tradition, as an eternal witness that ingratitude, especially towards God, does not escape punishment.

To put aside such facts (of which only a selection has been given) as irrelevant, and to substitute for them the speculations of 'authorities in natural science' unversed in critical researches, would involve a serious lapse from sound critical method. The case of the Sodom-story is parallel to that of the Creation-story, and still more of the Deluge-story, in the Hebrew Origines, to explain which in any degree by taking account of the subtle theorisings of geologists would detract from the clearness and validity of the approximately correct solutions of the critical problems involved. It is now beyond gainsaying that naive races, in viewing certain striking phenomena of nature, suggestive of special divine interventions, are led, by a mental law, to form mythic narratives respecting calamities which have happened to individuals or to populations under circumstances which in the most widely separated regions resemble each other. The Sodom-story in the traditional text can be in its main features explained as such a mythic narrative, and cannot otherwise be accounted for in any way that is not open to well-founded critical objection.

There are no doubt several difficulties which still remain to be dealt with. (1) There are some features in the Sodom-narrative which remind us of the strange story in Judg. 19; the introduction of these features requires explanation.

5. Difficulties.

(2) There is one reference (Gen. 14 3) to the site of the ruined cities which suggests that they were swallowed up by the waters of the Dead Sea; if the text is correct it appears to contradict the statement in 19 24, which makes no reference to a flood. (3) The expression 'overthrew' (וַיַּהֲפֹךְ) in 19 25 is, strictly speaking, inconsistent with the representation in v. 24. Blanckenhorn, it is true, has a speculative justification for the expression. But the fact that 'overturning' became the 'technical term' in literature for the destruction of Sodom may well make us hesitate to follow this eminent geologist. (4) It is almost as difficult to localise Sodom and Gomorrah as to localise Paradise.

It is only on the last of these points that we are tempted at present to dilate; but here we prefer to adopt the clear and full statement (HG, 505-8) of Prof. G. A. Smith. (It should be mentioned, however, that the question is, for us, of importance only in so far as it opens up problems as to the successive phases of the Sodom-story. The historical character of the narrative could not be rescued even if the geographical difficulty referred to were removed.)

'There is a much-debated but insoluble question whether the narratives in Genesis intend to place the cities to the N. or to the S. of the Dead Sea.

'For the northern site there are these arguments—that Abraham and Lot looked upon the cities from near Bethel, that the name Circle of Jordan is not applicable to the S. end of the Dead Sea, that the presence of five cities there is impossible, that the expedition of the Four Kings, as it swept N. from Kadesh-Barnea, attacked Hazazon Tamar, which is probably Engedi, before it reached the Vale of Siddim and encountered the king of Sodom and his allies; that the name Gomorrah perhaps exists in Tubḳ 'Amrîyeh, near Ain el-Feshkhah; and that the name of Zoar has been recovered in Tell Shāgūr.

'On the other hand, however, at the S. end of the Dead Sea there lay throughout Roman and mediæval times a city called Zoara by the Greeks and Zughar by the Arabs, which was identified by all with the Zoar of Lot. Jebel Usdum is the uncontested representative of Sodom. Hazazon Tamar may be not Engedi, but the Tamar of Ezekiel, SW. of the Dead Sea. The name "Kikkar" may surely have been extended to the S. of the Dead Sea, just as to-day the Ghor is continued for a few miles to the S. of Jebel Usdum; Jewish and Arab traditions fix on the S.; and, finally, the natural conditions are more suitable there than on the N. to the descriptions of the region both before and after the catastrophe, for there is still sufficient water and verdure on the eastern side of the Ghōr to suggest a garden of the Lord, while the shallow bay and long marshes may, better than the ground at the N. end of the sea, hide the secret of the overwhelmed cities.

'Such is the evidence for the rival sites. We can only wonder at the confidence with which all writers dogmatically decide in favour of one or the other.'

It may be added that Grove (in Smith's DB(1), art. 'Salt Sea') has argued at length for a northern site as the real one. He is supported by Canon Tristram (Land of Israel, 360-363) and Prof. Hull (Mount Seir, 165). The latter writes thus, 'From the description in the Bible, I have always felt satisfied that these cities lay in some part of the fertile plain of the Jordan to the N. of the Salt Sea, and to the W. of that river; and when visiting the ruins of Jericho, and beholding the copious springs and streams of that spot, how applicable to it would be the expression "that it was well-watered everywhere" (Gen. 13 10), the thought occurred, May not the more modern city (ancient Jericho) have arisen from the ruins of the Cities of the Plain?' We may add that the name 'Jericho' most probably comes from ירחם (Jeroham, Jarḥam) = ירחמאל (Jeraḥmeel).

Up to this point we have accepted the biblical texts in their present form. The gains of the criticism based upon these texts have not been trifling or unimportant; but the difficulties connected with the story of the destruction of Sodom have not all of them been overcome.

6. Text of Gen. 19, etc.

The passages which have now to be criticised textually are Gen. 10 19 13 10 14 19 17-25 19 30 Am. 4 11 (Is. 1 7) Hos. 11 8 Zeph. 2 9 Ps. 11 6.

(a) Gen. 10 19 defines the territory of the Canaanite as extending 'from Zidon in the territory of Gerar, as far as Gaza; in the direction of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim, as far as Lasha.' But can this be right? Zidon, Gerar, Gaza, Sodom, Lasha? That the rest of Gen. 10 has first of all become corrupt and then been manipulated by an ill-informed redactor is clear; can v. 10 be an exception? Evidently 'Canaanite' should be 'Kenizzite,' and most probably the names in v. 19*b* should be Ishmael, Jeraḥmeel, Shaul.[1]

(b) Gen. 13 10. The awkwardness of the clause 'before Yahwè destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah' has been noticed by critics; how could Lot know anything of the impending catastrophe? Other interpolations have also been noticed and yet neither the true limits of the passage, nor its meaning, have been fully understood. If we apply the right key, a full solution of the problem becomes possible. Read—'And Lot lifted up his eyes and beheld that Jeraḥmeel was everywhere well-watered [before Yahwè, etc.], like the garden of Yahwè, [like the land of Miṣrim in the direction of Missur].'[2] The description derives its points from the circumstance that Paradise was localised by early tradition in the land of Jeraḥmeel. Cp PARADISE, § 6. It is a most interesting fact that (if our restoration of the text is accepted) Sodom and Gomorrah were, like the primæval Paradise, placed by Israelitish writers in Jeraḥmeel.

(c) Gen. 14. The huge difficulties arising out of this passage are well-known. Critical opinion leans for the most part to the view that it is a post-exilic Midrash in honour of Abraham, but that it contains some material drawn directly or indirectly from a Babylonian source.[3]

[1] Cp Koran, Sur. 7 99 f.

[1] 'Admah' and 'Zeboim' were naturally added after the redactor had succeeded in producing 'Sodom' and 'Gomorrah.'

[2] The words within [] are interpolated. 'Miṣṣur' means the capital of Miṣrim.

[3] Moore, however, whilst not questioning the present text,

SODOM AND GOMORRAH

Gunkel even thinks that the scenes between Abraham and Melchizedek and the king of Sodom sound like popular tradition. He also remarks that the old tradition speaks either of Sodom and Gomorrah, or of Admah and Ṣeboim;[1] the combination of the four seems to him to rest on a later fusion of the current traditions. Winckler, too, deals with the question of the names. In v. 10 we hear only of the two kings of Sodom and Gomorrah (𝔊 and Sam., ומלך עמרה; the verb is plural). This critic, however, thinks that, as in 18 20 and 19 24, both Sodom and Gomorrah are regarded as subject to the same ruler; later editors, amplifying as usual, increased the number of kings. Far be it from us to deny the acuteness of previous critics, especially Winckler;[2] it appears to the present writer, however, that a keener textual criticism is urgently needed to bring out the real, as opposed to the imaginary, problems of the narrative. The true story seems to have stated that in the days of Abram war broke out between Jeraḥmeel king of Geshur (disguised as 'Shinar') or Ashḥur (disguised as 'Arioch') and Ishmael king of Sēlām (or Še'ulām?[3]). For twelve years the latter had been Jeraḥmeel's vassal; after this he rebelled. A year passed, and then king Jeraḥmeel came and made a raid among the Jeraḥmeelites of Zarephath, Rehoboth, and Kadesh. The king of Sēlām came out to oppose him; but he and his army were put to flight; the city of Sēlām was plundered, and Lot was one of the captives. News of this came to Abram the Hebrew, who lived at Reḥoboth (miswritten 'Hebron') and was in close alliance with the Jeraḥmeelites. At once he called together his Kenite and Jeraḥmeelite neighbours,[4] pursued the spoilers as far as Reḥob in Cushan, and brought back the captives and the property which the spoilers had taken. On his return two kings came out to meet him. One was the king of Ziklag (Ḥaluṣah?), a specially sacred city, whose king was also priest of the God of Jeraḥmeel,[5] and solemnly blessed Abram—a blessing which Abram acknowledged by the payment of tithes (cp Gen. 28 22). The other was the king of Sēlām, who offered Abram the whole of the recovered property. Abram, however, generously refused this, swearing by Yahwè, the God of Jeraḥmeel, that he would not commit such a sin against Jeraḥmeel's land,[6] or receive anything that belonged to the king of Sēlām, lest the king should thus be entitled to say that he (and not Yahwè) had enriched Abram. Only the clans which accompanied Abram—Eden [Aner], Heleṣ [Eshcol], and Jeraḥmeel [Mamre]—required their just share of the spoil.

The war was therefore between two branches of the Jeraḥmeelite race, and Abram the Hebrew, himself half a Jeraḥmeelite,[7] interposed in the hour of need for his neighbours and relatives. Sēlām, generally miswritten סדם (MT Sedom), but once שלם (v. 18 MT Salem), was not situated anywhere near the Dead Sea, but in Jeraḥmeel. Whether the earlier tradition really knew anything of a place called 'Gomorrah,' is already doubtful. The Vale of Siddim, or rather haś-Śiddim, which the traditional text (v. 3) identifies with a piece of water called 'the Salt Sea,' together with the bitumen-pits also referred to in that text (v. 10) disappears, when the text has been closely examined in the light of results of textual criticism elsewhere.[1] See Crit. Bib.

(d) Gen. 19 17-25. 'Zoar, on the SE. edge of the Dead Sea, covered over now by the alluvium, once lay in a well-watered country with a tropical climate. The Israelite tradition is surprised that this little bit of land has escaped the ruin of Sodom, and explains this treatment by the intercession of Lot who desired Zoar as a place of refuge. Thus the legend of Zoar is a geological legend. At the same time it contains an etymological motive; the city is called Ṣo'ar, because Lot said in his prayer, "It is only miṣ'ar (something small)."' So Gunkel (Gen. 192), according to whom the Zoar episode (including the incident about Lot's wife) is a later offshoot of the legend. We accept Gunkel's analysis (see § 2, n. 4), but cannot venture to accept his interpretation of the legend. The stress laid on מצער in v. 20 suggests that the real name of the city was מָצוּר, and thus agrees with the view that Sodom was neither N. nor S. of the Dead Sea, but in Jeraḥmeel. 'Zoar' therefore, needs emendation into 'Miṣṣur.'[2] The Zoar-episode has been retouched; originally it was, not a geological, but an etymological myth.

But was it only the Zoar-episode that underwent manipulation? Textual criticism enables us with much probability to answer this question. There are several reasons for suspecting that the text of v. 24 is corrupt. (1) The verb הפך in v. 25, as many critics have remarked, does not accord with the description in our text of v. 24.[3] (2) The reference to bitumen-pits in 14 10 (see c) and to 'fire and brimstone' in Ps. 11 6 (see h) are due to corruption of the text. Taking our passage in connection with Ps. 11 6, we should not improbably emend it thus:—

'And Yahwè caused it to rain upon Sēlām and upon 'Amōrah [and upon] Reḥoboth seven days[4] from heaven.'

This is of importance with regard to the original form of the legend. Note that in v. 25 'those cities' is equivalent to כל הככר—i.e., כל ירחמאל, 'all Jeraḥmeel.' 'Sodom' is not the only city which is caught in the net of its own wicked deeds. We cannot but expect a reference to some other place besides Sodom and its appendage Gomorrah. That in the original story the implied accusative to 'caused to rain' was, not 'brimstone and fire,' but 'rain,' is in accordance with v. 25, where הפך, 'to overturn,' may be illustrated by Job 12 15, 'he sends them (the waters) out, and they overturn the earth.' 'From Yahwè out of heaven' (as the traditional text reads) has never yet been adequately justified.[5] Tg. Jer. distinguishes between the Word of the Lord and the Lord. Similarly the Christian Council of Sirmium, 'Pluit Dei filius a Deo patre.'

(e) Gen. 19 30. The traditional text is so extraordinary that we quote it in full. 'And Lot went up out of Zoar, and dwelt in the mountain, and his two daughters with him, for he feared to dwell in Zoar; and he dwelt in a cave, he and his two daughters.' Kautzsch-Socin agree with EV, except that they render הָר, 'Gebirge' (mountain-country); they also remark in a note that MT has 'in the cave' (בַּמְּעָרָה), 'perhaps with reference to a definite locality which was connected with Lot.' We are then told (v. 31 f.) that, in order to continue the family, the two daughters agreed to 'make their father thinks the assumption of a special source for the few details about the campaign superfluous (Genesis, § 8; col. 1677).

[1] Admah and Zeboim, however, take the place of Sodom and Gomorrah only in a single passage (Hos. 11 8), which is not free from the suspicion of corruptness.

[2] AOF 1 101 ff.; GI 2 26-42.

[3] Ša'ul being probably a name belonging to the Negeb. Cp Semū'el, Išma' 'el.

[4] Read in v. 14 ויקרא את־קינים ובית ירחמאל [ישמעאלים]. 'Three hundred and eighteen,' in which Hitzig sees Gematria, and Winckler (GI 2 27) an astronomical number, is simply due to an editor's manipulation of corrupt repeated fragments of ישמעאלים, 'Ishmaelites.'

[5] עליון, like עולם in 21 33, comes from ירחמאל.

[6] 'If from a thread to a shoe-latchet, and if I would take anything,' is impossible. 𝔊 relieves the construction by omitting the second וְאִם. But the parallelistic arrangement is thus destroyed, and the improbability of the alleged proverb, 'Not a thread nor a shoe-latchet,' remains. Read אם־אחמא על־ארץ ירחמאל.

[7] 'Abram' = Ab-raḥam = Ab-jeraḥmeel; see Rekem and cp Terah.

[1] The gloss on עמק השדים in v. 3 is so absurd that Winckler even identifies the ים המלח with lake Ḥūleh in the N. His theory is a monument of ingenuity, but will not stand. ים המלח surely comes from ירחמאלים, and עמק השדים from מעכת כושים (cp a more frequent transformation of the latter word—דמשק). בארות בארות חמר is simply בעיר ירחמאל ('by the city of Jeraḥmeel').

[2] The presumption is that צער everywhere should be מצור; each alleged occurrence, however, needs to be separately considered (see Crit. Bib.).

[3] According to Gunkel, the raining of brimstone from heaven is analogous to the Assyrian custom of strewing salt on the site of a destroyed city (cp Salt). But surely when the rain of brimstone fell, Sodom had not been destroyed. Nor can the custom referred to (which is really a symbol of consecration, see Ezek. 43 24, and cp Salt, § 3) be illustrative of Yahwè's raining brimstone.

[4] Read שבעת ימים for ואש מאת יהוה.

[5] Ewald (GVI 2 223) quotes this passage in support of the theory that Yahwè was originally a sky-god. He compares Mic. 5 7 [6], 'as dew from Yahwè.' But it is the tautology that is startling.

drink wine,' and to 'lie with him.' Gunkel rightly points out that the original narrators of this story can have seen nothing wrong in the transaction; the circumstances which they have described rendered law and custom inoperative (cp LOT). But the awkwardness of the passage is evident. How could Lot have been afraid to remain in the city which had been divinely granted him as a refuge? One can understand his taking refuge in a cave in the mountains, if he was unaware that Zoar had immunity from destruction; but the present form of narrative is intolerable. And whence was the wine spoken of obtained? Gunkel proposes to assign v. 30*a*, together with the rest of the passage relative to Zoar, to a supplementer. But it is not plain why, if the original narrative brought Lot safely to a cave in the mountains, a supplementer should have complicated matters by the introduction of the 'Zoar-episode.' It would be simpler to omit the cave-episode as an afterthought (to account for the names Moab and Ammon).

But this is not the true remedy, which is—to apply textual criticism. There is a good parallel in 1 K. 18 4 13, where another strange story is told about an occurrence 'in the cave'; probably (PROPHET, § 7) מְעָרָה there is a corruption of a place-name, and a beautiful consistency is restored to the legends of Elijah if we emend מערה into צרפת, 'Zarephath' (both Elijah and Elisha [see SHAPHAT] were connected with southern Zarephath). It is plausible, therefore, to emend מערת here, too, into צרפת, comparing Josh. 13 4, where (see MEARAH) the original text probably had 'Zarephath that belongs to the Miṣrim.' To do this, we must make the not improbable assumption that the city which in v. 20 the traditional text calls מִצְעָר, and in vv. 22 f., 30 צֹעַר, but which the original text must have called מִצּוּר (Miṣṣur), was more fully called צרפת מִצּוּר, 'Zarephath of Miṣṣur' (cp Josh. 13 4, emended text). We shall have to return to this later (§ 10).

The alternative is to suppose that here, but not in the other passages referred to, מְעָרָה is a corruption of Miṣṣur. The general sense of the passage is the same.

(f) Am. 4 11 Is. 1 7. These are the two earliest of the passages in which מהפכה (cp הֲפֵכָה, Gen. 19 25) occurs as a kind of technical term for the legendary destruction of 'Sodom.' In Is. 1 7 the phrase is כמהפכת זרים, but we must, with most critics since Ewald, read כמ׳ סְדֹם (cp Dt. 29 22 [23] Jer. 49 18). In Am. 4 11 we find a longer and rather peculiar phrase, 'like Elōhim's overturning of Sodom and Gomorrah' (so also Jer. 50 40). This is generally supposed to be due to a consciousness that the Sodom tradition was originally connected not with the religion of Yahwè, but with Canaanite 'heathenism'; cp Gen. 19 29 [P], 'when Elohim overturned the cities,' etc.

The presumption is, however, that the Sodom-tradition is not of Canaanite but of Jeraḥmeelite origin. In this case it is not safe to insist that the story was not originally Yahwistic, for it seems probable that Yahwè was admitted by some of those who dwelt in the Negeb to be the god of the country. Some change in our critical theory is indispensable, and, having regard to what has been said elsewhere, it is not unreasonable to suppose that את־סְדֹם ואת־עֲמֹרָה, wherever it occurs in the phrase referred to, is a later insertion, and that the true 'technical phrase' is כמהפכת ירחמאל, 'like the catastrophe of Jeraḥmeel,'[1] with the possible alternative of כמ׳ סדם, 'like the catastrophe of Sodom.'

(g) Hos. 11 8. It is not probable (1) that 'Admah' and 'Zeboim' should be corrupt in Gen. 14 2 8 and correct in Hos. 11 8, and (2) that we should not be told to whom Yahwè (in his present mood) declines to yield up his people. There must be an error in the text; and, with 10 6 before us (where 'Asshur' means the great N. Arabian power, and 'Jareb' is a corruption of 'Arāb = Arabia) we can hardly be far wrong in restoring ירחמאל for כאדמה, ישמעאל for אשימך, and אמגנך for כצבאים.[2] Thus the passage becomes, How shall I give thee up [to] Jeraḥmeel? how shall I surrender thee [to] Ishmael?'

(h) Zeph. 2 9. This very questionable bit of Hebrew needs emendation. Read (after כַּעֲמֹרָה, 'as Gomorrah')

[1] אלהים, like עֶלְיוֹן and עולם (see § 6, n. 6), is one of the current distortions of ירחמאל.

[2] נ was taken to be a fragment of צ; the final ם comes from ו. The editor manipulated the corrupt text under the influence of an exegetical theory.

SODOM AND GOMORRAH

כושם וירחמאל שממה עד־עולם, 'Cusham and Jeraḥmeel (shall be) a desolation for ever.' For us, the principal result of this is that the 'salt pits' (which suggest the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea) disappear.[1]

(h) Ps. 11 6. The vagueness and also the excessive vehemence of this passage may well awaken suspicion. Probably we should read—

The Ishmaelites will give way, the Maacathites, the Reḥobothites;
A blast of horror is the portion of Cusham.[2]

The figure is taken from the simoom; there is no thought of the judgment of the 'ruined cities.'

It will be at once noticed that three out of the four still remaining difficulties in the story of Sodom disappear through the above criticism of the text.

7. New theory.

1. The cities were really, according to the earlier tradition, 'overthrown,' not, however, by an earthquake, but by floods of water from that upper ocean which formed a part of the cosmic system of the Hebrews. 2. The scene of the catastrophe was, not beside the Dead Sea, but in the land of Jeraḥmeel, and we are justified in inferring from Gen. 13 10 that it was the district of Eden, where in primeval times the divine wonder-land had been visible, that suffered. It now becomes inevitable to conjecture that the original story of Sodom, or rather perhaps Sĕlām, was the Deluge-story, or one of the Deluge-stories, of the Jeraḥmeelites. It is plain that such a story is needed to complete the cycle of racy Jeraḥmeelite tales of the Origines, and in dealing with the Deluge-story in Gen. 6-8 we have already found reason to hold that an earlier form of that story may have represented the Deluge as overwhelming the land of the Arabians and the Jeraḥmeelites, and the ark as settling on the mountains of Jeraḥmeel (PARADISE, § 6, col. 3574, cp col. 3573, n. 3). The unexpected coincidences between the Deluge-story and the Sodom-story confirm the view tentatively proposed before (PARADISE, l.c.). We may take it, therefore, to be extremely probable that the Hebrew as well as, according to Jastrow,[3] the Babylonian narrative in its earliest form represented the Deluge as originally partial. Let us now trace the parallelisms between the Hebrew and Babylonian Deluge-story and the narrative in Gen. 19 (as emended).

Deluge-story.	Gen. 19.
1. The righteous man, 'Noah' (6 9), or rather Ḥanok (see NOAH), or, as the great Babylonian story said, Parnapištim.	1. The righteous man, Lot (19 1-8).
2. [Anger of the divinity against the city of Šurippak.]	2. [Anger of the ĕlōhīm against the city of Sodom (19).]
3. The extreme corruptness of society (6 11-13 ff.).	3. The culminating act of wickedness (19 4-11).
4. The divine revelation (6 13 ff.).	4. The divine revelation (19 12 f.; cp 18 20 f.).
5. A long-continued, destructive rain-storm (7 10-12 17 ff.) on the land of the Arabians and Jerahmeelites (7 4), or (with thunder and lightning) on the Babylonian city of Šurippak.[4] The latter lasted for seven days.	5. For seven days a destructive rain-storm on the cities of the whole of Jeraḥmeel (19 24 f.).

[1] Schwally (ZATW 10 188 ff.) has already noticed the difficulties of MT, but has no adequate emendations.

[2] See Ps.(2) Note that ונפרית has been corrupted from רחבותי (cp d).

[3] Jastrow, who has partly traced the parallelism between the Sodom-story and the Deluge-story, writes thus: 'Moreover, there are traces in the Sodom narrative of a tradition which once gave a larger character to it, involving the destruction of all mankind, much as the destruction of Šurippak is enlarged by Babylonian traditions into a general annihilation of mankind' (RBA 507).

[4] We assume here that a tradition of a storm which overwhelmed Šurippak has been fused with the tradition of a far larger flood in the Deluge-story in the epic of Gilgameš (cp DELUGE, § 22; and especially Jastrow, Relig. Bab. Ass. 507). That even the former tradition is historical, we are far from asserting. Nor do we deny that the Deluge-myth in its earliest form related to all mankind. See DELUGE, §§ 18, 22.

6. 'Noah' and his family delivered (7 13 23*b*).	6. Lot and his family delivered (19 15 ff.).
7. The ark grounds on the mountains of Aram (so read) —i.e., Jerahmeel (8 4), or (Babylonian) on the mountain of Niṣir.	7. Lot warned to escape to the mountains [of Jeraḥmeel] (19 17).

To these parallelisms we may add, though with some reserve, the parallelism between Ḥanōk (Enoch), father of Methuselah (= Methusael = Ishmael) and grandfather of Lamech (= Jeraḥmeel), and Lōṭ, nephew or perhaps originally (cp 14 14 16) brother of Abraham (= Abraham = Father of Jerahmeel) and father of Moab (rather, Miṣṣur?) and Ammon (rather, Jeraḥmeel?). This parallelism is of importance, not for the story itself, but for ascertaining the particular ethnic origin of the story. It is not appropriate that the escaped righteous man (who in the earliest Deluge-myth was a solar hero) should have any further concern with this earth. If Ḥanōk (mythologically) was the father of Methuselah (Ishmael), and Loṭ the father of Miṣṣur and Jeraḥmeel, it must in the original story have been before the Deluge. And even if Noah (Naham?) was really the name of the hero of the Deluge-story in chaps. 6-7, Naham is certainly a name of the Negeb (see NAHAM, NAHAMANI). Altogether, nothing can be more probable than that those who first arranged the Hebrew legends had their minds full of Jeraḥmeelite associations. We can now fully appreciate the remark of Gunkel (Gen. 195) that since the story of Sodom says nothing at all of water, although the site so strongly suggested this, it is plain that the scene of the narrative must originally have been elsewhere. Of course, the present place of the story and much besides is due to a skilful redactor.

It is true, the name of the hero is different. But there were presumably different forms of the Jeraḥmeelite as well as of the Babylonian Flood-story. Probably enough, there was another version in which Abraham was the hero; comparing Gen. 8 1 ('God remembered Noah') with 19 29 ('God remembered Abraham'), one may, in fact, not unnaturally expect that Abraham, not Lot, should be the chief personage of the second story. The visit of the elōhīm to Abraham is an uneffaced indication that he originally was so. Certainly, something can still be said for Lot, who may originally have been greater than he now appears, and have been a worthy brother (see above) and rival of Abraham. But this is a pure conjecture, and one might even infer from 13 7-9 that Abraham and Lot originally belonged to the class (well represented in ancient legends) of hostile brothers,[1] and that Abraham corresponds to Abel (cp Remus) and Lot to Cain (cp Romulus). The legend might have taken this turn.

It is also true that in chap. 19 there is nowhere any trace of an underlying reference to the 'box' or 'chest' (a term specially characteristic of an inland country) in which the survivors were preserved, and that in 19 28 Abraham is said to have seen 'the smoke of the land going up as the smoke of a furnace.' But on the first point we may answer that if only Lot and his family were to be saved, no ark was necessary; the 'ĕlōhīm' would convey the small party to a place of safety. And as for the other point, we must, at any rate, credit the last redactor with enough capacity to adjust a mutilated narrative to his own requirements.

Stucken has offered another explanation of the legend which now occupies us.[2] According to him, the Sodom-and-Gomorrah-story was originally a 'dry' Deluge-story—i.e., a legend of the destruction of men by other means than a flood; such a story he finds in the Iranian legend of the Var (or square enclosure) constructed by Yima (see DELUGE, § 20*b*), in the Peruvian and other stories of a general conflagration, and in the Egyptian story of the destruction of men by the gods.[3] Whether the combination of stories which refer to water with those which make no such reference is either theoretically or practically justified, may be questioned; but we may, at any rate, admit that if the present text of Gen. 19 24 correctly represents the original story, the singular

8. Stucken's theory; a 'dry' deluge.

[1] Stucken, however (Astralmythen, 87) points out that the distinction between friendly and hostile brothers in mythology is a fluid one.

[2] Astralmythen, 96.

[3] See Naville, TSBA 4 1-19; cp Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 164 ff.

Egyptian story referred to is the nearest parallel to it. Here the 'Divine eye' is the executioner; it takes the form of the goddess Ḥathor, and slays men right and left 'with great strokes of the knife.' It seems to us, however, (1) that it is much more probable that the Jeraḥmeelites had two forms of a proper Deluge-story than that one of the extant Deluge-stories was only such in a loose sense of the term, especially having regard to the Babylonian Flood-stories, and (2) that the difficulties of Gen. 19 24 f. call loudly for the application of textual criticism.

9. Judg. 19 15-30

Stucken seems happier in his explanation[1] of the parallelism between Gen. 19 1-11 and the strange story in Judg. 19 15-30. He thinks that both stories have the same mythological kernel—viz., the tradition of the dividing of the body of the primæval being Tiāmat (the personified ocean-flood), with which compare also a series of myths of the division of the bodies of supernatural beings (e.g., Osiris). It is in fact all the more difficult to believe that Gen. 19 1-11 and Judg. 19 15-30 stand at all early in the process of legendary development, because both the stories to which these passages belong are ultimately of Jeraḥmeelite origin. This may be assumed in the former case (1) from the place which the 'Sodom'-story occupies among legends that are certainly in their origin Jeraḥmeelite, and (2) probably from the legend of the origin of 'Miṣṣur' and 'Jeraḥmeel' (so read for 'Moab' and 'Ammon' in 19 37 f.) which is attached to the 'Sodom'-story. And it is hardly less clear a deduction in the latter case from the results of textual criticism. For the story in Judg. 19-20 can be shown to have referred originally not to Benjamin but to some district of the Jeraḥmeelite Negeb.[2]

10. Result.

So far as the outward form of the story is concerned, our task is now finished. Now to resume and, if need be, supplement. Originally, it seems, there was but one visit of the ĕlōhīm; it is to Abraham, not to Lot, that the visit was vouchsafed. Abraham (i.e., in the Jeraḥmeelite story, a personification of Jeraḥmeel) was the one righteous man in the land. He received timely warning that those among whom he sojourned had displeased God, and the ĕlōhīm took him away to be with God. Then came a rainstorm submerging all Jeraḥmeel. This original story, however, received modifications and additions. Loṭ or Loṭan, the reputed son, not of Seir the Horite, but probably of Miṣṣur the Jeraḥmeelite, was substituted for Abraham, and a floating story of mythic origin (the myth spoke of violence done to a supernatural being) was attached to the story of Loṭ in a manipulated form, so as to explain and justify the anger of the ĕlōhīm. After this a legend was inserted to account for the name Miṣṣur; Loṭ had taken refuge at Miṣṣur, by divine permission, because it was but a 'little' city, and again another legend was added to record the circumstance that the people of Miṣṣur and Jeraḥmeel were descended from that righteous man,[3] who with his two daughters alone remained (the removal of the hero to the company of the ĕlōhīm had been forgotten) in the depopulated land. (The names were afterwards corrupted.) Finally, a corruption in the text of 19 24 suggested that the scene of the story must have been in that 'awful hollow,' that 'bit of the infernal regions come to the surface' which was at the southern (?) end of the Dead Sea. And the singular columnar formations of rock-salt at Jebel Usdum (cp DEAD SEA, § 5) to which a myth resembling that of Niobe (originally a Creation myth?) may perhaps already have become attached,[1] was appropriately transferred to the altered legend, and identified with Lot's wife.[2]

It may be hoped that to many students it will appear no slight boon to be relieved from the supposition that

11. Religious suggestions. the peoples with whom the early Israelites had intercourse were so much beneath them in morality as the traditional text represents. Misunderstood mythology is the true source of the terrible narratives in Gen. 19 1-11, Judg. 19 15-30. At the same time no criticism can deprive us of the beneficially stern morality which is infused into a most unhistorical narrative. Apart from the plot of the story there are several points of considerable interest for the history of Israelite religion. Thus (1) in 19 12-16 it is presupposed that the righteousness of the good man delivers not only himself but his whole house; very different was the conviction of Ezekiel (14 14 ff.). (2) It is at eventide that the visits of the ĕlōhīm are made, both to Abraham and to Lot. As the light of day wanes, man is more open to religious impressions; the Deity, too, loves to guard his mysteriousness, and performs his extraordinary operations by night (cp 32 25 [24] ff., Ex. 14 24). It is not unnatural to ask, how it comes about that elsewhere Yahwè is said to 'cover himself with light as it were with a garment' (Ps. 104 2), and to think of the influence of the Iranian religion. (3) Unmeaning repetitions in prayer may be useless; but repetitions which show earnestness are considered by the narrator to be aids, not hindrances. It is a mistake, as Gunkel remarks, to speak of Lot's 'weakness of faith.' (4) But, if we may treat Abraham's converse with Yahwè as a part of the narrative (it does in fact belong—thanks to a supplementer—to the section which links the Abraham-prelude to the Lot-story), we have a riper fruit of religious thought in 18 23-32. 'Not for Lot alone, but for all the righteous men in Sodom, his prayer is uttered, and it is based upon a fine sense of justice: "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" And what is right? Not the mere prescription of a legal code; justice must be softened by compassion. Each of the supposed ten righteous men of Sodom has links innumerable binding him to his fellow-citizens. Is he to be sent abroad without any of those to whom nature or custom has attracted him? No; a single righteous man can at least (as in the case of Noah) save his family, and "for ten's sake I will not destroy the city"' (New World, 1 245). It must not be thought that because mythology and, more widely regarded, the popular imagination have largely influenced the Hebrew narratives, they are therefore to a trained eye devoid either of historical or of religious interest.

12. Literature. To the books and articles cited under DEAD SEA, add the commentaries of Dillmann, Holzinger, and especially Gunkel; also Cheyne, New World, 1 236-245; Kraetzschmar, ZATW 17 81-92; Stucken, Astralmythen, Part ii., 'Lot' ('the myths attached to the name of Lot are the torso of a primitive myth').

The superficially plausible derivation from šālōm, שָׁלוֹם, 'peace' is retained by Kittel (Kön. 6), but is

1. Name. against the analogy of the other names (critically regarded) in David's family. Another explanation has lately been proposed with abundant learning and ingenuity. After summarising it, we will pass on to a third view. According to Winckler,[1] the name שלמה refers to a divine name שלם (šlm), which is attested in the Phœnician proper name יכנשלם, and allusively in the title שר־שלם (Is. 9 6 [5]).

Another form of the name of this deity was Šalman (cp the Assyrian royal name, Šalman-ašarīdu, and the Σαλαμαν of Greek inscriptions). This god is identified with Rešeph, and was therefore a Canaanite Apollo. According to Winckler, the king's true name was Dodiah (=Jedidiah, 2 S. 12 25); the name Šelōmō or 'Solomon,' like 'Bath-sheba' (='daughter of the Moon-god'), is of mythological origin, and was given to the king by later writers in connection with 'the transference of the legend of Semiramis-Bilḳīs to Sheba.' In fact, the only complete parallel to the form Šelōmō comes, according to him, from Arabia (Salâmâ). Elsewhere (Preuss. Jahrbb. 104 269; cp GI 2 286) Winckler puts the mythological connection thus: 'Formed from the divine name Šelem (Ass. Šalman). It corresponds to Nebo whom it designates as the god of the winter-half of the year (šelim is the west = Ass. šulum, sunset).'

It would seem that this acute critic somewhat exaggerates the bearings of mythology on onomatology. Certainly the analogy of the other names in David's family (as explained by the present writer) seems to be opposed to this scholar's explanation. That 'Jonathan' is composed, as Winckler and most scholars suppose, of a divine name and a verb, is due, as could easily be shown at length, to misapprehension. 'Jonathan' is only another form of NETHANIAH (q.v.); it is a modification of the ethnic name Nethani = Ethani, 'Ethanite.' That 'David' is a modification of a divine name is not impossible (cp DOD, NAMES WITH), but is opposed to the analogies of Dodiah (if this name is really correct) and of Dodi (MT Dodo, Dodai). It is quite as possible that Dod (whatever its ultimate origin) was an ethnic, and if, following analogies, we seek for an ethnic as the original of שלמה, we cannot be blind to the existence of ישמעאל and of שַׁלְמָה (see § 2). For the pronunciation שְׁלֹמֹה later writers are responsible. The true text of 2 S. 12 24 f. seems to suggest another pronunciation, Shillūmō (or Shallūmō?), arising out of the story of David's sin. See JEDIDIAH.

It is a long road which leads to the later conception of 'Solomon in all his glory.' We are here only

2. Early history. concerned with the strict facts, without idealisation, which of course does not mean that we have no sense for poetry, and no sympathy with the changes of popular feeling. The story of Solomon's birth is given in 2 S. 11 2-12 25—a composite narrative which has already received consideration (see BATHSHEBA, JEDIDIAH). Certainly there is much to learn from it; certainly we should wish to include it in a selection of fine Hebrew narratives. But with unfeigned regret we must pronounce it to be in the main unhistorical. The name Bathsheba, indeed, and the historical character of its bearer are, one may venture to hold, even after Winckler's arguments, alike secure. Just as קרית ארבע (Kirjath-arba?) is not 'the city of Four' (the god whose numerical symbol was four), so בת שבע (Bathsheba) is not 'the daughter of Seven' (the god whose numerical symbol was seven—i.e., the Moon-god, cp SHEBA), and consequently Bathsheba is not a mere pseudo-historical reflection of Ištar, the mythological daughter of the Moon-god.

[1] Wi. GI 2 223; KAT(3) 224. For the view of another Assyriologist see Sayce, Hibb. Lect. 57; Early History, 425; cp Simpson, The Jonah Legend, 141 f.

We may, however, admit that the story of David's treachery to URIAH (q.v.) probably developed out of a current oriental legendary germ, without of course disparaging the value of the Bathsheba story as given in 2 S. 11 2-12 25 for other than purely historical purposes. And we must also claim the right to extract a fragment of history from 2 S. 11 27 12 15*b*-25, rightly read, and illustrated by the story of Solomon's accession in 1 K. 1 f., and by the lists of David's sons in 2 S. 3 2 ff. 1 Ch. 3 1 ff. The 'fragment of history' is that Solomon had another name, which name is given in our present text as Jedidiah.[1]

Passing next to 1 K. 1 f., we find reason to think with Winckler that Solomon's opposition to the claim of Adonijah to succeed David was due not to his own and Bathsheba's selfish ambition, but to the consideration that after the successive deaths of Amnon and Absalom he, not Adonijah, was the legitimate heir to the throne. Here, however, we part from Winckler. Bathsheba is for us no mythological figure, but the true mother of Solomon; she is in fact identical with Abigail.[2] That Solomon's mother should bear two names in the tradition is not more surprising than that a king who oppressed the Israelites in early times should be called both Jabin (Jamin)—i.e., Jerahmeel—and Sisera—i.e., Asshur—both Jerahmeel and Asshur being N. Arabian ethnic names (see SHAMGAR ii., § 2). Bathsheba is in fact equivalent to Bath-Eliam (2 S. 11 3) or Bath-Ammiel (1 Ch. 3 5).

The name Bathsheba represents Abigail as an Ishmaelite woman (בת־שבע=בת־שמע=[בת־ישמע]אל); the name Abigail, as a Jerahmeelite. But Ishmael and Jerahmeel are often used as synonyms; the same woman could therefore be called a daughter of Ishmael and a daughter of Jerahmeel. So too שלמה and the name out of which ידידיה has probably been corrupted—viz. ירחמאל—are equivalents. Salma describes its bearer as having Ishmaelite or Salmæan affinities (see § 1, end), Jedidiah as being Jerahmeelite by extraction. The latter name too, appears to be given to the son of Abigail in the true text of 2 S. 3 3 and 1 Ch. 3 1, where the respective readings כלאב and דניאל are manifestly wrong, and both most probably presuppose the same original ירחמאל.

Adonijah's claim to the throne, however, must have been based upon some theory. If he was not the oldest living son of David, he may yet have been the oldest of those born after David's accession.[3] Probably David both favoured his pretensions and accepted him as co-regent. Unfortunately Adonijah neglected to bring over to his side the so-called 'Cherethites and Pelethites' (Rehobothites and Zarephathites),[4] who formed the royal body-guard, and with the aid of their leader Benaiah, Solomon compelled the old king to reject Adonijah.

In 1 K. 2 17 (cp v. 21) it is stated that Adonijah desired leave to make Abishag the Shunammite his wife (cp WRS, Kinship, 88 ff.). It is possible that Solomon, with the same object as Adonijah, actually took 'Abishag' (the name comes from פילגש, like Bilkis in the Semiramis legend from παλλακίς) into his harem, and that Rehoboam was the son of Solomon by 'Abishag.' See SHUNAMMITE.

Upon this theory Solomon was not one of the sons born to David at Jerusalem (2 S. 5 14 1 Ch. 3 5-8), and the traditional view of his age at his accession,[5] based on very insecure data, needs to be revised. Certainly the narrative in 1 K. 1 f. does not favour the view that Solomon was a young man (the rhetorical language of 1 K. 3 7*b* 1 Ch. 29 1 22 5 cannot be regarded as decisive); the hero of the coup d'état displays all the adroitness and astuteness of a practised politician. How Solomon treated his opponents is stated elsewhere (ADONIJAH, ABIATHAR, JOAB, SHIMEI); the story, which has a basis of fact (HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 1), makes it difficult for a modern to idealise this despotic prince. It is singular that 'Nathan the prophet' should have assumed the prominent position which belongs rather to Benaiah;[1] but ampler justice is done to the priest ZADOK (q.v.) for his energetic support of the son of 'Bathsheba.' It is probable that the Jerusalem priesthood exacted a very full recompense, and that fresh favours conferred on their body bore fruit for Solomon in the early idealisation of his conduct as a sovereign.

Was the substitution of Zadok for Abiathar accompanied by changes in the cultus at Jerusalem?[2] It is a question which baffles the critical student. The narrators give us much that we could have spared, and withhold much that would have been of great value to us. Their own interest is largely absorbed in the buildings of Solomon, especially in that of the temple. That the description in its present form comes (as Kittel supposes) from the Annals, seems hardly probable; as it now stands, it may perhaps represent a later age, to which the temple in particular had become a subject of learned but not altogether sober inquiry. See KINGS [BOOK], § 6, PALACE, TEMPLE (and cp Stade, GVI 1 318 ff., and ZATW, 1883, pp. 129 ff.). It is even to some extent doubtful whether the whole story of the building of a temple of Yahwè as well as of a royal palace outside the city of David is not due to misapprehension. According to Winckler (GI 2 252 ff.) the true temple of Solomon was merely a renovation of the old sanctuary of David on its original site—i.e., within the city of David—though it must apparently be admitted (see MILLO) that this scholar's explanation of millo and consequently the form in which he presents his theory needs reconsideration.

3a. Buildings.

There is, however, another point, not less important, and more capable of solution. According to the tradition in its present form (MT and 𝔊), the timber for building the temple was furnished, together with artificers, by Hiram king of Tyre. The relation thus indicated between Israel and the Tyrian king is, if accurately reported, in the highest degree remarkable. If, as Winckler, who follows MT, interprets what he thinks the historical truth, the king of Israel was in vassalage to the king of Tyre (?), how is it that after Solomon's time we hear nothing of attempts on the part of Tyre to strengthen its hold upon Israel, and on the part of Israel to free itself from Tyrian supremacy? True, all on a sudden, in the ninth century, we hear of an Israelitish king marrying a daughter of 'Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians' (1 K. 16 31). This, however, is an equally singular and an equally suspicious statement, when we consider that the most influential power in the politics of Israel and Judah (putting aside Assyria) was

3b. Hiram.

1 That the text of 2 S. 12 24 f. is not in its original form, is evident; a possible restoration will be found elsewhere (see JEDIDIAH). The present form of the text seems to be due to an editor who thought Jedidiah ('beloved of Yahwè'?) too good a name for the first child. By assigning this name to Solomon he unconsciously made a concession to historical facts. For S. A. Cook's theory, see AJSL 16 156 f. [1900], and cp JEDIDIAH.

2 Abigail probably = Abihail (see NABAL), and Abihail appears ultimately to come from Jerahmeel.

3 Wi. GI 2 245.

4 The explanation of 'Cherethites and Pelethites' (see JUDAH, § 4, PELETHITES) here given, is not that of Winckler; but (like S. A. Cook, AJSL 16 177, n. 61 [April 1900]) this able critic recognises, quite independently of the present writer, that this faithful warrior-band came from the Negeb.

5 𝔊A (1 K. 2 12), with about twenty other MSS and some versions (Arm. etc.), gives Solomon only twelve years at his accession, and Jerome (cp 132 ad Vitalem) asserts that the 'hebraica veritas' agrees with 𝔊. Josephus (Ant. viii. 7 8) gives his age as fourteen; he also says that he lived to 94! For other traditional statements, see Nestle, ZATW, 1882, pp. 312 ff., and Theol. Stud. aus Würtemberg, 1886, p. 160 f.; Kaufmann, ZATW, 1883, p. 185; Gautier, Rev. de théol. et de philos., Nov. 1886; Lagarde, Mittheil. 2 40, n. 1. Stade (GVI 1 297) says, not less than twenty years old; Kittel (Kön. 6), referring to 1 K. 11 42 14 21, doubtfully suggests eighteen.

1 Schwally (ZATW, 1892, p. 156) doubts whether Nathan was really a prophet. That הנביא ('the prophet') should probably be הַנְּדָבִי, 'the Nadabite,' is pointed out elsewhere (PROPHET, § 6).

2 See Winckler (KAT(3) 234), who inclines to think that Zadok was introduced by the later legend in the interests of the monotheistic idea.

not Tyre but the N. Arabian Muṣri. Now it so happens that, as Winckler too, with extreme moderation holds, צור (Tyre?) is miswritten for מצור (Miṣṣur?) in Am. 1 9 and Ps. 87 4 (cp TYRE). What, then, is there to hinder us from supposing (if other critical considerations favour this view) that the same error has occurred elsewhere? צידון, also, is undoubtedly miswritten sometimes for מצור or מִצְרָן. How, then, do we know that 'king of the צידנים' in 1 K. 16 31 should not rather be 'king of the מִצְרִים,' in which case אתבעל (cp אשבעל) should of course be ישמעאל? The probability that Ahab's matrimonial connection was with Muṣri, not with Tyre, has been referred to under PROPHET (§ 7, col. 3862, with n. 1); and when we take into consideration a fact which will be referred to presently—viz. that Solomon's principal wife was a Miṣrite princess—we shall see that if he went anywhere outside the land of Israel proper for timber, political interests would naturally impel him to go to the N. Arabian Muṣri. (We assume provisionally that the wooded mountain districts of the Negeb were not in Solomon's possession.) Nor must we forget that 'Ahiram' (whence 'Hiram') is one of the most probable popular corruptions of 'Jeraḥmeel.'[1] Ahiram or Hiram might indeed be the name of a king of Tyre; but it might also (cp Aholiab=Jeraḥmeel?) be that of a N. Arabian artificer.

It would not be critical to urge against this view of the seat of Hiram's kingdom that Josephus[2] quotes a passage from the Tyrian history of Menander of Ephesus and another from that of Dios, in which Εἴρωμος, king of Tyre, son of Ἀβίβαλος, is said to have had intercourse with 'Solomon, king of Jerusalem.' The date of Menander and Dios is presumably in the second century B.C., and though we may credit them when they tell us of the succession of the kings of Tyre, and of events not legendary in character which they can only have known from ancient authorities—i.e., from the Tyrian archives (which Josephus positively asserts that Menander at least had inspected),[3] we cannot venture to trust them when they touch upon matters closely related to the then current Jewish history. Thus when Menander (in Jos. Ant. viii. 13 2) tells us that there was a drought in Phœnicia, which lasted for a year, and was closed through the potent supplications of Ἰθώβαλος, king of Tyre, we divine at once that this is directed against the Jewish statement that a long drought in the land of Israel was terminated through the intercessions of Elijah,[4] and when Εἴρωμος is said by Menander and Dios (Jos. Ant. viii. 5 3) to have had a match of riddle-guessing with Solomon, we can see that this is based on the Jewish story of the riddles by which the queen of Sheba tested Solomon (1 K. 10 1).

We have no extra-biblical authority for doubting that if Solomon was indebted for building materials and artificers to any foreign king, it was to the king of Miṣrim, not to the king of Tyre. According to the most probable text of 2 S. 8 2 12 31 David had conquered both Miṣṣur and Jeraḥmeel (see Crit. Bib., and cp SAUL), so that if we hear of a king of Miṣṣur in the reign of Solomon, we may assume that he for a time at any rate owned the supremacy of the king of Israel. If so, there is nothing inconsistent in the double statement that Solomon had his own workmen in the mountains (1 K. 5 13 ff. [27 ff.]), and that Hiram sent workmen to cut down wood at Solomon's request.[5] Nominally, the mountain country of Jeraḥmeel (called, as we shall see, Gebālōn) was a part of Solomon's dominions, so that as suzerain he had a right to send

[1] Kittel (on 1 Ch. 14 1) prefers the form Ḥūram; Schrader (KAT(2) 170), Ḥirom. Cp HIRAM, end. The view taken above seems to the present writer the best. Urumilki is attested as a Phœnician royal name in an inscription of Sennacherib (KAT(2) 185, cp also ארמלך, an ancestor of Yeḥawmelek, CIS i. no. 1), and Urumilki probably=Jeraḥmeel.

[2] Ant. viii. 5 3 (§§ 144-149); c. Ap. I 17 f. (§§ 112-120).

[3] Dios, too, says Josephus, was trusted for his exactness (c. Ap. i. 17 112).

[4] Winckler (KAT(3) 250) gives a different explanation of Menander's assertion, which, however startling, might be acceptable, if it did not presuppose the traditional Hebrew text of the Book of Kings.

[5] As the text stands, Solomon asks Hiram for help in the hewing of timber (1 K. 5 1-10). It is in the hewing of stone that Solomon's labourers are represented as taking a prominent part.

workmen to do his bidding.[1] The forms of courtesy, however, may have required that he should request the vassal-king to send his own more skilled labourers to direct and to aid those of Solomon, and in order to prevent war from breaking out between Israel and Miṣṣur during the long building operations[2] at Jerusalem, as well as to foster a more friendly feeling based upon mutual services, the Israelitish king is reported to have paid Hiram (Jeraḥmeel) annually large quantities of wheat and oil.[3]

We are obliged sometimes, however reluctantly, to form historical conjectures, and this seems to be the most conservative one which, on the present subject, with due account of textual criticism, can be made plausible; but the fact, mentioned at a later point (§ 7), of the ill-feeling which Cusham or Aram (=Jeraḥmeel) bore to Israel leads us to question its accuracy. Only by force and by the transplantation of part of the subject population (2 S. 12 31, see SAW) could David keep his hold on the Jeraḥmeelite Negeb. It is probable that Solomon found it even more difficult than his father to do this, and from 1 K. 9 11-14 it would appear that Solomon was forced by the king of Miṣṣur to cede to him twenty cities in the land of Jeraḥmeel, and over and above this to pay a hundred and twenty talents of gold.[4]

The existence of a grave historical problem cannot, it would seem, be denied. We have offered the best solution of it at our disposal. It only needs to be added that the misstatement that Solomon procured timber and workmen from the king of Tyre must have been facilitated by the fact that the name 'Hiram' was actually borne by a king of Tyre, and that it was favoured by the observation of later Jews that the mountains of the Negeb were not in their time abundantly wooded (the trees having been cut down), whereas Lebanon was still well provided with timber. Whether, as Winckler supposes, part of the Lebanon was in the possession of Solomon, need not here be considered.

It is important, however, to mention these necessary corrections of names in MT. (1) The mountain country where timber was sought (1 K. 5 6) was called, not Lebanon, but Gebālōn (from Ar. jibāl, cp GEBAL), the people of which are, in 1 K. 5 18, called Gebalites.[5] The same correction is plausible elsewhere, e.g., Is. 14 8 Zech. 11 1, etc. (2) In 1 K. 9 11 13 הגליל and כבול are both popular corruptions of ירחמאל. (3) In 1 K. 10 11 f. 2 Ch. 2 8 [7] 9 10 f. the 'almuggim' or 'algummim' timber should rather be designated 'Jeraḥmeel' timber. It came (2 Ch. 2 8 [7]) not from Ophir, but from Lebanon—i.e., Gebālōn. Cp ALMUG TREES (end), where the theory mentioned—that almug-wood came from Lebanon (2 Ch. 2 8)—points in the direction of the critical view here recommended.

We need not deny that Solomon was a builder, or that he was aided by Jeraḥmeelite artificers (for which we have partial analogies[6] in Bezalel, b. Uri, b. Hur, and Oholiab, b. Ahisamach, in Ex. 31). One of these (whose father was a Miṣrite, but his mother an Israelite of the Negeb[7]) bore the same name as that assigned to the Miṣrite king—

4. Commerce.

[1] The δυναστεύματα (?) which Solomon 'opened' in Lebanon (Gebalon?) according to 𝔊BA (δυναστεύοντα, 𝔊L) in 1 K. 2 46c may, as Winckler thinks, have been mines. See Winckler, Alt. Unt. 176; GI 2 261, n. 2.

[2] Twenty years are assigned to them in 1 K. 9 10; cp 6 38 7 1.

[3] 1 K. 5 11 [25], where for the second כֹּר read בַּת (see COR).

[4] The best part of this is due to Winckler (GI 2 262; KAT(3) 237). He thinks that the original which underlies the present text of 1 K. 9 14 is וישלח (חירם) למלך צר מאה, where חירם is a gloss inserted at the wrong place. The sense is, 'and he (viz. Solomon) sent to the king of Tyre [Hiram] 120 talents of gold,' i.e., Solomon had to make up for the inadequate cession of territory by a large payment in gold. The king, however, with whom Solomon had to do was not Tyrian but Miṣrite, and the ceded territory not 'Galilæan' but Jeraḥmeelite.

[5] 1 K. 5 18 [32] should run וַיִּפְסְלוּ בְּנֵי יִשְׁמָעֵאל וּבְנֵי יְרַחְמְאֵל הַגִּבְלִים, 'and the Ishmaelites and the Jeraḥmeelites—the Gebalites—fashioned them.' Without the key to the names critics have been obliged to assume a deep corruption of the text (cp GEBAL, 1).

[6] All the names here quoted, except the first, are Jeraḥmeelite. The tribes of Judah and Dan were both largely mixed with Jeraḥmeelites.

[7] His father was a Miṣrite (מצרי not צרי), his mother either a viz. Hiram, i.e., Jeraḥmeel; the Chronicler (2 Ch. 2 12 [13]) calls him Hurani-abi, but this surely must be the same name (חורם אבי = ירחמאל). Cp HIRAM, 2, and on the place where he did his work (1 K. 7 46) see TEBAH. Nor need we altogether reject the other traditions of the intercourse between Solomon and 'Hiram.' If the view of the historical facts underlying 1 K. 9 11-14 adopted above be correct—i.e., if hostilities broke out between the king of Miṣṣur and Solomon, in which Israel was worsted—it is reasonable to suppose that the war was occasioned, not only by the craving for revenge, but also by a desire on 'Hiram's' part for commercial expansion. Having no port of his own, he was glad to use EZION-GEBER (q.v.), at the head of the Gulf of 'Akabah, which formed part of Solomon's dominion. Hiram had indeed no mariners to send, but he sent 'servants' of his own—i.e., commissioners and merchants—to buy and sell at the places where the ships might touch. The chief object which both kings longed for was naturally gold; Ophir, the port of the great Arabian or E. African gold-land, was the goal of these early voyagers (see GOLD, IVORY, OPHIR, TRADE, § 49).

The very different, commonly-held, opinion that 'at Ezion-geber (which [Solomon] retained, in spite of the return to Edom of prince Hadad) a ship was built, similar to those employed by the Phœnicians in their voyages to Tarshish (and hence called Tarshish ships), and manned in part by experienced Tyrian sailors,' and that 'from that port it was dispatched at intervals of three years to Ophir, bringing back thence gold, silver, ivory, valuable woods, and precious stones, as well as curious animals such as apes and peacocks,'[1] appears to rest on an inaccurately transmitted text and a not sufficiently thorough-going historical criticism. The best form that gratitude to past critics can take is surely not to repeat temporary conclusions, but to carry forward their work. We venture, therefore, to present some of the most pressing changes of view to which we have recently been led by independent research.

Even apart from the rendering of אֳנִי (1 K. 9 26, 𝔊 ναῦς) by 'ship' (RV, 'a navy of ships'), which has had the authority of Hitzig and Kittel[2] (Hist. 2 189), and the question as to the history of Hadad, there is much that is very doubtful in the opinion referred to. The 'apes' and 'peacocks' are considered elsewhere (see especially OPHIR, PEACOCKS); on the difficult question relative to the mention of silver as well as of gold in 1 K. 10 22, see SILVER, § 2. 'Valuable woods' should rather be 'a rare, fragrant wood, analogous to the spices or spice-plants of the queen of Sheba' (read אֲהָלִים—i.e., eagle-wood [see ALOES), not אַלְמֻגִּים—i.e., Jeraḥmeelite wood). The three passages bearing on Hiram's participation in the Ophir expeditions are (a) 1 K. 9 27, (b) 10 11, (c) 10 22. As for (a), the true text, translated, should probably run, 'And Hiram sent his servants, Jeraḥmeelites, on the ships with the servants of Solomon.' אנשי אניות is a corruption of ישמעאלים, and ידעי הים of ירחמאלים. Either 'Jeraḥmeelites' or (better) 'Ishmaelites' is a gloss or variant. In (b) we should read, 'And also the merchant-ships . . . brought from Ophir very much eagle-wood and precious stones.' חירם should be סֹחֵר (ם and ס confounded); cp Prov. 31 14. In (c) 'for the king had at sea ships (galleys) with oars[3] (אֳנִי מָשׁוֹט)'; to this was added in the earlier text אֳנִי סֹחֵר, 'merchant ships' (omit עִם, an editorial insertion), which is a gloss on 'אני מ. The phrase 'Tarshish ships' is a hopeless puzzle until we apply methodical textual criticism to the Hebrew phrase. See TARSHISH, § 7.

That Solomon, at one period of his life, had friendly relations with Muṣri is shown by his marrying a daughter of Pir'u king of Miṣrim (so beyond doubt we should read in 1 K. 3 1 9 16 in place of the very improbable MT[4]). This was pointed out by the present writer,[1] and afterwards independently by Winckler. To the notice of the marriage in 3 1 it is added in 9 16 that Pir'u took the field against a certain city, slew its inhabitants, and gave it as a portion to his daughter, Solomon's wife.[2] The place is called in the traditional text Gezer, and its inhabitants Canaanites; but both Judg. 1 29 and Josh. 16 10 lead us to doubt this, and it is in itself more probable that for גֶּזֶר (Gezer) we should read גְּשֻׁר (Geshur), and for הכנעני (the Canaanite), as elsewhere, הקנזי (the Kenizzite); some place in the far SW. of Palestine is presumably intended (see GESHUR, 2).

Kittel (cp Burney, Hastings, DB 2 862*a*) does well to separate 9 16-17*a* (as far as גזר) from vv. 17*b*-22; it has evidently been taken from a context which spoke of the marriage. At the same time its present context is full of interest, and we must return to it later (§ 7).

The Arabian land of SHEBA (q.v.), too, was interested, as legend asserted, in Solomon. Its queen is said to have actually come to Jerusalem to test Solomon's wisdom.[3] According to Kent (Hist. of the Hebrew People, 1 179) the object of her visit was to bring about a commercial treaty with Solomon. But surely the form of the legend is late. It is Tiglath-pileser and Sargon who tell us of queens of 'mat Aribi,' and 'mat Aribi' (see KAT(2) 414) is not Sheba; indeed, the Sabæan empire arose much later than Solomon. Probably, as Winckler suggests (GI 2 267), the queen of Sheba is but a reflection of the Miṣrite princess whom Solomon married. How Solomon came to be called the wise king, par excellence, is not clear. If it meant originally that he was as skilful in preserving, as his father had been in creating, a kingdom, the epithet was greatly misplaced. More probably, however, the title arose from the close intercourse between Solomon and the N. Arabian kings and kinglets. The Miṣrites and the Jeraḥmeelites were celebrated for their wise proverbs and apologues. To heighten Solomon's glory, it was stated by the later legend that, just as he was greater than his neighbours in war, so he excelled them in their own special province of wisdom (see 1 K. 5 9 f. [4 30 f.]). How far Babylonian influences affected him we are unable to say positively. But the phenomena of the early Genesis stories as explained by the present writer lead him to think that N. Arabia transmitted quite as much as Babylonia, though in doing so it could not avoid augmenting a mass of ideas and beliefs ultimately of Babylonian origin. See SHAVSHA, also CREATION, PARADISE, and cp EAST [CHILDREN OF], ETHAN, HEMAN, MAHOL.

Legend also lays great stress on Solomon's just judgment—a capacity for which was indeed one aspect of Hebrew 'wisdom'; but there is no satisfactory evidence for this, and the highly oriental story in 1 K. 3 16-28 has a striking parallel in a Buddhist Jâtaka. We can, however, most probably assert that Solomon was highly despotic in his methods; on this, historians who differ widely on other points are agreed.[4] If we are rightly informed, Solomon treated both the Israelites and the surviving Canaanites[5] as only good enough to labour, like the Egyptian fellahs till recently, at the royal buildings (5 13 f. [27 f.], cp 12 18). He is also said to have divided the country ('all Ishmael'?) into twelve departments (to a large extent, it would seem, independent of tribal divisions), each of which was under a deputy or 2 Maspero's expansion of this passage (MT) in Struggle of the Nations, 738, is unduly imaginative.

6. Solomon's despotism.

5 Other passages to be referred to presently seem to show that the N. Arabian subject population was specially employed in the corvée, though if Israelites had to do forced labour, the surviving Canaanites would of course not be spared. It is not well to attempt a too positive solution of such problems.

prefect (נִצָּב, 4 7 = נְצִיב, v. 19), charged with the duty of keeping up a constant supply of court luxuries, and also, we may be sure, of collecting the taxes, and perhaps too of providing forced labour.[1] In the Lebanon (? Gebalon) alone he is said to have had 10,000 labourers constantly employed (5 14 [28]). The overseer of the corvée was the hated Adoniram (1 K. 4 6 5 14; cp 12 18). No wonder that discontent became rife, especially in the powerful tribe of Ephraim. How a leader of the rebels was found is told elsewhere (see JEROBOAM, 1).

At the same time there are certain passages in our composite narrative which may make us hesitate to accept the darkest picture of Solomon's despotism. In 9 20-22, which we may hesitate to regard as merely a late attempt to whitewash Solomon's character,[2] it is expressly said that the corvée was limited to non-Israelites. And the singular statements respecting the number of Solomon's 'stalls of horses' (4 26 [5 6]) and of his chariots and horsemen (10 26), when critically inspected, appear rather to be statements respecting the number of his Cushite, Jerahmeelite, and Zarephathite servants (see Crit. Bib.). The narrative in 1 K. 12 no doubt ascribes the separation of N. and S. to the hateful corvée; but the account is too anecdotal to be strictly historical, and surely the forced service, so far as it existed, pressed heavily on the S. as well as on the N.

Certainly Jeroboam was an Ephrathite. But there may have been a southern, as well as a northern, Ephrath; Jeroboam's mother (see JEROBOAM, 1) was a Miṣrite, and the name of his clan (see NEBAT) may plausibly be explained as Arabian. And as for the statement (11 28) that Jeroboam was placed 'over the labour of the house of Joseph,' it is possible that here and in Am. 6 6 יוסף (יסף) has been miswritten for 'ישמעאל = 'ישם (Ishmael).[3]

We have assumed that Solomon's relation to Muṣri was not that of supremacy, but that of dependence. It should be frankly stated, however, that there is a considerable body of evidence which, rightly understood, points in an opposite direction.

7. Was he lord of the Negeb?

(1) There is the passage already referred to (2 Ch. 8 2), where Hiram is represented as the ceder of the twenty cities. (2) In close proximity to this, it is said (2 Ch. 8 3) that Solomon went to Hamath-zobah and prevailed against it. Now Hamath-zobah here, as in 2 S. 8 3, we take to be partly a corrupted, partly a manipulated reading; the true text gave Maacath-zarephath—i.e., the Zarephathite Maacath. And the strong cities which Solomon built (1 K. 9 15 [end], 17-19) were probably called Hazor, Jerahmeel, Geshur, Beth-horon (in the S.), Baalath, Tamar in Arabia.[1] (3) There are also the passages (4 26 [5 6] 10 26) referred to above, which, when critically emended, appear to assert the reduction to bondage or serfdom of a large portion of the Jerahmeelite population. And (4) there is a singular statement (10 14 f.) respecting the amount of gold which came every year to Solomon, the close of which should run nearly thus—'apart from the tribute (עֹנֶשׁ) of the Zarephathites and the Jerahmeelites (cp SPICE-MERCHANTS) and all the kings of Arabia.'[2]

These passages, however, seem to prove nothing but the strong determination of later writers to idealise the reign of Solomon. That Solomon was, for a time at any rate, lord of the Negeb (with the exception of 'Hiram's' twenty cities) may be admitted. That he had battles in the Negeb is also true, and his foe was no minor chieftain but the king of Miṣṣur himself, and Solomon was worsted in the conflict. The reference to HADAD[3] and to REZON[4] in 1 K. 11 14-25 and to Jeroboam's journey to Miṣrim in v. 40,[5] confirm the view that Solomon's position in the Negeb was seriously and frequently threatened. It is noteworthy that Rezon is said to have 'reigned in Damascus' (rather Cusham), just as Hadad 'reigned over Aram' (i.e., Jeraḥmeel). Evidently there was a strong jealousy between Israel and the neighbouring peoples of Jerahmeel and Miṣṣur. (Cp Stade, GVI 1 303, who, however, adheres to MT.)

The references to Solomon's horses, as we have seen, need to be carefully inspected; they have been much misunderstood.

8. References to horses.

There is evidence enough that סוּסִים (horses), and כּוּשִׁים (Cushites), רכב (chariot), and ירחמאל (Jeraḥmeel) have an unfortunate tendency to get confounded, and this confusion has affected the story of Solomon.

Still, we need not doubt that Solomon had, not indeed 'chariot-cities'[6] (see MARCABOTH), but at least horses and chariots. On the locus classicus, 1 K. 10 28 f., see HORSE, § 1 (5), MIZRAIM, § 2*a*, TRADE, § 49. It is a question, however, whether criticism does not make it a plausible view that the Miṣrim from which Solomon derived horses and chariots was the N. Arabian rather than the N. Syrian referred to in these articles. This at least can with much probability be stated, that, whilst there were nomadic tribes in N. Arabia whose riding animal was specially the camel (see CAMEL, § 2), there was also a settled population skilled in the useful arts and riding on horses (see Crit. Bib.). Our information on these points is scanty, but a negative attitude towards the inference here stated is possible only at the cost of rejecting critical facts which all hang together, and throw a light on many dark places in the history of Israel.

The total result of our study of Solomon is that his

[1] The brevity of the above statement is justified by the present state of textual criticism. The document to which it refers (1 K. 4 7-28 [5 8]) is admittedly obscure. 'The text,' says Benzinger, 'is a good deal corrupted, and has received interpolations.' In special articles on the names (see also FOWL, FATTED) some of the difficulties are dealt with. The point of view, however, in these articles is not more advanced than that of critical commentators in general. A further application of the key which Winckler (only half-conscious of its wide-reaching consequences) put into our hands, when he showed that מצרים sometimes stood for מִצְרִים—i.e., the N. Arabian Muṣri—and that this country exercised a persistent political influence on the Israelites, has results which, if correct, are of the utmost importance for the early regal period of the history of Israel. It becomes probable that Kittel's remark (which was thoroughly justified from a conservative textual point of view) that the table of prefects 'only concerns Israel proper, inasmuch as the conquered territories are referred to (4 21 [5 1]) in a different style,' is the reverse of the fact. The present writer holds that the twelve prefects were placed not over 'all Israel' (as the traditional text has) but over 'all Ishmael' (a parallel error to that in 2 S. 24 12; see TAHTIM-HODSHI)—i.e., over the Negeb—that in 4 22 f. [5 2 f.] the account of Solomon's 'provision for one day' has grown out of a list of the peoples or tribes of the Negeb, and that in 4 26 [5 6] the true text affirms that the Cushites, Jeraḥmeelites, Ishmaelites, and Zarephathites were servants to Solomon. 1 K. 4 20 is the only passage which distinctly breaks the connection. See Crit. Bib.

[2] This is the view of Kittel and Benzinger. The statements of 9 20-22 are thought by them to be refuted by a reference to 5 13 [27] 11 28 12 4. The text of these passages, however, will not bear the stress that is laid upon it. See preceding note (near end).

[3] On Am. 6 1-14, which appears to the present writer to refer to the Israelites settled in the Negeb, see Crit. Bib.

[1] Implying emendations of the text; see Crit. Bib. See also TAMAR, TADMOR, TRADE, § 50. The reader will find the old view and the new in collision, but this is inevitable. The problems before us are partly of a text-critical, partly of a historical character.

[2] Cp TRADE, § 50, where the corrected printing עֲרָב (cp Ch.) is admitted. We must add, however, that very probably פחות הארץ has arisen out of הצרפתים, written at the end as a correction of הרכלים ;התרים, as in Neh. 3 32, = ירחמאלים; and of this same word מסחר is also a corruption (ם = ס).

[3] Hadad was probably an Arammite (אֲרַמִּי)—i.e., a Jeraḥmeelite—rather than an Edomite: see Crit. Bib. on 2 S. 8 13 f. Winckler (KAT(3) 240) independently suggests that Hadad was of Aram-Zoba, not of Edom. Aram-Zoba, however, is really Aram-Zarephath, according to the present writer's view of the original text. See ZOBA. We must not, however, confound the spheres of action of the two adventurers, Hadad and Rezon.

[4] Rezon was a fugitive from his lord the king of Zarephath (= Maacath-Zarephath, above).

[5] See JQR, July 1899, pp. 551-556. As against Winckler (KAT(3) 241, the present writer thinks that 'Shishak' in v. 40 is merely an error for כּוּשִׁי (see PHARAOH, SHISHAK, 2).

[6] Cp, however, CHARIOT, § 5, CITY (f), and Wi. GI 2 210.

political importance has been very much exaggerated.

9. Political importance. Already in 1 K. 4 24 [5 4] we find the extent of his kingdom idealised as that of David had been. It is not difficult to account for this. The geographical statement in 4 24 [5 4] arises simply from a misinterpretation of נָהָר (nāhār) in v. 21 [5 1], which really means the 'nāḥal Miṣrim,' but was supposed to mean the Euphrates.[1] Later ages went farther in the same course, and in Pss. 45 and 72 (the latter of which, however, has received a later insertion) his life furnishes the framework for pictures of the Messianic king. Against this idealisation the redactor of ECCLESIASTES (q.v.) in his own way protests.

We now turn to Solomon's religious position. Was he a polytheist? Did he ever, as W. E. Barnes (Hastings, DB 2 511*b*) expresses it, 'patronise foreign worship?'

10. Not a polytheist. An affirmative answer is suggested by 1 K. 11 1-8. It is plain, however, from 𝔊's text, as well as from the phenomena of MΓ, that the original has been much expanded by later hands from a religious motive.[2] There was no bad faith in this; the later writers simply recast history in the light of certain fundamental principles—those of Deuteronomy (cp KINGS [BOOK], § 6). And their procedure appears more startling than it really was, owing to the fact that the ethnic names and the names of the gods have been accidentally corrupted. The original statement probably was that which underlies 11 7, 'Then did Solomon build a sanctuary for the god of Cusham and Jeraḥmeel'—i.e., for his Miṣrite wife; this probably stood in connection with the account of Solomon's marriage (cp 16 31-33).

Various comments on this were inserted in the margin, and introduced by the redactor or redactors into the text. Lastly, corruption transformed 'the god of Cusham' into 'Chemosh the god (abomination) of Moab,' and 'Jeraḥmeel' into 'Milcom the god (abomination) of the b'ne Ammon.' In what is now v. 1, 'Jeraḥmeelite, Miṣrite, Reḥobothite' became 'Moabite, Ammonite, Edomite (from "Arammite," a variant to "Jeraḥmeelite"), Zidonian, and Hittite,' and in what is now v. 3, 'princesses Ishmaelites' became 'princesses seven hundred,' and 'concubines Ishmaelites' became 'concubines three hundred.'

That Solomon had a number of wives, both Israelite and non-Israelite, is probable enough, but he did not make altars for all of them, nor did he himself combine the worship of his wives' gods with that of Yahwè. He can have had no thought of denying the sole divinity of Yahwè in the land which was Yahwè's 'inheritance.' It is a distortion of the true text when 𝔊^{L} represents Solomon as 'burning incense and sacrificing' (ἐθυμία καὶ ἔθυε) to foreign gods.[3] That this ambitious king had such a chastened piety as we find in 1 K. 8 14-61 (cp Driver, Intr.(6) 200 ff.) is on all grounds inconceivable; but we have no reason to doubt that according to his lights he was a faithful worshipper of Yahwè, so far as this was consistent with his despotic inclinations.

11. Later idealisation. [In the apocryphal Book of Wisdom, again, the composition of an Egyptian Hellenist, who from internal evidence is judged to have lived somewhat earlier than Philo (see WISDOM OF SOLOMON), Solomon is introduced uttering words of admonition, imbued with the spirit of Greek philosophers, to heathen sovereigns. The so-called Psalter of Solomon, on the other hand, a collection of Pharisee Psalms preserved to us only in a Greek version, has nothing to do with Solomon or the traditional conception of his person, and seems to owe its name to a transcriber who thus distinguished these newer pieces from the older 'Psalms of David.'[4] In NT times Solomon was the current type alike of magnificence and of wisdom (Mt. 6 29 Lk. 11 31). But Jewish legend was not content with this, and, starting from a false interpretation of Eccles. 2 8, gave him sovereignty over demons, to which were added (by a perversion of 1 K. 4 33), lordship over all beasts and birds, and the power of understanding their speech. These fables passed to the Arabs before the time of Mohammed (Nābigha, 1 22), found a place in the Koran, and gave Solomon (Suleimān) a lasting fame throughout the Moslem East. The story of Solomon, the hoopoe, and the queen of Sheba in the Koran (Sur. 27) closely follows the second Targum to Esth. 1 2, where the Jewish fables about him may be read at large. Solomon was supposed to owe his sovereignty over demons to the possession of a seal on which the 'most great name of God' was engraved. See Lane, Arabian Nights, Introd., n. 21, and chap. 1, n. 15.—W. R. S.]

SOLOMON'S PORCH (η στοα [του] σολομων[τ]ος), Jn. 10 23 Acts 5 12. See TEMPLE, § 30 f.

SOLOMON'S SERVANTS, CHILDREN OF (בְּנֵי עַבְדֵי שְׁלֹמֹה), a guild of persons attached to the second temple, mentioned in Ezra 2 55 58 Neh. 7 57 60 11 3† (υιοι δουλων σαλωμων [BAL]; Ezra 2 55 υ. αβδησελ [B]; 2 58 υ. ασεδησελμα [B], υ. αβδησελμα [A]), with the NETHINIM (q.v.), and sometimes (e.g., Neh. 3 26 31 10 29) apparently included under that term. Bertheau-Ryssel leaves it uncertain whether this guild of 'servants of Solomon' grew out of a small part of the Canaanitish bondservants of Solomon (1 K. 9 20 f.) which may have been assigned to the temple. The probability is, however, that the phrase has nothing to do with Solomon, but is corrupt. On Solomon's corvée, see SOLOMON, § 6.

Just as one can hardly doubt that the so-called nĕthīnīm are really the Ethanites, so the bĕnē 'abdē Šĕlōmōh must, it would seem, be either the bĕnē 'ōbēd-šalamū or the bĕnē 'ōbēd-'ĕdōm. 'Ōbēd-'ĕdōm is probably a corruption of 'arāb-'ĕdōm—i.e., Arabia of Edom, and 'Ōbēd-šelōmōh of 'arāb-šalamū—i.e., Arabia of the Salmæans (see SALMAH, 2). The Jerahmeelites and Edomites seem to have been strongly mixed with pure Israelites after the exile. One of the families of the Obed-edom or 'Arab-edom guild (if we may call it so) bears the name 'bĕnē Hassōphéreth' (or Sophereth)—i.e., bĕnē Ṣārephāthīm, or Zarephathites. See SOPHERETH. T. K. C.

In the Semitic languages the individual is often designated as a 'son' of the species to which he belongs, the species being indicated by a collective or plural noun (see SON OF MAN, §§ 1, 4-6).

Similarly, a member of the genus 'god' seems to have been designated as ben ĕlōhīm (Aram., bar ĕlāhīn).

1. Synonym of 'god.' This is suggested by Gen. 6 2-4 Ps. 82 6 Dan. 3 25. As early as the second century B.C. the bnē ĕlōhīm in Gen. 6 2 4 were understood in some circles to be angels, and this interpretation is certainly nearer the truth than the rationalising exegesis that made the fathers of the giants 'sons of mighty men' or 'pious folk' (see § 2). But the term can scarcely have conveyed originally the idea of 'angels.' At the time when the myth was first told in Judah, it is not likely that the doctrine of angels had yet developed. As 'the daughters of men' were simply 'women,' so 'the sons of the gods' were 'gods.' Such a usage of the phrase must have been deeply rooted, since even in the Hasmonæan age 'sons of 'Elyōn' was an expression employed as a synonym of 'gods.' In Ps. 82 6 bnē 'elyōn is used in the second hemistich as an equivalent of ĕlōhīm in the first. In Dan. 3 25 the celestial being seen in the fiery furnace is called bar ĕlāhīn (cp Pesh.). This is indeed explained by mal'ăkēh, 'his angel,' in 3 28, and so the phrase was undoubtedly understood by the author. But it is not probable that the Jews of the Maccabæan period called an angel bar ĕlāhīn; as good monotheists they no doubt said bar ĕlāhā. The author, however, endeavoured to make the speeches of pagan kings and queens more plausible by putting upon their lips such phrases as, in his judgment, they would naturally use. He lets them speak of the 'wisdom of gods' (5 11) and the 'spirit of holy gods' (4 5 f. [8 f.] 5 11). As these expressions were borrowed from pagan phraseology, bar ĕlāhīn was probably drawn from this same source. If the polytheistic neighbours of Israel employed the phrase, they are likely to have meant by it not 'an angel,' but a 'god.' Even in Job 1 6 38 7, the 'sons of the gods' are apparently conceived of as divine beings, subordinate to the Most High, but still associated with the elements, stars, or nations, over which they once reigned as independent rulers; and the same may be true of Ps. 29 (bnē ēlīm).

2. Designation of an 'angel.' Whilst originally these divine beings were not 'angels,' it is natural that in course of time they should become identified with the special class of 'messengers' (mal'ākīm). In Gen. 6 2 4, some MSS of 𝔊 (A 37, 72, 75) read οἱ ἄγγελοι τοῦ θεοῦ, and this reading seems to have been found by many patristic writers (cp also mala'kē in the margin of Syr.-Hex., and the Persian Vs.), though the majority of MSS and daughter-versions have the more literal οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ θεοῦ. Such a reference to angels is assumed in many passages.

So in Enoch 6 2 (οἱ ἄγγελοι υἱοὶ οὐρανοῦ, Giz. frg. and Eth.) 19 2 etc., Slavonic En. 7 18, Jubilees 5, Test. 12 Patr.: Reuben 5, Philo, 1 262, ed. Mangey, Jos. Ant. i. 3 1, § 73, Jude 6, 2 Pet. 2 4, Justin, Apol. 1 5, Clem. Hom. 8 13, Clem. Alex. Strom. 3 528, Tert. De Virg. Vel. 7, Lactantius, Instit. 2 15, Commodianus, Instruct. 1 3.

In Ps. 29 1 82 6, Targ. has בתי מלאכיא; in Job 1 6, 𝔊 reads οἱ ἄγγελοι τοῦ θεοῦ, and in 38 7 ἄγγελοί μου, and Targ. in both places malākayyā, and in Dan. 3 25 [92] 𝔊 renders ἀγγέλου θεοῦ. The translation 'sons of the angels' (Job 38 7 Pesh. b'nai mala'kē, En. 71 1) or 'children of the gods' (En. 69 4 5 106 5) apparently presupposes the use of ĕlōhīm (or Aram. ĕlāhīn) as a designation of angels, the 'sons' being the individuals of this class. Whether Aquila's rendering, οἱ υἱοὶ τῶν θεῶν, reflects such an identification of ĕlōhīm-θεοί with angels, or a more correct apprehension of the original meaning, or simply the conviction that the Most High can have no sons (cp Midr. Tĕhillīn, 2 7), cannot easily be determined. The fact that Gen. 6 2 4 are the only passages where the Targs. (Onk. and Jon.) render b'nē ĕlōhīm with b'nē rabrĕbayyā indicates that the common significance is here forced to yield, for dogmatic reasons, to a less natural meaning. The same is true of Sym. οἱ υἱοὶ τῶν δυναστευόντων, Sam. Targ. בני שלטניה, and Saadia banu'l ašrāfi, 'sons of the mighty,' 'the rulers' or 'nobles.' It is also significant that the term ḳĕdōšīm, which designates the gods as objects of worship, was transferred to the angels (cp Job 5 1 15 15 Zech. 14 5 Dan. 4 14 Ps. 89 6 8 Tob. 8 15); in Ecclus. 45 2, the original seems to have read ויכבדהו כאלהים (𝔊 translating אלהים with ἅγιοι), and a similar transfer is likely to have taken place in the case of the term 'watcher.' If 𝔊 is correct, in Dt. 32 8 (apparently a late gloss), the בני אל seem to have been limited in some circles to the celestial representatives, or patron angels, of the different nations.

At the basis of the myth in Gen. 6 1 ff. lies the idea of the physical descent of some men from divine beings [cp NEPHILIM, § 1].

3. Offspring of a god. The famous giants of old were regarded as sons of gods and of beautiful women. This explanation was especially resorted to in the case of great heroes of antiquity and of kings (see § 5). But clans and tribes also traced their descent from divinity through their eponym heroes. When the Moabites are said to be the sons and daughters of Chemosh (Nu. 21 29), the Hebrew singer used a phrase that is likely to have been employed by the Moabites themselves to claim descent from Chemosh, to indicate that they were his offspring in the world. Gen. 19 30-38 cannot be urged against this view. It probably referred originally to the descent of a pre-Edomitish clan from its divinity Lotan (see LOT). Edom, Esau, Ammon, Gad, Asher, and other gentilicia, are, beyond a question, names of gods [cp TRIBES, § 3]. Abram (the 'exalted father' of Hebron), Isaac (the 'smiling' El of Beersheba), Jacob (the 'pursuing' El of Shechem), Israel (the 'fighting' El of Mahanaim),[1] Ishmael (the 'listening' El of Beer-lahai-roi), Jerahmeel (the 'pitying' El of Raḥama) and many more, can scarcely have been other than divine figures originally. The sons of these were, no doubt, once regarded as physical descendants of gods, though the term was later understood to designate them merely as the offspring of eponym heroes, or as belonging to the tribes bearing these names. However foreign to the ideas of a later time, the conception that the Israelites descended from Yahwè himself is likely to have existed in earlier days. When, in extant literature, Israel is called 'son of Yahwè,' and the members of the people 'sons and daughters of Yahwè,' this is indeed probably, in every instance, used in a metaphorical sense (see § 4). Nevertheless, there are indications that the sonship once was taken more literally. Already, the connection between Yahwè's fatherhood and his creation of Israel is significant. In the Assyrian, banu means 'build,' 'fashion,' 'beget'; the same term denotes creation and procreation: Dt. 32 8 ('the rock that begat thee . . . the El that brought thee forth') shows how closely the ideas were related in the Hebrew mind. The tendency to make the eponym heroes sons of gods and women, seen in Greece (cp Rohde, Psyche,(2) 152 ff. 169 ff.) and elsewhere, was evidently at one time operative in Israel as well. The original paternity of Isaac is but thinly disguised in Gen. 18 10 ff. 21 1 ff. (cp that of Samson in Judg. 13 where mal'ak is probably a later addition). It is quite evident that at sanctuaries provided with maṣṣēbōth and ashērīm, ḳĕdēšīm and ḳĕdēšōth, the simple folk-religion cannot have left Yahwè without a consort and children. In Ezek. 23 Yahwè marries two sisters and begets children by them. This is an allegory. But when even a late prophet does not hesitate to introduce this conception as a figure of speech, it may be reasonably supposed that an earlier time found it only natural that Yahwè, as well as other gods, should have children by graciously visiting women of his choice. Gen. 6 1 ff. shows that gods might do this without offending the morals of the age. The notion of a physical divine paternity is not incompatible with an otherwise highly developed moral sense (see § 17).

4. Figurative use. The very fact that in Hebrew literature Israel is primarily the son of Yahwè and the individual Israelite only by virtue of his connection with the people, indicates that the phrase was once understood in a literal sense, since collective sonship is mediated through the eponym hero. Nevertheless, the idea of physical descent has been so strongly suppressed that the term is practically everywhere used figuratively, to express the love and paternal care of Yahwè and the reverence and obedience of Israel.

[1] As the 'Job stone' found by Schumacher at Sheikh Sa'd in Ḥaurān proves that Ramses II. penetrated into the E. Jordan country, it is possible that the Israel referred to in the Me(r)neptah inscription was a tribe having for its centre Mahanaim.

Already in Hosea 2 1 the ethical significance often associated with this metaphor comes to view when the prospect of becoming 'sons of the living God' (b'nē El ḥai) by a moral reformation is held out to the Israelites. In Hosea 11 1 the text is doubtful. Mt. reads 'out of Egypt I have called my son.' 𝔊 seems to have found a plural (לבניו, τὰ τέκνα αὐτοῦ). See LOVINGKINDNESS. 'His children' would refer to the 'sons of Israel.' In Is. 1 2 30 1, the Israelites are called 'sons of Yahwè.' That the phrase was felt to be a figure of speech is evident from Dt. 1 31 8 5 ('as a man bears [chastens] his son, so Yahwè'; cp Ps. 103 13); but 14 1 asserts 'Ye are the sons of Yahwè, your God,' and 32 6 asks 'Is he not thy father, thy maker?' In Jer. 3 4 Yahwè is said to be a father; 3 19, 'How shall I place thee among sons,' means 'make thee a son' (see Duhm, Jeremia, p. vi), consequently contains the idea of adoption. The promise, 'I shall be a father to Israel, and Ephraim shall be my first-born' is given in Jer. 31 9. Similarly Ex. 4 22, 'My son, my first-born, is Israel.' In Is. 63 16, the first-born of Yahwè is emphasised, in contrast with the neglect of the people by Abraham and Israel; the cult of these heroes brings no relief. Cp also 'our father,' Is. 64 8 [7]. Mal. 1 6 assumes that Yahwè is constantly represented by the people as a father. Mal. 2 10-16 has suffered much corruption by intentional alteration and by accident [see Crit. Bib.]. But v. 10 clearly shows that Yahwè is the father of the Israelites and their ancestor. In v. 11 neither 𝔊 nor Pesh. seems to have found in the text 'and marries the daughter of a strange god' (אל נכר), but some phrase which could be interpreted 'and walks after (or 'serves') foreign gods.' This may be a free rendering of ובא אל בית אל נכר, 'and enters the house of a strange god,' but MT shows that the idea of a woman being the daughter of her god was not foreign to Hebrew thought (cp Nu. 21 29 Wisd. 9 7 12 21 16 10). In Ps. 73 15, 'the generation of thy children' refers to the Jews. The fatherhood of God is finely expressed in the prayer, Ecclus. 23 1, beginning Κύριε, πάτερ, 'Lord, father.' In Ecclus. 4 11 the Hebrew reads ואל יקראך בן, 'and God shall call thee son.' Here sonship has an ethical quality. That is also the case in Wisd. 2 18, 'if the righteous man is God's son, he will uphold him'; whilst in 5 5 the sons of God probably are the occupants of the celestial world, including angels and human saints (see § 7); in 9 7 12 21 16 10 18 4, the sons and daughters of God are the Israelites, and in 18 13 the people is said to be recognised by the Egyptians as 'God's son.' In Judith 9 4 the Jews are God's 'dear children.' In Esth. 6 14, they are the 'sons of the only and true God,' and in 3 Macc. 6 28 they are the sons of the 'most mighty and heavenly living God.' Eth. Enoch 62 11 speaks of 'his children and his elect,' but the passage is probably a Christian interpolation. Cp also Sib. Or. 3 702, 'sons of the great God'; Ps. Sol. 7 30, 'sons of their God'; 18 4, 'as a first-born only-begotten son'; Ass. Mos. 10 27, 'sons of God'; Jubilees 1 15, 'sons of God'; and 4 Ezra 6 58, 'thy people, first-born and only-begotten.'

It may be inferred from such instances that the designation of God as father in a figurative sense goes back at least to the eighth century and was common in Israel in the last century B.C.; that the Israelites felt themselves to be sons and daughters of Yahwè because of their connection with the holy Yahwè-worshipping people; and that here and there the thought of a spiritual sonship based on character was reached.

Founders of states and kings in general were regarded in antiquity as sons of gods.

5. The king.

Numerous examples were gathered from Greek and Roman writers by D. F. Ilgen in 1795. He, however, wrongly supposed that the basis of what he deemed simply a figure of speech was the relation of the king as pupil to the divinity as teacher. In reality, the divine paternity was looked upon as an important fact. In the case of a long-reigning dynasty, or one connected by marriage with the preceding one, it was sufficient to assume a transmission of the divine life from an original impregnation by a god; in the case of a usurper not connected by marriage with the previously reigning family, resort must be had to an immediate divine fatherhood. Thus, the kings of Egypt were considered as the sons of Re' by virtue of descent from him; but Alexander could be declared a son of Ammon Re' only by a denial of Philip's paternity, and a revelation of his birth without a human father (Trogus in Justin, Hist. 11 11). Less prominence was evidently given to this conception in Assyria; but its existence is proved by 5 R. 2 97 where Ašur-bāni-pal says Ašur ilu banña, 'Ashur the god, my begetter.' The Ptolemies as successors of the Egyptian kings accepted such titles as 'son of Rē',' 'υἱὸς τοῦ Ἡλίου,' 'son of Isis and Osiris'; and some of the Seleucidæ, as successors of Alexander, also received the title Θεοῦ υἱός. The latter title was frequently used by the Roman emperors as well as divus, θεός, and ĕlāhā in the East (see Dalman, 227, and Deissmann, Bibelstudien, 1 166 ff.).

Even in Israel the king was regarded as standing on a higher level than ordinary men and given the name 'son of Yahwè.' His quasi-divine character is already indicated in the fact that he was anointed. Originally the pouring out of oil on his head was a sacrifice, an act of worship. Yahwè's anointed was recognised as partaking of Yahwè's sanctity, as possessed of a divine spirit and a higher intelligence (1 S. 10 9). It is more likely to be a reflection of a generally prevailing opinion than mere flattery, when the woman in 2 S. 14 17 20 declares that David is like the gods in hearing what is good and evil, and has the wisdom of the gods to know all that is in the earth (mal'āk is probably a late interpolation). How the people before the exile looked upon their kings, cannot be determined from the literary remains reflecting the often strongly anti-royalist spirit of the prophets. Is. 9 6 shows that a poet in the exile did not hesitate to predict for a child born to the royal family (possibly a son of Jehoiachin) that he would be called a 'mighty god' (ēl gibbōr). 2 S. 7 14, probably written after the exile, as H. P. Smith has perceived, and possibly in the days of Zerubbabel, presents the son of David as the son of Yahwè, and significantly predicts for him that in spite of this he will be punished as human beings are, though not destroyed. When kings again sat on the throne of David in the Hasmonæan age, they naturally applied to themselves this promise. Yahwè's anointed king was his son, born as such on the day of his coronation, whom the nations and their rulers should obey (Ps. 2). Accustomed as men in Israel had been to hear their Ptolemaic or Seleucid rulers referred to both as 'god' and as 'son of god,' the two terms easily merged into each other when applied, as they were, to the Hasmonæan kings. In Ps. 58 2 and 82 6 Pharisaic hymn-writers scornfully designate these native rulers as 'gods' (ĕlōhīm) and 'sons of God' (b'nē 'elyōn). There would be no sting in this sarcasm, if they were not actually designated as such. That this was the case is shown by Ps. 45 7 f. [6 f.], where a poet laureate of one of these princes on the occasion of a royal wedding apostrophises the monarch as divine. In Ps. 89 26 f., 2 S. 7 14 is applied to Alexander Jannæus (so Duhm). Zech. 12 8 probably also applies to the reigning family.

On the other hand, Ex. 21 6 22 9 [8] do not prove that rulers were called 'gods.' They refer to household gods (Eerdmans), and Targ. and Pesh. which render 'judges' are certainly wrong. So far as known, the king was never regarded in Israel as literally the son of Yahwè. The underlying thought seems to have been that the king became a 'son' by the infusion of his divine father's life and intelligence.

6. The Messiah.

In view of the fact that the king in Israel was called a son of God, it is somewhat strange that there is so little evidence of its use as a title of the coming Messiah. There is no passage in Jewish literature that can be confidently dated as earlier than Christianity, in which this name is given to the Messiah.

Enoch 105 2 is probably an interpolation (so Drummond, Charles, Dalman). 4 Ezra 7 28 f. 13 32 37 52 14 9 are all doubtful. The Aramaic original is lost, and the extant versions (Syr., Lat., Eth., Ar., Arm.) have all passed through Christian hands, and manifestly suffered changes in these very passages (see Drummond, 285 ff.). The Targ. to 2 S. 7 14 renders 'like a father' and 'like a son,' and the Targ. to Ps. 2 7 'thou art dear to me as a son'; Ps. 2 is generally referred to Israel. In Origen's time the Jews looked forward to the coming of God's Messiah, but professed to find no reference in prophecy to a coming son of God (c. Celsum, 1 49). Only rarely (as in b. Sukka, 152 a and Midrash Tehill. 2 7) is a Messianic interpretation of Ps. 2 found. There can be little doubt that the reason for this lies in the reaction, first against Hasmonæan pretensions, and subsequently against Christian exegesis. But between the insistence upon Davidic descent as a rebuke to the illegitimate line in the Psalter of Solomon, and the emphasis upon the human character of the Messiah (ἄνθρωπος ἐξ ἀνθρώπων) by Trypho as a disavowal of the new god, the great Messianic movements stirred many circles in Jewry, besides the followers of Jesus, with eagerness to discover a reference to the Messiah in every passage that lent itself to the purpose. It therefore remains possible that the identification of the Messiah as the son of God represents not merely the blending of two independent convictions, but the synonymy of two terms. Dalman objects to bar ĕlāhā as a Messianic title, on the ground that it was not customary to mention the name of God, as Mk. 14 61 υἱὸς τοῦ εὐλογητοῦ indicates. But Mt., who, according to Dalman, alone rendered the original idiomatic malkūthā da-shĕmayyā for 'kingdom of God' with βασιλεῖα τῶν οὐρανῶν, has in 26 63 υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, and so also Lk. 22 70; and there is no indication that 'sons of God' was rendered otherwise than by b'nē elāhā. Nevertheless, bar ĕlāhā is not likely to have been very commonly used as a designation of the Messiah, and there is no absolute proof of its use at any time.

7. One raised from the dead.

In Lk. 20 36 those that are accounted worthy of another world and of being raised from the dead are said to be equal to angels and 'sons of God, because they are sons of the resurrection.' According to Rom. 1 4 Jesus was shown to be a son of God by his resurrection from the dead. The idea that the ranks of the heavenly beings may thus be increased, is older than the thought of a resurrection.

Heroes that are well-pleasing to the gods may be carried aloft to be with them for ever, as Uta-napišti in the Gilgamiš epic, or Enoch and Elijah [see DELUGE, § 17, ELIJAH, ENOCH, and cp ETHAN, PARADISE, § 3]. Slavonic Enoch 22 gives a fine description of Enoch's reception in heaven, and his celestial garments. Into the same company of heavenly beings men could be brought from the subterranean realms of Shĕōl, when the Mazdayasnian doctrine of a resurrection had become familiar in Israel. Even in circles where the Greek conception of immortality prevailed, the godly man was supposed to take up his abode after death among the sons of God, and to obtain his inheritance among the saints (Wisd. 5 5). It is the merit of Barton (New World, 1899, pp. 114 ff.) to have called attention to this thought.

8. The Logos.

Among the Jews accessible to Greek philosophy, it was especially Philo who prepared the way for the Christian doctrine of the son of God by his Logos-speculation. When he called this Logos 'the perfect son,' 'the first-born son of God' (De Vit. Mos. 14; De Conf. Ling. 14; De Agric. 12), he did not imply that it was an individual, an hypostasis, a person. Yet it was inevitable that the term 'son of God' should suggest a mediator between God and the world, a celestial personality more grandly conceived than any other associated with the name, and herein lies much of its historic importance (see §§ 23, 25; and for a description of Philo's Logos the careful studies of Jean Réville, Soulier, Siegfried, Anathon Aall, and Grill).

9. The Synoptics.

The term 'son of God' (υἱὸς θεοῦ, υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ) or 'my (sc. God's) son' (υἱός μου) occurs in the Synoptic gospels 27 times, and the term 'the son' (ὁ υἱός) 9 times. It will be convenient to record the occurrences in detail and to classify them.

1. 'Son of God' or 'my (God's) son':—27 times.

a. Enumeration.

Mt. 3 17 4 3 6 5 9 14 33 16 16 17 5 26 63 27 40 43 54	=	11 times.
Mk. 1 1 11 3 11 5 7 9 7 14 61 15 39	=	7 ,,
Lk. 1 32 35 3 22 38 4 3 9 8 28 9 35 22 70	=	9 ,,

b. Analysis.

i. In three Gospels:—3 times.

Mt. 3 17 = Mk. 1 11 = Lk. 3 22: baptism.
Mt. 17 5 = Mk. 9 7 = Lk. 9 35: transfiguration.
Mt. 26 63 = Mk. 14 61 = Lk. 22 70: trial.

ii. In two Gospels: 4 times.

Mt. 27 54 = Mk. 15 39 (centurion)	=	once.
Mk. 5 7 = Lk. 8 28 (demon)	=	once.
Mt. 4 3 = Lk. 4 3 (temptation) / Mt. 4 6 = Lk. 4 9 ,,	=	twice.

iii. In one Gospel:—10 times.

Mk. 1 1 (superscription), 3 11 (demon)	= twice.
Mt. 5 9 (name of peacemakers), 14 33 (after walk on the sea), 16 16 (Peter's confession), 27 40 (at the cross), 27 43 (alleged quotation)	= 5 times.
Lk. 1 32 35 (annunciation), 3 38 (genealogy)	= 3 times.

2. 'The son' (ὁ υἱός) alone: 9 times.

a. Enumeration.

Mt. 11 27 (thrice) 24 36 28 19	=	5 times.
Mk. 13 32	=	once.
Lk. 10 22 (thrice)	=	3 times.

b. Analysis.

The three in Mt. 11 27 correspond to the three in Lk. 10 22 (hymn of Jesus)	= 6
Mk. 13 32 is equivalent to Mt. 24 36 (not even the son)	= 2
Mt. 28 19 (baptismal formula) has no parallel	= 1

10. Principles of criticism.

It is not sufficient, however, to consider the texts in which the title actually occurs. Passages throwing light upon Jesus' conception of the divine fatherhood in general and man's sonship must also be examined. Parables in which the term 'son' might be regarded as referring to Jesus, must be taken into consideration. Whenever a reputed saying of Jesus is drawn into the discussion, it must be tested in a retranslation into the Aramaic dialect spoken by Jesus; and the same applies to utterances concerning him by persons to whom this Galilean speech was the vernacular. The differences between the accounts of the evangelists must be observed. It is not permissible to leave out of sight the peculiarities of the evangelists, or the influence upon their minds of later thought and a growing tradition. It is necessary to bear in mind the fundamental distinction between the Greek words ascribed to Jesus which we possess, and the Aramaic sentences he spoke which we can only surmise; between the stories told for religious edification, and the history often symbolised rather than described in them. Moreover, the condition of the text must be sedulously watched.

11. Ethical significance in genuine sayings of Jesus.

In a number of passages whose substantial genuineness admits of little doubt Jesus is reported as having used the term 'sons of God,' or an equivalent, of men in such a manner as to imply a certain moral likeness to God.

Whilst in Mt. 5 9 the thought may conceivably be that the peace-makers will be called sons of God because they will be deemed worthy of a share in the resurrection (Lk. 20 36 and cp § 7), more probably the idea is that when the kingdom of heaven shall be established on earth, as it soon will be, they will be recognised by virtue of their spiritual kinship to God as his true sons. This is manifestly the case in Mt. 5 45, where sonship is based on an impartial and forgiving spirit like God's. Whether Jesus said 'sons of your father who is in heaven' or 'sons of the Most High,' as in the parallel passage in Lk. 6 35, is doubtful. Most probably he said 'sons of the father who is in heaven.' This is suggested by a comparison of Mt. 6 11 (ὁ πατὴρ ὑμῶν ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς) with Lk. 11 13 (ὁ πατὴρ ὁ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ, where, however, Sin. Syr. seems to read 'the father that is in heaven'). Mt. apparently had a preference for the pronominal additions. But whether אבא or אבוכון was originally used, it is significant that Jesus did not limit the divine paternity and did not exclude from sonship those who were 'themselves evil.' The same is strongly indicated also in the parables of the lost son (Lk. 15 11 ff.) and the two sons (Mt. 21 28 ff.), which teach that man even when he errs does not cease to be the son of God and the object of his fatherly affection. In Mt. 23 8 f. Jesus is speaking to the crowds as well as to his disciples, warning them not to call men Rabbi, Abba, and Moreh, 'for one is your master,' 'one is your father,' 'one is your teacher,' the reference being everywhere to God (see Köhler, JQR 13 567 ff.). On the other hand, in Mt. 10 20 29 and Lk. 12 32 the disciples are addressed, and those to whom the kingdom will be given are clearly distinguished by their character from the rest of the people. Even more manifest is this distinction in Mt. 17 25 ff. As kings on earth demand tribute not of their sons but only of strangers, so the heavenly king does not impose taxes on his sons. Those who think of God as taxing them for the support of the temple-cult are in reality strangers to him; the relations of sons to the heavenly father are characterised by freedom. In view of such a profoundly ethical conception of sonship and Jesus' attitude in general, it is difficult to believe in the historical accuracy of his refusal to work a miracle for a Phœnician woman on the ground alleged (Mt. 15 21-28 Mk. 7 27-30).

12. Jesus' self-consciousness as a son of God.

The synoptic tradition records no utterance of Jesus in which he distinctly refers to himself as a 'son of God.' In Mt. 27 43 it is indeed said that mocking high priests, scribes, and elders quoted him as having said: 'I am a son of God.' The only ground for such an assertion would be Jesus' answer to the high priest's question (Mt. 26 67). But see § 20 and SON OF MAN, § 37 (end). The taunt seems to have been made up of phrases from Wisdom 2 16-18 (see Brandt, 209). Of more importance would be the distinction between 'my father' and 'your father,' if this could be traced back to Jesus himself.

The Gk. text of Mt. gives the impression that Jesus said 'my father' when speaking of his own God or to him, whilst he said 'your father' when referring to the God of his disciples or the people, and that he taught his disciples to say 'our father,' but did not use this expression himself. Already a comparison with the synoptic parallels in which the possessive pronouns are lacking tends to raise doubts as to the integrity of the text. The prayer Jesus taught his disciples begins in Lk. 11 2 with 'Father' (πάτερ); and textual criticism renders the originality of the pronoun in many instances quite uncertain. When, furthermore, the attempt is made to recover the actual Aramaic words used by Jesus, the fact comes to view that in practically all cases the original is likely to have been simply Abba (אבא). Where the Gk. Mt. had πατέρ μου or ὁ πατήρ μου, Evang. Hier. has simply Abba in the extant passages, Mt. 10 32 f. 16 16 18 10 19 35 26 39; and the same is true of Lk. 2 49 10 22 etc. If this version is made from the Greek without the aid of an Aramaic translation, only a strongly entrenched usage can account for the suppression of the possessive. If, as seems probable, an earlier Aramaic gospel was consulted in the translation, the testimony is doubly significant. It is confirmed by other remains of Palestinian Aramaic.

Jesus almost certainly said only Abba in his own prayers as well as in the prayer he taught, and Abba dĕ bashĕmayyā, 'the father who is in heaven,' in referring to God. This conclusion is not merely of negative value. Positively, it indicates an exceedingly keen sense of the fatherhood of God creating a true filial attitude and a gentle feeling of brotherliness toward men. Into the innermost recesses of his spirit we cannot penetrate. Even if our sources were more fruitful and less heavily overlaid by tradition than they are, there would still remain the unfathomed depth of an experience colouring every characteristic thought and deed, the indefinable quality of a rich inner life, the mystery of a great and fruitful genius. But we are able to draw certain inferences from the fact that the highest moral and religious conceptions of sonship ascribed to him find expression in utterances in which he either speaks of men in general (Mt. 5 9 45 48), or includes himself with others (Mt. 17 25 ff. Mk. 3 35). Whilst he may have avoided such a statement as 'I am a son of God,' because bar ĕlāhā might have suggested an angel, a translated being like Elijah, or a king, it is possible, therefore, that the real reason was his fear lest he be misunderstood as claiming for himself alone that relation to the Father into which his own experience made him so desirous that all men should enter.

13. Hymn to Father and Son.

How well founded such apprehensions would have been may be seen from Mt. 11 25 ff. (Lk. 10 21 f.) 24 36 (Mk. 13 32) 28 19 and also from Mt. 21 33-46 (Mk. 12 1-12 Lk. 20 9-19) 22 2 (Lk. 14 16). In the first of these passages the gradual growth of a logion may be observed. The text presented by our MSS with minor variations between Mt. and Lk. already occurs sporadically in the second century (present tense Justin, c. Tryph. 100, 'knowledge of the Son first'; Iren. iv. 6 1, Clem. Recog. 2 47). Older than this, however, as modern critics generally recognise, is the text found in Justin, Apol. 1 63; Clem. Hom. 17 4 18 4 13 20; Marcosians in Iren. i. 20 3; Marcion in Tert. c. Marc. 2 27; Iren. ii. 6 1 iv. 6 3; Clem. Alex. Strom. 7 18 109 etc., which reads, with unimportant variations, καὶ οὐδεὶς ἔγνω τὸν πατέρα εἰ μὴ ὁ υἱὸς καὶ (οὐδὲ) τὸν υἱὸν (τις γινώσκει) εἰ μὴ ὁ πατὴρ καὶ οἷς (ᾧ) ἂν ὁ υἱὸς ἀποκαλύψῃ (βούληται ἀποκαλύψαι). The principal differences are that ἔγνω occurs in place of γινώσκει, that the sentence 'no one knew the Father except the Son' precedes 'nor any one the Son except the Father,' and that as a consequence it is the son instead of the father that reveals the son. Schmiedel (Prot. Monatshefte, 1900, p. 1 ff.) regards this as an original utterance of Jesus and understands the aorist to intimate that there was a time when Jesus discovered that God was a father, a thought that until then had not been present to his mind. According to this critic, the men who once believed in the fatherhood of God were all dead, and among Jesus' contemporaries no man recognised God as a father. Having become a 'son' by the discovery, he naturally looked upon himself as 'the Son' as long as he remained alone with his conviction that God was a father. But already Ewald (JBW, 1855, p. 160) pointed out that the difference between ἔγνω and γινώσκει would not appear in the Heb. yādaʿ, and Dalman (233) rightly insists that in the unvocalised Aramaic text the participle yādaʿ and perfect yĕdaʿ could not be distinguished. This difficulty would indeed be obviated if a derivative of נכר is supposed to have been used in the original (Evang. Hier. has מכר in Mt.); but even so (aphel perf.) this verb would scarcely have necessitated an aorist rather than a present tense. Klöpper (ZWTh., 1896, pp. 501 ff.) and Dalman strongly urge the improbability of the revelation of the son through the son. Yet only the son's knowledge of the father follows naturally the transmission of all knowledge to the son. The rather irrelevant statement that 'no one knows the son except the father,' has the appearance of being a gloss drifting into different places. If it is removed, the connection is greatly improved: 'All things (that are hidden from the wise and disclosed to babes) have been transmitted (Evang. Hier. אתמסר) to me by the Father, and no one knows the Father except the son and he to whom the son is willing to make a revelation.' It is difficult, however, to see how even such an utterance could have come from the lips of Jesus. The alleged return of seventy disciples from a journey during which they had been engaged in exorcising demons does not furnish a natural occasion for such a comment as this (see Bruno Bauer, Kritik der Ev.-gesch. [1891] 2 266 ff.). That Jesus should have thought of himself as possessed of all knowledge and regarded all other men as ignorant of God is scarcely conceivable. Long usage had rendered the term 'father' as a designation of God quite familiar to the contemporaries of Jesus, and piety had invested the name with deep spiritual significance (see § 4). But the abbreviated title 'the son' would probably have been as unintelligible to the Jews of Jesus' time as it was well understood by the Christians of the second century. Pfleiderer (Urchristenthum, 445 ff. 509 f.) recognises the influence of Pauline ideas, and Brandt (pp. 561, 576) considers Mt. 11 25-30 to be a hymn regularly constructed of material largely borrowed from Ecclus. 51. Neither of these views is perhaps capable of strict demonstration. But the underlying conviction that this cannot be a genuine saying of Jesus is as irresistible as the evidence of its gradual growth is conclusive.

14. Son's limited knowledge.

In Mt. 24 36 (Mk. 13 32) the clause 'neither the Son' (οὐδὲ ὁ υἱὸς) is lacking in many MSS, and (among other ancient witnesses) in the Syr.-Sin. Most modern scholars reject it. Scholten (Het oudste Evang. 227) maintained that it was also lacking in the original Mk. Dalman (159) thinks that the original text was 'not even the angels,' and that 'not even the son but the father only' is a later addition.

Schmiedel (l.c. 20) also regards the words in Mt. as spurious, but considers those in Mk. as genuine because they cannot have been engendered by reverence for Jesus, a motive that led the editor of Mt. to omit them in copying his source. It is not apparent why the supposed original copyist should have been more sensitive on this point than the later interpolator of Mt. In the first half of the second century it is not likely that any Christian was offended by the subordination of the Son or his limited knowledge (Scholten, l.c.). Only the rising estimate of Jesus can account for the place of the Son between the angels and the Father, for the emphasis upon the fact that even he did not know the day and the hour, and for the use of the abbreviated title. Mk. 13 32 seems to have been added to the Apocalypse of Jesus to explain either the absence of a sufficiently exact date or the delay in the fulfilment of prophecy.

15. Baptismal formula.

The third passage in which 'the Son' occurs is Mt. 28 19. That the trinitarian baptismal formula does not go back to Jesus himself is evident and recognised by all independent critics. Acts and the Epistles show that other formulas were used but not this one, that the apostles did not feel warranted to preach to the heathen without a special revelation, and that the early church never referred to this commandment. The fact that it is ascribed to Jesus after his death is also significant;

SON OF GOD

Conybeare (ZNTW, 1901, pp. 275 ff.; Hibb. Journ. 1, 1902, pp. 102 ff.) has shown that there was, as late as in the time of Eusebius, an earlier text which read: Πορευθέντες μαθητεύσατε πάντα τὰ ἔθνη ἐν τῷ ὀνόματί μου 'Go ye and make disciples of all nations in my name,' and has rendered it probable that the expanded form originated about 140 A.D. in the Old Latin texts of Africa, that it thence crept into the Greek text at Rome, and finally established itself in the East during the Nicene epoch in time to figure in all surviving Greek codices.

16. Allegory of husbandmen.

How Jesus understood his peculiar relation as a son may, according to Dalman (230), be seen very clearly from Mt. 21 33-46 (Mk. 12 1-12 Lk. 20 9-19). He regarded himself as the beloved son, or, as Gen. 22 2 𝔊 and Trg. suggests, 'the only begotten son,' entitled to the empire of the world, but destined to be put to death. On the other hand, Jülicher (Gleichnisreden Jesu, 1899, pp. 385 ff.) after a most searching examination of these texts comes to the conclusion that the story of the wicked husbandmen is not a parable describing something that might have happened in real life, but an allegory, and that it is in no sense an utterance of Jesus, but the work of early Christian theology. The justice of this verdict is appreciated when the marked contrast to all genuine parables, the lack of verisimilitude, the assumptions contrary to fact, and the charges based upon future conduct are duly noticed. In regard to Mt. 22 2, where the king makes a marriage feast for his son, Dalman rightly calls attention to the absence of the son during the meal, and the fact that in the parallel (Lk. 14 16) there is no mention of the son.

17. Proclamation by heavenly voices.

According to Lk. 1 32 35, the angel Gabriel announced to Mary that the child she was to bear would be called 'the Son of the Most High,' or 'the Son of God,' because the Holy Ghost would come upon her. Divine sonship is here made dependent upon physical generation. Jesus will be called Son of God because he is to have no human father. This mythical conception which was widely prevalent in antiquity (see §§ 2, 5) seems to belong to a late stratum (cp Conybeare, ZNTW, 1902, pp. 192 ff.) and is of Gentile-Christian origin (cp Hillmann, JPT, 1891, pp. 231 ff.). Older than it, is the idea that the Son of God was born as such at the baptism. Between the reports of the heavenly proclamation on this occasion in the synoptics there are important differences. Whilst Mt. 3 17 reads 'This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased,' Mk. 1 11 and Lk. 3 22 have 'Thou art my beloved son, in thee I am well pleased.' It is possible, however, that D a b c ff^{2*}l and a large number of patristic quotations have preserved a more original reading in Lk. 3 22—viz., υἱός μου εἶ σύ· ἐγὼ σήμερον γεγέννηκά σε, 'Thou art my son, to-day I have begotten thee.' The generation of the Son of God is in this case accomplished by the entrance of the Holy Ghost as a dove. This earlier myth seems to have been supplanted by that of the Virgin birth. The announcement of the heavenly voice at the transfiguration (Mt. 17 5 Mk. 9 7 Lk. 9 35) was then transferred to the baptism. (Cp Holtzmann, Die Synoptiker,[3] 85.)

18. Proclamation by demons.

The early church was convinced that not only heaven but also hell knew the secret of Jesus' divine sonship. Demons repeatedly proclaimed him the Son of God, Mk. 3 11 5 7 (Lk. 8 28; cp also Mk. 1 27); and Satan himself used his knowledge of this fact to lead him into temptation (Mt. 4 3 6; cp Lk. 4 3 9). To accept the opinion of the evangelists as to the supernatural knowledge and activity of demons is no longer possible.

It is assumed by many critics that the demoniacs actually spoke such words as are ascribed to them, and that they themselves, as well as their reporters, were only mistaken in their interpretation of mental and nervous disorders. Being thrown into great excitement by the extraordinary impression of Jesus' personality, these sufferers gave voice to their own or the general feeling that Jesus was the Messiah. But on this theory it cannot be explained why men excited to madness by the political situation should have avoided the one unmistakable Messianic title, 'Son of David,' and employed a term that cannot be proved to have been then used, nor why, of all men, only the demoniacs should proclaim him as the 'Son of God.' As it is especially Mk. who emphasizes this testimony of the demons, it is natural to see in it a phase of his general conception of Jesus' life and character. He had to reckon with a strongly entrenched tradition to the effect that Jesus had not proclaimed himself as the Messiah. From the premises of his Christian faith he could only conclude that Jesus had then concealed his Messiahship and the divine nature which he associated with it. Such a fact might be hidden from men, but not from demons. They must have known, in spite of his disguise, the divine Son by whom they were to be judged. It is particularly the merit of Wrede (Das Messiasgeheimniss, 1901, pp. 73 ff.) to have called attention to this aspect of the case. The story of the temptation should be considered from the same point of view. [Cp TEMPTATION, §§ 4-6.]

As no objective reality can be ascribed to these voices from the world of evil spirits, it is idle to inquire whether in their reported utterances 'Son of God' corresponds to an Aramaic bar ĕlāhā, bar ʿelyōn, b'reh d'ĕlāhā, and what meanings each of these forms may have conveyed.

19. Petrine confession.

The same conception that Jesus' divine sonship cannot be known by men except by a special revelation from another world is found in Mt. 16 17. Of such a revelation there is no hint in the accounts of Peter's confession at Cæsarea Philippi given by Mk. (8 27-33) and Lk. (9 18-22). But neither of these evangelists puts the title 'Son of God' upon the lips of Peter. Mk. has simply ὁ χριστός, Lk. ὁ χριστὸς τοῦ θεοῦ; the latter probably goes back to mĕšīḥā dĕ-yahwe, cp 1 S. 24 7 Trg., and Ps. Sol. 18 7 χριστὸς κυρίου, and originally 17 32, and not to a mĕšīḥā d'ĕlāhā not found elsewhere. It is more likely that Peter used this longer form than the shorter one in Mk. There is no reason to doubt either the question or the answer in the form preserved by Mk. and Lk. Before carrying out his plan of proclaiming the kingdom of heaven in Jerusalem, Jesus would naturally desire to know the attitude of the people. If Peter's description gave him some assurance that there was no immediate danger in that direction, the views as to his personality cherished by his disciples seem to have made him all the more apprehensive, and caused him most earnestly to forbid them to make any such statement concerning him.

It has long been recognised that Mt. 16 17-19 is a late interpolation. It may already reveal the pretensions of the Roman bishop (Wernle, Syn. Frage, 192), and has been more correctly interpreted by Catholic exegetes than by Protestants (Bauer, Kritik, 36). But, apart from the macarism, the text of Mt. has been interpolated (cp Holtzmann, Syn.[3] 257) by the addition of the two terms 'son of Man' (see SON OF MAN, § 39) and 'son of the living God' (cp Hosea 2 1, 𝔊 υἱοὶ θεοῦ ζῶντος). Van Manen (Th.T, 1894, p. 184) is probably right in thinking that 'Son of God' is not here a designation of the theocratic king, but to be taken in a metaphysical sense. But to the interpolator ὁ χριστός was no longer a mere equivalent of 'the Messiah'; it had no doubt already assumed the same significance as the 'Son of God.'

20. High Priest's adjuration.

According to Mt. 26 63 the high priest said 'I adjure thee by the living God that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God'; in Mk. 14 61 he simply asks 'Art thou the Christ the Son of the Blessed?' and in Lk. 22 67 the elders of the people say 'If thou art the Christ tell us,' and only after the reference to the Son of Man, 'Art thou then the Son of God?' v. 70. It is evident that according to Christian tradition Jesus was asked by the priests whether he regarded himself as the Messiah, and that the particular form of the question shaped itself freely. In Mt. and Lk. Jesus does not commit himself; Mt. 26 64 reports only the brief Σὺ εἶπας, 'Thou sayest so,' Lk. 22 70 his reason for not answering as well as his rejoinder, 'You say that I am.' On the meaning of Σὺ εἶπας see Thayer, JBL 13 40-49; Merx, Die vier kan. Ev. 2 384. These gospels represent a tradition according to which Jesus maintained his incognito before the priests as well as before Pilate. The apparently earlier form of the narrative preserved in Lk. makes no mention of false witnesses, blasphemy, a formal sentence to death, and personal indignities, but tells of two false charges brought against Jesus by the priests before Pilate—viz., his forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar and his declaring that he himself is the Christ, an anointed king. Mk. has all the additions of Mt. and, besides, takes the important step of changing Σὺ εἶπας into Ἐγώ εἰμι 'I am.' What took place in the pontifical residence to which Jesus had been carried was probably as little known to his disciples as to us. (See Brandt, 53 ff.; We. Skizzen, 6 [1899] 207; cp SIMON PETER, § 15.) At the time when these accounts were elaborated, 'Son of Man,' 'Christ,' and 'Son of God' had become synonymous, and 'Son of God' was understood as 'God,' so that the blasphemy of making oneself equal with God could be conceived of as a charge brought against Jesus. The 'Son of God' in Mt. 27 40 is lacking in the parallel passage Mk. 15 29 f., and the utterance is based on Mt. 26 61 (Mk. 14 58), having no more historic value than these improbable testimonies.

21. Centurion's exclamation.

In utter amazement at the miracles that accompanied the death of Jesus, the centurion cried 'Of a truth this is the Son of God' (or 'the son of a god'), Mt. 27 54 (Mk. 15 39). As there is no reason to suppose that the great darkness, the earthquake, the rending of the veil in the temple, and the rising of the dead from their tombs actually occurred [cp EARTHQUAKE, § 2], the occasion for such an exclamation did not exist. Of these miracles Mk. mentions only the rending of the veil. Since the centurion could not have seen this, even if it happened, his astonishment is left without a cause. If Mk. had thought that the centurion became convinced of the divinity of Jesus by the fact that he died somewhat earlier than expected, uttering a loud cry, he would scarcely have introduced the statement as to the veil. By his tendency to shorten the accounts that he copied, he has here, as elsewhere, rendered his own incongruous. Both Mt. and Mk. no doubt thought of 'Son of God' in a Christian sense. While it is quite doubtful whether any of the evangelists found the loud cry significant, it is possible that a centurion accustomed to such sights saw in the relatively speedy release from suffering an evidence that this political criminal was indeed a righteous man (Lk. 23 47), though Lk. thought of the miracles as occasioning this judgment.

22. Origin of title in Synoptics.

A critical study of the synoptic material leads inevitably to the conclusion that Jesus never called himself 'the Son of God,' and never was addressed by that title. That he was proclaimed as such by voices from heaven and hell is a notion consonant with the ideas of the time, but not of such a nature as to command belief at present. But this negative result raises a question concerning the origin of the term 'Son of God.' Sanday regards it as certain that it was applied to Jesus in 1 Thess. 1 10, '23 years after the ascension,' and thinks it 'easier and more critical' to see in the expression a continuation of Jesus' own teaching than to look for its explanation in other directions. But apart from the impossibility of proving that the epistle quoted was written '23 years after the ascension,' by pointing to the Pauline literature Sanday has himself drawn the attention away from the line of direct transmission of the thoughts and words of Jesus. It is indeed in Hellenistic circles that the title as we find it applied to Jesus is likely to have originated. There is a possibility (see § 6) that in some circles the intensified study of 'Messianic' prophecies during the first century A.D. caused the term bar ĕlāhā to be used as a title of the Messiah. Wernle (Anfänge uns. Rel. 295) goes too far when he asserts that no road leads from the OT and Rabbinism to the doctrine of the deity of Christ, as Sanday rightly maintains. In Hasmonæan psalms 'gods' and 'sons of God' are still synonyms and, in language tinged with apocalyptic imagery, the reigning kings are described both as 'gods' and as 'sons of God.' In spite of practical monotheism, the belief in the existence of gods as celestial princes or as demons continued. Such a phrase as 'sons of God' because sons of the resurrection does not reflect a specifically Christian consciousness, but is likely to go back to 'Rabbinism,' showing its conception of the possibility of becoming a son of God in a metaphysical sense through a resurrection. Tendencies in the direction indicated can be pointed out, and are natural enough, since the mental habits of the Aramaic-speaking Jew cannot have been so radically different from those of the Greek-speaking Jew. Nevertheless it should be admitted that we possess no direct evidence of the use of bar ĕlāhā as a Messianic title. On the other hand, the term υἱὸς θεοῦ was frequently met with in the Græco-Roman world as a title of kings and a designation of heroes born of divine fathers or translated to be with the gods. The ideas associated with θεός and υἱὸς θεοῦ flowed into each other and had a metaphysical rather than an ethical significance. The meaning generally given to the term in the empire would unconsciously colour the thought of Hellenistic Jews when they found it employed in the Greek version of their Scriptures in what they took to be predictions of the Messiah. The titles υἱὸς θεοῦ, Κύριος, and Σωτήρ would certainly apply as well to the coming king of Israel as to the Roman Emperor. So far Jewish thought might certainly have gone, though it cannot be strictly proved that it went. It is not necessary to go outside the boundaries of Jewish thought, influenced by Greek speculation, for the ideas of an elevation into the sphere of divine life, through resurrection and ascension, the victory over demons knowing the secrets of another world, and even the birth of a hero without a human father, as Philo shows. In the present state of NT criticism it is not possible to date with accuracy the appearance of one or another of these ideas in Christian literature; but it may, perhaps, safely be assumed that they had all found expression by the beginning of the second century.

23. Use of title in Fourth Gospel.

In Jn. 'Son of God' (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ) occurs ten times, and 'the Son' fourteen times. As in the case of the Synoptists it will be convenient to give the details.

1. 'Son of God': 10 times.

1 34: testimony of John.	10 36: OT precedent.
1 50: Nathanael's confession.	11 4: glorified through Lazarus.
3 18: belief in him.	11 27: Martha's confession.
5 25: dead hearing his voice.	19 7: making himself God's equal.
6 69: Peter's confession.	20 31: purpose of book.

In 3 16 'the only begotten son' occurs, and in 17 1 'thy son.'

2. 'The Son': 14 times.

3 17 35 36 5 20 21 22 bis 23 26 6 40 8 35 36 14 13 17 1.

In 1 18 the true reading seems to be μονογενὴς θεός, in 9 35 τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου; in 1 34 the text is uncertain, Syr. sin. cur. reading 'the chosen one of God.'

It is important to observe that ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ is used by John, Nathanael, Peter, Martha, and the evangelist himself, but rarely by Jesus, whilst ὁ υἱός is as a rule employed by Jesus alone. In the ecclesiastical circles whose christology this gospel reflects, the longer form, usually in addition to ὁ χριστός, was evidently used in public confessions of faith, and the shorter form had already come into vogue in theological discussions. To this evangelist 'the Son' was a divine being who had appeared in human shape. He was 'a god' (θεός 1 1), 'an only-begotten god' (μονογενὴς θεός 1 18) who had assumed human nature, had become flesh (1 14). He was the Logos of whom Philo had spoken as 'the Son,' the medium of creation and redemption. It was not blasphemy for him to claim a title felt to be equivalent to 'God,' for he had been sent from heaven, whilst in the Scriptures men who had only received oracles from heaven were called 'gods' (10 33 ff.) And he called those happy whose faith allowed them to say 'My Lord and my God!' without having seen the evidences of his resurrection (20 29).

It is no longer necessary to prove that the words put upon the lips of Jesus in this gospel cannot have been uttered by him. Even scholars generally distrustful of results that contravene ecclesiastical tradition are no longer willing to maintain the position of Schleiermacher and Neander, but freely admit 'in this collection of sayings an element—possibly a somewhat considerable element—that represents not so much what was actually spoken as enlargement and comment embodying the experience and reflection of the growing church' (Sanday). The critical estimate gained by the investigations of Bretschneider, Strauss, Bruno Bauer, Schwegler, Baur, and Zeller was in the main so sound that it has been adopted, even after the severe testing by Bleek, Ewald, and Reuss, with modifications that do not essentially affect it, not only by Hilgenfeld, Keim, Volkmar, Holtzmann, Scholten, Thoma, Pfleiderer, and Albert Réville, but also by Schürer, Jülicher, and substantially Harnack, whose theory of authorship and interpolations does not render it usable as a source for the history of Jesus (Das Wesen des Christenthums, p. 13 ET, p. 19 f.). It is significant that the most recent investigators, Jean Réville, Kreyenbühl, Schmiedel, and Grill agree in rejecting the Johannine authorship, the authenticity of the speeches, and the various partition-theories. That all parts of the book reveal the influence of the Philonian Logos-idea was never so fully demonstrated as by Réville and Grill; however mistaken his theory of authorship may be, Kreyenbühl has exhibited, even more clearly than Baur, the gnostic affinities of the gospel; Schmiedel has shown convincingly how essentially correct the interpretation of the external evidence by the Tübingen school was; and by setting Jn.'s central idea, the incarnation, against the background of Oriental speculation, Grill has not only used the comparative method that henceforth must find a wider application in all biblical interpretation, but also revealed the legitimacy of that process of thought which led from the Fourth Gospel to the Symbolum Nicænum.

24. In Epp. and Rev. In the epistolary literature of the NT the following facts are noticeable.

'Son of God' occurs in 1 and 2 Jn. . . .	= 13 times
'the Son' occurs in 1 and 2 Jn. . . .	= 6 ,,

Neither occurs in—

(a) Jas. Jude 1 Pet. 3 Jn. or (except in an allusion to the transfiguration) 2 Pet.

(b) in Phil. Philem. 2 Thess. 1 Tim. 2 Tim. and Titus.

In the remaining epistles the occurrences are:

1. 'Son of God'

Rom. 1 3 4 9 5 10 8 3 29 32	= 7 times
Gal. 1 16 2 28 4 4 6	= 4 ,,
1 Cor. 1 9 2 Cor. 1 19 Eph. 4 13 Col. 1 13 1 Thess. 1 10	= 5 ,,
Heb. 1 5 4 14 6 6 7 3 10 29	= 5 ,,

2. 'the Son'

1 Cor. 15 28	= once
Heb. 1 2 8 3 6 5 8 7 28	= 5 times

The conception in the Johannine epistles is the same as in the fourth gospel. Rom. 1 3 is especially important as showing the idea of divine sonship based on the resurrection. Connected with this metaphysical sense of the term is the conception that men are not in themselves sons of God but may become such by endowment with divine spirit, 8 6. In Gal. 1 16 the manifestation of the risen Son of God is described as an inner process.

In Eph. and Col., which show the influence of the Logos speculation, the Son is the pre-existent medium of creation: the phrase 'first-born of all creation,' Col. 1 15, should not be interpreted so as to exclude priority (Sanday), since 'he is before all things,' as v. 17 shows. The closest affinity to the fourth gospel is found in Heb., where 'the Son' is an essentially divine being, subordinate to the Most High, but higher than 'the heavenly man' of 1 Cor. 15. Schenkel finely observed the embarrassment the author felt at the thought of this being learning obedience or suffering 'though he was a Son.' The Alexandrian exegesis of chap. 1 shows with what peculiar material the road from the OT was paved.

The term does not occur in Acts, and Sanday rightly decides against παῖς θεοῦ being interpreted as an equivalent. In Rev. 2 18 the Christ is called 'Son of God.' The strangely composite christology of this book may be connected with its composite authorship and the transmission of its text.

25. Historical significance of title. A careful examination of the gospels tends to produce the conviction that Jesus never assumed the title 'Son of God' either to designate himself as the expected king of Israel or to intimate that his nature was unlike that of other men, but that he spoke of men in general as 'the sons of God' and of God as their father, and also used the expression as a mark of distinction for those whose character resembled God's, who by their filial relation were freed from bondage to legal enactments concerning the cult, whose spirit and conduct established peace in the world, and who would be accounted worthy of a share in the resurrection from the dead. From a modern point of view such an attitude no doubt appears ethically more valuable than the loftiest claim of kingship or of godhood. The personality which historical criticism is able to discover behind the gospel records is not only more real but more ideal than the portrait the evangelists produced. Nevertheless the bestowal upon Jesus of a title he did not claim and probably could not have understood marked a step forward. When he was lifted up from earth and made a god, he drew all men unto himself. For him they abandoned the gods of their fathers, and out of his fulness they all received some measure of grace and truth. It may be questioned whether without this deification it would have become historically possible for him to dispense his spiritual gifts through the ages. It was far easier for men outside of Jewry to look upon the bearer to them of such treasures of life as a god than as a mere man; and even Hellenistic Jews must translate his personality into the supernatural to derive from it such spiritual benefits as their education had prepared them to receive. There is an element of truth in Wernle's keen observation that 'christological dogma did not arise through a gradual increase but, on the contrary, through Jewish and anti-gnostic reduction of the popular faith' (Anfänge, 295). It was after all the true humanity of the Son of God that bore off the victory at Nicæa. But it should not be denied that there had been a gradual growth into that well-balanced conception which, it would seem, was best adapted to guard the spiritual interests involved. As the œcumenic creeds were the corollaries of that conception of 'the Son of God' who is himself 'God' which comes distinctly to view in the fourth gospel, so this itself is the product of a long development of thought in Israel as well as in Greece, and among the Aryans of India and Persia. The contribution of Jesus himself to this development was the indelible impression of his personality. His own thought was too grand in its simplicity for the world to appreciate. That it means more to be a child of God in the sense in which Jesus used the term than to be the Son defined by the Nicene creed, is a truth still hidden from many who are wise and prudent.

26. Literature. The title has been discussed with more or less fulness in numerous commentaries, OT and NT theologies, critiques of the gospels, and lives of Jesus. Among the latter those of Strauss, Neander, Keim, Hase, Schenkel, Beyschlag, Weiss, and A. Réville should be mentioned. The following works deal with various aspects of the question. Ilgen, 'De notione tituli filii dei' in Paulus, Memorabilien, 7, 1795, pp. 119-198; Bertholdt, Christologia Judæorum, 1811; Colani, Jésus Christ et les croyances messianiques de son temps, 1864; Wittichen, Die Idee Gottes als des Vaters, 1865; Vernes, Histoire des idées messianiques, 1874; Drummond, The Jewish Messiah, 1877; Schenkel, article 'Sohn Gottes' in Bibellexikon, 1875; Stanton, The Jewish and the Christian Messiah, 1886; Wendt, Die Lehre Jesu, 1890; Baldensperger, Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu, 1892; Briggs, The Messiah of the Gospels, 1897; Paul, Vorstellungen von Messias, 1895; Brandt, Evangelische Geschichte, 1893; Thoma, Genesis des Johannes-Evangeliums, 1882; Pfleiderer, Urchristenthum, 1887; Jean Réville, Le Quatrième Evangile, 1901; Kreyenbühl, Das Evangelium der Wahrheit, 1900; Grill, Untersuchungen über die Entstehung d. vierten Evangeliums, 1902; Holtzmann, Neutestamentliche Theologie, 1897; Schmiedel, *Prot. The expression 'Son of Man' (ben ādām) is in Hebrew literature a synonym of 'man.' Apart from Ezekiel and Daniel it seems to be used exclusively in poetic style.

1. Synonym of 'man.'

ben-ādām (בֶּן אָדָם) in Nu. 23 19 Is. 51 12 56 2 Jer. 49 18 33 50 40 51 43 Ps. 8 5 80 18 146 3 Job 16 21 25 6 35 8, probably also in the original of Ecclus. 17 30 Judith 8 16 Test. 12 Patr. Joseph 2; ben ĕnōš (בן אנוש) in Ps. 144 3. The meaning is rendered perfectly clear by īš (איש), ĕnōš (אנוש), or géber (גבר) occurring in the parallel stichoi. Such poetic expressions may be either survivals of forms once in common use or later creations. When cognate languages offer no analogy, the latter is more probable. In this case, the strongly entrenched Aramaic usage (see § 4) is in favour of the former explanation. Collectives like אֱנוֹשׁ, אָדָם, בָּקָר, צֹאן are very old; and the designation of the individual of the species as בֶּן־אָדָם or בֶּן־אֱנוֹשׁ, a man, בֶּן־בָּקָר, an ox, בֶּן־צֹאן, a sheep or a goat, is likely to belong to the same early period.

A still simpler phrase for 'a man,' aḥad hā-ādām (אַחַד הָאָדָם), occurs only in Judg. 16 7, where it seems to have been preserved from an earlier form of the story in which Samson was not 'one of mankind' but a solar divinity. While īš (איש, originally also a collective, cp בני איש, איש ישראל) and iššāh (אשה) apparently tended to displace ben-ādām and bath-ādām (or bath han-nāšīm, Dan. 11 17) and were supplemented by ādām and ĕnōš in the sense of 'man' 'the human being,' der Mensch (frequently found in Ecclus.), the plurals bnē ādām and bnē īš maintained themselves more strongly against the collectives both in the sense of 'people' 'Leute' and in that of 'mankind.'

The plurals occur thus: בְּנֵי אָדָם in Gen. 11 5 Dt. 32 8 1 S. 26 19 2 S. 7 12 1 K. 8 39 Ezek. 31 14 Mic. 5 6 Joel 1 12 Ps. 11 4 12 2 9 14 2 21 11 31 20 33 13 36 8 45 3 49 3 53 3 57 5 58 2 62 10 66 5 89 48 90 3 107 8 15 21 31 115 16 145 12 Prov. 8 4 31 13 22 Eccl. 2 8 3 10 21 8 11 9 3 12; בְּנֵי אִישׁ in Ps. 4 3 49 3 62 10 Lam. 3 33 Ecclus. 16 15 36 23 38 7 40 1; בְּנוֹת הָאָדָם, 'the women of the human race' in Gen. 6 2.

2. Special use in Ezekiel.

In Ezekiel the expression 'son of man' occurs some ninety times, always as the title by which the prophet is addressed by Yahwè. The question naturally arises, why Ezekiel represented Yahwè as constantly employing this term; or, if its use was not due to conscious reflection, but to inspiration in a certain pathological condition, why this particular form of speech suggested itself with such frequency.

Jerome regarded the term as expressive of the frailty of him who was honoured with divine visions and commissions, and most modern scholars have found in it an intimation of weakness and insignificance (Smend, Bertholet, Kraetzschmar, Toy). Appel, however, deems this explanation inadequate, examines the title in the light of the various passages in which it occurs, and comes to the conclusion that it was given to the prophet by way of distinction to set him off from his fellowmen. According to the theory of Maurice Vernes (Hist. des idées messianiques, 187 [1874]) 'son of man' is synonymous with 'prophet.' Fiebig thinks that it may have been more natural to use the longer form in the vocative. Already in the interpretation of the phrase in Ezekiel we meet with an emphatically low and an emphatically high estimate, a synthetic and an analytic judgment, an assumption that it is a title of office and an appeal to philology and literary criticism; and there is an element of truth in each contention. There can be no question as to the general identity of 'son of man' and 'man.' It is also quite evident that 'son of man' cannot have been used by man as a title of a prophet. He might be referred to as ha-ḥōzeh (החוה) 'the seer,' han-nābī' (הנביא) 'the speaker,' ham-mōreh (המורה) 'the oracle giver,' īš hā-ĕlōhīm (איש האלהים), 'the man of God,' but not simply as 'the man.' The ordinary designations, however, would not be so suitable in the mouth of God and angels. By them the prophet would be either called by name (Am. 8 2 Dan. 9 22 10 11 f.), or addressed as a representative of the human race. In the latter case, the fact that celestial beings hold converse only with their chosen ones would naturally make the expression suggestive, not merely of inferiority of race, but also of special privilege. Its use would consequently express the prophet's self-consciousness as well as his humility. Dan. 8 17 shows that in some circles it was thought proper for the angelus interlocutor to address the prophets as 'human being' (בן ארם), when the name was not used.

The employment of this phrase by Ezekiel seems, then, to have arisen from the double feeling of humility and elation expressed in Ps. 8. Much of the repetition may be due solely to literary habit, and some instances to later imitation (see SCYTHIANS, § 5).

3. Doubtful meaning in Ta'ănīth 65*b*.

The only apparent exception in Hebrew seems to be Talmud, Pal. Ta'ănīth 65 b.

The passage contains the following comment on Nu. 23 19 by Abbāhū (about 280 A.D.): 'If a man says "I am a god," he lies; (if he says) "I am a son of man," he will in the end regret it; (if he says) "I ascend to heaven," he may say it, but he cannot accomplish it.' If the text is sound, the interpretation of Laible, Bacher, and Dalman is no doubt essentially correct. Abbāhū, who was often in conflict with Christians, unquestionably refers to Jesus. He is not likely to have had in mind either Moses (Schwab) or the tower-builders (Rabbinic commentators, followed by Cohen in Lietzmann). Christians like Sason, who in their disputations with him seem to have used to some extent the Hebrew language, probably translated ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου by ben hā-ādām, as, in modern times, Delitzsch. It is supposed that the indefinite ben ādām was suggested by Nu. 23 19, and that the context was depended on to indicate the reference. The real difficulty, however, is to understand why Abbāhū should have regarded it as an assumption on the part of Jesus to call himself 'son of man,' such as any man must in the end regret. It is not a question of Messianic titles and prerogatives. The Messiah is not a god, in Jewish theology, and does not ascend to heaven, nor is it improper for him, or any other man, to call himself a son of man, ben ādām. The original may have read 'I am a man and I ascend to heaven,' בן ארם אני ואני עולה לשמים, the words סופו לתהות בו being a misplaced gloss. Abbāhū would, then, wittily allude to the self-designation of Jesus as a confession that he was not a god but a man, while emphasising thereby the enormity of his claim, inferred from Jn. 14 24 and Acts 1 9.

4. Aramaic usage.

In Aramaic 'son of man' is used with great frequency as a synonym of 'man.'

1. Early inscriptions.—For the Assyrian and Persian periods we are wholly dependent upon inscriptions. These are often dated and represent a widespread territory; but they are for the most part very brief, and the vocabulary is limited. It is of comparatively small significance that the term 'son of man' does not occur in them, since it is very seldom that any designation of man is found. But it is important that among the few instances אנש occurs three times as a plural or collective—viz. קדם אלהי וקדם אנש 'before gods and man' (Zenjīrli, Panamu stele, l. 23, eighth century), ואלהן ואנש 'gods and men' (Teima, sixth century CIS 2 no. 113*a*, l. 20), VII. אנש 'seven men' (Kuyunjik, Oct. 680, CIS 2 no. 17).

2. Syriac. — Among the East Aramaic dialects (Syriac, Mandaic, Babylonian Talmudic) the expression is most common in Syriac. Even if the Pesh. of OT is essentially a Jewish work, it cannot, in view of text and canon, be earlier than the first century A.D., and probably does not antedate the oldest Christian productions by more than fifty years. The fact that 'man' is rendered bar nāšā in the OT rather less frequently than the original Syraic literature would cause one to expect is therefore likely to be due to the translators clinging as closely as possible to the Hebrew text, and not to any change in the common speech of Edessa. That nāšā originally was a collective and virtually a plural is abundantly evident from the preponderating usage. The fact that in a translation from one dialect into another the Bibl. Aram. [כְּ]בַר אֱנָשׁ of Dan. 7 13 was rendered [איך] כבר אנשין in Syriac[1] shows that even the indefinite אנש gave the impression of being a collective. There are many instances, however, where the Syriac אנשא is used as a singular. That bar-nāšā originally denoted the individual of the species man is perfectly clear from the collective meaning of אנשא and the prevalent usage. It is the ordinary, though not the only, designation of man, the individual, and the emphatic ending א does not prevent it from meaning 'a man' as well as 'the men.' איש and בר אנש are both used for 'one,' 'some one,' 'any one,' 'jemand,' 'each.' In the version made by Paul of Tella in 618 ben ādām is rendered by b'reh dĕ-nāšā in Nu. 23 19 Ezek. passim, Jer. 49 18 50 40 etc.; and by b'reh de-bar-nāšā in Jer. 51 43, while bar-nāšā is reserved for ādām or ĕnōš. This does not show that b'reh dĕ-nāšā, which never occurs in Pesh., was a natural Syriac translation of ben ādām, but only that Paul of Tella, when he had already used bar-nāšā for ādām, availed himself of the form created as a terminus technicus of Christian theology (see § 13) for a synonym. That he should do so is neither more nor less strange than that he should employ the similar phrase b'reh dĕ-bar-nāšā. The same influence of the phrase constructed as a rendering of ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου is seen in the NT where Pesh. uses b'reh dĕ-nāšā even in Jn. 5 27 Heb. 2 6 Rev. 1 13 14 14, though the Greek has only υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου.

iii. Biblical use.—In Pesh. the Heb. ben ādām is rendered bar-nāšā everywhere except in Job 35 8. bar-nāšā is the translation of ādām in Ex. 13 13 33 20 1 S. 15 29 Is. 44 13 Jer. 26 10 14 Ezek. 1 3 10 26 10 8 14 28 2 9 Mal. 3 8 1 Ch. 29 1, of ĕnōš in Ps. 55 14 66 11 90 3 103 3 104 15 Job 15 14 25 4 32 8. But more frequently another word is chosen, such as 'nāšā or b'nē 'nāšā or gabrā for ĕnōš; ādām or b'nē nāšā or 'nāšā for ādām. It is interesting to observe that in Ecclus. the Heb. īš is rendered gabrā, 14 2 f. 31 16 36 20 26; 'nāšā, 27 5; b'nē 'nāša, 15 19. ādām is rendered bar-nāšā, 11 2 13 15 41 11; b'nē nāšā, 15 17; and kol nāšā, 16 17; b'nē ādām is rendered b'nē 'nāšā, 16 15 40 1. Similarly in the Aramaic portions of OT., ĕnāšā is rendered bar-nāšā in Dan. 7 8; elsewhere ĕnāš by 'nāš (Dan. 2 10), אנשי (constr. plur.; Ezra 4 11), kol-nāš (Dan. 3 10), 'nāšā (Dan. 5 5 etc.); and ănāšā with b'nē nāšā, Dan. 2 38 5 21, or 'nāšā, Dan. 4 29 [25].

In the NT the Evangeliarium Hier. uses the indeterminate bar-nāš exclusively as a rendering of ἄνθρωπος in Mt. 8 9 19 6 Mk. 8 36 f. Lk. 7 8 18 2 Jn. 3 37 5 34 7 22 23*a* 10 33 11 50 16 21 (Jn. 7 23*a* is not an exception as the construction demands the emphatic);[2] bar-nāšā only for ὁ ἄνθρωπος in Mt. 4 4 12 35*a*, b 26 24*a*, b 74 Mk. 2 27*a*, b Jn. 18 17 29 19 5; gabrā in the sense of 'husband,' Mt. 19 5 10 (cp Mt. 1 16 Lk. 2 36 Jn. 4 16 ff.), but also in Mt. 26 72 as a synonym of bar-nāšā in 26 74; and 'nāš with the meaning 'any one' in Mt. 19 3 10 end. The exact use of the emphatic is all the more remarkable as gabrā so rarely occurs, and this rare occurrence is itself peculiar in view of the fact that b'reh dĕ-gabrā is the ordinary rendering of ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. In the Curetonian Fragments, bar-'nāšā is used indiscriminately for ἄνθρωπος and ὁ ἄνθρωπος in Mt. 4 4 12 12 43 15 11*a*, b 18 20 19 6 Lk. 9 25 Jn. 3 27 5 34 7 22 23*a*, b; gabrā for ὁ ἄνθρωπος in Mt. 8 9 12 35*a*, b 19 3 5 10 Lk. 23 4 47; 'nāš in Mt. 15 20 for 'one.' In the Sinaitic MS bar-nāšā is likewise used without discrimination for ἄνθρωπος and ὁ ἄνθρωπος in Mt. 4 14 12 12 (?) 43 15 11*a*, b 18 20 19 6 Mk. 8 36 f. 10 9 Lk. 18 2 Jn. 2 23 3 27 5 34 7 22 23*b* 10 33; gabrā for ὁ ἄνθρωπος, Mt. 8 9 12 35 19 10 35 Mk. 10 7 Lk. 4 4 6 45 7 8 Jn. 11 50 18 17; bar-nāš, Jn. 7 23, and 'nāš, Mt. 15 20, for 'one,' jemand. In the Pesh. substantially the same condition prevails, as bar-nāšā is used for ἄνθρωπος in Mt. 12 12 19 6 Mk. 8 36 f. Lk. 9 25 Jn. 3 27 5 34 7 23*a* 10 33 16 21, even more frequently than for ὁ ἄνθρωπος as in Mt. 4 4 12 43 15 11*a*, b 18 20, and gabrā for ἄνθρωπος in Mt. 8 9 Lk. 7 8 Jn. 11 50 as well as for ὁ ἄνθρωπος, Mt. 12 35 19 5 10 Lk. 4 4 6 45 Jn. 18 17 29 19 5, and 'nāš has the sense of 'some one' in Mt. 19 3 Jn. 2 25*a*. In Mt. 16 13 οἱ ἄνθρωποι is rendered 'nāšā by Pesh., Cur., and Sin., while the Ev. Hier. has b'nē 'nāšā. To show that 'nāšā may be sing. and b'reh dĕ-nāšā a grammatical possibility, Driver quotes Job 7 20 14 19 33 16, Pesh., as 'precise formal parallels.' Such passages as Ex. 31 14 Dt. 8 3 Is. 51 12 Job 25 6 Eccles. 7 28 f. are better examples of 'nāšā as

[1] Here and occasionally elsewhere in this article the Syriac has been transliterated into Hebrew for the sake of simplicity.

[2] Lietzmann's statement (p. 83) that ἄνθρωπός τις is rendered ברנשא חד in Lk. 5 20 is not correct. The Greek is ἄνθρωπε, and the Ev. has ברנשא, as the vocative is regularly indicated by the emphatic. Ἄνθρωπός τις is rendered ברנש חד, Lk. 5 11.

sing., since in the three cases quoted it seems to be a collective (Job 7 20, Syr. 'maker of the human race,' Heb. נֹצֵר הָאָדָם, 'watcher of mankind,' 𝔊 τῶν ἀνθρώπων; 14 19, 'hope of the human race,' Heb. תִּקְוַת אֱנוֹשׁ; 33 16, 'ears of men,' Heb. אֲנָשִׁים, 𝔊 ἀνθρώπων). The construction of collective nouns with sg. suffixes is very common. In appearance the forms 'ābōdeh d'anāšā (maker of man), sabreh d'anāšā (hope of man), and edneh d'anāšā (the ear of the man) look very much like b'reh d'anāšā (son of man); in reality there is a marked difference between them. While the former are perfectly clear and idiomatic expressions, the latter is artificial, vague, and ambiguous. It may be translated either 'son of the human race,' or 'son of the human being.' But it is no more apparent what it means to be 'a son of the human race,' in distinction from being a mere member of the human family (bar-nāšā), than why a man's father should be emphatically described as 'the human being.' The form can be explained by the exigencies of theological thought (cp § 13), not by the laws of Aramaic speech.

iv. Mandaic.—In Mandaic בר אנאשא occurs, Genza i. 207 22, in the sense of 'man.' Two plurals are found, בני אנאשא and בנאת אנאשא (formed as אבות, אבאהאתא). The late form בארנאשיא, plur. Asfar Malwaše, 298, shows how completely the first part of the word was lost to consciousness. עניש, 'a man,' 'any one,' occurs only in status absolutus. But the most common expression for 'man' is גברא. Cp Nö. Mand. Gram. 127, 148.

v. Babylonian and Talmudic.—In Babylonian Talmudic ברנשא was likewise used, though not so frequently as אנשא, for 'man.'

vi. Judæan dialect.—Among the W. Aramaic dialects (Judæan, Samaritan, Galilæan, Nabatæan) this idiomatic expression seems to have been less common in the S. than in the N. It does indeed occur as early as 165 B.C. in Dan. 7 13. For here kĕ-bar-ĕnāš (כבר אנש) means 'like a human being.' Dalman thinks that this chapter has been translated from a Hebrew original which had כְּבֶן אָדָם. Even if that were so, the translator would not have chosen bar-nāš in preference to bar ādām, exclusively used by Onkelos, if, in the circles where he moved, bar-nāš and bar-nāšā were not more commonly used. For the plural he uses bnē ănāšā, Dan. 2 38 5 21, or ănāšā, 2 43 4 16 f. 25 32 7 8; cp Ezra 4 11. ĕnāš occurs only in the sense of 'a man,' 5 5 6 7 12 7 4 14 2 10 3 10. The oldest Targums, ascribed to Onkelos and Jonathan, are written in the same Judæan dialect. As בר אנש does not occur at all in Onkelos—ben ādām being rendered bar-ādām—and only in Is. 51 12 56 2 Jer. 49 18 33 50 40 51 43, Mic. 5 6 for ben ādām in Jonathan, it is possible that the distinctive word for man, the individual, bar-nāšā, was not in vogue, gabrā, 'man, the male,' and ănāšā, 'man, the race,' being employed also to denote the member of the human family. The fact that בני אינשא occurs with greater frequency both in Onkelos and Jonathan may then show that the plural survived longer than the singular for the same reasons as in Hebrew. But the influence of a more extensive cultivation of the ancient Hebrew tongue in Judæa, especially among those capable of acting as interpreters, should not be overlooked; and it is quite likely that the common speech of the people was less affected by Hebraisms than the paraphrases would suggest.

vii. Samaritan.—In the Samaritan version of the Pentateuch ברנשא is found only in some manuscripts in Gen. 9 6 and Nu. 23 19. Since it occurs quite frequently in Markah (cp Fiebig, 17 ff.), it is safe to infer that here also the influence of the original upon the learned translators renders the version less trustworthy in this respect as a witness to Samaritan usage.

viii. Galilæan dialect.—In regard to the Galilæan dialect we possess the simplest information. In the freedom of spontaneous utterance and repartee in the Palestinian Talmud the peculiarities of popular speech have a better chance of revealing themselves than in the translations, and the later Targums follow less closely the Hebrew than the earlier. But even when due weight is given to this fact, the extraordinary frequency of the idiom no doubt indicates a more extensive use on the part of the people of Galilee. Dalman is inclined to regard it as a comparatively late development under the influence of the Syriac, and thinks that a person in the first century A.D. using so strange an expression as bar-nāsā then would not have been understood as speaking of 'man.' But Fiebig has shown that, not only did Hoša'ya, about 200 A.D., use ברנשא רבא for 'a great man' (Shĕkālīn 5 6), but Šime'on b. Yochai, about 130-160 A.D., used ברנש for 'man,' 'der Mensch' (Berach. 1 5), and possibly also Sime'on b. Gamaliel, his contemporary, if a certain saying has been preserved more accurately in Talm. Bab., Nĕdārīm 54*b*, Mĕ'īlā 20*b*. The indifference to the emphatic state points to long usage even in the first part of the second century. It is extremely difficult to believe that only three generations earlier an expression that had taken such deep roots, and is found in the literary remains of all Aramaic dialects, should not have been widely used in Galilee as an equivalent of אנש or אנשא in the sing., and it is quite incredible that so natural and idiomatic a designation of the individual of the human race should not have been understood as 'man,' but taken to be an esoteric expression. Mesopotamia and N. Syria were old centres of Aramaic speech, and it is therefore natural that the old term to denote a member of the human family should have maintained itself most strongly there. Of ברה דאנשא there is apparently no trace in the

SON OF MAN

Galilæan dialect. It does not even occur in Christian testimony which may represent this dialect.

ix. The Nimrod legend in Bĕrēšith rabba.—It is quite unnecessary to resort to Babylonian mythology, as Fiebig is inclined to do, for an explanation of ברנשא דמביל רוחא (Ber. rabba 38 p. 47); Abraham no doubt intended to lead Nimrod on from the worship of man to that of God, as he had from the worship of the elements to that of man; every man is a bearer of the breath of life, and no mysterious pregnant sense is demanded.

x. Nabatæan.—Of the Nabatæan nothing is known except through inscriptions. In these only אנוש in the sense of 'one,' 'some one,' 'any one' occurs. No inference can be drawn concerning the existence of ברנש or ברנשא. The use of this term in Aramaic has been treated with most comprehensiveness by Fiebig, with most Talmudic learning by Dalman, and with most insight by Wellhausen. An essentially correct understanding of it lies at the basis of the theory developed by Eerdmans, Schmidt, Meyer, and Lietzmann (see § 30).

5. Analogous forms in Assyrian, Ethiopic, and Arabic.

In the Babylonian myth concerning Adapa and the S. wind (Recueil de trav. 20 4) the hero is addressed as Zir amiluti (3 12). Hommel (Exp. T. May 1900, p. 341) translates this expression, 'spring of mankind,' explains it as 'he from whose seed the whole of mankind is sprung,' and compares it with ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. If this translation were possible, the phrase would have nothing in common with the Greek term or its Aramaic original. But it clearly means 'seed of men'; and as zeru in 2 R. 36 48 is distinctly said to be a synonym of maru, 'son,' zir amiluti is an exact equivalent of בר אנשא. Whatever his relation to Ea, Adapa is a mortal man, not a god, and is to be punished for his presumption. The idea that he is the first man is precluded by 16 11 12 16. [Cp PARADISE, § 12.]

Adapa's designation as mar Iridu—'son [i.e., citizen] of Iridu'—(cp mar Batili, mar Barsip, mart Ninâ, mart mal Aššur) shows that, like בֵּן and בר, maru was used to designate the member of a larger body. Delitzsch aptly compares mar ummani (pl.), 'an artist'; mar ikkari, 'a peasant'; mar išpari, 'a weaver,' with Heb. בְּנֵי הַנְּבִיאִים; mart nunt also means simply 'fishes,' and mar iṣṣuri, 'a bird.'

The Ethiopic Bible renders 'son of man' by wăldă săb'ĕ, wăldă bĕ'ĕsī, 'ĕg uălă 'ĕmăḥĕyāu and wăldă 'ĕguăla 'ĕmăḥĕyāu. Of these terms wăldă săb'ĕ is probably the most original. As săb'ĕ is a collective and virtual plural, wăldă săb'ĕ exactly corresponds to בראנשא Wăldă bĕ'ĕsī=filius viri is the equivalent of בר גברא, but, like גברא, bĕ'ĕsī is also used for 'man,' 'der Mensch.' Our ignorance of the native mythology renders it impossible to decide whether in 'ĕguălă 'ĕmăḥĕyāu=proles matris vivi, the reference to Eve is original, and the expression consequently of Jewish or Christian origin, or some other mother, human or divine, is intended. It is often used collectively for οἱ ἄνθρωποι, οἱ υἱοὶ τῶν ἀνθρώπων, בני אנשא. Wăldă 'ĕguălă 'ĕmăḥĕyău, 'son of the offspring of the mother of the living,' is apparently a Christian term made substantially on the same pattern and for the same reason as ברה דברנשא. It was exclusively used for ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου in the NT, and by reminiscence or interpretation found its way into passages having only υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου such as Jn. 5 27 Heb. 2 6 Rev. 1 13 14 14 and also Ps. 80 18 Dan. 7 13 Ezek. 2 1 and throughout the book, and Enoch 37-71 passim (see § 7).

In the Arabic version 'son of man' is most frequently rendered ibnu'l insāni both in OT and NT. Sometimes ibnu insāni occurs, Is. 51 12, and in Ps. 146 3 בֶּן אדם is rendered bani bašari. In the NT ibnu'l bašari occurs frequently (see § 13). Bašaru is a collective and plural, but used for 'man,' the individual, as well as for 'man,' the race.

6. Dan. 7 13.

Dan. 7 13 is the earliest passage in Aramaic literature where the term 'son of man' occurs. One 'like a human being' (kĕbar ĕnāš, כבר אנש) appears before the Ancient of Days and receives the empire of the world. The Messianic interpretation of this passage meets us as early as in the first century A.D. in Enoch 37-71 (see § 7) and 4 Ezra (see § 8). The evangelists apparently understood it as referring to the Messiah (cp especially Mt. 26 64 Mk. 14 62), and the natural impression of the Greek gospels is that Jesus himself shared this view. It consequently prevailed in the church. Through the influence of 'Aḳība, Joshua b. Levi, and Shemuel b. Naḥman, it also gained the ascendancy in the synagogue. On critical grounds it has been accepted by a number of modern scholars.[1] Its strength lies in the fact that it recognises the presence in this passage of a well-known concrete personality. But it utterly fails to explain how the Messiah, once introduced, can have dropped so completely out of the author's thought, not only in the explanation of the vision where he is unceremoniously ignored, but also in the future deliverance with which Michael has much to do but the Messiah nothing. A non-Messianic interpretation appears already in Enoch 71 (see § 8), where Enoch is evidently understood as being the 'son of man' of Daniel's vision. Ibn Ezra interpreted bar-ĕnāš as referring to the people of Israel. In modern times this view has been maintained by many scholars.[1] Yet a symbolic representation of 'a more humane regime,' 'ein Menschheitsideal' savours more of modern humanitarian ideas than of the concrete conceptions of Semitic antiquity.

The present writer (JBL 19, 1900) was led by these difficulties to regard the manlike being as an angel, and more particularly Michael, the guardian-angel of Israel. He pointed out that angels are constantly introduced as having the appearance of men;[2] that the only angelic representative of Israel is Michael ('your prince,' שַׂרְכֶם, Dan. 10 21 12 1); and that his coming with the clouds after the destruction of the beasts, in view of 4 Ezra 13 1 Apoc. Elijah 14 20 15 1, may show that the battle with chaos-monsters had already been transferred from Yahwè to Michael. This view has been accepted by Porter (Hastings, DB 4 260), who also suggests the demonic character of the beasts. The objection that one would expect the heathen nations to be likewise represented by their angel princes is met partly by the traditional form of the appropriated Marduk myth, partly by a lingering respect for these angelic dignitaries who are the former gods of the nations. Chaos-monsters may be consumed by fire, but angels are not slain. That the one like a man is neither the Messiah nor a mere symbol of Israel has independently been argued by Grill (Untersuch. über die Entst. des Vierten Evang. 50 ff. [1902]), who also thinks of Michael, but is inclined to look for a still higher being whose name is significantly withheld, like that of the numen of PENUEL (q.v.), at the same time a 'most exalted personal intermediary between God and the world and a transcendant prototype of the God-pleasing humanity ultimately to be realised in the people of the Most High.' The first part of this definition suits Michael; whether he or any other angel was ever thought of as the ideal Israelite, is more doubtful.

Völter (ZNTW, 1902, p. 173 f.) has also abandoned the hitherto prevailing views and suggested that the celestial being is none else than the Mazdayasnian Ḫšathra vairiya, one of the Ameša speñtas who is a personification of the kingdom of heaven. But apart from the uncertainty as to the date of the Avestan documents, Daniel's man-like being is a representative not of the heavenly kingdom, but of Israel.

7. Enoch 37-71.

Another originally Aramaic book (so rightly Schürer, Lévi, We.) in which the term 'son of man' occurs is Enoch 37-71. It is known to us only through an Ethiopic translation. That a Greek version even of this part of the Enoch literature once existed may be inferred from Tertullian (de cultu feminarum, 1 3); but whether the Ethiopic translation was made from it, is uncertain. According to Bruce (in Laurence, Libri Enoch Proph. Vers. Æthiop. 11 [1838]) 'the Jews in Abyssinia admit it into their Canon; it is not, however, the Book of Enoch received amongst the Rabbins.' The first Ethiopic version may therefore have been made by a Jew from the Aramaic. This would account for a number of Aramaisms not so likely to pass through the medium of a Greek translation. See APOCALYPTIC, § 30.

That the text has suffered numerous interpolations is universally admitted. A series of these were apparently taken from a lost Apocalypse of Noah. Already Laurence perceived some of them; Köstlin (Th. Jahrb. 1856, p. 240 ff.) recognised those that most certainly have this origin, 54 1-55 2 60 65 1-69 25. Tidemann (Th. T, 1875, p. 261 ff.) conjectured that 41 3-9 43 44 59 were drawn from the same source, and Charles has adopted this view. Bruno Bauer (Kritik d. Gesch. 1 402 [1841]) first called attention to the now generally recognised secondary character of 70, 71, and suggested that the 'Son of Man' passages were interpolated. Hilgenfeld (Jüd. Apokalyptik, 162 ff. [1857]) presented the only natural interpretation of 67 4-13 by which the Noachic interpolations are found to be later than 79 A.D., and the most probable explanation of 56 1 ff. which apparently makes the original work later than Nero. His view that the book was essentially the work of a Gnostic Christian was accepted by many scholars. The objection that one would expect more distinctive Christian teaching was met in part by a reference to the Enochian masque, in part by emphasis upon the important Christian ideas found in the book. Drummond, however, showed in a convincing manner, that the Messianic passages were out of harmony both with the title and with the contents in each figurative address, and that their removal rendered the discourses far more intelligible (The Jewish Messiah, p. 48 ff. [1877]). This argument was further elaborated by Pfleiderer (Urchrist., 312 ff. [1887]). A similar view was independently presented by Bousset (Jesu Predigt, 106 [1892]). But Drummond's theory failed to explain how any man could have written chap. 71 either before or after these interpolations were made, and also why a Christian interpolator should not have used the title wăldă 'ĕguălă 'emăḥĕyāu exclusively as it is in the NT. 71 1-16 can be accounted for only on the assumption that the text preceding it somewhere made an allusion to a man who has righteousness, yet in such a manner as to render it possible to regard Enoch as the man intended. This precludes the possibility of any passage containing the peculiar Christian phrase 'son of the offspring of the mother of the living' (62 7 9 14 63 11 69 26 f. 70 1) having been a part of the text to which 71 1-16 was added. It is among the passages in which 'son of man' is rendered wăldă săb'ĕ (46 2 ff. 48 2 60 10) or w. bĕ'ĕsi (62 5 69 29 a, b) that such an allusion must be sought. In 60 10 the author of the Noachian fragments used bar-nāšā or ben-ādām precisely as it is used in Ezek.

It is difficult to think through chap. 46 in the Aramaic without obtaining the impression that the Ethiopic is a direct translation of the original. 'I saw one like a man;' 'I asked in regard to that man;' 'he answered: this is the man who has righteousness;' 'this man whom thou hast seen will arouse the kings.' The use of the demonstrative (ברנשא הו) is evidently in good order. On the theory of a translation from the Greek, the present writer and subsequently Charles pointed out the use of the demonstrative for the missing article in the Ethiopic, permitting the assumption that the Greek had everywhere simply ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. But Flemming (in Lietzmann, PHM) has rightly called attention to the fact that in the NT wăldă 'ĕguălă 'ĕmăḥĕyaū is never preceded by a demonstrative. Wăldă săb'ĕ is as admirable a reading of bar-nāšā in 46 2 ff. as in 60 10. Even in 48 2, 'in that hour that man was named (i.e., 'called') before (Aramaic for 'by') the Lord of Spirits,' the use is natural. The scene in 46 is reminiscent of Dan. 7. As Daniel's manlike being was not mentioned by name, he might be an angel like Michael, a translated hero like Enoch, a true descendant of David snatched up to heaven and preserved for the day of his appearance, or a Christianised pre-existent Messiah. The present description no doubt suggests to us the Messiah; but it is quite possible that in an earlier form of it the man who walked with God, revealed hidden secrets and achieved victories, pointed as clearly to Enoch, the vision being (rightly or wrongly) ascribed, like others in the book, to Noah. That wăldă bĕ'ĕsi, if original, could be used in the same sense as wăldă săb'ĕ is evident from 71 14 which refers back to 46 2. In 62 5 all MSS except the oldest read w. bĕ'ĕsīth, 'son of woman'; in 69 29 the oldest manuscript has the same form. This shows that Christian copyists tampered with the text from theological motives, the dogmatic interest being here the same as that which crowded b'reh dĕ-gabrā (ברה דגברא) out of use. These MSS themselves are probably Christian interpolations, as is, undoubtedly, 71 17 (cp Schmidt, art. 'Enoch' in Jewish Ency.; Son of Man, ch. 7; AJTh. 7).

In the original discourses the term consequently never seems to have occurred. It is found in one of the Noachic interpolations in the sense of 'man' as a rendering of bar-nāšā. In 46 2 ff., and 48 2 which may have belonged to the same early stratum of insertions, it has no other meaning. At these points Christian interpolations appear to have attached themselves. Where in the rest of the book these are most manifest, the distinctive NT title is employed.

8. 4 Ezra 13 3 ff.

In the Apocalypse of Ezra 13 3 ff. the seer beholds one like a man (quasi similitudinem hominis) coming out of the sea (de corde maris) with the clouds of heaven, refers to him again as that man (ille homo) and simply 'the man' (homo), and receives the interpretation that this is the man through whom the Most High will redeem creation. We do not possess the original; but the extant versions (Lat., Syr., Eth., Arm.) all seem to come from the lost Greek translation. As the author evidently has Dan. 7 13 in mind, the original probably had ben-ĕnāš and bar-nāšā which may have been rendered correctly ἄνθρωπος and ὁ ἄνθρωπος in the Greek. The connection shows that there can be no question of 'man' or 'the man' being a title. Though the term 'Messiah' is not mentioned, there can be little doubt that the Messiah is intended. Retouching by Christian hands may be observed in all the versions. But the book, written in the reign of Domitian, probably shows the most transcendental conception of the Messiah found in Jewish thought. All the more significant is it that the final judgment is not one of his functions. In 6 1 the true text is preserved by Lat., Arm., 'through a man' being a Christian addition in Syr. Eth. Ar., as Hilgenfeld has shown (Messias Jud. 54 n.).

9. Revelation.

The Christian parts of the Apocalypse of John contain two passages, 1 13 and 14 14, where the phrase ὅμοιον υἱὸν ἀνθρώπου 'like a son of man' occurs. It is the exact equivalent of kĕ-bar-ĕnāš and the author no doubt had in mind Dan. 7 13. In the first place it is unquestionably the celestial glory of Jesus that is described with colours largely borrowed by Ezekiel. As 14 15 introduces 'another angel,' the impression is that the manlike being of 14 14 is also an angel. That this angel has a crown upon his head does not show that he is the Messiah. The angel of Sardis (3 11), the celestial presbyters (4 4 10), the angel represented as a white horse (6 2), and the horse-like locusts (9 7), also wear crowns, and the angels are the harvesters in Mt. 13 41. It is of utmost importance that this work, written substantially at the close of the first century (APOCALYPSE, § 35, col. 207), though with later additions, knows nothing about the title ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου.

10. NT Epistles.

The term ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου is not found in any of the fourteen epistles ascribed to Paul; in 1 or 2 Pet., 1, 2 or 3 Jn., James or Jude. Its absence in this entire literature representing different lands, periods, and tendencies of thought can scarcely be accidental. It may not prove that all the authors were unacquainted with the term. As it is used in the Fourth Gospel, the reason for its non-occurrence in 1, 2, 3 Jn. may be that there was no occasion for using it. On the other hand, if Jude had found it everywhere in his copy of Enoch as a Messianic title, and known of it as the self-designation of Jesus, he is quite likely to have referred to it. In Heb. 2 6, Ps. 8 5-7 is quoted as referring to Jesus. The author sets forth the inferiority of a revelation indicated through angels, and argues from the Psalm that the world to come was to be subject not to angels but to one who had been made for a little while lower than the angels (𝔊). The same reference of the passage to Jesus is seen in 1 Cor. 15 27. Heb. 2 9 clearly indicates the underlying question: Of whom does the prophet speak, of man in general, or of some particular man? The answer was found in v. 6. He spoke of one who had been made for a little while (βραχύ τι) lower than the angels to be afterwards made ruler of all things. This could only apply to Jesus. The author of 1 Cor. 15 45 ff. designates the Christ as ὁ ἔσχατος Ἀδαμ, ὁ δεύτερος ἄνθρωπος, ὁ ἄνθρωπος ἐξ οὐρανοῦ. Thus he evidently strives to express the ideal, supernal humanity of Jesus. Yet it never seems to have occurred to him to use for this purpose the common synoptic title, nor the mere term ὁ ἄνθρωπος, or an equivalent, without a modifying adjective or adverbial expression.

The most natural explanation is certainly that it was not known to him.

As an alternative the possibility was suggested in JBL 15 36 that he may have regarded it as an inadequate characterisation of that heavenly man who was no longer to be known according to the flesh; but such disregard was deemed incompatible with a knowledge on his part of this as the one Messianic title used by Jesus. Schmiedel (Prot. Monatsch. 1898, pp. 260 ff., 1901, pp. 342 ff.) thinks that he may have hesitated to present to Greek readers a term which, unlike the Jews, they would not have understood as a synonym of 'man' but literally as 'the son of the man.' Such considerations do not seem to have influenced the earliest translators (cp § 36); if they were seriously entertained by himself, it is difficult to see how he could have allowed the objectionable phrase to run its course wherever the evangelical tradition went without an explanation.

11. Acts 7 56. Apart from the gospels, Acts 7 56 is the only passage in NT where ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου occurs. Whether it comes from the Author to Theophilus or represents a real utterance of Stephen [see STEPHEN, § 7], it shows that there were some Christians who did not reverently shrink from the use of what in the gospels is the exclusive self-designation of Jesus, nor hesitate to employ it lest it be misunderstood by Greek-speaking people. The author manifestly takes for granted that the excited populace must recognise in the phrase a designation of Jesus and not merely a Messianic title. What is deemed blasphemy is not that he claims to see the Messiah on the right hand of God, for that is his place, but that he claims to behold the murdered Jesus in the Messiah's place. If the statement is historical, Stephen may have said in Aramaic: 'I see bar-nāšā,' i.e., 'a man,' or 'the man,' intending to continue his sentence, or referring to the righteous man with whose death he had just charged the people. But it may be a free imitation of Lk. 22 69.

12. Occurrences in the Gospels. The term ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου occurs in the gospels eighty-one times—viz., thirty times in Mt., fourteen in Mk., twenty-five in Lk., and twelve in Jn.

The references are as follows:—Mt. 8 20 9 6 10 23 11 19 12 8 32 40 13 37 41 16 13 27 f. 17 9 12 22 19 28 20 18 28 24 27 30*a b* 37 39 44 25 31 26 2 24*a b* 45 64; Mk. 2 10 28 8 31 38 9 9 12 31 10 33 45 13 26 14 21*a b* 41 62; Lk. 5 24 6 5 22 7 34 9 22 26 44 58 11 30 12 8 10 40 17 22 24 26 30 18 8 31 19 10 21 27 36 22 22 48 69 24 7; Jn. 1 51 3 13 f. (5 27) 6 27 53 62 8 28 9 35 12 23 34*a b* 13 31.

Mt. 18 11 (= Lk. 19 10), 25 13 and Lk. 9 56*b* (= Lk. 19 10) TR are rightly obelised by critical editors. The sixty-nine Synoptic passages clearly do not represent as many distinct utterances. By removing the most obvious parallels, Holsten and Oort leave forty-two, Mangold and Driver forty. In any such arrangement there is much exercise of subjective judgment, since passages in the different gospels that are not absolutely alike are regarded as identical, while exact parallels in the same gospel may or may not be considered as duplicates. As it is of some importance to know which of these occur in all three, in two, or only in one of the gospels, the following arrangement may be made for convenience' sake, involving no judgment as to the number of times, or separate occasions, when the evangelists considered Jesus as having used the expression. 13. Renderings in the Ancient Versions. The earliest Aramaic translation of the Gospels, the Sinaitic Syriac, renders ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου by b'reh dĕ-gabrā (ברה דגברא) in Mk. 8 38 Lk. 7 34 and Jn. 13 31; in Lk. 11 30 and Jn. 12 23 only b'reh (ברה) is left; in all other extant passages b'reh dĕ-nāšā (ברה דאנשא) seems to have been used.[1]

The Curetonian fragments have ברה דגברא in Lk. 7 34 9 26 22 48, elsewhere ברה דאנשא. In the Evangeliarium Hierosolymitanum the phrase is rendered ברה דגברא in Mt. 9 6 12 32 16 13 17 9 12 22 19 28 24 27 30*a* 37 39 Lk. 5 24 6 5 22 9 58 11 30 12 4 8 10*a* 19 10 24 7 Jn. 3 13 f. 6 27 53 62 bis, 8 28 13 31: ברה דברנשא (b'reh dĕ-bar-nāšā) in Mt. 24 30*b* 44 25 31 26 2 24*a b* 45 64 Mk. 2 10 8 31 38 9 31 10 33 Lk. 21 27 36 22 22 Jn. 1 51 12 23 34 bis.

Only in the Pesh. is ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου uniformly rendered b'reh dĕ-nāšā. Driver's statement (Hastings, DB 4 582) that in the Sin., Curet., and Pesh. the term is always represented by b'reh dĕ-nāšā is incorrect. The occurence of b'reh dĕ-gabrā in Lk. 7 34 (Sin., Cur.), Mk. 8 38 (Sin., Ev.) and the identical Lk. 9 26 (Cur.), Lk. 22 48 (Cur.) and Jn. 13 31 (Sin., Ev.) is not without its importance. It suggests that in the case of some sayings b'reh dĕ-gabrā had so established itself in common usage that even translators who, for dogmatic reasons, preferred b'reh dĕ-nāšā were influenced by it. It is evident that b'reh dĕ-bar-nāšā is a creation of Christian theology designed to avoid misconstruction of b'reh dĕ-gabrā. Originally the latter was no doubt intended to mean simply filius hominis; but the root idea (filius viri) could not fail to be embarrassing to the dogma that Jesus was not the son of a man. Its use by Paul of Tella (see § 4) shows that the substitute was not unknown among the Christians of Mesopotamia. Cureton explained that his translator 'was not accurately acquainted with the Greek language, and therefore translated . . . filius viri not hominis' (Remains, p. lii). But the Greek phrase, which is everywhere the same, could not have troubled him, and he knew his own language. If, in some places, he used what he must have regarded as a synonym, the reason is probably to be looked for in tradition.

It is significant that b'reh dĕ-nāšā never occurs in the Palestinian lectionary, and that in Mt. and Lk. b'reh dĕ-gabrā maintained itself everywhere except in Mt. 24-26 and Lk. 21-22. So completely has the consciousness of the element 'son' in Son of Man disappeared that 'son of the son of man' meant only 'son of man.' Possibly the introduction of the new phrase in the synoptic apocalypse (see § 41) and in certain typical sayings is reminiscent of an earlier Aramaic version having only bar-nāšā. The Edessene translators could not render the Greek phrase by bar-nāšā since this would have taken no account of the articles. As the idea was new, no extant expression could be used, and any term would be open to misapprehension. The form apparently first chosen, b'reh dĕ-gabrā, might be understood as the son of some particular man, but gabrā had the advantage of being a singular. In the end the objection that it might be taken to imply that Jesus had a human father proved more serious, and the phrase seems gradually to have been crowded out of use until the officially recognised version had no other form than b'reh dĕ-nāšā. 'Son of the human being,' might be interpreted 'son of Mary.'

[1] לברא ראנשא, Lk. 22 48, is either a scribal error or ראנשא is a later addition; ראנשא, Jn. 6 27, was no doubt preceded by ברה.

The earliest Arabic version was probably made from some Aramaic translation. It is not likely, however, that this was the Peshita, as it would then undoubtedly render b'reh dĕ-nāšā everywhere with the same phrase. But in Mt. 9 6 16 13 Lk. 9 58 17 24 26 19 10 Jn. 1 51 3 13 f. 6 27 53 62 8 28 it uses the term ibnu 'l bašari, while elsewhere the rendering is ibnu 'l insāni. Bašaru is a collective, but is frequently used as a sg., and ibnu 'l bašari is not improbably a rendering of b'reh dĕ-gabrā.

The Ethiopic everywhere translates the Greek term wăldă 'eguălă 'emăḥeyāu, never expressing the article by a demonstrative zĕekā or zentū. With the same uniformity the Latin versions render it filius hominis.

On the relation of Marcion and other Gnostics to the Synoptic title see § 43 f. It cannot safely be maintained that it was unknown to all of the 'apostolic fathers.'

14. Patristic and mediæval interpretation.

The most natural interpretation of Barn. 2 10 is that the author alludes to it when, having found in an interpolated text of Ex. 17 14 a reference to the son of God, he declares that Jesus is prefigured in it 'not as son of man, but as son of God.' The inference may be drawn that about 130 A.D. the title was known in some circles and understood as designating the human nature assumed by the Son of God. In a later addition to the Ignatian epistle to the Ephesians 20 2 the title is found (τῷ υἱῷ ἀνθρώπου), apparently interpreted as referring to Jesus' descent from David. Justin (Dial. 100) explained the title as referring to Jesus' descent through Mary from David, Jacob, Isaac, and Abraham. Irenæus (Haer. 3 19) understood it to denote that Jesus was the son of Mary 'quæ et ipsa erat homo,' and Tertullian strongly argued the impossibility of any other interpretation (adv. Marc. 4 10). Origen, on the contrary, regarded it as unnecessary to seek for a particular human being, since the expression simply meant 'man' and was chosen by Jesus from pedagogic motives, as when God is represented as a man (Migne, 13 15 37).

Even in Greek the member of a body was sometimes indicated by υἱός, as in υἱ. τῆς γερουσίας, υἱ. τῆς πόλεως, υἱ. τοῦ δήμου, υἱ. 'Αφροδισιέων (cp Deissmann, Bibelstudien, 1 166), and υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου was frequently found in parallelism with ἄνθρωπος in the LXX. So profound a student of these versions as Origen may therefore have rightly understood the idiom.

Theodoret introduces the Hebrew and Aramaic usage to account for certain phrases compounded with υἱός or θυγάτηρ in 𝔊; he may have applied the same principle to this case. Chrysostom certainly regards the term as simply designating 'man' in Jn. 5 27 (Migne, 59 223). That seems also substantially to have been the view of Augustine (Contra Arian. 18). It is possible that Cyprian's comparison of Mt. 12 32 with 1 S. 2 25, and inference that the church cannot forgive sins against God, indicates that he understood filius hominis to designate 'man' in a generic sense in some passages, as Lietzmann has suggested (p. 80). Jerome was not prevented by his knowledge of Hebrew from identifying 'the human being' as the virgin Mary (Com. in Ps. 85); and this continued to be a common interpretation. Euthymius Zigabenus (about 1100 A.D.) explains that ἄνθρωπος may mean γυνή as well as ἀνήρ (Migne, 129 293), and Alexander of Jumège (d. 1209) only regrets the difficulty of rendering in French a title which is identical so far as the meaning is concerned, but not grammatically, with filius virginis. In the first German translation it was indeed translated sūn der maid (Codex Teplensis and three earliest editions), and the Romance version of the Waldenses had filh de la vergene. Nicolaus de Lyra understood Mt. 12 8 to affirm that blasphemy against Christ's humanity is not as unpardonable as that against his divinity, and Mt. 16 13 to be a confession on his part of the humble fact of his humanity while his disciples understand it of his divinity (Biblia Sacra, 1588, vol. ii.). A curious comment on 'men' in Mt. 16 13 is 'homines sunt qui de filio hominis loquuntur, Dii enim qui deitatem intelligunt.'

With the renaissance of learning, the first attempts at a philological explanation appeared. Génébrord, a noted Hebraist, commenting on Mt. 12 32, declared that 'son of man' meant simply 'man' and, returning to Cyprian's suggestion, saw in Eli's words (1 S. 2 25) an expression of the same sentiment. Sins against men may be pardoned, but not sins against God (De S. Trinitate, 1569). Flacius Illyricus defined filius hominis as unus quispiam homo (Clavis, sub voce 'filius'). Beza regarded the expression as a Hebrew phrase for man, and suggested the Hebrews' custom of speaking of themselves in the third person, but also called attention to the fact that in the gospels no one except Jesus does so. It is the merit of Grotius to have first recognised that in Mt. 12 8 the conclusion must be, 'Therefore man is lord also of the sabbath.'

15. Resort to the Hebrew?[1]

Pointing to Mk. 2 28 as exhibiting the more original connection he conclusively showed that the argument would have no cogency if the Son of man were interpreted as the Messiah, and could not have been understood, since at the time Jesus had neither declared himself to be the Messiah nor been willing to have his disciples proclaim him as such. In regard to Mt. 12 32 he came to the same conclusion as Génébrord; but he refrained from attempting an explanation of any other passages on the same principle (Crit. Sac. 6 445 f.).

The discovery that upon two occasions Jesus spoke, not of himself, but of man in general, when employing this phrase, naturally seemed less important than the conjecture that he constantly used 'the man,' in the sense of 'this man,' for the personal pronoun. The latter was maintained by Coccejus (Schol. in Mt. 8 20), and found its way into the first life of Jesus by Hess (1 160 261 269). Bolten's criticism was important because through it a third passage (Mt. 9 6) was added to the two of Grotius, and the Aramaic term bar-nāšā was brought into the discussion (Der Bericht d. Matth. 1792).

16. Substitute for personal pronoun?[1]

He called attention to the Syriac use of b'reh de-nāšā with no more force than that of an indefinite pronoun, found it strange that the Greek translator should have failed to take note of this Aramaism, and boldly maintained that in Mt. 24 27 Jesus said, 'So will be the appearance of some one,' meaning by 'some one' himself. In regard to all passages except Mt. 9 6 12 8 Paulus returned to the opinion of Coccejus ('hic homo pro ego'), pointed out the importance of Jn. 12 34, and suggested a later misapprehension under the influence of Dan. 7 13 (Exeg. Hdbuch, 1 465 500 2 21 f.). Kuinoel accepted the interpretation given by Grotius of Mt. 12 8 and, in spite of the well-founded warning of Eichhorn (Allg. Bibl. 524 [1794]), followed Beza and Bolton in Mt. 10 23 (Com. 295, 337 [1823]). The impossibility of the latter explanation led Fritzsche, who in general agreed with Paulus, to the view that Mt. 10 23 and other passages were later additions (Com. in ev. Matth. 320). The theory which assumed that Jesus habitually used an indefinite pronoun or a phrase like 'the man,' accompanied by a gesture indicating himself, was too artificial to command respect, and in the general reaction against the rationalistic school, the real achievements of these earlier scholars were completely forgotten.

17. Ideal man?

When Herder (Chr. Schriften, ii. [1796] 5 4) explained the term as designating the ideal humanity of Jesus, he gave a new form to the idea that it was intended to teach the human nature of the Christ. But in this modernisation the contrast with the divine nature of the Christ was lost, and an emphatically high conception was the result. Through Schleiermacher (Einl. 479 ff.) and Neander (Leben Jesu, 129 ff.) this view gained a wide recognition.

It was adopted among others by Böhme, Olshausen, Lutz, Reuss, and Luthardt, has more recently been defended by Westcott and Stanton, and influenced Weisse, Holtzmann, Beyschlag, Hase, Keim, Mangold, Usteri, and Brückner.

18. Coming man?

Hofmann (Schriftbeweis, ii. 2 53) could find in the phrase no allusion to an ideal of humanity, but regarded it as substantially synonymous with 'he that cometh,' ὁ ἐρχόμενος, containing no indication of character. Cremer (Wörterbuch[(5)], 846 ff.) similarly saw in it a reference to the man promised in the protevangel, Gen. 3 15.

19. Current Messianic title?

Already Scholten (Specimen, 1809) interpreted the term as a title of the Messiah, the heavenly king destined to reign as man over men. Strauss (Leben Jesu, 463 [1835]) expressed the opinion that the son of man was one of the current Messianic titles. V. Cölln (Bibl. Th. 2 16 [1836]) agreed with him. Ewald (Gesch. Christus', 202 [1855]) pointed to Dan. and En. 37-71, which he regarded as the oldest part of the book, as evidence. Renan (Vie de Jésus, 131 ff. [1863]) maintained that in certain schools it was a title of the Messiah as judge of the world and king of the age to come. Beyschlag (Christologie, 9 ff. [1866]) held that it was a Messianic title in Dan. 7 13 En. 46 2 ff. and all passages in the gospels, and that Jesus chose this particular title both to express his consciousness of being a man and his knowledge of the fact that he was the ideal, absolute, and heavenly man. Baldensperger (Selbstbewusstsein Jesu(2), 169 ff. [1892]) likewise affirmed that the phrase was used before the time of Jesus as a Messianic title and was adopted by him as such, not, however, before the episode at Cæsarea Philippi, the earlier passages having been displaced.

20. Expression of a peculiar Messianic consciousness?

That Jesus employed the term to express his own peculiar Messianic consciousness has been the conviction of many scholars. But there has been much difference of opinion as to his reason for selecting it, and in regard to its origin. While some investigators endeavoured to discover its meaning by an analysis of all passages, and by connecting the various predicates with the idea of man, others discerned in it only a designation of office without immediate connection with the root idea, and in the predicates saw synthetic judgments. The majority of critics found its origin in Dan. 7 13. Others, however, thought of Ezek., Ps. 8 or En. 46, while a few regarded it as an absolutely new creation of Jesus. One source was deemed sufficient by some students; by others the conception was looked upon as the result of various combinations. As to the motive for its employment, there were those who thought that it was chosen openly to proclaim a different Messianic title from that suggested by such titles as 'Son of David' and 'SON OF GOD' (q.v.). But many scholars urged that such a public announcement was improbable at least in the earlier part of Jesus' ministry, and that he is more likely to have used it as a riddle to be guessed at, half revealing, half concealing his notion of the Messiah and his own claims. The various theories were largely dependent upon different interpretations of passages in OT and the Pseudepigrapha, the priority ascribed to Mt. or Mk., and the tone of Mt. 8 20 compared with Mk. 2 10.

21. Emphasis on lowliness and human sympathy?

In commenting on Mt. 8 20, De Wette observed that to those who did not think of Dan. 7 13 the expression could only suggest 'this man,' whilst to those who had the Daniel passage in mind it would mean 'this insignificant man who, in spite of his humble condition, is destined to become that which the prophet has indicated.' In this pregnant utterance the thought of Paulus still shows its vitality; but it contains the germs of new theories.

Wilke (Urevangelist, 633 [1838]) inferred from Mt. 16 13 that 'son of man' cannot be identical with the Messiah. Baur (ZWTh. 1860, pp. 277 ff.) made an important contribution by showing that the passage where the term occurs in the fourth gospel cannot throw any light on its original meaning. His examination of the synoptics convinced him that the context never favoured the idea of an ideal humanity and that there was no reference to Dan. 7 13; and he therefore concluded that Jesus invented the term, at the same time to claim for himself a Messiahship without which he could not attain to a more universal recognition and a genuinely national work, and to keep aloof from the vulgar Messianic idea associated with the title 'son of God.' He would be, not a king coming in power and glory, but a man deeming nothing foreign to him that belongs to the lot of a human being, identifying himself with all human conditions, needs, and interests, in genuine human sympathy, and accepting all sufferings and sacrifices connected with his work in life. This has been called an 'emphatically low' estimate in distinction from that of Herder. It should be observed, however, that it comes much nearer to the old dogmatic position with its sharp contrast between the title of Christ's humiliation and that characteristic of his glory, as seen, e.g., in Meyer (Com. 1832, to Mt. 8 20), and that it really sets forth the human worth of Jesus' personality more clearly than any mere abstraction like 'the ideal.' Colani (Jésus Christ et les croyances Messianiques, 74 ff. [1864]) held that the expression was unknown before Jesus because it was he who created it, that by it he designated himself as the poor child of Adam, and also as the object of a peculiar divine love, that no one called him by this name because it would have been little short of an insult, and that it disappeared because in the church the divinity became more important than the humanity of Jesus. Strauss was also won for the opinion of Baur and Colani; and Schenkel (Bibel-lexikon, 1872) presented a somewhat similar conception based on Ps. 8.

22. Modified Messianic title?[1]

Hilgenfeld, like Baur, regarded the term as indicating lowly external conditions and a humble disposition, but entered a protest against separating it from its source in Dan., and maintained its Messianic significance in all places, though reflecting the peculiar conception of Jesus (ZWTh. 1863, p. 327 ff.). Baur was led by this presentation to assume a later Danielic significance for the eschatological discourses (NTTh. 1864, p. 82).

Bernhard Weiss (Bibl. Th. NT 59 ff. [1868]) saw in the expression neither a current Messianic title nor a description of character, but a term having no intrinsic significance in Dan., chosen by Jesus to avoid misapprehension of his aims and yet to announce himself as the Messiah promised in Dan. The statements made concerning the Son of Man were consequently regarded by him as synthetic judgments, in the Kantian phraseology introduced in this connection by Biedermann (Dogmatik, 226 f.).

Mangold (Th. Arb. d. rhein. PV 1877, pp. 1 ff.) regarded the term as a Messianic title, chosen to emphasise the possibility of suffering and death as a man, and the coming exaltation as the true, ideal man. Usteri (Th. Z. a. d. Schweiz, 1886, pp. 1 ff.) strongly urged that the verbal meaning of the phrase was of no importance, as it was solely a title of office selected by Jesus in order to allude to the coming of the promised redemption to mankind. Essentially this view was held by Bruce (Kingdom of God, 172 [1890]), and Stevens (Teaching of Jesus, 91 ff. [1901]) emphasised the new content which Jesus is likely to have given to this Messianic designation.

23. Mystifying title?[2]

Rejecting Ewald's theory as to Enoch 46 ff., Weisse looked upon the term as an original creation of Jesus to express his peculiar consciousness of being a human Son of God, and therefore having no familiar connotation to his hearers but presenting to them a riddle (Ev. Gesch. 1 325 [1838]; Ev.-frage, 22 ff. [1856]).

Weisse's philological explanation ('human son'; like אבי השמים, supposed Hebrew original of ὁ πατὴρ ὁ οὐράνιος, 'heavenly father') naturally met with no approval, and his confusion of the Synoptic with the Johannine use was wisely avoided by Ritschl. Sharing, however, with Weisse, the view that Mk. is earlier than Mt. and presents in a more trustworthy manner the course of Jesus' life, Ritschl was led to the conclusion that Jesus used the term to conceal rather than to reveal his Messianic claims, as Mk. records two instances of its use before the important episode at Cæsarea Philippi (Th. Jahrb. 1851, p. 514).

Holtzmann (ZWTh. 1865, pp. 212 ff.) pointed out the determining influence of the first occurrence in Mt. (8 20) upon those who maintained the priority of this gospel, held that in reality the passage suggests Messianic dignity rather than humility, and inferred from Mk. 2 10 the Messianic significance of the term to the mind of Jesus, but considered this to have been a secret until the visit to Cæsarea. Keim thought that Jesus gradually went beyond this mystifying title to such designations as 'the coming one,' 'the bridegroom,' in suggesting his Messianic claims (Gesch. Jesu, 2 376). Hase was of the opinion that Jesus chose this term first to conceal, and then at the proper time to manifest his Messiahship as the perfection of human nature (Gesch. Jesu, 412). According to Wendt (Lehre Jesu, 441 ff. [1890]), the use of this expression was not so much a riddle, as a problem provoking to thought and private judgment; for whilst the hearers by their transcendental conception of the Messiah were prevented from seeing in the Daniel phrase 'Son of man' a fit designation of so august a being, Jesus found it most suitable to express his conviction that in spite of human weakness and lowly conditions he was the Messiah. In Mt. 8 20 9 6 11 19 12 8 32 and parallels, Holsten (ZWTh. 1891, pp. 1 ff.) saw the evidence that Jesus used this term concerning himself before the scene at Cæsarea Philippi, and in Mt. 16 13 the proof that he employed it to designate himself as the Messiah.

[1] Hilgenfeld, B. Weiss, Mangold, Usteri, Bruce, Stevens.
[2] Weisse, Ritschl, Holtzmann, Keim, Hase, Holsten, Wendt, Paul, Dalman, Gunkel, Fiebig.

It seemed to Holsten probable that Jesus' Messianic consciousness grew out of his experience, suggesting to him that the chosen one on whom the unction of spirit rested was to pass through two forms of existence, one of humiliation, another of glory, even as the 'Son of man' in Dan. was brought from earth to heaven to be clothed with power. So profound a view, however, must have been a mystery to the disciples until it was revealed to them.

According to Paul (Vorstellungen um Messias, 42 [1895]), the mystery existed for Jesus himself as well as for his hearers, inasmuch as there was a time in the Galilæan period when he still doubtfully asked whether in reality he was the Son of man promised in Dan. Dalman (Worte Jesu, 191 ff. [1898]) clearly recognised that 'the Son of man' was not a Messianic title in the time of Jesus, and that bar-nāšā was the phrase used by him that has been translated ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. This, however, he regarded as unknown in Galilæan Aramaic at that period in the sense of 'man.'

It would therefore naturally point to Dan. 7 13, a passage especially attractive to Jesus, because it ascribed the establishment of the kingdom of heaven to God alone. Dalman considered it improbable that Jesus employed the phrase before the episode at Cæsarea, some pericopes having been placed out of their chronological order. After that event his disciples regarded it as a declaration that he was the Son of man of Daniel's vision; to the people it was a riddle, the solution of which Jesus did not give until his appearance before the Sanhedrin, and then at the cost of his life; to himself it was a means of realising and teaching that the child of human parents, by nature weak, destined by God to be the ruler of the world, may before his investiture with Messianic power be obliged to suffer and die.

Accepting the view that bar-nāšā was used and meant simply 'man,' 'the man,' Gunkel (ZWTh. 1899, pp. 581 ff., Vierte Buch Ezra, 347 [1900]) maintained that 'the man' was a secret title of the Messiah used in Apocalyptic circles, and originating in Babylonian mythology.

Like Gunkel, Fiebig (Der Menschensohn, 61 ff. [1901]) regarded 'the man' as a familiar designation of the Messiah; but as his philological examination had led to the conclusion that ברנשא was understood in Galilee at the time of Jesus as meaning also 'man,' he ingeniously argued that the phrase was intentionally used in an ambiguous manner, so that the hearers might believe that he (Jesus) was speaking of man in general, or of 'the man'—i.e., the Messiah as a third person—whilst in reality he was speaking of himself.

24. Composite idea ?[1]

The conception of the phrase as a mystifying title into which Jesus poured the contents of his peculiar Messianic consciousness was naturally favourable to the introduction of various combinations; while some scholars were contented with a single OT passage as the basis for further development, others thought of several different ideas blending into a new conception.

Thus Weizsäcker conceived of a gradual revelation of Jesus' Messianic self-consciousness, first on the prophetic side suggested by Ezekiel, and then on the royal side intimated by Dan. (JDTh. 1859, p. 736 ff., Ev. Gesch. 426 ff. [1864]). Hausrath found in the term a combination of the heavenly man in Dan., the man that is a little lower than the angels in Ps. 8, and the prophet in Ez. (NT Zeitgesch.(3), 1879, 1 480). Wittichen introduced, in addition, the Son of man in Enoch and the Servant of Yahwè in 2 Is. (Die Idee des Menschen, 137 ff. [1818]; Nösgen (Gesch. Jesu, 155 ff. [1891]) saw in the expression a combination of esoteric Messiahship suggested by Daniel, and a phase of existence through which the Messiah must pass with its predetermined humiliation and suffering. Bartlet (Expos. 1892, p. 427 ff.) also united the idea of the suffering servant with that of an ideal representative of humanity and the kingdom of God. Schnedermann (Jesu Verkündigung, 2, 1895, 206 ff.) combined Danielic Messiah, Ezekielic prophet, ideal man, and human suffering. Charles (Book of Enoch, 312 ff. [1893]) held that the true interpretation would be found if the conception in Enoch were taken for a starting-point, its enlargement and essential transformation in the usage of Jesus were noted, its subsequent reconciliation to the conception of the Servant of Yahwè were observed, and the occasional reminiscences of Dan. 7 were perceived. Stapfer (Jésus Christ pendant son ministère, 305 ff. [1897]) combines in the expression Ezekielic prophet and Danielic Messiah. In the judgment of Sanday (Hastings, DB 2 622 f.) the ideas of a representative of the human race, an ideal man, and a suffering servant of Yahwè are fused into the central idea of Messiahship. This position is also endorsed by Driver (ib. 4 582).

25. Prophetic title ?

Whilst Weizsäcker found in the customary designation of Ezekiel a means employed by Jesus for suggesting the prophetic character of his Messiahship, Vernes held that 'Son of man' actually was a current prophetic title assumed by Jesus to indicate that, like John the Baptist, he was a herald of the coming kingdom, and subsequently merged into the Danielic 'Son of man' by the Church (Idées mess. 178). This view has been carried out most consistently by Cary (The Synoptic Gospels, 360 ff. [1900]) who maintains that by this term Jesus intended to announce himself as a prophet sent to warn his people of the danger which threatened them if they did not turn from their evil ways.

26. Designation of Jesus' own ideal, future Messiahship, or indwelling genius ?

It was not unnatural that the thought should arise that the 'Son of man,' of whom Jesus is represented as having habitually spoken in the third person, was an ideal or spirit not identical with, though closely related to, his own immediate self.

Brückner (JPTh. 1886, p. 272) suggested that Jesus who, in his judgment, never used the term before the episode at Cæsarea, when predicting the return of the Son of man, thought not of his own personality, of the man Jesus, but rather of the ideals with which he had identified himself. A. Réville (Jésus de Nazareth, 2 190 ff. [1897]) concluded from Mk. 2 10 28 and Mt. 25 that in the thought of Jesus the phrase designated something more than an individual son, though this individual be Jesus himself, that it was a personification of a principle transcendent above, and immanent in, all the persons making up the sum total of humanity, and only applied to Jesus in so far as he identified himself with this principle. According to Joh. Weiss (Predigt Jesu, 52 ff. [1892]; Nachfolge Christi, 33 f. [1875]), Jesus used the term to indicate his future position. When he should return upon the clouds, he would be the Son of man referred to by Daniel. In the sayings concerning the death of the Son of man, he taught objectively that the coming Messiah must suffer and die; in Mt. 11 19 16 13 Lk. 7 34 the title has been substituted for original 'I'; in Mk. 2 10 28 the philological explanation resumed by Lagarde, Rahlfs, and Wellhausen (see § 29) should be applied (cp also Predigt Jesu(2), 1900, pp. 160 ff., 201 ff., where the interpretation of some passages is slightly modified). In harmony with his exegesis of Dan. 7 13, Grill (l.c., 57 ff.) comes to the conclusion that Jesus more or less distinctly conceived of himself as being dynamically identified with the highest principle of revelation, the angelic hypostasis introduced by Daniel, and that the original text read ἐγώ in Mk. 2 10 and ὁ ἄνθρωπος in Mk. 2 28.

27. Designation of 'kingdom of heaven' ?

When the interpretation of Daniel's 'Son of man' as a symbol of a coming ideal society had won its way to wide recognition, the suggestion lay near at hand that Jesus may have used it himself in the same sense.

Hoekstra maintained that Jesus indicated not himself by this term, but the new religious community to which the kingdom was to be given (De benaming de zoon des Menschen, 1866). Carpenter (First Three Gospels, 1890, p. 383 ff.) held that Jesus employed it as an emblem of the kingdom of righteousness, and that his followers, impressed with the conviction that he was the Messiah, understood it in a personal sense, and gave such a colouring to his reported utterances as accorded with this assumption. Drummond (JTh.St. 1901) thinks that Jesus may have regarded it as an expression for the ideal people of God, and for himself as head of this class, giving to it the same primarily collective, subsequently individual, sense that the Servant of Yahwè has.

28. Creation by the evangelists ?[1]

Whilst many scholars failed to make any distinction between the words actually uttered by Jesus, and the sayings ascribed to him by the evangelists, and some were content with indicating passages of doubtful authenticity, others felt the necessity for a more searching criticism. As a more correct estimate of the Fourth Gospel spread, the tendency developed in many circles to lean all the more heavily on the synoptics. It is largely the merit of Bruno Bauer and Volkmar to have applied the same measure to all the gospels, explaining each as a didactic work written for a definite purpose, and naturally reflecting the religious thought of the author and the men among whom he lived. From this point of view B. Bauer reached the conclusion that Jesus never called himself 'Son of man' (Kritik d. ev. Gesch. 3 [1842] 1 ff.), and Volkmar was led to the view that it was an original creation of Mk.

But was really Mk. the originator of it? Colani (Jésus Christ, 140 [1864]) had seen that Mk. 13 6-32 (Mt. 24 4-38 Lk. 21 8-36) was 'a veritable Apocalypse lacking nothing essential to this species of composition.' According to Jacobsen this was the door through which the expression entered into the gospels, whilst it was still absent in the original form of Mk. (Untersuchungen über die syn. Evv. 64, [1883]; Prot. Kirchenzeitung, 1886, p. 563 ff.). Pfleiderer (Urchrist. 366, 387 [1887]) also inclined to look upon the word as of foreign Apocalyptic origin, not used by Jesus himself. Convinced that Jesus did not put forth any Messianic claims, Martineau explained the occasional use of the term by Jesus as F. C. Baur (§ 21) had done, but ascribed to the Evangelists the conception of it as a Messianic title (Seat of Authority, 335 ff. [1890]). Orello Cone (New World, 492 ff. [1893]) also looked upon the Apocalyptic passages as the channel through which 'Son of Man' as a Messianic title found its way into the gospel, though he still thought of Jesus as having used it to denote that he was 'the man who was pre-eminently endowed from on high.'

In H. L. Oort's dissertation (De uitdrukking ὁ vl. τ. ἀ. in het NT, 1893) the Messianic significance of the term in the Greek NT was strongly maintained; its origin was sought in Dan. and the later Apocalypses, whence it was taken by the evangelists, and no effort was made to trace any of the sayings back to Jesus. Van Manen (Th. T, 1893, p. 544; 1894, p. 177 ff.) discountenanced in principle any attempt to go behind the written records, and ascribed to the influence of Dan. and Enoch the introduction of the term as a Messianic title in the gospels; a view also adopted by Baljon (Griekisch-Theologisch Woordenboek, 2960). Brandt's position was fundamentally the same as Volkmar's; but he added the important suggestion that the identification of Jesus with Daniel's 'Son of man' would be most natural, if this Apocalyptic figure had been recently introduced (Evangelische Geschichte, 562 ff. [1893]). It was probably the Messianic interpretation, however, not Dan. 7 itself, as (following Lagarde) Brandt was inclined to think, that was of recent origin. Thus a deep chasm was found between the gospels and the actual words of Jesus, over which no man could pass with any degree of assurance. How completely this exclusive regard for the Greek gospels tended to crowd into the background the whole question concerning the Son of man, may be seen in the important discussion of the Messianic secret by Wrede (Das Messiasgeheimnis [1901]), in which it is scarcely touched upon, except that he expresses a doubt whether a play upon words can have been intended in Lk. 9 44, on the ground that the solemn title 'Son of Man' and not 'man' is contrasted with 'men.'

If this in itself perfectly legitimate literary criticism had the tendency of leading to a wholly negative result, or at best a non liquet, as regards the use of the title by Jesus, there was at least a possibility that this result was due to a serious defect in the method pursued—viz., the failure to examine the reported sayings in what must have been approximately their form in the vernacular of Jesus, if spoken by him. With the multiplicity of new and complicated problems claiming the attention of students of early Christian literature and the apparent necessity for a division of labour, it is not strange that even eminent NT scholars should have devoted indefatigable labours to what at best could be only translations of the words of Jesus without ever inquiring what the Aramaic sentences were that he actually uttered, whilst OT scholars to whom such a question would naturally occur hesitated to enter a field no longer familiar to them. The chief significance of Lagarde's and Wellhausen's contributions to the problem lies in the fact that it was again approached from the standpoint of Semitic philology. Positively, the gain was not great at first.

29. Fresh recourse to the Aramaic.

Uloth had only renewed the old explanation of the rationalistic school (Godgeleerde bijdragen, 1862, p. 467 ff.). Lagarde, like Uloth, saw that Jesus must have used bar-nāšā and thought his purpose was to indicate that he was not a Jew, nor the member of any nation, but a man (Deutsche Schriften, 226 [1878], Ges. Abh. 26). Wellhausen held that bar-nāšā should have been translated ὁ ἄνθρωπος, but found it exceedingly strange that Jesus should have said 'the man' instead of 'I,' though he rightly felt that it was not more peculiar than the currently accepted view that he said 'the Messiah' instead of 'I' (Israelitische u. jüd. Geschichte,[1] 312 [1894]). J. Weiss, following Rahlfs, wisely returned to Grotius's exegesis of Mk. 2 10 28; but the improbability of his eschatological explanation (see § 26) left the problem still unsolved.

What was needed was a search for the Aramaic original that should at the same time take account of the results of literary criticism secured by such scholars as Bruno Bauer, Volkmar, and Van Manen, as well as by a Baur, a Ritschl, and a Holsten, a keener analysis of the apocalyptic sources, and a thorough investigation of the Gnostic attitude to this title. It is to be regretted that Bruins, who acutely criticised Oort's failure to consider the Aramaic usage (Th. T, 1894, p. 646 f.), did not follow up his own suggestions. The scope of De Christus naar de Ev. (1896) possibly prevented a discussion.

30. Basis in generic use and later transformation.

Eerdmans first combined the general position of Van Manen and Oort with the assertion that in Mt. 12 8 32 16 13 Jesus used bar-nāšā in the sense of 'man.' He could not find in bar-nāšā a Messianic title, nor think that Jesus regarded himself as the Messiah. Yet he considered it probable that on some occasions Jesus used the term concerning himself in emphatically declaring to those who would see in him something more than a man, that he was only a man as well as they. As to the origin of the Greek phrase as a Messianic title, he thought it possible that it arose through the peculiar form of the Greek translation; and the absence of this title everywhere in early Christian literature except where there was evidence of acquaintance with the gospels, he accounted for by assuming that it was everywhere a translation of an Aramaic original (Th. T, 1894, p. 153 ff., 1895, p. 49 ff.).

The view that Jesus never called himself 'the Son of man,' indicates that he was either the Messiah, the ideal man, or a mere man; that, nevertheless, the development of this term into a Messianic title was in part due to his having spoken upon some occasions concerning the rights and privileges of 'man,' using the word bar nāšā in such a startling manner as to create, contrary to his intention, the impression among later interpreters that he had referred to himself, and that through the Greek translation of the Synoptic Apocalypse it found its way into the gospels, was first expressed by the present writer in a paper read before the Society for Biblical Literature and Exegesis in 1895, and published in JBL 15 3 ff. On independent grounds it was considered that only four sayings containing the phrase placed before the incident at Cæsarea can be judged genuine—viz., Mt. 8 20 9 6 12 8 32. A statement of universal validity to the effect that 'man must pass away, but he will rise again,' was supposed to have received later colouring in what were misunderstood as predictions of Jesus' death and resurrection after three days; and it was thought possible that in Mt. 26 64 Jesus spoke of the kingdom of heaven referring to Daniel's symbol.

Arnold Meyer (Jesu Muttersprache, 91 ff., 140 ff. [1896]) briefly indicated his belief that in Mk. 2 10 28 Mt. 12 32 an original bar-nāšā meaning 'man' was used, that in Mt. 8 20 it stood for 'I,' and that in Mt. 11 19 it should be translated 'some one.' He deferred the discussion of the eschatological passages to a second part of his work which has not yet appeared. But from later utterances (Die moderne Forschung über die Gesch. des Christentums, 75 [1898] and Th.Lit.Z. 1898, col. 272) it may be inferred that in some places he thinks it possible that the 'coming of the Son of man' actually spoken of by Jesus was identical with the 'coming of the kingdom of heaven.' He also brought to light the forgotten labours of Génébrord and Bolten, and called fresh attention to the exegesis of Grotius.

Lietzmann (Der Menschensohn [1896]) first observed that there are no traces of the title outside of the Gospels and Acts before Marcion, and surmised that it originated in Asia Minor between the death of Paul and the year 90 A.D. (On the latter point see § 43.) In regard to the use of bar-nāšā by Jesus, Lietzmann reached independent conclusions that approximated most closely to those of the present writer, from whom he differed chiefly in not being able to assume a basis in the language of Jesus for the subsequently modified sayings concerning his death and resurrection (see § 40), while he rejected Eerdmans' view that Jesus occasionally used it to denote himself. He was also disinclined to accept Meyer's contention that the occurrence of the phrase in some of the eschatological passages should be traced back to Jesus, without desiring, however, to pass a judgment in this matter beyond the general conclusion that Jesus did not call himself 'the Son of Man' (Th. Arbeiten aus d. Rhein. Pred. Ver. [1899]).

31. Defence of this theory.[1]

The theory stated above was accepted and defended by Wellhausen (Gesch.[3] 381 [1897]; Skizzen, 6 187 ff. [1899]). He thought it probable that Jesus once (Mk. 10 32-34) expressed apprehensions as to the outcome of his visit to Jerusalem; but, as the exact wording cannot be ascertained, he deemed it impossible to determine whether the term bar-nāšā was used. As the source was Dan. 7 13, he regarded it as possible that already the Aramaic term bar-nāšā had come to be understood in some circles as a designation of the Messiah.

Pfleiderer (New World, 444 ff. [1899]) also adopted the view, which was not far from his own earlier position. (On his ingenious theory concerning Lk. 22 36-38 see § 40.) Marti (Das Buch Daniel, 53 [1901]) indicated his acceptance. On the linguistic side, Bevan came to the defence against Dalman (Critical Rev. 1899, pp. 148 ff.), and Nöldeke added the weight of his approval (in Drummond, l.c.).

Adopting Wrede's position, Staerk (Prot. Monatsh., 1902, p. 297 ff.) sees in the mysterious name 'Son of Man' a creation of early Christian anti-Jewish polemics, having one root in some misunderstood λόγια such as Mk. 2 10 etc., and intended to veil the Messiahship of Jesus during his lifetime. Such a conscious intention he finds in the fact that men to whom bar-nāšā in the sense of 'man' must have been familiar slavishly translated it with ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου.

32. Partial agreement.

Holtzmann (NTTh., 1897, pp. 246 ff.) finds it impossible, in view of the accumulating material and philological difficulties, to pronounce peremptorily against this theory, and is inclined to accept it so far as the pre-Cæsarean passages are concerned, while presenting as a still available alternative the view of Holsten. Fries (Det fjärde evangeliet, 87 ff. [1898]) reaches the conclusion that the term was used by Jesus only on rare occasions to avoid the personal pronoun, and not in a purely Messianic sense, while through En., where it only means 'man,' it was introduced as a Messianic title in the Synoptics (cp § 28).

It is scarcely probable that a new investigation of pĕlōnī (פלוני) or 'ōthō hā-'īš (אותו האיש) as a substitute for Jesus in certain Talmudic writings would throw any light on our question, as Fries thinks; Eliezer no doubt said ישו in Yōmā 66*b*. The extensive reading of Fiebig (Der Menschensohn, 1901), including large parts of the Talmud not before examined in regard to this phrase, corroborated the opinions on which the theory rested. Fiebig recognised the essential accuracy of the observations made by the present writer (p. 59), and his criticism of Wellhausen was scarcely judicious. When the latter scholar affirmed that the Aramæans had no other word for the individual of the human species than bar-nāšā, he evidently did not mean to deny that words originally having another meaning, such as gabrā and 'nāšā, in course of time came to be used also with that significance, as is clear from Skizzen, 6 196 n. (1899). The only word relevant to this discussion, however, is one that could have been translated ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, and the only such word in Aramaic is bar-nāšā, since expressions like b'reh dĕ-gabrā (ברה דגברא), b'reh dĕ-'nāšā (ברה דאנשא), and b'reh dĕ-bar-nāšā (ברה דברנשא), manifestly originated as Christian translations of the Greek term; but bar-nāšā is the only Aramaic word that denotes the individual of the genus man and nothing else. As the material considered by Fiebig clearly indicates, and as this scholar himself unhesitatingly concludes, that Jesus employed the term bar-nāšā (ברנשא) and that this was naturally understood by his hearers to mean 'man' in general, his further assumption that Jesus meant by it himself as the Messiah appears somewhat hazardous. If Jesus was willing to have his hearers infer that he cherished such bold and original ideas as that man for whose sake the sabbath was made was also lord of the sabbath and that any man, not merely a priest by virtue of his office, has a right to pardon sin, why ascribe to himself as an arrière pensée the narrower and less logical conception that he alone as the Messiah was lord of the sabbath and had the right to pardon sin? If he at all entertained such a thought, it cannot have appeared to him unimportant, and it is difficult to see how he could have been willing to spread what in that case would have been a dangerously false impression by an ambiguous use of language. Oscar Holtzmann (Leben Jesu, 1 28 ff. [1901]) accepts the proposed exegesis of Mt. 8 20 Mk. 2 10 28 and Lk. 9 58, but thinks it probable that Jesus used the expression on many occasions to indicate his acquiescence in man's general lot, and to teach objectively concerning the Messiah which he believes himself to be.

33. Objections by different scholars.

Because of its far-reaching implications (see § 46), it was natural that the explanation stated above should meet with much opposition. Van Manen (l.c.) rightly protested against the tendency to assume a genuine utterance behind every saying attributed to Jesus in the synoptics, and to forget the peculiar character and manifestly late origin of these writings. But since even within the synoptics it is often possible to trace a growth from a simpler form to one unquestionably coloured by later thought, the investigator certainly has the right to assume that this development did not begin in our present gospels. By testing a certain word in an approximation to the Aramaic form it must have had if uttered by Jesus, an entirely different sense is not seldom suggested that may readily have been obscured by a natural mistake in translation, or an equally natural doctrinal bias. As to Mt. 16 13 ff., van Manen is probably in the main right (see § 39), as well as in upholding the Messianic significance of the Greek term everywhere, and in rejecting the survival of Baur's position in Eerdmans. On Hilgenfeld's argument based upon the Gospel according to the Hebrews, see § 42. The fact that Dalman (l.c.) could find no other Aramaic term likely to have been used by Jesus than bar-nāšā, and recognised the improbability of this having been a Messianic title, is more significant than his contention that bar-nāšā in the sense of 'man' was a Syriac innovation and not likely to have been thus understood in Galilee in the time of Jesus.

Dalman may, indeed, have indicated a real tendency of Aramaic speech in Syria; but the remains of its various dialects are too scanty and late to determine whether the development was from an earlier bar-nāšā to a less accurate use of gabrā or 'nāšā for 'man,' 'der Mensch,' a view favoured by the general spread of Aramaic from Mesopotamia and N. Syria southwards, or from an earlier gebar or 'nāš to a later bar-'nāš. But Bevan's point that the various uses of 'nāš and bar-'naš which appear concurrently in Syriac are all found in one or another of the Palestinian dialects and that no Palestinian dialect employs any of these forms in a sense unknown in Syriac, is certainly well taken; and Wellhausen rightly feels that Dan. 7 13 is itself decisive (cp also Fiebig, and usage in Ev. Hier., above § 4, iii.).

The authority of so accomplished a student of Palestinian Aramaic as Dalman naturally influenced other scholars. Baldensperger (Th. Rundschau, 1900, p. 201 ff.) expressed his satisfaction with the final defeat of the philological explanation, and hinted at undue philosophical prepossessions. Rush Rhees (JBL 17 96) also thought that the present writer was hampered by the prejudgment that Jesus cannot have made for himself at the outset any supernatural claims. This, however, was not the case, as the conviction that Jesus did not cherish a desire to become even a righteous king, a divinely appointed ruler of Israel and the nations, was not the starting-point but the rather unexpected result of a long series of investigations.
Klopper (ZWTh. 1899, p. 161 ff.) accepts the validity of Schmiedel's arguments (see § 34), and thinks that

SON OF MAN

Jesus, already in the Galilæan period, claimed for himself a peculiar kind of Messiahship by the Danielic title. He deems it probable that Jesus looked upon his victory over Satan in Mt. 4 1 ff. as a realisation of the slaying of the beast in Dan. 7 11 26. It is difficult to see what ethical content could have been given to a figure which everybody understood to mean the establishment of the empire of the Jews that could not also have been given to the current Messianic ideal. Clemen (TLZ, 1899, col. 489) asks why bar-nāšā cannot have been a Messianic title at the time of Jesus as well as later. The answer is that there is no evidence whatever that bar-nāšā was ever used as a Messianic title. There is reason to believe that Jesus on some occasions used it in the sense it commonly and exclusively has in extant Aramaic literature. In these instances it has been wrongly translated in the Gk. Gospels by a title not yet drawn from Dan. when Rev., 4 Ezra, and the interpolations in En. 37-71 were written in the reign of Domitian.[1]

The most serious objection of Krop (La pensée de Jésus, 1897) is derived from the presence of the title in predictions of Jesus' death and resurrection. How was the title brought from the eschatological series into so different a setting? It may be answered that when once utterances concerning the Son of man had been placed upon the lips of Jesus, and the expression consequently understood as a self-designation, it may readily have been substituted for 'I,' as the vacillating tradition in many places indicates, and adopted in the creation of new oracles. It is probable, however, that a genuine utterance of Jesus was misunderstood and made the foundation of these logia (see § 40).

Gunkel's opposition (l.c.) comes from his strong conviction that 'the man' is a mythological figure.

As to the personality to whom Dan., Enoch, and 4 Ezra refer, he is no doubt right in assuming an ultimate Babylonian origin. The conflict between Marduk and Tiāmat became in Judaism one between Yahwè and the great chaos-monster. What was first ascribed to Yahwè himself was subsequently assigned to an angel. After the destruction of the beast, this celestial representative of Israel comes in Dan. 7 with the clouds to receive the world-empire. The development of the Messianic idea (cp Schmidt, Son of Man, chap. 6) led to a transfer of these functions to the Messiah. But that the heavenly king, described like other angels as having the appearance of a man, was known as 'the man,' lacks all plausibility. Designations suggesting character or function—such as 'the chosen one,' 'the just one,' 'the restorer,' 'the bridegroom,' 'the lamb'—are intelligible; 'the man on the clouds' would point to Dan. 7 13, and titles signifying this, like ענני (Trg. to 1 Ch. 3 24) and ברנפלי (Sanh. 96 b), were indeed formed, as Eerdmans has shown; but, neither in Babylonian mythology, nor in Jewish speculation, is it likely that an important personage was referred to merely as 'the man,' 'the human being.'

An objection is raised by Rose (Rev. bibl., 1900, pp. 169 ff.): the close connection between the kingdom and the Son of man render it probable that Jesus, to whom the former idea was of such importance, also occupied himself with the latter. Two facts, however, are not sufficiently considered in this view. Intense speculations concerning the kingdom and the world to come are frequently found without any allusion to a Messiah, and this is readily accounted for by the hope centring on God himself as the sole deliverer of his people and judge of the world. When Drummond (l.c.) appeals to the independent tradition of Jn. and to the fact that 'the apostles must have known whether their Master spoke of himself in the way recorded in the gospels or not,' it is to be said that acquaintance with the synoptics on the part of the Fourth Evangelist can scarcely be doubted, that the peculiar use of the term in his gospel (see § 45) does not point to an independent tradition, and that the synoptic gospels were written too late to reflect, even on points more important than this, what the apostles must have known, as Drummond himself would no doubt admit. His weightiest objection is that the Church would have preferred to invent some higher title. But the impression left upon an ancient reader of Dan. 7 13 was not that of a frail mortal, but rather that of a resplendent celestial being; and the title was not invented, it grew. Driver (l.c.) recognises that all such considerations would have to yield, 'if it were philologically certain that "the son of man" could not have been an expression used by our Lord.' That bar-nāšā should not have been understood as 'man' in Galilee in the first century, although it was so used in the second, does not seem to him quite probable. He therefore goes to the opposite conclusion that bar-nāšā = 'man' may have been so exceedingly common that for emphasis Jesus was obliged to use the term b'reh dě-nāšā, meaning 'the Son of man.' But this Christian translation of ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, intelligible only as a product of dogmatic necessity, would not have been understood as 'the Son of man' but as 'the son of the Man.' Realising the precariousness even of this assumption, he finally quotes with approval Sanday's opinion that Jesus may have introduced the term upon some occasion when he was addressing hi Aramaic-speaking fellow-men in—Greek! It is not easy to believe that this Son of man who went forth to seek and to save that which was lost presented to his Galilæan fishermen riddles concerning himself in a foreign tongue.

Even the suggestion of Jansen quoted by Weiss (Predigt Jesu,(2) 155) that Jesus used the Hebrew term ben-ādām, though less violent, lacks all probability. It is not apparent why he should have translated bar-nāšā into ben-ādām, which was not a Messianic title and could not possibly suggest Dan. 7 13.

The keenest criticism of the new interpretation has been made by Schmiedel (Prot. Monatsh., 1898, pp. 252 ff. 291 ff., 1901, pp. 333 ff.).

34. Schmiedel's criticism.

He is unquestionably right in laying down the principle that 'absolute credibility should be accorded to that which cannot have been invented by a tradition replete with veneration for Jesus because contradicting it, and most clearly in instances where, among the evangelists themselves, one or another has actually effected a transformation out of reverence for Jesus.' Strangely enough, this acute critic has failed to perceive that, if the interpretation based on the Aramaic is admitted, the passages in question furnish most valuable illustrations of his principle. Has a man the right to assure his fellow-man that his sins are pardoned? The Pharisees assert that God alone can pardon sin. Jesus affirms that man has the right to do so. This thought was too bold for the Church to grasp. She asked, 'Who is the man that can pardon sins?' and her answer was, 'the Christ.' It was no doubt because the translator, following the custom of the Alexandrian version, rendered the phrase literally ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου rather than in good idiomatic Greek ὁ ἄνθρωπος that the saying was preserved at all.

It is not necessary to assume that the question debated was originally connected with a case of healing, and quite irrelevant to ask whether Jesus thought that all men could exercise healing power, nor is it at all certain that Jesus would have answered such a question in the negative. Jesus declares that the sabbath was made for man's sake, therefore man is also lord of the sabbath, and the added remarks show that he regarded the whole cult as of less importance than the principle of love violated in the charge made against his disciples. But a view of the sabbath that put it wholly into the hands of man, was too radical for the Church. By the misleading, though probably unintentional, turn given to the expression in Greek, she gained the comforting assurance that the Christ was lord of the sabbath, and would, no doubt, lend his authority to any change made in his honour. The more in harmony with the growing veneration for Jesus this thought is, the more value must be attached to the earlier and so markedly different form revealed by a translation of the saying back into the original Aramaic.

In Mt. 8 20 Jesus used what sounds like a current epigram to indicate the vicissitudes of human life. He thought of man's lot, the Church instantly thought of his; and the greater the distance between her meditation upon the humiliation of her heavenly lord from the general outlook upon human life suggested by the Aramaic saying, the stronger is the presumption in favour of the latter. There is pardon, Jesus declares, for anything that is said against a man, but when the Holy Spirit that works his mighty deeds through a man is declared to be an evil spirit, how can there be forgiveness? While the Aramaic saying suggests as the thought of Jesus, that men should be willing to forgive whatever may be said against them, but that it is an infinitely more serious matter to call a manifestly good spirit possessing a man, Beelzebub; the Church found it far easier to think that Jesus has given the gracious assurance that he would pardon even blasphemy against himself, though he was the Messiah, possibly because his Messianic glory was veiled, but that blasphemy against the Holy Spirit could not be forgiven. When the prophet's death began to appear to him as the inevitable result of his career, he may have comforted his disciples with another word of universal application: 'man must pass away, but he will rise again.' Convinced by the testimony of those who had seen him in heavenly visions that he had risen from the dead, the Church was better prepared for the thought that he had predicted his own death and resurrection than that he had in simple confidence bound up his own destiny with that of humanity. In proportion as the Aramaic sayings thus disclosed differ from the Greek logia, presenting conceptions that do not, like the latter, ally themselves naturally with the developing ecclesiastical appreciation of Jesus, they become precious evidences, both of the historical character of Jesus and of the peculiar type of his teaching.

Schmiedel also argues the probability of an original Messianic reference in Mk. 2 28 from Jesus' attitude to the law. He thinks that Jesus may have been led to regard himself as the Messiah by the practical question that he as a reformer was forced to meet, whether the validity of the law might be set aside. 'The law was intended to remain forever. If it must be changed, an explicit authorisation by God was of course necessary. No prophet had possessed this. It was on the whole conceivable only in connection with the new order of the world, the coming of the Messianic age. Consequently, only one could be the divine messenger who would dare to announce it, the Messiah.' This ingenious line of reasoning rests on presuppositions that are scarcely tenable.

Jesus probably believed that Moses wrote the Pentateuch. Yet he found in the prophetic rolls the most pointed criticism of the cult. Prophets had in the name of God spoken against sacrifices, temples, sabbaths, and other ordinances of the law. He was manifestly much more influenced by the prophets than by the law. Whilst the question of the validity of the codes might seem one of life and death to a lawyer, it is altogether probable that other things seemed far more important to the carpenter of Nazareth. The Essenes did not regard it as necessary to wait for the Messiah to authorise a remarkably free attitude toward the temple service. Galilee was notorious for what were regarded in Jerusalem as laxer conceptions. The man of Nazareth who went forth from his carpenter's bench, as Amos of old from his sycamore trees, is not likely to have scrupled to follow the example of the prophets until he could persuade himself that he was, or was destined to become, the Messiah for whom some of his countrymen longed.

In distinction from Eerdmans, Schmidt, and Lietzmann, who had looked upon the Greek translators as the agents through whom the designation of 'man' became a Messianic title, Wellhausen thought it possible that already the Aramaic bar-nāšā was at one time used with this significance. It would indeed be interesting to know whether 'Son of man' was employed by the Aramaic-speaking Christians in the first century, and if so, what the form was. Unfortunately, there is no evidence on this point.

We do not know what term in the Hebrew gospel Jerome rendered filius hominis, nor the age of the pericope in which he found it. The Ev. Hier. may well be somewhat earlier. But its two terms b'reh dĕ-gabrā and b'reh dĕ-bar-nāšā are manifestly translations of ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, and only the absence of b'reh dĕ-nāšā is of importance as it may show that this Edessene theological term was not used by the Palestinian Christians. The latest interpolations in Enoch 37-71 are of doubtful age and provenience (see § 7). As to the fragments of a lost apocalypse preserved in the Synoptic gospels, there are too many signs of editorial activity in the first of the evangelists, or variants in different copies of the Greek text used, to permit a safe judgment particularly on the important point whether in the Aramaic original Mt. 24 30 and parallels contained the first mention of the coming Son of man. It is altogether possible that the usage in this Apocalypse was analogous to that in Enoch 46 and 4 Ezra 13, the man being first introduced and then referred to with a demonstrative pronoun that would naturally fall away in the Greek when the phrase was understood as a title.

If bar-nāšā had ever developed into a Messianic title among the Christians of Palestine, there did not seem to be any reason why they should have substituted for the term which they must then have supposed Jesus to use, such a phrase as breh dĕ-gabrā. Schmiedel's point that, if bar-nāšā could convey to some minds the idea that the Messiah was meant, there are no grounds, at least so far as the language is concerned, for disputing that it may have been so intended by Jesus and understood by his immediate disciples, appears to the present writer to be well taken. But it touches only an admission by Wellhausen, not necessitated by any unmistakable fact. If such a transformation had been effected in Jewish-Christian circles before the end of the first century, we should expect to find it in Rev. The absence of the title in this Christian apocalypse, where there were many natural occasions for using it, is far more significant than its non-occurrence in the epistolary literature where some such motive as Schmiedel has imagined may have been operative.

Until new evidence, or arguments not long ago refuted, shall be adduced in favour of the assumption that Jesus spoke Greek, it must be taken for granted that he addressed his hearers in the Galilæan dialect of the Aramaic.

35. Value of the philological argument.

When this is acknowledged, it follows of necessity that it is the duty of every scholar before pronouncing upon the authenticity of any saying attributed to Jesus to consider whether it may have been wrongly translated. In the performance of this duty two difficulties are met with: it is possible only to approximate to the original, and the literary material by which the Galilæan dialect is known apparently does not go back farther than to the second century A.D. On the other hand, the translation in this case is simplified by the fact that ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου can only be the rendering of a form compounded with bar (בר), and further facilitated by the circumstance that of terms that may be considered, b'reh dĕ-'nāšā, b'reh dĕ-gabrā and b'reh dĕ-bar-nāšā must be eliminated. While all these are manifestly Christian renderings of the Greek term, b'reh dĕ-nāšā was apparently not used in Palestine, b'reh dĕ-gabrā cannot have been formed as an allusion to Dan. 7 13 and as an original Aramaic expression would put the emphasis on Joseph, and b'reh dĕ-bar-nāšā is ruled out by the same considerations. The only available term, then, is bar-nāšā.

The examination in detail of Aramaic usage undertaken during the last few years, valuable as it has been, was not necessary to reach this conclusion. But bar-nāšā means simply 'man,' the individual of the human species, and is the only Aramaic form that by its origin and usage has solely this connotation. Whilst the term occurs with greater frequency in the literary remains of some dialects, there is no reason to believe that it was lacking in any (though even this would not be strange), and it has the same sense wherever it is found. In Galilee it appears to have been used more commonly than in Samaria and Judæa. Although, in the absence of older literature, no actual occurrence of the term before the second century A.D. can be quoted, there is no known fact that even remotely indicates that it was not employed and understood to have the same meaning a few generations earlier.

The phrase translated ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, therefore, naturally conveyed the sense of 'man.' This is precisely the most appropriate meaning in the passages whose authenticity on other grounds is least subject to doubt. It is quite possible that in one or another of these sayings the indeterminate bar 'nāš, 'a man,' was originally used, or that the emphatic ending had already lost its force. It would then imply only a natural misapprehension, and no violence, if such an utterance as 'A man may pardon sins' should have been interpreted, 'Even a man—viz., this man,' or 'Though I am a man, I have the right to pardon sins'; and the question as to the authority involved may (so Wellhausen) have assisted in giving the impression that Jesus referred to himself. But from this understanding of the phrase to the conception that Jesus designated by it his Messiah-ship the distance is very great. A person speaking Aramaic might of course refer to a third person as 'The man,' if he had already introduced him. There seems to be no instance of this among the recorded sayings of Jesus. There is not the slightest evidence that 'the man' was a current Messianic title, and the natural impression upon a person to whom Aramaic was the vernacular, that a speaker employing the term bar-nāšā referred to man in general, any man, renders it exceedingly improbable that this phrase, without further qualification, can ever have been used as a designation of the Messiah. Since, in spite of this fact, ὁ υἱ. τ. ἀ. is sometimes put upon the lips of Jesus where the generic use is out of the question, the recourse to the Aramaic furnishes a most valuable criterion of genuineness.

36. Force of the Greek translation. But if bar-nāšā meant simply 'man,' why was it translated ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, and not ὁ ἄνθρωπος? The answer is to be found partly in the Greek version of the OT, and partly in the development of thought in Greek-speaking Christian circles.

The Hebrew ben-ādām was by 𝔊 as a rule rendered υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου (υἱὸς ἀνθρώπων Job 16 21, υἱὸς γηγενοῦς many MSS Jer. 49 33), and so also bar-ĕnāš in Dan. 7 13 (Θ and 𝔊). The plural b'nē ādām is translated υἱοὶ ἀνθρώπων, 1 S. 18 19 2 S. 7 14 Is. 52 14 Mic. 5 6 Prov. 8 4 31 Ps. 57 5 146 2, and οἱ υἱοὶ τῶν ἀνθρώπων, Joel 1 12 and frequently in Prov.; b'nē hā-ādām is translated οἱ υἱοὶ ἀνθρώπων in 1 K. 8 39, and οἱ υἱοὶ τῶν ἀνθρώπων in Gen. 11 5 2 Ch. 6 30 Ps. 33 13 145 12. Of most importance is the usage in Ecclus., where the Hebrew has uniformly b'nē hā-ādām and this seems originally to have been rendered everywhere οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου (1 13 2 38 3 18 f. 21 8 11 9 3), οἱ υἱοὶ τῶν ἀνθρώπων occurring only sporadically in MSS as a correction and υἱοὶ ἀνθρώπου as an alternative reading in 3 21 (HP 147 149, Ald.). It is significant that Aquila also has οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου in 8 11 where his text has been preserved. To a Greek this could scarcely have conveyed any other idea than 'the sons of the man,' the man being some particular person previously mentioned. Aquila, as well as the translator of Ecclus., thought in Aramaic, had b'nē 'nāšā in mind, and used ἄνθρωπος as a collective after the fashion of 'nāšā. In Dan. 5 21 mibbĕnē enāšā is simply rendered ἀπὸ τῶν ἀνθρώπων (Θ). Instead of following this example and rendering bar-nāšā by ὁ ἄνθρωπος, the Christian translator adopted the more common custom observed in the Greek version and particularly what seems to have been its most recent form seen in Ecclus.

A Hellenistic Jew familiar with Aramaic would, therefore, be quite likely to divine behind ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου an original bar-nāšā, whilst a Greek, naturally inquiring who the ἄνθρωπος was, would be puzzled by the expression. If this conceivably caused a hesitancy in some minds to employ it, it certainly was to many an additional reason for its use. The air of mystery surrounding it made it peculiarly fitting as a secret intimation of Messiahship. It is manifest that the phrase is not a fresh translation of a Semitic original in every place where it occurs. Possibly this is not the case anywhere. It may have been employed in oral teaching and in earlier writings before any of our gospels were written, and adopted by the evangelists as an already current designation. The use of ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, not only in passages where the employment in the Greek Bible of ἄνθρωπος as if it were a collective like 'nāšā rendered it possible to see through it a bar-nāšā in the ordinary sense of 'man,' but also where this would have been impossible, inevitably leads to the conclusion that it may be necessary to distinguish between passages having different claims to authenticity.

37. Need of literary criticism. The idea that we possess in the Synoptic gospels accurate transcripts of the words of Jesus is already abandoned when the 69 occurrences are reduced to 39, 40, or 42 by eliminating what are deemed unmistakable duplicates. For if the 22 passages (see § 12) thus duplicated are examined, a substantial agreement is indeed found, but not absolute identity, and the differences are sometimes such as cannot be accounted for by a more or less accurate rendering of an assumed Aramaic original.

In the case of the 17 passages found only in Mt. or Lk., some are obviously duplicates of sayings already recorded within these gospels, others have synoptic parallels in which the phrase does not occur, and others still are manifestly later glosses. While à priori there is no reason to question the possibility of a genuine utterance having been preserved only in one gospel, on examination the decidedly secondary character of all these seventeen instances becomes apparent.

Not only is Mt. 10 23 without a parallel in Lk. 12 11 f., but the whole section Mt. 10 17-25 predicting the sufferings of the apostles reflects a time when the missionary activity of the Church was still confined to Israel. The allegorical interpretation of the parable of the tares, found only in Mt. 13 37-41, shows the strong feeling against Antinomianism in the early Church but also the wisdom with which some of her leaders left the punishment of heretics for the Messiah when he should appear. It is generally recognised that the Evangelist wrote this commentary. On Mt. 16 13, see § 39. In Mt. 16 28 the 'Son of Man' coming in his kingdom has probably taken the place of 'the kingdom of heaven,' as is suggested by Lk. 9 27, where 'the kingdom of God' is used, and Mk. 9 1, where it is expanded into 'the kingdom of God already come with power.' When Mt. 19 28 f. is compared with Lk. 18 29 and Mk. 10 29, it is clearly seen that each evangelist has modified the utterance or registered a peculiar tradition. While Lk. seems to be nearer the original, the omission of 'lands' is in harmony with his general attitude, and 'kingdom of God' is his synonym for the more idiomatic 'kingdom of heaven.' Instead of 'for the sake of the kingdom of heaven,' Mk. has 'for my sake and for the gospel's sake,' specifies the future blessings, and significantly adds 'with persecutions'; Mt. introduces the answer by v. 28 and has 'for my name's sake.' If 'the sign of the Son of man' in Mt. 24 30*a* had formed a part of the original apocalypse, it is likely to have been preserved by Mk. and Lk. (see § 41). The commentators have not yet discovered what the sign is. Was it a flame of fire (2 Thess. 1 8) or a cross? In either case, this additional feature would not be very old. On Mt. 25 31, see § 41. The statement of a fact (Mk. 14 1 f. Lk. 22 1 f.) has been changed into a prediction in Mt. 26 2. Instead of 'for the sake of the Son of man' in Lk. 6 22, Mt. 5 11 has 'for my sake,' but even this is a later addition. When Lk. 12 8 is compared with Mt. 10 32 it is apparent that κἀγώ in the latter place is more original than the title, but also that the whole verse is secondary. Lk. 17 20-22 is not in harmony with what follows, and Paul, Wernle, and Holtzmann have rightly pointed out the disenchantment of the Church expressed in 17 22. Jülicher (Gleichnisreden Jesu, 2 288) recognises that Lk. 18 8*b* is a late addition similarly expressing the painful disappointment as regards the parousia. The beautiful comment, Lk. 19 10, may be this evangelist's tribute to Jesus, or an interpolation in this place as in Mt. 18 11. The exhortation, Lk. 21 34-36, is undoubtedly, as Wernle (Syn. Frage, 17) observes, the work of Lk. himself. Holtzmann thinks that Lk. 22 48 is also a creation of the evangelist and calls attention to its rhetorical character (HC,(2) 1901, p. 414). In Mt. 26 50 the text is scarcely sound, and the account of Judas' treason is of doubtful historicity (see JUDAS ISCARIOT, §§ 7, 10). It is possible, however, that Lk. 22 48 goes back to an Aramaic original that conveyed the sense: 'Is it with a kiss that thou betrayest a man (bar-nāšā)?' And Mt. 26 50 may originally have had as a variant 'Why dost thou betray (παρει for παραδιδως) a friend?' Two men in dazzling raiment, evidently angels, remind the women in Lk. 27 7 that Jesus had predicted the death and resurrection of the son of man. Addresses by angels do not belong to history. How little Lk. cared for mere verbal accuracy is seen in the fact that the quotation made by the angel does not quite correspond to any prediction recorded.

A study of these passages shows with what freedom sayings of Jesus were certainly modified and apparently created.

If words occurring only in one gospel are naturally somewhat more open to suspicion than those found in two or three, it must be remembered, on the other hand, that the presumption in favour of genuineness does not necessarily increase by duplication, as it may only imply the copying of one evangelist by another or the use of a common source. The reliability of any saying must then ultimately depend upon the general trustworthiness of the document where it first appeared or the current of tradition it registered.

To assume, as many scholars do, that the evangelical tradition has been preserved in its purity in Mk. is to draw a very rash conclusion from the doubtful theory of Mk.'s priority. The fact that no passage containing the phrase is found in Mk. that is not also found in Mt., or Lk., or both, only shows that Mk. remained free from some of the later additions to the other synoptics. It often happens, however, that it is the text of higher age and greater prestige that because of its wider use is most enriched in that way. Thus our best Greek MS of Ecclus.

has the greatest number of interpolations, while far inferior MSS are relatively free from additions to the text (see Schmidt, 'Ecclesiasticus' in Temple Bible).

The evidence of later expansions of Mt., most clearly presented by Hilgenfeld, is constantly increasing, and new indications of similar accretions to the original Lk. already suggested by Marcion's gospel, are forthcoming. The assumption that Mk.'s conception of Jesus' attitude to the Messiahship was different from that of Mt. and Lk. and more historical can scarcely maintain itself after Wrede's criticism. As the prejudice in favour of Mk., based on a shorter text and a supposed correcter view of Jesus' career, is removed, and the different versions of each saying are compared and tested in their presumable Aramaic form, an impartial survey of the facts will show at once how far all the synoptics are from reflecting accurately the words of Jesus without losing touch altogether with the oldest tradition, and in what sense the earliest testimony as to the succession of these gospels, representing the order as Mt., Mk., and Lk., is to be accepted. It will then be seen that there are passages in Mt. and Lk., not found in Mk., that may go back to original sayings of Jesus; that the only passage found in Mk. and Lk., but not in Mt., cannot be regarded as authentic; that there is no genuine saying preserved in Lk. that is not also found in Mt.; that there are passages in Mk. as well as in Mt. and Lk. that are clearly of very late origin; and that there are passages in Mk. as well as in Mt. and Lk. in which the phrase may go back to an original bar-nāšā even after the episode at Cæsarea Philippi.

Among the eight passages found only in Mt. and Lk., Mt. 8 20 (Lk. 9 58), 11 19 (7 34), and 12 32*a* (12 10*a*) probably go back to original utterances of Jesus (see § 38); 12 40 (11 30) is an interpolation particularly clumsy in Mt.; 24 27 37 39 (17 24 26 30) belong to the synoptic apocalypse (see § 41), and 29 44 (12 46) is recognised by Jülicher (l.c. 2 142 ff.) as a later gloss. Among the five found in Mt. and Mk., Mt. 17 9 (9 8) refers to the vision on the mountain. In Jesus' lifetime, not even his most intimate disciples had had anything to relate concerning his luminous heavenly body. Did this necessarily exclude the possibility of a vision of this body before his death? Not to the minds of the evangelists, since they had accustomed themselves to the thought that Jesus had forbidden all such disclosures concerning himself before he should rise from the dead. This vision (ὅραμα) is thus an anticipation of the vision that spread the belief in his resurrection. The Elijah question, Mt. 17 10-13 (Mk. 9 11-13), consequently had no connection originally with what precedes; the text in Mk. is late and confused (so also Wernle, l.c., 133), whilst that in Mt. is in good order and the conclusion may be a rendering of 'So must a man (ברנש) suffer by them,' referring to John the Baptist. Mt. 20 28 (Mk. 10 45) comments retrospectively on the exemplification in the life and death of Jesus of the principle he has just laid down. Lk. 22 27-30 is a later and less valuable interpretation that curiously misunderstands the thought that Jesus wished to convey. Mt. 26 24*b* (Mk. 14 21*b*) occurs in an interpolation which breaks the connection between 26 21*a* and 26 (14 18 and 22) with an account that has been placed by Lk. at the end (22 21-23) and even there is probably unhistorical. The occurrence of the phrase in Mt. 26 45 (Mk. 14 41), not found in Lk. where the connection is better, is no doubt to be explained by the place Judas gained in Christian legend (so Wellhausen). (On Mk. 8 31 [Lk. 9 22], see § 40.)

Among the eight passages found in all the Synoptics, Mt. 9 6 (Mk. 2 10 Lk. 5 24) and Mt. 12 8 (Mk. 2 28 Lk. 6 5) probably go back to original utterances. Mt. 16 27 (Mk. 8 38 Lk. 9 26) is clearly a later addition, further transformed by Mk. and Lk. Mt. 17 22 (Mk. 9 31 Lk. 9 44) and Mt. 20 18 (Mk. 10 33 Lk. 18 31) is a prediction of his death (see § 40). Mt. 27 30*b* (Mk. 13 26 Lk. 21 27) belongs to the Synoptic apocalypse (see § 41). Mt. 26 24*a* (Mk. 14 21*a* Lk. 22 22) belongs to the interpolation considered above. The absence of disciples witnessing the scene, the conflict with judicial practice, the absurdity of the false testimony, the failure to produce any statement that a Jewish court could have construed into blasphemy, and the contradictions and evident Christian colouring render it extremely difficult to believe in the historical character of the trial before the Sanhedrin. (Cp SYNEDRIUM.) In Mt. 26 64 Jesus answers the question whether he is the Messiah 'thou sayest it,' in Lk. 22 69 'ye say that I am.' The plain import is 'You say that I am the Messiah, but I have made no such statement.' It is significant that these two evangelists should have hesitated to put upon the lips of Jesus an affirmative answer even under oath. So strong was the tradition that Jesus did not in his lifetime claim to be the Messiah, so firm the conviction that he guarded his secret to the end. They felt justified only in ascribing to him a covert reference to the Messiah in the third person and with the secret name. Mk. (14 62) lacks some of the expressions in Mt. and Lk., but departs widely from the earlier tradition by making Jesus acknowledge his Messiahship. Cp the searching criticism of Brandt (Ev. Gesch. 53 ff.).

In view of this indispensable literary criticism, it is of no small importance that it is possible by turning the Greek logia into the vernacular of Jesus to obtain some sayings at once so different from the prevailing conceptions of the early Church and so bold and original as to raise the strongest presumption in favour of their genuineness.

38. Genuine sayings during Galilean period.

Such are, in the first place, Mt. 9 6 and 12 8 (and parallels), found in all the synoptics. In the former case the question is debated whether a man has a right to assure another man that his sins are pardoned. The Pharisees maintain that God alone can pardon sin. They probably regarded absolution in the name of God as a priestly function. There is no evidence that the Jews expected the Messiah to forgive sins, and no intimation that Jesus looked upon this as a privilege to be exercised only by himself. On the contrary, he enjoins his disciples to use this power (Mt. 18 18). Such a simple assurance of forgiveness, flowing from a living faith in a heavenly father's love, was to Jesus no sacerdotal act. Any man had a right to extend it.

In Mt. 12 8 the generic meaning is equally clear. The disciples having eaten corn as they passed through the field, are accused of breaking the sabbath. Jesus defends them by quoting the example of David, who ate of the shewbread, which, according to the law, he had no right to do, and gave his followers permission to do so. The point is not that David and his 'greater son' may take liberties with God's law which would be wrong for others, but clearly that so godly a man as David recognised that the sustenance of life was in God's eyes more important than the maintenance of the cult. Lest this should be misunderstood, he adds another argument. The law permits the priests to work on the sabbath, thus regarding the commanded cessation of labour as less important than the maintenance of divine worship. The thought is not that he and his had priestly rights, for they had none, and Jesus had no interest in the sacrificial cult, as the next statement shows. But even from the standpoint of the law there were things more important than the enjoined cessation of work. Man was not made for the sabbath, but the sabbath for man; therefore man is also lord of the sabbath. This conclusion alone is relevant to the argument. If it were necessary to prove that the Messiah might break the law or authorise his disciples to do so, how could so startling a proposition be established by the general consideration that the sabbath was made for man's sake? There is indeed no evidence that the Jews expected the Messiah to violate or abrogate the divinely given law. The very suggestion would probably have produced a shock. If Jesus really desired to convince his hearers that the Messiah had a right to dispense from obedience to the law and that he was the Messiah, he must have understood that what was needed for that purpose was a reference to a recognised Messianic passage ascribing such powers to the Messiah or a firmly-rooted tradition to this effect, and a straightforward presentation and vindication of his claims, all the more necessary if he did not wish his Messiahship to be taken in a political sense. Were it possible that the Aramaic word he used for 'Son of man' could have been interpreted as a Messianic title, the impression left on the Pharisees would still have been that he had defended law-breaking on the ground that the lower, the sabbath, must yield to the higher, man, and had made such a sweeping application of a general principle, true enough in certain circumstances, as would allow any man to set aside any ordinance of God.

'The foxes have holes, and the birds of the heavens have nests, but a man has nowhere to lay his head' (Mt. 8 20) may be a proverb quoted by Jesus or an epigram coined on the spot. In either case the scribe no doubt saw the hint quickly. Man's life is full of danger and uncertainty. Where will he reside to-morrow? Nature cares for the beasts; they are not driven from home and hearth for their convictions. The thought probably never occurred to the scribe that this Galilæan teacher had in the same breath announced himself as the Messiah, and complained that though he was so great a man he neither owned a house nor had a lodging-place.

The enemies of Jesus charged him with performing his cures by the aid of Beelzebub. In this he saw a blasphemy, because he felt that his success in curing the sick was due to a divine spirit that possessed him. Yet he was careful to distinguish between an attack upon a fellow-man and a denunciation of the spirit operating through him. Therefore he says, 'If any one speaks against a man, that may be pardoned, but he that speaks against the Holy Spirit can have no pardon' (Mt. 12 32). No person in the audience could have understood him to say: 'You may blaspheme the Messiah with impunity, but not the Holy Ghost,' The distinction is clearly between the divine spirit and the human instrumentality.

Wellhausen prefers the reading in Mk. 3 28 f. and assumes that a misunderstanding arose through the original reading in Lk. 12 10 which, on the basis of the absence of λόγον in Marcion, he translates into Aramaic and renders 'all that is said by man' (כל די אמיר לברנשא). This is an ingenious suggestion; but an omission on the part of Mk. seems more probable than such a misapprehension. For, whether the words were uttered by Jesus or not, they seem to have originated in some such reflection as we find in 1 S. 2 25.

In Mt. 11 19 Jesus may be rightly represented as having said 'John comes neither eating nor drinking and they say, He has a devil; a man comes who eats and drinks and they say, Behold a glutton and a wine-bibber.'

The account in Mt. 16 13-20 of Jesus' question to the disciples giving occasion for Peter's confession has manifestly suffered by later expansions.

39. The phrase not used at Cæsarea-philippi.

Such is the pontifical diploma presented to Peter in vv. 17-19. Such also the addition 'the Son of the living God' in v. 16. In v. 13 a second question has been preserved in Syr. Sin. Namely, 'Who is this Son of man?' added to the first, 'What do men say concerning me?' 'This' may perhaps be put to the account of the Syriac translator (so Schmiedel). But it is also possible that 'Who is this man (bar-nāšā)?' is a gloss already in the Aramaic, leading the later glossator to introduce by contrast the title of Christ's divinity. It is evident that the interpolator lived at a period when the supremacy of the Roman See was being established. At that time the term 'Son of man' would be understood to denote the human nature as distinct from the divine. Apart from these additions, Mt. seems to have preserved an earlier text than Mk. 8 27 ff. and Lk. 9 18 ff. Desirous to proclaim the coming of the kingdom of heaven in Jerusalem also, Jesus apparently hesitated on the ground that it might be taken as a political movement. Hence, the question as to what men thought of him. If the answer was reassuring so far as the people were concerned, seeing that they looked upon him as a prophet and not as an aspirant to Messiahship, he had to reckon also with the attitude of his own disciples. When Peter, utterly misunderstanding the question as to their views, took the occasion to express his own hope, Jesus was obliged to 'command the disciples that they should not say to any man that he was the Messiah,' as it is emphatically put in Mt.

According to Mk. 8 31 (Lk. 9 22) Jesus announced his death and resurrection after three days immediately upon Peter's confession. Of this Mt. knows nothing. The first reference to the sufferings of the Son of man are found in Mt. 17 12 (Mk. 9 12), 40. Basis of predictions of death and resurrection.

But here it is probable that the original Aramaic conveyed the sense 'so must a man (bar-'nāš) suffer by them.' For 'the disciples understood that he spoke to them concerning John the Baptist,' v. 13. Later, this would naturally be misunderstood as a reference to himself. The original form of Mt. 20 28 (Mk. 10 45) may have been 'Man has not come (sc. into the world) to be served, but to serve.' When this was applied to Jesus, the dogma of the 'ransom' seems to have been added.

In Clem. Hom. 12 29 (ed. Schwegler) Peter quotes the following words of Jesus: τὰ ἀγαθὰ ἐλθεῖν δεῖ, μακάριος δέ φησί, δι' οὗ ἔρχεται· ὁμοίως καὶ τὰ κακὰ ἀνάγκη ἐλθεῖν, οὐαὶ δὲ δι' οὗ ἔρχεται. The work in which this is found probably dates from the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161-180); cp Hilgenfeld, Clem. Recog. and Hom., 1848, p. 305 ff., ZWTh., 1869, p. 353, Einl. p. 42. The same saying is reported by Aphraates: 'good is sure to come and it is well with him through whom it comes; evil also must come, but woe to him through whom it comes' (5 1, ed. Graffin). Aphraates used Tatian's Diatessaron. The generic sense of bar-nāšā in each part of this section, naturally enough applied to Jesus and Judas in Mt. 26 24 Mk. 14 41 Lk. 22 22, was consequently still preserved in the middle of the second century.

Of the two passages found in all the synoptics, Mt. 17 22 (Mk. 9 31 Lk. 9 44) and Mt. 20 18 (Mk. 10 33 Lk. 18 31), the latter furnishes a more natural situation. That Jesus cannot have predicted in detail his death and resurrection after three days or on the third day, is evident to all critical students. But the difficulty of suppressing the political hopes of his followers and the prejudices and opposition he was sure to encounter in Jerusalem may well have filled his mind with forebodings of evil. He fell back, however, upon the conviction that the highest good, the kingdom of heaven, would come, and that it would be well with any man who assisted in its coming and suffered for its sake. He no doubt believed in a resurrection of the dead, although his idea seems to have been nearer the Essene than the Pharisaic conception. As Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had been raised out of death into an eternal life with God, so he expected to be raised, Mt. 22 23 ff. (Mk. 12 13 ff. Lk. 20 20 ff.). This hope he may have expressed by some such word as 'man must pass away but he will rise again.' Even this would be improbable, if Pfleiderer were right in assuming that Jesus cherished no doubts as to the outcome of his mission to Jerusalem.

Considering Lk. 22 36 as a genuine saying of Jesus, Pfleiderer (New World, 1899, p. 431 ff.) concludes that, as he ordered his disciples to buy swords, probably to defend themselves against hired assassins, he cannot have gone to Jerusalem with the 'purpose of dying there as a sacrifice for the sin of the world, but of contending and conquering.' It might be said that, if he advised his followers to arm themselves, the thought of danger and death must have been present with him. But it is exceedingly improbable that he ever gave any such counsel. If he had actually urged his followers to sell their very garments in order to purchase swords, without explaining his purpose, he must have contemplated a coup d'état and there would have been plenty of swords at his disposal, but there would have been a certain disingenuousness in his rebuke, Mt. 26 52, so thoroughly in harmony with the doctrine of non-resistance he had preached, since he was himself responsible for the presence of the sword and the notion that it would be an urgent necessity. The earlier tradition in Mt. and Mk. knows nothing of such a command given by Jesus; but it preserved the fact that one of the disciples had drawn a sword and cut off a man's ear. How was this sword to be accounted for? Jesus had ordered it. For what purpose? Lk. 22 27 gives the answer, 'This which is written must be accomplished in me, "And he was reckoned with the lawless."' Jesus, of course, did not go to Jerusalem in order to die, but to proclaim the good news of the kingdom. Nevertheless he no doubt realised the dangers of the situation and only put his life into jeopardy because he deemed it necessary for the accomplishment of his work, sustained the while by the hope that the kingdom of heaven would come in the world and to himself a share in the resurrection from the dead.

In Mt. 24 4-36 'the Son of man' occurs five times; in Mk. 13 5-32 only once, and in Lk. 21 8-36 twice.

41. The Synoptic Apocalypse. Mt. 24 30*b* (Mk. 13 26 Lk. 21 27), which is alike in all the synoptics, has no doubt been drawn from the last apocalypse. Before it Mt. introduces the term twice—viz., in 24 27 which is also found in Lk. 17 24 and in 24 30*a* which has no parallel. The second occurrence in Lk. (21 36) is also without a duplicate; while Mt. 24 37 39 correspond to Lk. 17 26 30.

If the passage which the three gospels have in common was the first in the original apocalypse that referred to the Son of man, it may well be that it conveyed the meaning, 'they shall see a man coming on the clouds of heaven,' and he will, etc. If Mt. 24 27 actually preceded it, this sense would not be possible; but there is no certainty that the original has been reproduced exactly or in order. Until further discoveries shall have been made, it will remain most probable that 'the man' was first introduced as 'a man,' as in En. 46 and 4 Ezra 13. This apocalypse may not originally have been put upon the lips of Jesus. When its fragments once secured a place in the synoptic gospels, the influence upon the conception of the term 'Son of man' must have been profound. If even ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου to persons familiar with Aramaic might still have conveyed the sense of bar-nāšā (see § 36), the man coming with the clouds or appearing as a lightning flash was too plainly the celestial being described in Dan. 7 13 to be considered as referring to man in general. A new mode of thought was naturally given to familiar utterances. It was this heavenly man who had been without a home on earth, who had authority over the sabbath and the right to pardon sins, who had suffered at the hands of men and predicted his advent in glory and power. The title was substituted for the personal pronoun; old sayings were modified, new ones formed. Where Jesus had spoken of the kingdom of heaven whose coming he expected, the Church spoke of the Son of man for whose coming she eagerly looked. Among the new creations none is grander than the judgment scene in Mt. 25. Its chief significance lies not so much in the fact that the judge identifies himself with his brethren, or that the nations are judged by their treatment of the Christians, as in the fact that they are judged exclusively by moral tests: men's eternal welfare is determined by their unconscious goodness in dealing with their humblest fellow-men.

An indication of the date of the synoptic apocalypse in its Christian form may be found in the circumstance that it follows in Mt. immediately upon a passage that in all probability belonged to the Σοφία τοῦ θεοῦ, as Strauss has shown (ZWTh., 1863, p. 84 ff.). This 'Wisdom of God' cannot have been written long before the end of the first century, as it contains an allusion to the murder of Zechariah b. Barachia during the siege of Jerusalem (cp Jos. BJ iv. 5 4 [§§ 335, 343]).

Jerome (Vir. Ill. 2) affirms that in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which he had translated into

42. Gospel according to Hebrews. Greek and Latin, the statement was made that Jesus after his resurrection, 'took bread, blessed, brake, and gave it to James the Just, saying, "my brother, eat thy bread, for the Son of man (filius hominis) has risen from those that sleep."' Hilgenfeld (ZWTh., 1899) thinks that the Aramaic phrase translated by Jerome was b'reh dĕ-'nāšā.

It would be interesting, in all these circumstances, to know what Aramaic term Jerome found in his gospel, and of utmost importance if it could be proved that the copy he saw in the library at Cæsarea was a faithful transcript of the Gospel written by Matthew. In its original form, the Gospel according to the Hebrews may indeed have been of very high age, and have served as a basis for the first Greek gospel. That it was nameless, as Handmann thinks (Heb. Ev., 1888, p. 115), is not probable. The most natural supposition is that it was ascribed to Matthew. Whether such a tradition was correct, may be doubted. But, like all other gospels, it undoubtedly underwent many changes; and this particular pericope, at least in the form represented by Jerome, can scarcely have had a place in the first draft.

As b'reh dĕ-'nāšā apparently was not used by Palestinian Christians, b'reh dĕ-gabrā is more probable. But it may even be questioned whether Jerome wrote filius hominis, as Gregory of Tours quotes the words: 'Surge, Jacobe, comede, quia jam a mortuis resurrexi' (Hist. Franc. 1 21).

It is the merit of Lietzmann to have called attention to the fact that outside of the NT the phrase occurs for

43. Marcion's gospel. the first time in Marcion, and was used by different Gnostic schools. Marcion's gospel seems to have had this term in the same places as the canonical Lk., except that 7 29 35 11 30-32 18 8 31-34 were not found in his gospel.

From Marcion's acquaintance with it, Lietzmann draws the conclusion that it originated in Asia Minor before the year 90 A.D. It is not apparent why this year should have been chosen. Harnack's conjecture (Chron. 298 ff.) is based on an obscure and manifestly corrupt passage in Clement of Alexandria. Lipsius placed Marcion's birth at least twenty years later, and his arrival in Rome in 143/4 (ZWTh., 1867, p. 75 ff.). Tertullian's statement that Marcion was the son of a bishop is scarcely more reliable than that of Megethius, that he was himself a bishop (cp Meyboom, Marcion en de Marcionieten, 34 ff.). But, apart from this, there is no evidence that Marcion as a child was familiar with the gospel he quoted in Rome in the time of Pius (cp also Hilgenfeld, Ketzergesch. 329 f.).

According to Irenæus (Adv. hær. i. 30 1-31 2) the Gnostics called the primeval light, the father of all

44. Use of term by Gnostics. things, Πρῶτος ἄνθρωπος (primus homo), and the first thought (ἔννοια) emanating from him Δεύτερος ἄνθρωπος (secundus homo), or υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου (filius hominis). This υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου was not, however, identical with the Christ who, in their opinion, was the offspring of 'the first man' and 'the second man' with 'the holy spirit,' while the man Jesus, son of Yaldabaoth and the Virgin Mary, was conceived of as the earthly tabernacle in which the Christ took up his abode. Hippolytus (Philosophumena, 5 6-11 10 9) reports that the Naasenes (נחש = serpent), or Phrygian Ophites, also worshipped the 'man' (ἄνθρωπος), and the 'Son of man' (υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου) as a unity of father and son, the father probably being designated as Adamas (אדם).

In the Evangelium Mariæ, a Gnostic work earlier than Irenæus, the highest being is called Πρωτάνθρωπος (cp K. Schmidt, SBAW, 1896, p. 843 f.), and in a somewhat later form of this Gnosis the 'Man of light,' Adamas, occurs (id. in TU 8 297 309 ff. 658); and the perfect and true man (hominem perfectum et verum) called Adamas, belongs to the circle of divine beings manifesting Barbelo, the father and the son, in the thought of the Barbelo-Gnostics (Iren. 1 29). When the 'Heavenly Dialogue,' quoted by Celsus in his 'True Word' (about 177 A.D.), declared that the Son of Man (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου) was mightier than a god (Origen, Contr. Cels. 8 15), this god was no doubt Yaldabaoth whom his mother, Sophia, had to rebuke by a reminder that above him were 'the father of all, the first man, and the man, "the son of man,"' according to Irenæus. Valentinus also gave the first place in the pleroma to the προὼν ἄνθρωπος (Clement, Strom. ii. 8 36), and Monoimos represented the divinity as man, and in so far as it is revealed, as 'Son of man' (see Grill, l.c., 355).

The evident kinship between the Ophite system and the thought ascribed to Simon of Gitta, renders it not improbable that the founder of the movement already was familiar with these designations for the highest beings. His saying in regard to the divine manifestation as son in Judæa, as father in Samaria, and as holy spirit in the other nations (Philos. 6 19) is most readily understood in harmony with whatever else is known of his views, if it is assumed that he asserted the divinity of man on the basis of the acknowledged humanity of God, finding in Judaism, Samaritanism, and paganism, in Jesus, himself, and Helena, manifestations of that divinely human life symbolised by the already extant figures of 'the man,' the 'Son of man,' and the feminine spirit in the pleroma.

That the Ophites existed before Christianity, their doctrine being a mixture of Egyptian and Jewish ideas, has been suggested by Baur (Christliche Gnosis, 194 ff. [1835]), by Lipsius, who preferred to think of Syrian rather than Egyptian influences as preponderating (ZWTh., 1863, p. 718 f.), and by Lietzmann, who quotes Philaster, 1 1, as showing that they 'argued their heresies before the coming of Christ.' Lietzmann, however, is of the opinion that 'man' as a divine name can only have originated as a designation of the heavenly prototype of the Messiah appearing on earth, called even in early times 'the second man,' though the term is actually found only in late Rabbinic writings, and that the Christian Ophites continued to use these titles, naturally adopting ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου for ὁ δεύτερος ἄνθρωπος. But Grill is probably right in pointing out an Indian origin for this conception (l.c., 348 ff.).

The Vedic Purusha—i.e., 'man'—is a designation of the universe, the macrocosm being conceived after the analogy of the microcosm. A distinction is made, however, in Rig Veda 10 90 between Purusha as the absolute being, and Purusha as the firstborn, and for this derived primeval existence the term Nārāyana, 'the one like a man,' 'the son of man' is used (Mahānarōyana-Upanishad, 11). Gnostic speculation is altogether likely to have been affected by this idea.

It is possible, too, that there was a basis in the mythical lore of Syria. Adam is not improbably the name of a Semitic divinity [cp OBED-EDOM]. The familiar motive of a father, a son, and a mother-goddess having issue by the son (cp Stucken, MVAG, 1902, 446 ff.), reflecting as it does a very primitive form of domestic life, is certainly of mythical origin, and not the result of late philosophical speculation. The conception of the macrocosmic man and the celestial protoplast is earlier and more widespread than the significant names expressing it in Sanscrit sources, and rendered the introduction of similar terms easier. There seems to be no trace in Gnostic thought of the Jewish idea of the Messiah, and the Christ-idea has the appearance of being a later addition to a system already completed. The Gnostic 'Son of man' cannot be accounted for as growing out of the conception presented in the synoptics; rather is it possible that the Greek phrase, used in rendering the generic barnāšā, lent itself to an interpretation akin to the Gnostic thought, seeing in Jesus an incarnation of a celestial 'Son of man.'

Recent criticism of the Fourth Gospel has had a tendency to emphasise again its relations to Gnosticism.

45. Use in Fourth Gospel.

While the unhistorical character of the Gospel, its impregnation with Alexandrian, and particularly Philonic, thought, and its date toward the middle of the second century, have been rendered practically certain by the labours of many scholars, from Bretschneider to Holtzmann and the Révilles (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE), questions concerning earlier and later strata within the gospel, and the attitude of author or redactor to Gnostic thought, have assumed fresh importance during the last few years. How profoundly investigation on these points may affect the interpretation of the 'Son of man' in Jn. is seen in the works of Fries, Kreyenbühl, and Grill. Following the expansion-theory of Schweizer, to some extent adopted by Bousset and Harnack, in the more radical form given to it by Delff, rather than the source-theory of Weisse, Freytag, and Wendt, Fries (Det fjärde evangeliet, 1898; En koptiske evangelium, 1900) has independently elaborated a view according to which an earlier gospel by the presbyter John has been expanded by Cerinthus with interpolations, partly taken from the Gospel according to the Hebrews, partly consisting of his own philosophical speculations on the basis of the Philonian logos-doctrine. This theory leads him to consider 1 51 3 13 f. 5 27 53 62 8 28 and 13 31 as interpolations. Only 12 23 34 he thinks it necessary to assign to the original gospel, but regards these as evidence that Jesus himself occasionally used the term. Söderblom has indicated his general agreement with this position (Jesu Bergspredikan, 40 [1899]).

So much is sacrificed to Cerinthus, that 12 23 34 might as well have been added. For 12 23 is practically identical with 13 31, and the statement offending the people in 12 34, that 'the son of man must be lifted up,' is found not in 12 32 where Jesus says, 'If I am lifted up,' but in 3 14 which is regarded as an interpolation. So far as the 'Son of man' passages are concerned, they must therefore, even on this view, be put to the account of a Gnostic philosopher, familiar with Philo's speculation, since the similarity of 6 27 to the Gospel according to the Hebrews does not extend to this phrase. The significant thing is that the parts which must be considered as most characteristic of the gospel are thus given by Fries to a Gnostic. Fries may be right in pointing out a probable use of a Greek translation of the Gospel according to the Hebrews. That the author to whom we owe the gospel in substantially its present form, barring some transpositions indicated by Spitta and Bacon, and the appendix, used other sources than the synoptics is not improbable. But the freedom with which Mt. 26 64 has been modified in 1 51, and the passion-sayings have been transformed into predictions of glorification in 3 14 8 28 12 23 and 13 34, suggests the extreme difficulty of ascertaining the exact language and historical worth of any such sources through the chiaroscuro of his thought.

If Fries fell back upon the opinion of the ancient Alogi that Cerinthus had had something to do with this gospel, Kreyenbühl (Das Evangelium der Wahrheit, 1900) has maintained that the present gospel is the work of Menander of Kapparetæa, the disciple of Simon, and contemporary of Ignatius, in a work equally marked by learning, critical acumen, and sympathetic insight. In accordance with this view he holds that 'Son of man' in Jn. is intended to be understood not as an exclusive self-designation of Jesus, but rather as a term applying to 'man,' 'any man,' jeder Christenmensch, Menander speaking out of his Christian consciousness of being a saviour sent by the aeons into the world (l.c. 437 ff., cp Irenæus, Adv. hær. i. 23 5). It is difficult for the present writer to believe that the slender foundation in Justin and Irenæus will bear the weight of so heavy a structure.

Menander may indeed have conceived of himself as having come into the world to redeem men from ignorance, and it is barely possible that he regarded himself as a manifestation of the celestial man. But the natural impression is certainly that in Jn. Jesus is represented as speaking solely of himself when he uses the term 'Son of man'; and no recourse to the vernacular of Jesus does here, as in the case of the synoptics, suggest a different and universal significance. Particularly important is 6 53, where it seems just as impossible that Menander could have spoken of the appropriation of his own flesh and blood, or of the flesh and blood of man in general, as that Jesus should have used such words. Here the reference is evidently to the Eucharist, and the Son of man is Jesus whose body and blood the Church regarded itself as appropriating in the sacrament, and whose life-giving words the author deemed of supreme value.

The interpretation of Jn. 6 35 from the view-point of the author's symbolical idealism by J. Réville (Le quatrième évangile, 178 ff. [1901]) is more satisfactory than the present writer's assumption of a strong opposition to sacramentalism (JBL, 1892, p. 20). It may be justifiable to infer that in some circles, 'to eat the flesh and to drink the blood of the Son of Man' had developed into a liturgical formula, and this would show how little Christians hesitated to use this supposed self-designation of Jesus. It is the merit of Kreyenbühl to have greatly strengthened the impression that this gospel contains a certain type of Gnostic thought. In view of the fact that practically all the OT, tl Apocrypha, and the Pseudepigrapha are either anonymous or pseudonymous writings, it is time that the eager desire to fasten the authority of the Fourth Gospel upon some person mentioned in Early Christian Literature should be put at rest. Grill (l.c.) rightly contents himself with tracing the gospel idea of the incarnation (that does not go back to Philo) through Gnosticism to its source in Indian speculation, and he interprets the phrase as designating the celestial 'Son of man' who has become a 'man.'

Wendt is probably right in regarding ἀνθρώπου after υἱὸς in 5 27 as a later addition (Das Johannesevangelium, 121 f. [1900]). In 3 13 the words ὁ ὢν ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ should not be removed from the text on the ground of their absence in BSL, but emended into ὁ ὢν ἐξ οὐρανοῦ, as Sin. Syr. has men šĕmaya; and in 9 35, not only BDS but also Sin. Syr. and Eth. have 'Son of man.' In 12 34 the 'Son of man' is not merely an equivalent of the Messiah (so JBL, 15 39). The assumption is that Jesus claims to be the Messiah; but the reference to a removal from earth renders it possible to doubt whether the mysterious title 'Son of man' does not have a different meaning.

46. Effect on question of Jesus' Messiahship.

When it is recognised that ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου is the translation of an Aramaic bar-nāšā, that this term cannot, on philological grounds, have been used as a self-designation since it naturally conveyed only the idea of 'man' in general, and that this generic use is most suitable in all instances where there is reason to suppose that a genuine utterance is found, the opinion that Jesus regarded himself as the Messiah loses its strongest support. There are indeed passages in which the underlying assumption seems to be that Jesus claimed for himself the Messiahship without using the name. Keim (Jesu von Nazara, 2 376) enumerates as such Mt. 9 15 11 3 13 12 3 41 f. 13 17; Beer regards Mt. 9 15 as decisive ('Enoch' in Kautzsch, Pseudepigrapha, 232); Wendt (l.c., 178 ff.) instances Mt. 11 25 ff. Mk. 11 27 ff. 12 35 ff. But in Mt. 9 14 ff. the justification of fasting by the departure of the bridegroom, and of the non-fasting in Jesus' lifetime (cp Mt. 11 18), by the presence of the bridegroom, is as clearly a vaticinium ex eventu (Volkmar) as the words concerning the garments and the wineskins are unmistakably genuine (see Holtzmann, Synoptiker,(3) 55). In Mt. 11 3 Jesus is asked by John the Baptist, through his disciples, whether he is the coming one. Jesus not only does not answer the question, but deliberately turns the attention away from himself to his work, described in language borrowed from Is. 29 18 f. 35 5 6, and culminating in the proclamation of good tidings to the poor. It is the view men have of the kingdom of heaven that concerns him; on this point Jesus considered John's conceptions to be as defective as those of Moses and the prophets (Mt. 11 12 f.).[1] The 'sign of Jonah' is the preaching of repentance to the Ninevites; but Jesus felt that his proclamation of the kingdom of heaven was of more importance than the announcement of judgment by the unwilling prophet (Mt. 12 41 f.). If Mt. 13 17 is genuine, it expresses Jesus' conviction that the kingdom of heaven, prophesied of old, is coming, and his congratulation of his disciples for discerning its advent. But this does not harmonise with the lack of perception on their part, of which he elsewhere has to complain.[2] The parable of the vineyard (Mk. 12 1 ff.) has been so thoroughly changed, under the hands of the evangelists (see Jülicher, l.c., ii. 2 386 405 f.), that it is quite impossible to ascertain what the original utterance was in 12 35 ff.

If Mt. 22 41 ff. (Mk. 12 35 ff.) is genuine, it is either an academic question concerning the Scriptural basis for the current assumption that the coming Messiah is to be a descendant of David, or a serious Scriptural vindication by Jesus of his claims to be the Messiah although he is not of Davidic descent. His general method of teaching renders it exceedingly improbable that he should have engaged in such a discussion simply to confute Pharisaic exegesis without anything of practical importance depending on the decision; but if he really attached value to their accepting him as the Messiah without the demanded legitimisation, his reticence on the essential point whether he was the Messiah becomes wholly incomprehensible. It seems evident that this pericope is a defence of Jesus' Messiahship, made by his disciples against Jewish attacks upon it on the ground that he was not a son of David—a defence made at a time when no one had yet thought of constructing the pedigrees now found in Mt. and Lk., both of which are very late. The critical estimate of these passages has not been influenced by the discussion of the term 'Son of man,' and in almost all instances has been reached by scholars who believe on the basis of this title that Jesus regarded himself as the Messiah.

47. Value of the different theories.

Although at first sight the result of recent investigations may seem to be wholly negative and to render valueless the long labours that have been expended upon the term, a closer examination will show that each new theory has tended to bring to view some aspect of the truth, and that the hypothesis that appears to explain satisfactorily most of the facts yields the richest returns for our knowledge of the life and teaching of Jesus. When Jesus declared that man is lord of the sabbath and has the authority to pardon sin, he no doubt thought of man as he ought to be as a child of the heavenly father; and thus there was in his mind an element of that ideal humanity which Herder emphasised. That he did not look upon himself as the absolutely perfect man only enhances his moral greatness. Other genuine utterances suggest that humble sense of fellowship with man and acceptance of man's lot which Baur rightly felt. Those who explained the term as a Messianic title were right in so far as the Greek gospels are concerned. But a correct feeling also led many scholars to the opinion that Jesus cannot have through this term accepted as his own the current Messianic ideal. That it served to hide the secret of his Messiahship was also true; only it was not Jesus himself, but his disciples, who thus used it. Similarly, the term is likely to have suggested to early Christians a conception in which many heterogeneous elements were blended. The gradual elimination of the Fourth Gospel, the synoptic apocalypse, the manifestly secondary passages containing the phrase, as the literary character of the gospels became more truly appreciated, was of utmost importance. Only on the basis of such careful criticism could the resort to the vernacular be of any value.

While no process of criticism can restore the ipsissima verba of Jesus, an approximation may be possible. For the work of retranslation knowledge of the linguistic material is necessary, and also philological insight. The attempts to explain the use of the term in passages that are rejected have been of much value, since they are utterances of early Christians whose thought, intrinsically important, has exercised a paramount influence in the world. In their interpretation it is both legitimate and necessary to seek for light in the mythical and legendary lore of the epoch. The more marked the difference between the thoughts revealed in the Aramaic translations of the Greek sayings, the more difficult is it to explain them by the conceptions known to prevail among the Greek gospel-writers; the more original and valuable the obtained utterances, the stronger is also the presumption that they come from a great personality whose historical existence thereby becomes assured and whose tremendous influence can be appreciated. If he ceases to be what he so earnestly enjoined upon his disciples not to say that he was, a king to be ministered unto, he becomes more truly than ever what he would be, a son of man ministering to the sons of men.

48. Bibliography.

The most important literature before the nineteenth century is indicated in the works of Scholten, Appel, and A. Meyer. The term is discussed in every Life of Jesus, New Testament Theology, and Bible Dictionary. All important contributions in recent times have been referred to in the course of this article.

The mention of the father's name is unusual, although it may possibly have been inserted to distinguish him from Sosipater (Rom. 16 21), with whom, however, he should probably be identified. 2. One of the 'kinsmen' of Paul who unites with him in saluting the Christians of Rome, Rom. 16 21. He seems, therefore, to have been well known to them. In the Pseudo-Dorotheus he is a bishop of Iconium. He is probably to be identified with SOPATER [q.v.] of Berœa.

SOSTHENES (CωCΘΕΝΗC). 1. 'Ruler of the synagogue' (ἀρχισυνάγωγος, see SYNAGOGUE, § 9) at Corinth when Paul was in that city on his second journey, the first into Greece (Acts 18 17). After the failure of the Jews' concerted action against Paul before Gallio (see GALLIO, § 2)—in which, perhaps, Sosthenes had taken a leading part—we are told that 'all' (πάντες, so BℵA and others), or 'all the Greeks' (πάντες οἱ Ἕλληνες: so DdEHLPM, etc.), certainly not 'all the Jews' (πάντες Ἰουδαῖοι or πάντες οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, as some authorities have; see Ti., Blass, Hilgenfeld) laid hold on Sosthenes and beat him before the judgment-seat.

It is not necessary to suppose, as many do, that Sosthenes was the successor of Crispus, the 'ruler of the synagogue,' baptized by Paul at Corinth (Acts 18 8; see CRISPUS), nor yet to assume, with others, that Lk. is confusing the two persons. Both may concurrently have borne the title of 'ruler of the synagogue' (ἀρχισυνάγωγος), and have held the office denoted by it, just as cases in which there were more than one chief priest (ἀρχιερεύς) can be cited (cp ANNAS and CAIAPHAS). This Sosthenes has been identified by many since Theodoret, but without reason, with 'the brother' mentioned in 1 Cor. 1 1 (see no. 2).

2. Sosthenes 'the brother' appears in 1 Cor. 1 1 as having a share in the preparation of 1 Cor. To prove that the part he took was that of amanuensis merely, appeal is usually made to 1 Cor. 16 21; but those who argue thus overlook the fact that Tertius, who is supposed to have written the Epistle to the Romans, is not mentioned until the end of that epistle, and then expressly as the apostle's secretary (Τέρτιος ὁ γράψας τὴν ἐπιστολήν, Rom. 16 22). Moreover, no one has ever thought of taking 'Timothy the brother' in 2 Cor. 1 1 Col. 1 1 (cp Phil. 1 1), 'all the brethren which are with me [Paul]' in Gal. 1 2, 'Silvanus and Timotheus' in 1 Thess. 1 1 2 Thess. 1 1 as having been the apostle's secretaries in attendance. The simple fact is that the names belong to the form usually adopted for the Pauline epistle; one or more persons are mentioned besides the apostle as writing it, their function being that of attesting the truth set forth and defended by the apostle (2 Cor. 13, cp Dt. 19 15). From time to time we are reminded of their presence by the use of the plural (first person), but quite as often the apostle uses the singular. 'The brother' Sosthenes is otherwise unknown. He is enumerated among the seventy in Eusebius (HE i. 12 1) and elsewhere (see Lips. Apok. Ap.-gesch. 1 201 203, 3 413, E. 3. W. C. v. M.

SOSTRATUS (CωCΤΡΑΤΟC [A], COC. [V]; the name is also borne by a priest of Aphrodite in Paphos; cp Schürer, GVI 1 514 vv.), governor of the citadel in Jerusalem (ΕΠΑΡΧΟC ΤΗC ΑΚΡΟΠΟΛΕωC) temp. Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. 4 27 [28] 29). The post would, doubtless, be important (cp Benz. HA 47; JERUSALEM, § 27).

ἔπαρχος, used in 𝔊 for פֶּחָה (see GOVERNOR, 1), corresponds to the Roman præfectus. From it is borrowed the Nab. הפרכא, the precise nuance of which is not quite certain (CIS 2, nos. 173, 207, 214).

SOTAI (סֹוטַי, meaning? CωΤΑΙ [L]). The B'ne Sotai, a group or family (see SOLOMON'S SERVANTS) in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA ii., § 9); Ezra 2 55 (σωτει [B], σωται [A]) = Neh. 7 57 (σουτει [BA], -τιη [ℵ*vid.], -τιει [ℵc.a vid.]) = 1 Esd. 5 33 (σωται [L], EVom. after 𝔊BA).

SOUL (נֶפֶשׁ, ΨΥΧΗ; common to all the Sem. languages; but Ass. napištu generally means 'life,' more rarely 'soul'). Properly 'breath'; but this sense seems to have gone out in Hebrew. The usual sense is the soul or individual life (so very often, see, e.g., Ps. 66 9 Is. 53 12) as distinguished from the 'flesh' or 'body' (Dt. 12 23 Ps. 31 10). By a natural transition nép̄heš also means 'a living being,' especially in the phrase nép̄heš ḥayyāh (נֶפֶשׁ חַיָּה), lit. 'a living soul,' used of man in J (Gen. 2 7) and of animals in P (Gen. 1 20 24 30 9 12 15 f. all P; 2 19, redactional insertion in J); cp 1 Cor. 15 45. For further developments, see ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 12-19, and for the connection of 'soul' and 'heart' cp HEART.

None of the three passages cited in Ges.-Buhl for the sense 'breath' will stand examination, as has been shown by Briggs, 'The use of נפש in the OT' [a critical and exhaustive classification of passages], JBL 16 [1897] 17-30. These passages are:—(a) Prov. 27 9. Here Briggs gives népheš the sense of lēbāb, 'heart'; but it is better to read וּמֶתֶק עֵצָה מַרְפֵּא לְנָפֶשׁ, 'so the sweetness of counsel is healing to the soul' (Toy also ומחק עצה). (b) Job 41 13 where נפש, 'breath' (?), is ascribed to Leviathan. But Job is a late book; a reversion to an archaic sense is not probable here. So Briggs, who renders 'his passion, or fury, kindleth coals.' The parallel expressions, however, point to the reading נִשְׁמָתוֹ, 'his breath.' (c) Is. 3 20, בָּתֵּי הַנֶּפֶשׁ, RV 'perfume-boxes' (see PERFUME). Briggs proposes 'boxes of desire,' or 'smelling boxes.' Paul Haupt (SBOT, 'Isa.' [Heb.] 82) has suspected a connection with Ass. pašāšu, 'to anoint oneself.' This suggests בָּתֵּי נִפְשֶׁשֶׁת, 'boxes of ointment' (Ass. napšaštu, 'ointment'). But still better would perhaps be בָּתֵּי שֶׁמֶן (מ and פ confounded). T. K. C.

SPAIN (CΠΑΝΙΑ [AℵV Ti. WH], 1 Macc. 8 3 Rom. 15 24 28). Carthaginian Spain became Roman at the close of the Second Punic War (201 B.C.); but the Roman power was not fully consolidated over the entire Iberian peninsula until nearly two centuries later (by Marcus Agrippa the friend and minister of Augustus). There is no reason to suppose that the apostle Paul ever carried out the intention of visiting Spain expressed in Rom. $15_{24\ 28}$, and the evidence that the country was evangelised by the apostle James the Less (see JAMES, § 1) is too late and legendary to be of any value. Cp GEOGRAPHY, § 25 f.; TARSHISH, § 2.

SPAN (זֶרֶת; ϲπιθαμη). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. In Lam. 2_{20}, AV gives the pathetic phrase 'children of a span long' for עֹלֲלֵי טִפֻּחִים; RV, however, has 'the children that are dandled in the hands' (cp v. 22). Budde, 'Hätschel-kinder.'

SPARROW. The word ṣippōr, צִפּוֹר, of frequent occurrence in OT, is, with only two exceptions (Ps. 84_4[3] 102_8[7], ϲτρογθιον) rendered 'bird,' 'fowl' in EV. Nor does the exceptional translation 'sparrow' imply that any particular species was intended. The word probably meant any small Passerine bird, a group which is unusually abundant in Palestine. It is interesting to note that the common house-sparrow, Passer domesticus, is common in Palestine, but in a smaller and brighter variety; three other species of Passer are also enumerated. Canon Tristram identifies the sparrow of Ps. 102_7 as the Monticola cyanus or Blue Thrush, from its habit of sitting solitarily, or sometimes in pairs, on projecting ledges or some other conspicuous perch, uttering from time to time a plaintive and monotonous song. The 'sparrow' is not included in the list of unclean birds; and it seems probable that at any rate in NT times (Mt. $10_{29\ 31}$ Lk. 12_6, στρουθίον) they were eaten, as is commonly the case in Mediterranean countries to this day. See BIRD, FOWL, § 1. A. E. S.

SPARTA (ϲπαρτη [ℵV], -τια [A], 1 Macc. 14_{16}; SPARTANS, ϲπαρτιαται, 1 Macc. 12_2 f. 14_{20} f. 15_{23}; λακεδαιμονιοι, AV 'Lacedemonians,' RV '-dæm.,' 2 Macc. 5_9).

The greatness of Sparta was long past when she came into connection with the Jewish people. The final suppression of the liberties of Greece by the Romans was in part due to her obstinate refusal to enter the Achæan League (149 B.C.). On the destruction of Corinth and dissolution of that league, Sparta gained a favourable position so far as retaining her autonomy went, but a number of the Laconian towns dependent upon her were granted autonomy by the Romans (Strabo, 366; Livy, 34_{29}). Sparta at this period held the rank of a civitas fœderata et libera (Str. 365), being self-governing and not liable to tribute or to the jurisdiction of a Roman governor. Sparta and the Spartans are mentioned together in connection with a correspondence which passed between them and the Jews in the Maccabean period (1 Macc. 12_6). About 144 B.C. Jonathan, then leader of the Jews, wishing to make alliances to strengthen his position, sent Numenius and Antipater with letters to Rome, Sparta, and elsewhere (1 Macc. 12_1 ff., cp DISPERSION, § 13). In his letter to the Spartans he lays great stress on a former letter from their king Areus to the Jewish high priest Onias, and on the desirability of renewing the brotherhood which had then existed. The letter of Areus is quoted to the effect that it had been found in writing that the Spartans and Jews were of the same stock, that is to say, of Abraham, and that therefore their interests were identical (12_{20-23}). Shortly afterwards Jonathan died, and the tidings of his death caused great grief in Sparta (14_{16}), but on Simon's assuming the priesthood, the rulers (i.e., the Ephors) of the Spartans wrote to him wishing to renew the friendship which they had confirmed with Judas and Jonathan his brethren (14_{17} f.).

The name of the Spartan king is given as ARIUS.[1]

So RV, but AV AREUS (1 Macc. 12_{20}, αρης); which should also be read in v. 7 (with Vg. and Jos. [ἄρειος]) for AV DARIUS; and again in v. 19, for AV ONIARES (ονια[α]ρης [ℵV], -νειαρ. [A vid.]), which has arisen from the combination of ονειᾳ ('to Onias'), the last word in v. 19, with ἄρης (Arius), the first in v. 20.

Although there were two Spartan kings named Arius, there is little doubt that Arius I. (309-265 B.C.), the successor of Cleomenes, is the one here referred to, and that the high priest is Onias I.[1] It has been suggested with great probability that this letter was written in 302 B.C. when the Spartans may have wished to hinder Demetrius Poliorcetes, who was then warring with Cassander. That treaties may have existed between Semitic and other peoples at that time is shown by the league between the Athenians and the Sidonians before the time of Alexander the Great, to which reference is made in CIG, no. 87 (Schürer in Riehm's HWB 2_{1536a}).

The authenticity of the letters in 1 Macc. has been much disputed. The letter from Jonathan to the Spartans (1 Macc. 12_6 ff.) scarcely reads like a diplomatic document, and betrays the religious spirit of a later age; though it must be admitted that it is impossible to build too much upon the wording since the letters are translations of translations.

There is no reason, however, to doubt the fact of diplomatic relations with Sparta having been set on foot by Jonathan. For Sparta was too obscure at the time to have suggested itself to a forger eager to magnify his hero by inventions of the kind. Again the incident leads to no result in the sequel; the reverse would have tended to throw doubt upon the entire episode.

As given both by Josephus and the author of 1 Macc. the two letters of the Spartans seem fragmentary and wanting in definite suggestion. They have the air of diplomatic forgeries. Especially is it noticeable that whereas Jonathan describes the Spartan overtures as a declaration of 'confederacy and friendship' (1 Macc. 12_8) there is no such declaration in proper diplomatic terms in the appended document. Yet the ability to point to actual alliance in the past would have been the natural and most powerful recommendation of his proposals.

A point upon which too much stress has been laid is the relationship between the Spartans and Jews. Areus mentions that it was written down that they were 'brethren and of the stock of Abraham.' The unlucky JASON (q.v., 2) fled to the Lacedemonians (λακεδαιμόνιοι) for shelter because they were his 'near of kin' (διὰ τὴν συγγενίαν, 2 Macc. 5_9), and Herod made a favourite of a certain Spartan 'on account of his country' (Jos. BJ i. 26_1). There seems to be no good ground for regarding the 'Sparta' of these letters as a corruption of the Asiatic name Saparda (see SEPHARAD); and it is equally hazardous with Hitzig (Gesch. 347) to identify it with the Lycian town Patara. It is conceivable that the old historians connected the Pelasgians with the Spartans, and derived the former from Peleg the son of Eber; but the relationship insisted on finds a parallel in the case of the people of Pergamos, who, in making an alliance with the Jews, pointed back to similar relations between their ancestors and Abraham[2] (Jos. Ant. xiv. 10_{22}). The old historians and genealogists were ever ready to account for existing confederacies and alliances as resting on some ancient bond of kinship, and numerous analogies may be found amongst classical writers; cp GENEALOGIES i., § 3 [3], col. 1660.

1. Construction.

The spear was a favourite weapon of offence amongst ancient nations, as it has always been amongst other peoples at an early stage of development; it was easy to make and could be used with great effect. It varied chiefly in its size, weight, and length; this will be seen from the illustrations in Erman (Life in Anc. Eg.), Wilkinson (Anc. Eg.), and Maspero (Struggle of the Nations), though too much reliance must not be placed on the representations of spears in 'works of art' (cp the remarks of Cecil Torr, Ancient Ships, 8). It consisted, as a rule, of a wooden staff with a sharp head of flint or metal. It may be that the early Israelites, as a writer in Kitto (Bibl. Cyclop.) suggests, like other primitive peoples, made use of the horn of some animal, 'straightened in water, and sheathed upon a thorn-wood staff.' We know with what effect animals themselves use these horns (Darwin, The Descent of Man, 501 ff. [1890]). 'When sharpened this instrument would penetrate the hide of a bull, and, according to Strabo, even of an elephant; it was light, very difficult to break,' and 'resisted the blow of a battle-axe' (Kitto). Later, brass (see COPPER) or IRON (q.v.) was used. Layard (Nineveh and Babylon, 301 [1853]) found at Nimrūd the heads of spears, 'which being chiefly of iron fell to pieces almost as soon as exposed to the air.' In Gen. Louis Palma Di Cesnola's Cyprus (1877), plates xxxvi. and xl. (after p. 392), are given gems from Curium in the Phœnician (xxxvi.) and the Greek (xl.) style, on which warriors are represented armed with round shields (see SHIELD), and spears which look like sharp-pointed stakes; cp the long spears on the Sarcophagus from Golgoi (pl. x., opposite p. 110). On the other hand, on the silver patera found at Amathus (pl. xix., opposite p. 276) a regular spear-head seems to be represented.

2. The ḥănīth.

Layard (Nineveh and its Remains, 2 343) says, 'the spear of the Assyrian footman was short, scarcely exceeding the height of a man; that of the horseman appears to have been considerably longer. . . . The shaft was probably of some strong wood, and did not consist of a reed, like that of the modern Arab lance.' It would seem to have been a stout weapon, since warriors used it to force stones out of the wall of a besieged city (see p. 372). The Egyptian soldiers of the eighteenth Theban dynasty carried 'pikes about 5 ft. long, with broad bronze or copper points' (Maspero, Struggle, 213); the spear was not so common. The Assyrian pikemen of a later date were armed with equally heavy weapons (ibid., 627 f.). The Hebrew ḥănīth (חנית) seems to have been a large weapon. It was used by great warriors (2 S. 2 23, etc.); and it is the weapon put into the hands of 'giants' (2 S. 23 21, etc.). Goliath is said to have carried a spear 'like a weaver's beam (1 S. 17 7), its head weighing 600 shekels' (for the idea of 'giants' see ANAKIM). Saul is said to have hurled his ḥănīth at David (1 S. 19 9 f.). From such indications in the OT we may suppose that the ḥănīth had some resemblance to the Egyptian and the Assyrian pike.

3. The rômaḥ.

A lighter, and no doubt much older, weapon of the kind was also in use among the Egyptians and the Assyrians, and is still found among the Bedouins and other primitive peoples. This is called in Arabic rumḥ, and we can hardly be wrong in identifying it with the Hebrew rômaḥ (רֹמַח, see Nu. 25 7, etc.; cp Doughty, Ar. Des. 1 221 228; Merrill, East of the Jordan, 482), which, however, was no doubt often shorter. 'The beam, made of a light reed of the rivers of Mesopotamia, is nearly two of their short horse-lengths; they charge them above their heads' (Doughty, 1 334). The Arab keeps this spear continually at his side. When he prepares to encamp the sheikh strikes his spear in the ground. When the camp is broken up 'the spear is the last thing taken from the ground' (Warburton, The Crescent and the Cross, chap. 25). For other spear-like weapons ('dart,' etc.) see WEAPONS, § 2. Cp SIEGE, WAR. M. A. C.

SPELT is the RV rendering of kussĕmeth, כֻּסֶּמֶת (Ex. 9 32 Is. 28 25 Ezek. 4 9†), for which AV has twice 'rie' and once 'fitches.' See FITCHES.

[It is possible that כֻּסֶּמֶת, 'spelt,' occurs also in 1 S. 2 36, where it is said that destitute priests will sue to be put into a priest's office לַאֲגוֹרַת כֶּסֶף וְכִכַּר לָחֶם, i.e., according to tradition, 'for a piece of silver and a loaf of bread.' But the rendering 'piece' presupposes a connection of אג׳ and גֵּרָה, gērāh (see WEIGHTS), which is purely arbitrary. Following Del. Prol. 149, BDB and Ges.-Bu. take אג׳ to be an abstract noun, meaning 'payment,' cp Ass. agāru, 'to hire.' But this root does not appear to be known in Hebrew, nor is an abstract noun probable in this passage. Probably the text is corrupt, and we should read לְעֹמֶר כֻּסֶּמֶת, 'for an omer of spelt.' 𝔊B is without the following words וככר לחם[1]; possibly these were added after the corruption of לעמר כסמת, on account of the concluding mention of 'a morsel of bread.' For a bolder expedient see Crit. Bib.—T. K. C.]

SPICE (i.e., Lat. species, OFrench espice, hence épice; cp זַן, 2 Ch. 16 14, all species [of spices]: Vg. unguentis meretriciis [זונה]), though now specifically employed to denote 'a class of aromatic vegetable condiments used for the seasoning of food, commonly in a pulverised state,' was, in the seventeenth century, applicable to a much wider variety of 'species'; in AV it happens to be applied (unless, perhaps in Cant. 8 2, where 'spiced' wine is alluded to)[2] never to condiments but only to aromatic odours. It represents :—

1. bĕšem, בֶּשֶׂם (Ex. 30 23†), or bôśem, בֹּשֶׂם (often), plur. בְּשָׂמִים, 2 Ch. 16 14, etc. That this word must sometimes at least have a general sense is shown by the expressions קִנְּמָן־בֶּשֶׂם (Ex. 30 23; see CINNAMON), קְנֵה־בֹשֶׂם (ib., see CALAMUS) and רֹאשׁ כָּל־בֹּשֶׂם (Ezek. 27 22). On the specific sense, see BALSAM.

2. sammīm, סַמִּים (Ex. 30 34: EV SWEET SPICES; Ex. 25 6 30 7 31 11 35 8 15 28 39 38 40 27 [only AV] Lev. 4 7 16 12 Nu. 4 16 2 Ch. 2 4 [3] [only AV] 13 11; EV SWEET INCENSE) or ḳĕṭōreth sammīm, קְטֹרֶת סַמִּים (Ex. 37 29†; EV INCENSE OF SWEET SPICES and RV in 40 27 2 Ch. 2 4 [3]).

The word sammīm is a general expression for fragrant material in the form of powder, akin to Ar. šamma, 'to smell,' as well as samm, simm, or summ, 'poison,' and to Aram. sammā, 'a medicament.' The exact history of this group of words is obscure, but probably the oldest form of root is represented by Ar. šamma = Aram. sam; and Ar. samm and Heb. סמים may both be loan words from Aramaic (cp Fränkel, 262). On the other hand, the oldest meaning is perhaps that of the Hebrew word and of Ar. šamm, viz., 'fragrance'; the notions of poison (in Syr. sammā dhĕ-mawtā) and of medical efficacy may well be derived from this. In post-biblical Hebrew, and sometimes in Syr., the word was used with a further extension of meaning—viz., for colouring matter.

The use of the word in OT is, as a general term, for the sacred incense compounded of stacte, onycha, galbanum (galbanum of sammīm), and frankincense (see INCENSE).

3. nĕkō'th, נְכֹאת (Gen. 37 25; EV Spicery; RVmg.

SPIDER. 1. śĕmāmīth, שְׂמָמִית ; Prov. 30$_{28}$† ; RV LIZARD [q.v., 7].

2. ʿakkābīš, עַכָּבִישׁ (ἀράχνη, aranea). Under this name the spider is mentioned in MT only twice—viz., in Is. 59$_{5}$, where the devices of the wicked are likened to a spider's web, and in Job 8$_{14}$, where the confidence of the godless is compared to a 'spider's house.' There are several other passages, however, in which, through an easy textual error, the spider has been supplanted by the moth. Thus in Job 4$_{19}$, 'which are crushed before the moth' (לִפְנֵי עָשׁ) should rather be 'which are crushed even as the spider'[1] (לְפִי עַכָּבִישׁ) ; Mohammed, too, compares idolaters to spiders (Koran, Sur. 29$_{40}$). In Hos. 8$_{6}$ the 'calf of Samaria' is also probably compared to a spider's web,[2] and in Ps. 39$_{12}$ [$_{11}$] 90$_{9}$ (𝔊 ὡς ἀράχνη[ν] in both passages) the same figure seems to be employed to symbolise the frailty of human life, according to probable emendations of these two corrupt passages.[3] Textual criticism also reinstates the spider in a fine description of the fate of the wicked (see MOTH), where 'moth' should probably be 'spider' (Job 27$_{18}$ ‖ 8$_{14}$; but in 𝔊 of 27$_{18}$ ἀράχνη seems to stand for סֻכָּה). Not improbably, too, 'the poison of asps' in Ps. 140$_{3}$ should rather be 'the poison of spiders' (so Grätz, Merx, after Tg.). In Is. 59$_{5}$ 'spiders' and 'vipers' are parallel, with an allusion to a belief in their poisonousness. See ASP. 𝔊, according to Grabe, followed by H and P read 'spider' (ἀράχνη, but the text [BAQ] has ταραχή) in Hos. 5$_{12}$, where MT has 'moth.' T. K. C.

Cp תור, 'spy out,' Nu. 13$_{2}$ $_{16}$ f. etc., and יְתוּר, 'range [of spying?]' Job 39$_{8}$. The equation רגל=רכל (1 above) finds an analogy in the use of תָּרִים as 'merchants,' 1 K. 10$_{15}$ (but see MERCHANT, SOLOMON, § 7).

The practice of obtaining information by means of spies as a preliminary to warlike movements was well-known to the Hebrews. Two notable cases are the mission of twelve (?) spies by Moses to explore the region which the Israelites were about to invade, and the mission of two spies by Joshua 'to view the land, namely, Jericho' (see JERICHO, § 3). It is the former episode which concerns us here. Our chief traditional authority for it is in Nu. 13 f. (JEP), but it is also related in an allusive way in Dt. 1$_{22}$ ff., where the writer is presumably dependent throughout on the narrative of JE ; there is at any rate no evidence that he made use of P. It may be convenient to lay before the reader the variations between the accounts which the redactor has welded together, as well as he could, in Nu. 13 f. ; it will not only show the reader the state of the traditional evidence for the mission of the spies but will illustrate the section on Nu. 13 f. in NUMBERS [BOOK], § 3 ; cp also Driver, Intr.(6) 63.

	P		JE
13 3,	start from wilderness of Paran (P).	13 26,	start from Kadesh (redactional, but from JE).
21,	they explore the land from the wilderness of Zin to Rehob, to the district of Hamath (P).	22 f.	they go as far as Hebron (J), or the valley of Eshcol (E).
32,	they describe the land as one that 'devours its inhabitants' (P).	27 f.	'the land is very fruitful, but the inhabitants can well defend themselves' (J).
14 6,	Joshua and Caleb oppose the mutinous Israelites (P).	30,	Caleb stills the murmurers (J).
38,	Joshua and Caleb (v. 30, Caleb and Joshua) are excepted from the general doom (P).	14 24,	Caleb may enter the land (J).

It is usual to give the preference to the statements of J and E (an analysis of JE cannot remain unattempted, even though [cp NUMBERS, § 3] the result may be incomplete). It was from Kadesh, then, that Moses sent spies into Canaan (cp 32$_{8}$ R_{D} ; cp NUMBERS, § 8), one from each tribe, and the region to be explored was the Negeb and the mountain-district (i.e., as most understand, that of Judah). The spies did in fact reach Hebron (in the 'hill-country' of Judah, Josh. 20$_{7}$ 21$_{11}$), where they found Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai. On their return, they gave a very favourable report of the land, and supported this by a huge cluster of grapes from Eshcol ; but a further statement respecting the Nephilim, the sons of Anak, who dwelt at Hebron, made the people despond, and even venture to express a wish to choose another leader and go back to מצרים. Caleb alone is excepted from the doom which Yahwè fails not to pronounce on the rebellious people. The punishment of the guilty is thus expressed in Nu. 14$_{33}$ (assigned to J by Dillm.).[1] 'Your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, will I bring in . . . But as for you, your carcases shall fall in this wilderness. And your children shall be shepherds במדבר ארבעים שנה, and shall bear (the consequences of) your infidelity, until your carcases be consumed in the wilderness.'

Looking at the differences tabulated above we shall see that the first is quite unimportant, since the wilderness of Paran in the wider sense may have contained Kadesh-barnea (see PARAN). The third is of some interest, because (Wellh. Prol.(3) 370) Nu. 13$_{32}$ (P) may reflect the melancholy feelings of post-exilic Jews, who could only by faith describe their country as a delectable land (ארץ חמדה, Ps. 106$_{24}$). The fourth and fifth are important because they show that one at least of the early narratives did not include Joshua among the spies. According to E. Meyer (who allows very little of the material in chap. 13 f. to J), the earliest narrative stated that Caleb (possibly with other spies) was sent into the Negeb—to Hebron, and said on his return that the people was strong and the cities fortified, Amalek dwelling in the Negeb, etc., and that giants too were to be seen there. The despondency of the Israelites disappears, and with it the divine sentence of forty years' wanderings. According to Meyer the object of the story of the spies was simply to account for the settling of Caleb in Hebron. 'Caleb of course receives Hebron because he acted as spy, not because he remained stedfast.' E, however, looks at things with a 'theological' interest, and alters the story for edification, while P calculates from Josh. 24$_{29}$ that Joshua too

[2] כי שבבים should be קורי עכביש (Ruben, Critical Remarks, on Hos, l.c.) ; cp Vg. in aranearum telas.

[3] See Che. Psalms,(2) and cp LOCUST, OWL.

[1] Both Dillm. and We. deny that v. 33 belongs to P, and hold that the 'forty years' (ארבעים שנה) are a fixed point in tradition. We., however, assigns 14$_{30-34}$ to a special source, distinct from JE.

must have been born in Egypt, and therefore includes him among the spies, and makes him, like Caleb, faithful among the faithless ('Kritik der Berichte,' etc., ZATW 1 139 ff. [1881]).

One of the most doubtful points in Meyer's theory is the definition of the object of the story. Was Caleb really the only spy, and the only clan-leader who had land assigned to him in the Negeb? It is also by no means certain that the threat of the forty years' wandering formed part of the original tradition. It is suggested elsewhere (MOSES, § 11, end) that in Nu. 14 33 (as well as in other passages) במדבר ארבעים שנה is most probably due partly to corruption, partly to editorial manipulation, and that the original text had simply במדבר ערבים 'in the desert of the Arabians.'

Possibly, too, in Nu. 13 25 (P) the statement that the spies returned מקץ ארבעים יום arose through a misreading of מכוש ערבים ('from the Arabian Cush');[1] and it is in the highest degree probable that מצרים in Nu. 13 22 14 2-4 should be read Miṣrim, i.e. the N. Arabian Muṣri (see MIZRAIM, § 2 b).

Nor are these the only names which have to be scrutinised. Important as it is to put a rational sense on the traditional stories in their later form, it can hardly be less urgent to find out how the stories originally ran, and what they originally meant. It has been pointed out elsewhere (NEGEB, § 7) that it is the Negeb and the Negeb alone that is referred to as the region explored by the spies. חברון (Hebron) has arisen out of רחבות[2] (Rehoboth), and the mountain-district in 13 17 is 'mount Jerahmeel.'[3] In v. 28 ענק should probably be עמלק, and we thus see that v. 29[4] is partly a gloss on בני עמלק (so read) in v. 28 (see NEPHILIM, § 3, i.).

The second apparent difference in the above table still remains. Did the spies, according to P, or at least P's authority, really survey 'the whole land throughout its entire length from the wilderness of Zin (cp Nu. 21 1 33 36) to Rehob' (either the place of that name in the territory of Asher, Josh. 19 28, or Beth-rehob, near the town of Dan, Judg. 18 28[5])? This no doubt is the general view. Another theory, however, is much more probable. If not P himself, yet almost certainly P's authority, meant, not any northern Rehob, but Rehob or Rehoboth in the Negeb, while חמת (Hamath) is in many OT passages most probably a southern Hamath, or more strictly a southern Maacath (see MAACAH, end). This accords with the view (see above) that in Nu. 13 25 the original text had, 'And they returned from spying out the land, from Cush of Arabia.'

Thus the difference between JE and P in the story of the spies is much less serious than has been supposed. The only important variation is the combination of Caleb with Joshua—himself perhaps originally a Jerahmeelite hero (cp JOSHUA).

We have no space here to consider the names of the spies according to P (Nu. 13 4-15). It is quite possible that all, or nearly all, the names are characteristically Negeb names. But this is unimportant compared with the right comprehension of the rest of the composite narrative. Let it be added, however, that דרך האתרים (Nu. 21 1) is not (as even Knobel supposed) for דרך הַתָּרִים (AV 'by the way of the spies') but is probably a corruption of דרך הרמתים (cp Ramathaim-zophim), unless we prefer to trace it to עיר התמרים (KADESH, 1, § 3). In either case, the name appears to be an early popular corruption of ירחמאל.

Winckler's theory (GI 2 40 f.) is ingenious, but cannot here be discussed. T. K. C.

[2] Note that Ahiman represents Jerahmeel; Sheshai comes from Cushi (cp note 1); for Ṭalmai compare Ṭelem and Talmon (which can be shown to be Negeb names). 'Zoan in Egypt' should be 'Zoan (or Zoar?) in Miṣrim.'

[3] As Dillm. points out, 'go up into the Negeb' probably comes from J, and 'go up into the mountains' from E. But if so, is it not natural to take נגב and ההר as practically synonymous?

Denk.* 82). The Aramaic and Arabic names šebelthā and sunbul (more fully sunbul hindī, 'Indian spike'), like our own 'spikenard,' have reference to the 'spike'-like appearance of the plant from which the perfume is derived. Accounts of the true or Indian nard, as well as of inferior sorts, are given by Theophrastus (De Odor. 42 ff.), Dioscorides (1 75), and Pliny (HN 12 26 f. 13 2). Its botanical source in India was investigated by Sir W. Jones (As. Res. 2 405-417),[3] and was ascertained independently by Wallich and Royle to be the plant called Nardostachys Jatamansi DC, of the order Valerianaceæ. The drug consists of the rhizome surmounted by the fibrous remains of the leaves. It occurs throughout the alpine Himalaya from Kumaon to Sikkim.

The meaning of the adjective πιστική (Mk. 14 3 Jn. 12 3† is very uncertain. Five explanations have been offered: (1) that it means 'liquid,' from πίνω; (2) that it means 'genuine,' from πίστις; (3) that it means 'powdered,' from πτίσσειν; (4) that it is a local name; (5) that it = πιστάκης; (6) that it = Lat. spicita. There is difficulty in accepting any of these explanations; and it is possible that the word may have quite another origin, as Dymock (Pharmacogr. Ind. 2 233) gives Pisitá as a Sanskrit name for the spikenard plant (cp W. Houghton, PSBA, 1888, 3 144-6. N. M.—W. T. T.-D.

ii. 1. In Æschyl. Prom. 481 (Lob. ῥημ. 131) πιστός means 'drinkable' (so K. F. A. Fritzsche on Mark, following Casaubon), but the word is only so used for the sake of a pun; otherwise ποτός and πόσιμος, but never πιστικός. It is true that πίστρα (-ον), πιστήρ are found from the same stem πι-, and that according to Athenæus (689 c) and others, oil of nard, mixed with wine, was, as a matter of fact, taken as a beverage; but in Mk. and Jn. the nard is used as ointment, so that, if πιστικός is only added with the meaning 'liquid,' the explanation would be superfluous.

Naber (as above) points out, on the other hand, that Clem. Alex. (Pæd. 2 8, § 64, p. 207 ed. Potter) distinguishes between μύρα ὑγρά and μύρα ξηρά, and Basil (Hom. in Ps. 44 9, ed. Garnier, 1 166 l, also in Stephanus, sub στακτός, 7 650 f.) between two preparations of ointment, the one fluid (ῥυτόν) called στακτή (= 'dropped,' stillata, stillatitia), and the other thicker or more viscous (παχύτερον), called σμύρνα. The expression in Athenæus also (2 25, p. 46 A: ἐκκλίνειν δεῖ τὰ πάχη τῶν μύρων), he thinks, has reference to this. Naber therefore conjectures that there stood originally in Mk. and Jn. a word (of which no traces can be met elsewhere) σπειστικός (= 'capable of being poured,' 'liquid,' from σπένδω). By itacism it could also have been written σπιστικός, in which form its strangeness made it unintelligible, and thus it finally became corrupted into πιστικός.

[1] Vg. has nardi spicati in Mk. and nardi pistici (so usually Ital.) in Jn.

[2] Meissner has pointed out a Babylonian plant-name larder. This, according to Hommel (PSBA 21 136 [1899]), the Babylonians borrowed from an Iranian form nard (neo-Pers. lāl); the Indians have for nard the later form naṭa and nala(da).

[3] 'A Bráhman of eminent learning gave me a parcel of the same sort, and told me that it was used in their sacrifices; that, when fresh, it was exquisitely sweet, and added much to the scent of rich essences, in which it was a principal ingredient; that the merchants brought it from the mountainous country to the NE. of Bengal; that it was the entire plant, not a part of it, and received its Sanscrit names from its resemblance to locks of hair; as it is called Spikenard, I suppose, from its resemblance to a spike, when it is dried, and not from the configuration of its flowers, which the Greeks, probably, never examined. The Persian author describes the whole plant as resembling the tail of an ermine; and the Jatámánsi, which is manifestly the Spikenard of our druggists, has precisely that form, consisting of withered stalks and ribs of leaves, cohering in a bundle of yellowish brown capillary fibres, and constituting a spike about the size of a small finger' (op. cit., 409 f.).

2. The adjective πιστικός occurs with the meaning 'convincing' and also 'having the power of persuading' (Plato, Gorg. 455 A; Diog. Laert. 4 37; Dion. Hal., ed. Reiske, 5 631; Theophrast. in Aristot. opera metaph., ed. Sylburg 253, ed. Brandis, 309), though in almost every instance of its occurrence the variant πειστικός is preferred (Bekker and Stallbaum on Plato; Lob. on Soph. Aj. 151); in later times it means, when used of persons, 'faithful,' 'reliable' (Lücke on Jn. 12 3, Index to Cedrenus). If, therefore, we adopt the translation 'genuine' (Meyer on Mk.)—and such a meaning is conceivable—we must suppose that the word is used rather freely, just as in commercial language, for instance, attributes which more often apply only to persons are not infrequently used of goods. Pliny (HN xii. 26, § 43) mentions that in commerce nard was apt to be adulterated by admixture of pseudonardus, a plant resembling it.

3. Lob., par. 31, supports Scaliger's derivation from πτίσσειν, 'to pound' (K. F. A. Fritzsche on Mk. 595), τ after π being sometimes dropped out for the sake of euphony (cp e.g., π(τ)έρνιξ, and Lat. pi(n)so = πτίσσω, perna = πτέρνη). But how, it may be asked, could powdered nard be suitable for anointing?

4. If it is a local name it has been suggested that it stands either for Ὀπιστικός (from Opis not far from Babylon) or for Ψιττακικός (from Psittake on the Tigris). Still more likely would be Πίστα, an abbreviation—according to the Scholion on Æschyl. Pers. 2—of a Persian town Πίστειρα; but we cannot be sure that this notice (which according to Stephanus refers to a Thracian town) is trustworthy.

5. E. N. Bennett (Class. Rev., 1890, p. 319) sees in the word an allusion to the Pistacia Terebinthus, the resin of which, together with other sweet scents (e.g., βάλσαμον, cp BALM, INCENSE), was mixed with the oil of nard. Dioscorides says (Mat. Med. 1 91) of the πιστάκη; γεννᾶται δὲ καὶ ἐν Ἰουδαίᾳ καὶ Συρίᾳ καὶ ἐν Κύπρῳ, its resin is εὐώδης, προέχει δὲ πασῶν τῶν ῥητινῶν (he describes nard in 1 6 f.). Bennett, therefore, thinks that νάρδος πιστάκης is intended. According to Hdn. ii. 428 24, and Stephanus, τὰ ψιττάκια would be another form of τὰ πιστάκια, the fruit of the πιστάκη, which Hdn. (i. 315 16) derives from the town Ψιττάκη.

6. Nestle (ZNTW, 1902, pp. 169-171) explains πιστικός from the Latin name nardus spicata: the participle spicatus could become in vulgar Latin spicitus, just as probatus became probitus and vocatus vocitus (Rönsch, Itala u. Vulgata, p. 296, cp 283 [1869, (2) 1875], and, more fully, Collectanea philologica, 221-223 [1891] = ZWT, 1877, pp. 409-412); next spicitus was transformed into πιστικός. The supposition however is not easy; for as late as the second half of the second Christian century we find Galen taking the word over into Greek in the form σπίκατα.

The 'nardus spicata' of (Ital. and) Vg. is intelligible when we remember that the nard-plant—which indeed is called ναρδόσταχυς, spica nardi—resembled in shape an ear of corn.

SPIRIT (רוּחַ, rūăḥ, fem. about seventy-three, masc. about thirty-two times: in 𝔊 ΠΝΕΥΜΑ, ΑΝΕΜΟϹ, ΠΝΟΗ, ϹΤΟΜΑ, ΛΟΓΟϹ, ΦΘΕΓΜΑ, ΨΥΧΗ, ΚΑΡΔΙΑ, ΘΥΜΟϹ, ΝΟΥϹ, ΟΡΓΗ, ΟΔΥΝΗ, ΦΡΟΝΗϹΙϹ, ΒΟΗΘΕΙΑ, ΦΩϹ, ΜΕΡΟϹ), originally 'wind,' and so the point of the compass from which the wind blows. In poetry, which no doubt represents ancient usage, the storm wind is the breath of Yahwè's mouth or nostrils (e.g., Ex. 15 8 10 Ps. 18 16 [15]), and since the commotion of nature is a sign of his displeasure, the rūăḥ of Yahwè becomes synonymous with his wrath (Is. 4 4 59 19 Zech. 6 8 Job 4 9 15 30). The rūăḥ or spirit of a man is his disposition, his mental state; he may be 'depressed in spirit,' 'of a proud spirit,' 'of a patient spirit' (Prov. 16 18 f. Eccles. 7 8). It is natural to compare the wind, invisible itself but visible in its effects, with the mental disposition displaying itself in mien and action. Just in the same way Aeschylus, describing the changed mind of Agamemnon says that he 'blew an impious veering gale of mind' (φρενὸς πνέων δυσσεβῆ τροπαίαν, Ag. 217).

1. Meaning.

In a very early passage, Gen. 6 3, rūăḥ denotes the divine substance or nature, not necessarily immaterial, but far removed from the weakness of mortal flesh. By intermarriage of the 'sons of God' or angels with women, a portion of this divine spirit has passed to their descendants, and therefore Yahwè declares, 'My spirit shall not continue (?) for ever in man, since he is only flesh,' and shortens the span of human life to 120 years.[1] But though the spirit or invisible power of God was not proper to man, it descended upon the heroes of Israel and endowed them with superhuman energy. It fell on Othniel (Judg. 3 10); on Jephthah (11 29); on Samson (14 6 19 15 14). The phenomenon has no ethical import. Samson shows that the spirit of Yahwè has descended on him by rending a lion as if it were a kid. Similarly the divine spirit produces prophetic frenzy (1 S. 10 6 10 19 20 23), such, e.g., that Saul strips off his clothes and lies a day and a night naked. The spirit might transport a prophet miraculously (2 K. 2 16). Sometimes Yahwè sent a lying spirit on his prophets (1 K. 22 22) or the spirit of strife into a city (Judg. 9 23), or a spirit of melancholy madness (1 S. 16 14, etc.).

Far higher is the use of rūăḥ in the literary prophets. To Isaiah, Yahwè (Is. 31 3) is 'spirit' because he is the spiritual principle in the history of the world and as such invisible. Moreover, the spirit of prophecy is an abiding gift. To ignore the prophet's counsel is to set at nought God's spirit which speaks through him (Is. 30 1). In the same sense Hosea had spoken (9 7) of the prophet as 'a man of the spirit.' But before Ezekiel references to 'the spirit' as in the prophets only occur in Is. 30 1 Hos. 9 7 and perhaps Mic. 3 8. A prophet so deeply spiritual as Jeremiah avoids the term 'spirit' altogether; it had been associated too long with frenzy and marvel.

2. Later nuances.

The following are the chief points in the exilic and post-exilic conception of spirit. It is an official charisma, speaking, e.g., habitually in David (2 S. 23 2) and fitting the Messiah for the discharge of his duties (Is. 11 2), conferring wisdom on judges and martial vigour on warriors (Is. 28 6). It is characteristic of P that he attributes it only to Joshua, who receives it in increased measure by the imposition of Moses' hands (Nu. 27 18 f. Dt. 34 9). It is to dwell in the midst of the people as a 'new spirit' (Ezek. 36 26 8 f.), and to be poured out from on high on land and people (Is. 32 15). The fulfilment of this promise is assumed in Ps. 51 11 [13] 143 10; cp Neh. 9 20. Twice[1] it is called the holy spirit, Ps. 51 11 [13] and Is. 63 10, in which latter passage it is personified (cp Eph. 4 30), and twice 'the good spirit' (Neh. 9 20 Ps. 143 10). It is a cosmic power, producing order (Gen. 1 2) and fertility (Is. 32 15). It is the principle of all-pervading energy (Is. 34 16) and omnipresence (Ps. 139 7). It is the νοῦς or intelligence of Yahwè (Is. 40 13), not as in earlier writers his essence. Finally, in a very late passage, it is the breath of life which God imparts, and which at death returns to him (Eccles. 12 7; cp Job 27 3 33 4 34 14 f. Ps. 104 29 f.). Cp FLESH. W. E. A.

3. Contrasted with σάρξ.

In discussing the NT use of πνεῦμα, the question is complicated by the employment of other words, especially of psyche, ψυχή, soul, to denote the interior part of man, whereas σάρξ, flesh, is the single word to denote the material part. As a general thing both words are used with reference to the contrast between the spiritual and the material part, and both words are ennobled by this contrast. When Jesus speaks of the value of the soul (ψυχή: Mt. 16 26), and contrasts it with the comparative unimportance of the body (Mt. 10 28), and Paul advises the delivering over of the flesh to destruction, in order that the spirit (πνεῦμα) may be saved (1 Cor. 5 5), they are both evidently using different words for the same thing. And apart from the Pauline epistles and two passages in the epistles of James and Jude respectively (Ja. 3 15 Jude 19), these words are used in the same way to express the contrast between the spiritual part of man and material things, but are not contrasted with each other. But Paul found it necessary to express this contrast not only in terms of the spiritual and the material, but also of the spiritual and the natural (1 Cor. 2 14), and for this purpose he uses the elsewhere synonymous words, pneuma and psyche.

The psyche is the vital or spiritual part of the natural

[1] On this passage cp NEPHILIM, § 1.

SPIRIT

man, and the pneuma is the new part brought into activity when the supernatural man begins his career with the entrance of the divine pneuma. Paul does not state this expressly; but it appears from his introduction of the human co-incidently with the divine pneuma (cp Rom. 8 10 16 with the rest of the passage 1-27. And see 1 Cor. 6 17 19, cp 14-17 with rest of passage). It is evident from the passage in 1 Cor. that pneuma is not to be identified with nous, the intelligence, in Rom. 7 23, where it is used interchangeably with the 'inner man,' which rebels against the sin of the outer man. That faculty, the spirit, is the organ evidently of the Holy Spirit, and does not appear in the apostle's account of the situation until the entrance of the Holy Spirit which removes the disability discussed in our passage, Rom. 8 1-9, cp v. 10 16. The faculty which ineffectually rebels against sin in the natural man is the mind. It is very much as if the apostle had said that when he sinned even in the natural man, he knew better, and his intelligence rebelled against it, but ineffectually, because the very organs of action were the seat of sin. But the inner man after the coming of the Spirit is spirit, which is freed from the bondage of the flesh.

4. Pauline usage.

We must not think, however, of the human spirit as the essential factor in the new man according to Paul. The essential factor is the Divine Spirit, who effects deliverance for the man not by creating or awakening a new faculty in him, but by coming himself to dwell in him. That is the reason why it is the Holy Spirit, not the human spirit, that is constantly brought into contrast with the flesh in Paul. This has led to the statement that the apostle does not speak of a human spirit. But the use, while infrequent, is sufficiently distinct. The human spirit is evidently the part in which, and upon which, the Holy Spirit works, and through which it controls the man, but which has no office except in connection with the Divine Spirit. Without the Divine Spirit it is like ears in a soundless world. The real agent in substituting holiness instead of sin in man is God, not man. What is this Divine Spirit? The answer is not always the same. In the earlier Jewish literature, it is an emanation from the One God through which he performs various offices—e.g., creation—but especially that of inspiring in man the knowledge and skill needed for his work. In general we may say, that whenever God is represented as a diffused presence, he is represented as working through the spirit. And in no pre-Pauline writings is there any indication that the impersonal use is departed from. But in Paul, and Jn. especially, there is the beginning of the later doctrine of the Spirit as a distinct entity, quasi-personal, in God. He is to God what the spirit is in man (1 Cor. 2 10 f.); but in God this is objectified, represented as a distinct personality (Rom. 8 27 Gal. 3 5 Jn. 14 26 16 13).

5. The Divine Spirit.

There is a distinct difference, however, between the Pauline and the Johannine theology in the doctrine of the Spirit. In both, he is the principle of immanence in God, the one through whom God dwells in men, conveying to them the truth, not in the external way by which men communicate with each other, and which has no power of enforcement or persuasion sufficient to beget in men the spirit of holiness, but internally and with regenerative power. And in both especially he conveys to men the grace of which Christ is the author. But in Paul, he is the principle not only of immanence, but of incarnation. In Jn. it is the Logos, the Word of God, who is incarnate in Christ. The thought is borrowed from the Alexandrian philosophy, which represents God as creating various natural products out of the ideas of the same in his mind. These ideas are endowed with life and creative power, so that God creates not only out of them, but through them. Besides these individual ideas, there is the collective idea of the universe as a whole, the Logos, or Word, which is also vested with a life and quasi-personality of its own. The incarnation of this in the Son of God is thus only the final form of the incarnation which is the generative idea of the Logos. The Spirit, on the other hand, is in Jn. the principle of immanence. If we go back to the philosophy from which the Logos idea is derived, the Logos is the thought of God, distinctly a principle of incarnation. But the Pneuma is the Spirit in which the thought is generated, and this is as obviously a principle of immanence. All this is distinctly different from Paul's thought. He has no Logos doctrine, which is a thought derived from Alexandrianism, and Paul is not an Alexandrian. He declares himself a zealous Pharisee, and opposed to any attempt to translate religion into the terms of philosophy (Gal. 1 14 1 Cor. 1 17-31). But Pharisaism and Alexandrianism are at opposite poles of thought, and Alexandrianism is an attempt to philosophise religion. And yet Paul teaches the pre-existence of Jesus and his sharing in the work of creation (Phil. 2 5-11 1 Cor. 8 6). What then is the principle of incarnation in Christ? It cannot be God himself, as Paul distinguishes between God and the Lord Jesus Christ. On the other hand, whilst there is only one passage which has the appearance of distinguishing Christ from the Spirit (2 Cor. 13 14), there are many passages which seem to identify them. In the first place, the indwelling of Christ, his mystical union with the believer, is exchanged frequently for an indwelling of the Spirit. Then the Spirit is called the Spirit of Christ, and Jesus' divine Sonship is attributed to the Holy Spirit. He is the Son of God on that side of his being, as he is Son of David on the side of the flesh (Rom. 1 3 f.). And finally it is distinctly said that the Lord is the Spirit (2 Cor. 3 17 f.).

6. Pauline and Johannine usage contrasted.

Now, it is not as if this was unexpected. If Jesus was in any way pre-existent, and that pre-existence antedated creation, and he had a share in creation, then he is in some way an incarnation of the Divine. And in the Jewish theology the only Divine principle remaining, after eliminating God himself as expressly excluded, and the Alexandrian Logos as ruled out by Paul's opposition to Alexandrianism, is the Spirit of God. In Paul, therefore, the incarnation is of the Holy Spirit. E. P. G.

1. Definition.

'Spiritual Gifts' is a comprehensive name for all those extraordinary and often directly miraculous powers of which we learn, chiefly from 1 Cor. 12 4-11 28-30 Rom. 12 3-8, that they were possessed by many Christians of the apostolic age, and, according to Paul, had their origin in a specific operation of the Holy Spirit, which has for its object the profit of the church.

When in 1 Cor. 12 6 the 'workings' (ἐνεργήματα) are assigned to God, or in v. 5 the 'ministrations' (διακονίαι) brought into connection with Christ, we are not to see in this any real departure from the regular attribution of the spiritual gifts to the Holy Ghost. The phrase in v. 5—'diversities of ministrations but the same Lord,' is simply another expression of the purpose for which the gifts are given—the common good of the church; for he who serves the church serves Christ who is the Lord of the church, or, according to another way of putting it, who is the soul of the church which is his body (12 12 f.). The phrase in v. 6 on the other hand—'diversities of workings but the same God'—is appropriate in so far as by the 'workings' in question we are to understand according to v. 10 'workings of powers,' or of miracles (ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεων), of which one most readily thinks of God as the author. They are nevertheless attributed precisely in the next verse (v. 11) to the Holy Spirit, a conclusive proof that no real distinction ought to be drawn here between him and God as the author of these workings.

2. Literal meaning of χάρισμα.

The word charisma in this connection is plainly used in a narrow technical sense. (a) That the thought of the grace of God as being the source from which the bestowal of a charisma comes is still very vividly realised is shown by Rom. 12 6: 'having gifts (charisms), differing according to the grace that was given to us' (ἔχοντες χαρίσματα κατὰ τὴν χάριν τὴν δοθεῖσαν ἡμῖν διάφορα).

In the only NT passage where charisma (χάρισμα) is coupled with the adjective 'spiritual' (πνευματικόν), the technical sense is, as it happens, absent; in Rom. 1 11 it does not mean any special aptitude possessed by Paul, but a gift (in the way of instruction, encouragement, consolation, or the like) which he hopes to be able to confer upon the Romans in the course of his visit, even if 'spiritual' (πνευματικόν) expresses the thought that he himself in turn has received it from the Holy Ghost. Still further removed from the specified meaning of the word charisma as given above, though again with a passive application (gift that is conferred), are the applications of it which we find in Rom. 6 23 (eternal life the charisma, not of the Holy Ghost but of God), in 11 29 (the charismata of God = the favours bestowed by God upon his people Israel as enumerated in 9 4 f.), in 2 Cor. 1 11 (without τοῦ Θεοῦ: the charisma of Paul's deliverance from deadly danger); so also in Rom. 5 15 f. where the justification of sinful man is the charisma of God and Christ. The word denotes the whole aggregate of God's benevolent operation in the universe in the single passage outside of the NT, and the Church Fathers in which it is known to occur (Philo, Legis allegor. 3 24 end, 1 103 ed. Mangey: 'All things in the universe, and the universe itself, are the donation and benefaction and gift of God' (δωρεὰ καὶ εὐεργεσία καὶ χάρισμα Θεοῦ τὰ πάντα ὅσα ἐν κόσμῳ καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ κόσμος ἐστίν).

(b) Very sharply distinguished from these uses is the technical sense in which the word is employed, whether in the pl. (Rom. 12 6 1 Cor. 12 4 31; and, with the addition of 'healings' [ἰαμάτων], 12 9 28 30), or in the sing. with a negative (1 7: 'so that ye come behind in no charisma'), or in a distributive sense (1 Pet. 4 10: 'according as each has received a charisma'; cp 1 Cor. 7 7: 'each man hath his own charisma from God'). In just the same way, in the technical sense, the distributive singular of 'grace' (χάρις) stands in connection with the plural 'gifts' (δόματα), in Eph. 4 7 f.: 'unto each one of us was the grace given according to the measure of the gift (δωρεᾶς) of Christ. Wherefore he saith . . . He gave gifts (δόματα) unto men.' Not till we reach the Pastoral Epistles do we find the sing. charism (χάρισμα), used comprehensively to denote all the aptitudes which Timothy, as a bearer of ecclesiastical office, possesses, or ought to possess: 'neglect not the charism that is in thee' (1 Tim. 4 14); 'I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the charism of God which is in thee' (2 Tim. 1 6).

(c) For us the technical meaning of the word is first met with in Paul. At the same time, we may at least be certain that Paul did not invent it when he was composing his epistles: for he employs it in his writings without any explanation, as referring to a matter quite well known. There remains a possibility that he may have coined the expression, in the course of his observations of the extraordinary endowments intended by it, while engaged in his missionary labours. We may well venture upon such a conjecture, seeing that the idea of grace (charis) is so specially prominent with Paul. Yet the expression can also have sprung into existence in the Christian churches without the agency of Paul.

3. Delimitation of field.

No one of the three leading passages relating to spiritual gifts in the writings of Paul, as given above (§ 1), can claim to be a complete account, and it therefore remains uncertain whether even all three together make mention of everything which Paul reckoned to this category. (a) Nevertheless the attempt must be made, with the help of these three principal passages and other subsidiary ones, to form to ourselves some conception of the range of the phenomenon in question.

'Prophecy' (προφητεία) is the only charism that is actually named in all three passages; but in effect so also is 'teaching' (διδασκαλία), if we permit ourselves to regard the 'word of wisdom' (λόγος σοφίας), and the 'word of knowledge' (λ. γνώσεως), of 1 Cor. 12 8 taken together as identical with 'teaching,'—a view which is favoured by 14 26 ('teaching' [διδαχή], co-ordinated with 'revelation, tongue, interpretation' [ἀποκάλυψις, γλῶσσα, ἑρμηνεία]), whilst in 14 6 'knowledge [γνῶσις] also is found co-ordinated with 'teaching' (διδαχή) as well as 'tongues, revelation, prophecy' (γλῶσσαι, ἀποκάλυψις, προφητεία), so that only the 'word of wisdom' (λόγος σοφίας) seems to be left as synonym for 'teaching' (διδαχή). In both the leading passages in 1 Cor. 'gifts of healings' (χαρίσματα ἰαμάτων), 'powers' or 'miracles' (δυνάμεις), and 'diversities of tongues' (γένη γλωσσῶν), occur in addition to the other concepts already mentioned. Rom. has with the first passage in 1 Cor. (12 5) nothing but 'ministry' (διακονία) in common, but in that first passage, as well as in 1 Cor. 16 15, this word seems to have a more extended application than in Rom. 12 7; with the second passage in 1 Cor. (12 28-30) Rom. has in substance but one concept in common—on the assumption, that is to say, that we may identify the προϊστάμενος ('he that ruleth') with him who has the gift of 'government' (κυβέρνησις). Peculiar to the first passage in 1 Cor. (12 4-11) are 'faith, discerning of spirits' (πίστις, διάκρισις πνευμάτων), and 'interpretation of tongues' (ἑρμηνεία γλωσσῶν); to the second (12 28-30) the concepts 'apostle' (ἀπόστολος), and 'helps' (ἀντιλήμψεις); and to Rom. 'admonishing' (παρακαλῶν), 'giving' (μεταδιδούς), and 'showing mercy' (ἐλεῶν).

(b) Eph. 4 11 and Justin, Dial. 39, can be adduced only as secondary authorities, so long as it is with the apostolic age that we are dealing.

Eph. (on its date see col. 3120, n. 3) noticeably enumerates offices only, not charisms. Of these Paul had already named the 'apostles,' 'prophets,' and 'teachers,' and also the 'pastors' (ποιμένες), if these are to be taken as equivalent to the 'rulers' (προϊστάμενοι) of Rom. 12 8. Peculiar to Eph. are the 'evangelists' (εὐαγγελισταί), on whom see MINISTRY, § 39 a, b. Of the gifts enumerated by Paul Justin has only 'healing' (ἴασις), and 'teaching' (διδασκαλία). What he designates 'understanding' (σύνεσις), may safely be identified with 'wisdom' (σοφία), and his 'strength' (ἰσχύς) perhaps with 'power' (δύναμις), as he attributes 'strength' (ἰσχύς) to Moses (Dial. 87). The new elements in his list are 'counsel' (βουλή), 'foreknowledge' (πρόγνωσις), which answers only in a very limited degree to the 'prophecy' (προφητεία) of Paul, and 'fear of God' (φόβος Θεοῦ). Four of his seven concepts—'understanding' (σύνεσις), 'counsel' (βουλή), 'strength' (ἰσχύς), and 'fear of God' (φόβος Θεοῦ)—

Justin has taken direct from Is. 11 2 f. 𝔊, where, according to his interpretation (Dial. 87), are enumerated the seven powers of the Holy Spirit which were all of them to rest upon Jesus from his baptism onwards, whilst the saints of the OT and Christians never receive more than one or a few of them. In Is. we find, besides the four words already given, 'wisdom' (σοφία), 'knowledge' (γνῶσις), and 'piety' (εὐσέβεια). It is plainly with reference to knowledge (γνῶσις), that Justin speaks of foreknowledge (πρόγνωσις), for he lays stress upon the argument that in his time 'prophetic charisms' (προφητικὰ χαρίσματα) are still found among Christians, and that thus the OT gift of prophecy—by which he understands merely prediction of future events—has passed over to the followers of Christ (Dial. 82, begin.).

(c) It will be noticed that in all the enumerations almost no reference whatever is made to the virtues that are looked for in every Christian. Even 'ministry' (διακονία), 'giving' (μεταδιδόναι), 'showing mercy' (ἐλεᾶν), are enumerated only on the assumption that they have risen to a pitch that is not attainable by every Christian. The extraordinary character, rising in many cases to the level of the miraculous, which has been noted in § 1 as the first criterion of charisms in the technical sense, is thus preserved. All the less have we any occasion to lay stress on the 'fear of God,' which Justin has merely taken from Isaiah, or to extend in an analogous way the limits of our category in the direction in which this would be permissible, if one elected to pay heed only to the second criterion (see § 1)—that they are attributed to the agency of the Holy Spirit—and, further, to take it as one's guiding principle that according to Paul the whole new life of the Christian, with all its virtues, is a work of the Holy Spirit (Gal. 5 22 f.: love, joy, peace, etc.). It would therefore be a mistake to accept the limits for our present concept, as these are laid down by Weinel (below, § 21), who in fact writes not about the 'gifts,' but about the operations, of the Spirit. To these of course belongs the ethically good state of the will, treated of by Weinel (149-161), with all its effects; it does not belong to the order of charisms.

(d) There is still another element included by Weinel which we for our part must exclude. The receiving of revelations—apart from the subsequent reporting of them—or the power to endure martyrdom (or even ascetic privations) may be traced back to the Holy Spirit, and may also possess the note of the extraordinary in a very high degree, yet they ought not to be reckoned to the number of the charisms because they lack the third criterion—that of utility for the life of the church.

This criterion must have had very great importance in Paul's view; for not only does he in 1 Cor. 12 7 14 2-33 make it the chief goal of his entire discussion of the charisms (although he has been led to the mention of them, not by this thought but by that of the unity of the Holy Spirit), but also in Rom. 12 6-8 the same goal is set before him, although the occasion is in like manner different, namely, the thought of the unity of the church notwithstanding the diversity of its members. One is not entitled to suppose that the profit of the church is only an application of the charisms which Paul would like to see made, not a constitutive element in the concept itself. So far from that being the case, this criterion is for the apostle so important, that he would refuse to reckon to the number of charisms in the technical sense of which we are now speaking, any phenomenon which yielded no advantage for the community at large.

(e) For this reason we must hesitate before including in the category in question one manifestation which Paul himself expressly designates by the name of charisma. In 1 Cor. 7 6 f. he wishes that all were unmarried as he himself is, but does not set this up as a positive command, 'because each man hath his own gift from God, one after this manner and another after that.'

It would be a mistake to believe that Paul here intends to contrast a charisma of marriage with a χάρισμα ἐγκρατείας (as, following 7 9, we may designate the other side of the comparison); for in this whole section he regards marriage, and the intercourse of the sexes in marriage, not as a good in itself, but only as a preservative against evil (7 2 5 9). Rather must we take as the antithesis to the χάρισμα ἐγκρατείας some one or other of the charisms enumerated in chap. 12. Paul, however, would hardly have arrived at such a co-ordination if for his own personal calling the unmarried condition had not carried with it a direct and obvious utility for the churches under his care—that, namely, of leaving him freer for the preaching of the gospel and pecuniarily less dependent on the churches, in which freedom and independence he discerned a great advantage for the exercise of his office, and specially for the assertion and establishment of his authority (1 Cor. 7 32 f. 9 12 b 15-18 2 Cor. 11 7-12). When, therefore, he speaks of the unmarried condition as a charism, he will, broadly speaking, be thinking of himself and of those in a like position with himself. Otherwise we should have expected him to class as charisms also other forms of asceticism, such as abstinence from certain kinds of food, or voluntary poverty; but this he never does.

After defining the field our next task must be a classification of the charisms of so very various kinds.

4. Classification. (a) It might seem as if Paul himself had undertaken it when, in the first of the three leading passages (1 Cor. 12 4-6), before going into details, he sets up these three great categories—'charisms' (χαρίσματα), 'ministries' (διακονίαι), and 'works' (ἐνεργήματα).

If, however, we decide to take these verses as setting forth a strict arrangement, we shall have to believe that in the detailed enumeration in vv. 7-11, where each charism is traced back to the Holy Spirit, only the first of the three great categories has been specifically dealt with, since the second and third of these—'ministries' (διακονίαι), and 'works' (ἐνεργήματα)—are brought into connection not with the Holy Spirit but with Christ, or God. This again, however, would not be in accordance with v. 10, where 'works' ['of powers'] (ἐνεργήματα [δυνάμεων]), are included in this detailed list; and in Rom. 12 7 the 'ministries' (διακονίαι) belong to the charisms (χαρίσματα). Thus 'charism,' 'ministry,' and 'work' (χάρισμα, διακονία, and ἐνέργημα), are only three different names for all, or at least many of these gifts, and they are chosen with conscious reference to the three modes of divine revelation. The most comprehensive would seem to be, according to v. 6, 'work' (ἐνέργημα), (God worketh all things in all); according to Rom. 12 6 'charism' (χάρισμα); in 1 Cor. 16 15 'ministry' (διακονία) is used also in a very comprehensive sense.

(b) Within the detailed enumeration made in 1 Cor. 12 8-10 a classification might seem to be hinted at by Paul himself, when he uses 'other' (ἄλλῳ) six times and 'different' (ἑτέρῳ) twice; for 'different' (ἕτερος) may mean 'of another kind,' whilst 'other' (ἄλλος) signifies merely 'not identical.'

In that case, however, we should have to subsume under the fixed confidence or 'faith' (πίστις, v. 9), which is introduced by the first 'different' (ἑτέρῳ), not merely the gift of healing and the power of working miracles (which would be suitable enough), but also 'prophecy' and 'discerning of spirits' (which would not suit at all). 'Other' and 'different' are thus used only for the sake of variety, not with the intention of expressing a difference.

(c) Any attempt to find a suggested classification in the omission of the particle 'and' (δέ) in many instances also breaks down.

In v. 10 the second and third δέ are put in brackets by WH. If in these two cases the particle is taken as genuine, then each 'other' (ἄλλῳ) is accompanied by δέ, and 'different' (ἑτέρῳ) in both cases is without it; the classification would then be the same as under (b). If both are deleted, 'discerning of spirits' as one principal division would be separated from 'prophecy' as another principal division, although unquestionably the two are not more widely separated than 'interpretation of tongues' from 'kinds of tongues' (14 29). Thus we should have to reject the first of the two δέ and retain the second (so Bern. Weiss.). For this, however, the authorities give not the slightest warrant, for in both cases the evidence is almost exactly the same for the retention and also, on the other hand, the same for the deletion.

(d) Thus all that remains for us is to attempt some sort of classification from the nature of the case. The points that seem clearest are these: (1) to the 'works of powers' (ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεων) of 1 Cor. 12 10 28 belong the 'charisms of healing' (χαρίσματα ἰαμάτων) of vv. 9 28 which were invariably regarded as miraculous, and the 'faith' (πίστις) of v. 9 since, in 13 2, it is spoken of as able to remove mountains. (2) To the 'ministry' (διακονία) of Rom. 12 7 belong certainly the 'givings' (μεταδιδόναι) and 'showing mercy' (ἐλεᾶν) of 12 8, and the 'helps' (ἀντιλήμψεις) of 1 Cor. 12 28. This, if we take διακονία in a narrow sense. In a wider sense of the word there is a 'ministry of the word' (διακονία τοῦ λόγου, Acts 6 4), and in the sense in which the word appears to be used in 1 Cor. 16 15 other gifts also might easily be included under it, as Stephanas had rendered useful service in the guidance of the church at Corinth as well. Yet (3) it is better to regard the governments' (κυβερνήσεις) of 1 Cor. 12 28 as forming an independent main division, to which of course the 'governor' (προϊστάμενος) of Rom. 12 8 will belong. Most amply subdivided (4) is the gift of the 'word'; 'word of wisdom' (λόγος σοφίας), 'of knowledge' (λόγος γνώσεως), the first of them (or both of them) = 'teaching' (διδασκαλία), or, if it is the product of the charism that is thought of, = 'doctrine' (διδαχή); see § 3 a. Then there is also the 'admonish' (παρακαλεῖν) of Rom. 12 8; but also very specially 'prophecy' (προφητεία) together with 'discerning of spirits' (διάκρισις πνευμάτων) and the 'kinds of tongues' (γένη γλωσσῶν) with 'interpretation of tongues' (ἑρμηνεία γλωσσῶν). An apostle (1 Cor. 12 28) combines the gift of the word with that of direction and of miracle-working (2 Cor. 12 12).

The first three classes call for but little remark by way of explanation. It has elsewhere been shown from the sources (see GOSPELS, § 144; cp also below, § 16) how widespread, down to the end of the second century, was the belief that many Christians possessed the power of working miracles, and very specially that of driving out evil spirits. It is specially important to observe that the same power is not denied of those who are not Christians, but only attributed in their case to the agency of demons. This goes to show that some kernel of actual fact in the alleged occurrences is undeniable.

5. Charisms apart from that of the word.

We may seek to explain these from natural causes, a method of explanation that presents no particular difficulty, least of all in cases of casting-out of devils—i.e., healings of mental disease, which, however, often enough will have been only temporary in their effect. We may further take it that the faith which saw miracles in those really unmiraculous events will, without discrimination, have attributed to those who produced them performances also of such a nature as would really have been irreconcilable with the laws of nature. The collection to be found in Weinel (109-127) shows, however, that the Christian writers, apart from quite summary accounts, refer, with regard to the first and second centuries, almost exclusively only to exorcisms, and attribute miracles of the more pronounced sort to heathen sorcerers and to the gnostics (who, in holy horror, are put on the same level with the sorcerers). Exceptions are the legendary works in which such magical arts, as practised by Simon Magus, are imitated by Peter or by Peter and Paul with a view to outdoing them (see SIMON PETER, § 33 f.), or apocryphal Acts of Apostles, partly of gnostic origin, the spirit of which is illustrated by some examples in JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 8 f., and in SIMON PETER, § 46.

On 'ministry' (διακονία), see DEACON, § 3; on 'government' (κυβέρνησις) and its development, see MINISTRY, § 9, and subsequent sections.

The various forms of the fourth class, on the other hand, demand careful and detailed investigation. Let us begin with the 'word of wisdom' (λόγος σοφίας) and 'word of knowledge' (λόγος γνώσεως) in 1 Cor. 12 8. It is obvious from the first that the two are very closely related; for in 2 7-16 'know' (γινώσκειν) figures as the verb to which the substantive 'wisdom' (σοφία) corresponds. If, notwithstanding, the two must be regarded as characteristically distinct in our leading passage, the difference accordingly is hardly to be sought in their differing contents, but rather in the way in which the human spirit appropriates the same material which is brought before it by each. Now, according to 2 Cor. 4 6 (cp 2 14), gnōsis appears to be applied to the knowledge of what is perceived in an ecstatic condition; for Paul who had never known Jesus upon earth can only have seen, in the face of Christ, the splendour of God (δόξα is nothing abstract; cp 2 Cor. 3 7 Lk. 2 9 Acts 7 55 1 Tim. 6 16 Rev. 21 23 f.), in a vision. If, now, gnōsis appropriates to itself the impression thus received and casts it into the form of thought, it follows from this manner of origination that the mental product will possess the character of what, in the philosophical theory of knowledge, is called intuition. It will thus have the note of immediacy as distinguished from that which has been reached by the discursive method. For the explanation of what is meant by 'wisdom' (σοφία) no such direct hint is given us by Paul. Apart from passages where the word is used in an unfavourable sense, it always indicates with him the content, not the manner, of the knowledge. This circumstance, however, cannot alter anything in the fact that in our leading passage it is parallel with gnōsis, and here, accordingly, like the other, must mean a manner of knowing. There is nothing to indicate that the practical, as distinguished from the theoretical, is meant. On the other hand, the wisdom of the world, which is the opposite of that here intended, exhibits pretty clearly the feature which would offer a clear contrast with gnosis as explained above; it results from intelligent consideration of things. A wisdom which figures as gift of the Holy Spirit must naturally be the consequence of the inspiration of that spirit; but nevertheless it can in its style and manner display the note of discursive thought and reflection quite as clearly as gnosis can display that of vision and intuition.

6. 'Wisdom' and 'knowledge'; 'exhorting.'

Holsten seeks to bring out the contrast in the following way; in Paul we have to look more for gnosis in so far as he visualised the fundamental conceptions of his entire doctrine on the basis of that image of the ascended Jesus which he saw in his vision near Damascus; 'wisdom' (σοφία) we find more in Apollos. If this is correct, the so-called pneumatic interpretation of the OT which believes itself able to arrive at the hidden sense, would rather fall to the side of 'wisdom' (σοφία), including the form in which it is employed by Paul in, for example, such passages as 1 Cor. 9 9 f. 10 4 14 21 f. 2 Cor. 3 13-16 Gal. 4 21-31. According to the Epistle of Barnabas, it is true (10 2 9 f.), it appears to be called gnosis. Yet here a vacillation of expression is easily possible. It must be added, further, that gnosis in Paul, where it relates to the region of practice (1 Cor. 8 1 7 10 f. and doubtless also 2 Cor. 6 6), is a much simpler notion. It is easily conceivable that the application of the word to this region may have had a different course of development from that which it had when regarded as a spiritual gift.

The 'admonish' (παρακαλεῖν) of Rom. 12 8 belongs entirely to the practical side. Primarily it means not to comfort but to exhort. Consolation, however, is not excluded; for the literal meaning is to speak to a person. It is presupposed that people are in need, not so much of instruction as of the effort made, whether gently or more strenuously, always in a friendly and tactful manner, to bring them, by spoken word, to a better disposition of will or a better frame of spirit.

We should completely misunderstand 'prophecy' should we suppose its essence to lie in prediction of the future. This is not wholly excluded; but it can have had only a very modest part as compared with more important elements in the idea. These elements are found in 1 Cor. 14.

7. Prophecy.

(a) According to 14 3 prophecy produces 'edification,' 'comfort,' and 'consolation'; according to v. 24 f. it can penetrate so deeply as to lay bare the secrets of the hearts of strangers and constrain them to confess that the spirit of God speaking in the prophet has rightly disclosed what was passing within them. Accordingly, prophecy would seem to be distinguished from the 'word of wisdom' (λόγος σοφίας) and the 'word of knowledge' (λόγος γνώσεως) in this, that it is preaching of a purely practical kind, often not unlike the addresses at a revival meeting. Yet, according to vv. 31 and 19, the hearers also learn (μανθάνειν) and are instructed (κατηχεῖσθαι) by it. Theoretical elements, therefore, cannot be wholly absent; the real distinction as compared with 'wisdom' (σοφία) and 'knowledge' (γνῶσις) has not yet emerged.

(b) What is more important to observe is that, according to v. 30, it is by a 'revelation' that the prophet is led to speak. This feature is in fact so characteristic that in the enumeration in v. 26 we actually find 'revelation' (ἀποκάλυψις) where, alongside of 'teaching, tongue, and interpretation of tongues' (διδαχή, γλῶσσα, and ἑρμηνεία γλωσσῶν) we should have expected to find 'prophecy' (προφητεία). In v. 6 also, the two pairs are clearly so distributed that the first member of the one ('revelation') is, if not similar to, at least analogous to, the first member of the other ('prophecy') just as are the second members of the two pairs (γνῶσις and διδαχή). Here accordingly is seen what is the really essential distinction between prophecy on the one hand, and wisdom and knowledge on the other; it lies in the suddenness and immediacy of the revelation from which prophecy proceeds. For we must assume that a prophet spoke from the basis of such a revelation even in those cases where he had received it, not as we find in v. 30, while the meeting was actually going on, but some time previously—at home, let us suppose.

(c) On the other hand, prophecy has to be distinguished equally clearly from the 'speaking with tongues' with which it stands in such close parallelism. Whilst that which is spoken in tongue-speech remains unintelligible until it has been interpreted, the 'prophet' can be understood by any one (vv. 3 f.) because, during the time of his speaking, he is guided by his 'understanding' (νοῦς; v. 14). Therefore, also, it is said of prophecy (v. 32) that 'the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets,' whilst those who speak with tongues are at the moment in the ecstatic condition.

(d) Taking all these considerations together, we find that the prophecy spoken of by Paul is entirely similar to the discourse of the OT prophets. In the OT also the contents of prophetic discourse are for the most part of a practical character, yet also informing; the origin is sought in a sudden revelation; the manner of speech of the OT prophets is quite intelligible. This holds good of the prophetic discourse so long as it has not, as in the Book of Daniel, or even in Zechariah or Joel, passed over into the apocalyptic style, but simply as we find it in the genuine writings of the older prophets, not as it is described by such authors as Philo and Justin for whom the OT prophets are men who speak in a completely ecstatical condition and are mere foretellers of the future. Perhaps we might even go a step farther and conjecture that the manner in which the 'prophets' of the apostolic age were conscious of receiving their revelations resembled that of the OT prophets who say, 'The Lord spake to me,' and that the contents of such a revelation, as in the OT, had reference for the most part to some concrete detail. From what has been said it will be seen that on the whole the most suitable rendering of 'prophecy' will be 'inspired address' or 'inspired preaching.' On the later stages of Christian prophecy see MINISTRY, § 38 [also PROPHETIC LITERATURE, §§ 30-33]; on 'discerning of spirits' (διάκρισις πνευμάτων), see below, § 18.

The discussion of the question of speaking with tongues has been brought into the state of confusion in which we find it by the circumstance that investigators were determined to take Acts 2 1-13 as their starting-point, and to find the truth of that narrative confirmed in all circumstances, in other words, supported by Paul. The student, however, who is not prepared to give up the genuineness of the principal Pauline Epistles (as to which cp GALATIANS, §§ 1-9) is in duty stringently bound to consider the account of Paul as the primary one, and discuss it without even a side glance at Acts, and to reject as unhistorical everything in Acts which does not agree with this account. Nor will it be permissible to urge that Paul's information may have been defective; for he himself spoke with tongues more than they all (1 Cor. 14 18).

8. Speaking with tongues: the phenomenon itself.

(a) The speaking with tongues was unintelligible (1 Cor. 14 2 9 11 16) and therefore of no use to the church, unless an interpretation followed (vv. 6 9 17). Paul goes so far as to say (v. 22) that in a mixed assemblage of Christians and non-Christians it has any purpose at all only for the non-Christians—namely, to be to them a sign which, in the context, can only be taken as meaning a mark of displeasure. True, along with this he concedes that the speaking with tongues has a value for the speaker himself, for his edification, namely, because it is a speaking on behalf of God (vv. 2 4 17 28). From the latter circumstance, and particularly from v. 2 ('no man understandeth'), has been drawn the conclusion that the speaking with tongues was in quite low tones. Against this, however, has to be set the comparison of tongue-speech with musical instruments which give out loud tones, if not individually distinguishable, and with a foreign language which is heard but has not been learned (vv. 7-11), as also the statement that a stranger must regard the tongue-speaker as one out of his mind (v. 23).

(b) The explanation of the unintelligibility of such speeches must accordingly be sought in this, that intelligent thought (νοῦς) had no part in their production (v. 14). For 'unfruitful' (ἄκαρπος) in this connection must mean not 'receiving no fruit' but 'yielding no fruit.' Now, the antithesis to ('speaking' λαλεῖν, or 'praying' προσεύχεσθαι, or 'singing' ψάλλειν, etc.) 'with the understanding' (τῷ νοΐ) in vv. 15 f. is 'with the spirit' (τῷ πνεύματι), but in v. 19 it is 'in a tongue' (ἐν γλώσσῃ λαλεῖν). 'To be in the spirit' (ἐν πνεύματι εἶναι), however, is in Rev. 1 10 4 2 17 3 21 10 the terminus technicus for the ecstatic state.

Hence the meaning must be that not all tongue-speakers were in a position to be able afterwards to explain their utterances (vv. 13 28), and that it is only of the prophets that Paul says that the spirits speaking through them are well known to be subject to the will of the prophets and could therefore, when a new speaker came forward, be silent (v. 32)—although for his own part Paul enjoins silence (v. 28) also on the speakers with tongues (on occasions when no interpreter is present). How ecstasy was regarded is well described by Philo (1 510 f. ed. Mangey); only, he supposes he is describing the condition of the OT prophets (in the widest sense of the word so as to include all the OT saints) when he says: '[he is] a sounding instrument of God, invisibly struck and played upon by him . . . The understanding that is in us goes abroad when the divine spirit arrives, and returns home again when the spirit departs; for it is not right that mortal and immortal should dwell together' (ὄργανον θεοῦ ἐστιν ἠχοῦν, κρουόμενον καὶ πληττόμενον ἀοράτως ὑπ' αὐτοῦ . . . ἐξοικίζεται ἐν ἡμῖν ὁ νοῦς κατὰ τὴν τοῦ θείου πνεύματος ἄφιξιν, κατὰ δὲ τὴν μετανάστασιν αὐτοῦ πάλιν εἰσοικίζεται· θέμις γὰρ οὐκ ἔστι θνητὸν ἀθανάτῳ συνοικῆσαι).

(c) What the listeners actually heard Paul does not tell, because it was perfectly well known to his readers. For us this is unfortunate, since on this point, perhaps the most important of all, we are thus thrown back upon conjecture, and many are only too readily inclined to support their conjectures by reference to Acts 2 1-13. If, as we ought, we hold strictly by 1 Cor., we learn from 14 14-17 to distinguish between a 'praying' (προσεύχεσθαι) and a 'singing of psalms' (ψάλλειν), whilst the 'blessing' (εὐλογεῖν), since it occurs in a confirmatory clause, is doubtless to be identified with the latter or with both, as also 'giving thanks' (εὐχαριστεῖν) with 'blessing' (εὐλογεῖν). But what are we to say as to the nature of these prayers, songs of praise (and thanksgivings)? They were unintelligible, and were spoken in the state of ecstasy; from this we must conclude that they consisted either of quite disjointed sounds, cries, sighs, and the like, or, if of actual words or short sentences, at all events not of connected ones. A Christian listener, who naturally did not, like the stranger in v. 23, regard the speaker as insane, must yet have had the impression that he was speaking in a dreamlike state.

(d) We may, further, adduce analogies from earlier and later times. Whilst the prophets of the best OT period are clearly distinguished from the speakers with tongues by the complete intelligibility of their utterances, the oldest stages of prophecy manifest a strongly ecstatic character. Cp for example 1 S. 10 5-12 19 20-24. These prophets, capable of being brought by music and sensory stimuli, to dancing and frenzy, stand for their part in turn quite on the same plane with the pagan oracle-givers (μάντεις). In this connection we can appropriately adduce the description of such persons (μάντεις) in Plato (Tim., 71 e-72 b, Ion, 534 b-d), according to which they need an interpreter; only, this interpreter here bears the name of prophet. Within Christianity, Montanistic prophecy shares fully the ecstatic character of the primitive Christian tongue-speech. Of Montanus, for example, Epiphanius (Hær. 48 4, begin.) has preserved an utterance in which he says in the name of God: 'behold the man is as a lyre and I play over him like a plectron; the man sleeps and I wake; behold, it is the Lord who takes away the hearts of men, and gives to men a [another] heart:' (ἰδοὺ ὁ ἄνθρωπος ὡσεὶ λύρα κἀγὼ ἐφίπταμαι ὡσεὶ πλῆκτρον· ὁ ἄνθρωπος κοιμᾶται κἀγὼ γρηγορῶ. ἰδοὺ κύριός ἐστιν ὁ ἐξιστάνων καρδίας ἀνθρώπων καὶ διδοὺς καρδίαν ἀνθρώποις). From recent times we may cite the inspired persons of the Wetterau and elsewhere (1714-1749); also the second stage of Jansenism from 1713 onwards, the Irvingites, the 'preaching sickness' and 'reading sickness' in Sweden, 1841-1854 (see RESURRECTION, § 36 e), many cases of somnambulism, also the Quakers, and especially and above all the Camisards in the Cevennes[1] (1686-1707); not, however, the Jumpers and Shakers.

(e) The 'kinds of tongues' (γένη γλωσσῶν) of Paul points emphatically to a manifoldness of tongue-speech with regard to which we are hardly able to form any concrete idea. In the 'praying' (προσεύχεσθαι), 'singing' (ψάλλειν), 'blessing' (εὐλογεῖν), of 1 Cor. 14_{14-17} we have up to the present point become acquainted with two (or three) different kinds of contents of tongue-speech; but that by no means exhausts the subject. We may perhaps think in addition of such contents as: communication of a vision received, threatening of judgment, personal confession, and the like. On the other hand the expression 'kinds' (γένη) can also be taken perhaps as intended to denote differences in the form of the speeches according as they were composed of complete but reciprocally disconnected sentences, of disconnected words, or of single sounds or syllables; whether they betokened joy or sorrow, delight or terror, and so forth.

Proceeding now, on the basis of the preceding paragraphs, to a consideration of what is meant by the expression 'speaking with tongues,' the first thing to be remarked is that in the present connection Acts 2_{1-13} must be set aside not provisionally, but definitively. Nothing is more certain than that 'tongues' (γλῶσσαι) in the case before us must not be translated 'languages.'

9. Tongues not foreign languages.

(a) Were the case otherwise the expression '(to speak) in a tongue' (γλώσσῃ [λαλεῖν]) would be quite impossible, although in point of fact it occurs not only in the mention of a single speaker (1 Cor. $14_{2\ 4\ 13}$ f. $_{19\ 26}$ f.)—where it might be argued that each individual speaks only in one language that is foreign to him—but also in v. 9 where more than one speaker is in question.

(b) Where unquestionably the languages of foreign peoples are being spoken of (v. 10 f.) Paul as it happens precisely refrains from using 'tongues' (γλῶσσαι); the word he employs is 'voices' (φωναί), an unmistakable proof that in this connection 'tongues' (γλῶσσαι) is reserved for a different concept, and with these 'voices' (φωναί) the speaking with tongues is only compared, whilst on the other assumption the two would be identical.

(c) Paul concedes that the speaking with tongues is fitted for the private edification of the speaker, and therefore recommends that this gift should be exercised in solitude (vv. 4 18 28). But that speaking in foreign languages should have this result would be indeed wonderful.

(d) The interpretation of tongue-speech would not have any miraculous character at all, and therefore have no claim to be considered a charism, if it rested upon acquaintance on the part of the interpreter with the foreign language in question. If, however, we are to suppose that the interpreter understands the language in question just as little as the speaker, the interpretation would be a miracle of precisely the same order as the tongue-speech itself, and it would be incomprehensible how in v. 28 Paul could have supposed the case that before the beginning of a tongue-speech the speaker could know that no interpreter for it was present at the meeting. For the gift of interpretation on such a presupposition as that under discussion could nevertheless be quite suddenly bestowed on someone immediately after the tongue-speech had been made.

(e) That no one in the meeting, apart from subsequent interpretation, understands tongue-speech (v. 2) would not hold good of those listeners who understood in a natural way the foreign language, the temporary use of which had been bestowed upon the tongue-speaker in a supernatural way.

(f) The antithesis between '(speaking) with a tongue' (γλώσσῃ [λαλεῖν]) could not be 'with the understanding' (νοΐ: so v. 15) or 'by way of revelation,' 'of knowledge,' 'of prophecy,' 'of teaching' (ἐν ἀποκαλύψει, ἐν γνώσει, ἐν προφητείᾳ, ἐν διδαχῇ: so v. 6), but must run: 'to speak in one's mother's tongue.' Of this we find nowhere the faintest trace.

(g) Finally, the main characteristic feature of tongue-speech—ecstasy—would be completely inexplicable. Wherefore this, if the whole matter is simply to speak in a foreign language which one has never learned? After all, ecstasy is a psychological condition which must have its psychological explanation. But if this kind of speaking can really bring ecstasy with it, why can it alone do so? One might say: the substance of these speeches was so exceedingly joyful that it transported the speaker to an ecstasy. But why not also the substance of many speeches held in one's mother-tongue? We should therefore have to say: on each occasion when a communication was received that cheered to ecstasy, the speaker was endowed in a supernatural way with the ability to speak in a foreign language. In that case, however, the counter question, Why not in his mother-tongue? would be difficult to put to silence.

(h) The latest defender of the view that foreign languages are intended, Arthur Wright (see below, § 21), does so in fact quite differently.

He points to 'the little prophets of the Cevennes' (1686-1701), children of three years and upwards, who, according to Heath (Contemp. Rev., Jan. 1886), preached sermons not only in their mother-tongue, but also in good French, often for three-quarters of an hour. 'There was nothing hysterical or wildly excited about their manner, only they were insensible to pain and could not be induced to stop.' The explanation given is that they were merely repeating sermons which they had previously heard delivered by grown-up preachers; their memory was abnormally stimulated by the excitement of the persecutions. In like manner, according to Wright, the primitive Christian tongue-speakers in each case were simply repeating discourses which previously—of course without understanding them—they had heard with excited attention, especially in Jerusalem, where at one of the great feasts, for example, a multitude of unknown languages could be heard. He lays stress upon the argument that 'they who spake with tongues are never said to have given utterance to distinctly Christian teaching' and goes on to say: 'Accustomed to the higher tone of St. Paul and his evangelists the Corinthians found little profit in these Rabbinic exhortations.' He thus draws his entire view as to the contents of all the tongue-speeches from Acts 2_{11} ('speaking the mighty works of God'), instead of the notorious overvaluation of tongue-speech in Corinth asserts the opposite, and moreover seems seriously to believe that all the Corinthian Christians, bond and free alike, who spoke with tongues had previously at one period or another been in Jerusalem, and there had excitement and anguish of so enduring a character that their memory could be stimulated with regard to them in this abnormal way: and this too for discourses of which they could not by any means have had the same impression as the Camisard children just spoken of, that all salvation lay in them, for they did not turn to Judaism; at least this is not affirmed by Wright. He is equally silent as to what it was that brought on the ecstatic state at the repetition of discourses formerly heard. He speaks of the whole as 'a miracle, not of power, but of providence'; the latter he sees in 'the choice of time, the preparation of the speakers beforehand, the selection of suitable words, the restriction of the gifts to particular persons.' Finally, he nevertheless finds himself compelled to add to his words quoted above, the following, as an explanation of the ecstasy: 'the exciting cause may finally have been not merely mental tension, but the direct impulse of the Holy Ghost.' The interpretation of the tongue-speeches on the other hand he accounts for by 'a knowledge of the language'; where, however, it is the tongue-speaker who is himself the interpreter, this explanation will not serve: for the speaker 'had no recollection of what he had said.' In such a case, then, 'interpretation' must mean 'any utterance made in the vernacular during the state of ecstasy.' Wright has been led to put forward his hypothesis 'from a sense of the very serious danger of calling in question the historical truth of the Acts of the Apostles.' With the purpose of obviating this danger he does as great violence to the language of Paul as any of his predecessors.

10. Acts 2 1-13 and Mk. 16 17.

What is excluded by the words of Paul is exactly what is meant in Acts 2 1-13: the 120 of 1 15 spoke in the languages of the Parthians, Medes, etc.

(a) The expedients that have been resorted to are innumerable: the friendly address produced in the foreigners only a homelike feeling; or they interpreted the disconnected sounds of the actual tongue-speaking described in 1 Cor. in each case as utterances of their own language; or the 120 spoke a single language, a new one miraculously intelligible to all, whether that of Paradise or the future language of heaven; or they spoke not Aramaic but Hebrew, and in this the foreigners, who all of them were Jews or Proselytes, recognised the language of worship to which they were accustomed at home; or the 120 spoke only a few languages, not wholly unknown to them but only unfamiliar, such as Arabic, colloquial Greek, colloquial Latin; or those who spoke were not by any means only the 120 but all the foreigners who were present with them. This and all the like is strictly excluded by the thrice repeated statement (vv. 6 8 11) that every man of the foreigners heard the 120 speaking in his own mother-tongue.

(b) The only theory still left open would seem to be that of a miracle of hearing instead of a miracle of speaking. Yet neither does such a supposition hit the meaning of the author; for according to what he says the foreign languages were not only heard but also spoken. The words of v. 4: 'they began to speak with other tongues' (ἑτέραις γλώσσαις), receive their interpretation precisely in the statement 'we hear them speak in our mother-tongue' (ταῖς ἡμετέραις γλώσσαις, v. 11; 'each in his mother-speech,' ἕκαστος τῇ ἰδίᾳ διαλέκτῳ, vv. 6 8).

It is possible to suppose a miracle of hearing, therefore, only in the sense of ascribing to the author a confusion of such a miracle with one of speech. But why should it have been precisely a miracle of hearing? If it occurred in the ears or rather in the minds of the hearers, there is no answer to the question wherefore it was that the Holy Spirit exercised his miraculous influence precisely in this quarter, whilst it is not only said (v. 4), but is also appropriate to the situation, that it was on the speakers that he wrought. According to others the miracle, in becoming a miracle of hearing, happened during the transmission from the mouth of the speaker to the ear of the hearer. The Holy Spirit 'interpreted the words during their passage through the air, so as to present them to the ears of the numerous listeners, to each in his native tongue.' Here one can only ask in increased surprise why it is precisely the Holy Ghost that is named as the author of a miracle which is accomplished in no human being but in a dead object.

(c) Another question: Wherefore the 'tongues as of fire' (γλῶσσαι ὡσεὶ πυρός) in v. 3? In this view that a miracle of hearing is intended, they are left wholly out of account. Other interpreters have, in view of what is said of the tongues, supposed that according to Acts the miracle was one wrought on the organs of speech.

Since 'tongue' in v. 3 denotes the organ of speech this seemed to be the case also in v. 4; the meaning would therefore be: they received in their mouths new tongues and therewith spoke a new speech. Here, however, not only does one miss all possibility of conceiving the nature of what happened, so that one is compelled to describe the suggestion of it as simply fantastical; the idea further is not in the least indicated by the words. The 'tongues as of fire' of v. 3 have nothing to do with the 'other tongues' of v. 4; for the tongues of fire do not enter the mouth but rest upon the head. Such remains the meaning even if the reading 'rested' (ἐκάθισεν: sing.) is adopted; for here the subject can only be 'fire,' the only other subject which is grammatically possible, the 'sound' (ἦχος) of v. 2 being excluded by the nature of the case. Perhaps the pl. (ἐκάθισαν) is nevertheless to be read, as in ℵ*D sah. cop. pesh.

(d) These tongues of fire, however, remain out of account also in the interpretation that a miracle of speech is intended in so far as that interpretation has been set forth under (a). Since, however, they cannot by any means be regarded as of subordinate importance they urgently call for some explanation. This has in part been given already (see MINISTRY, § 21 c). The event of Pentecost is there represented as a parallel to the giving of the Law on Sinai. To this parallel belongs also the loud noise from heaven with which the scene is opened in v. 2. In virtue of this very circumstance, however, the narrative lies gravely open to the suspicion that it rests not upon observation of fact but upon the activity of the imagination.

(e) In what is said about the audience the text has suffered greatly. 'Both Jews and proselytes' (Ἰουδαῖοί τε καὶ προσήλυτοι) in v. 11 is impossible as a clause in the enumeration; it has sense only if taken as in apposition to all the other clauses together, so that what is meant is: 'and in fact of every nation, born Jews and also proselytes.' Thus it had its place originally either after 'Arabs' (Ἄραβες), or on the margin as a gloss, but a correct one. In order that foreigners should be hearing their mother-tongue it is not in point of fact enough that born Jews should be represented as present from foreign countries; proselytes also must be there, to whom the foreign language was really a mother-tongue in the full and proper sense of the word.

(f) Against this, however, there is what we find in v. 5, where all the hearers are called 'Jews dwelling in Jerusalem' (εἰς Ἰερουσαλὴμ κατοικοῦντες Ἰουδαῖοι). 'Jews' in fact is wanting in ℵ; but even so it is improbable that all these strangers in Jerusalem had their residence (κατοικοῦντες) there; it would be much easier to suppose that they were there only as visitors at the feast. The circumstance also that 'dwelling' (κατοικοῦντες) in C pesh. cop. comes before instead of after 'in Jerusalem,' and 'Jews' in E before instead of after 'dwelling' can be held as indicating that both words were originally a gloss, and in this case a wrong one. If so it would have to be attributed to the desire to produce harmony with v. 14: 'Jews and dwellers at Jerusalem' (ἄνδρες Ἰουδαῖοι καὶ οἱ κατοικοῦντες Ἰερουσαλήμ). Yet see below, i, end.

(g) For the same reason 'sojourners' (οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες) before 'Romans' (Ῥωμαῖοι) in v. 10 is open to the suspicion of being a gloss if it means Roman citizens who were settled in Jerusalem. Should it be intended, however, merely to indicate that they were there on a passing visit, the expression will fitly apply not only to Romans but also equally well to all other nationalities, and therefore would have had its right place before 'Parthians' (Πάρθοι: v. 9). That Roman citizens who were settled in Rome (not in the province) should be intended is excluded by the article, for this would affirm that they had come for the feast to Jerusalem in a body.

(h) Finally, 'Judæa' (Ἰουδαίαν) in v. 9 between 'Mesopotamia' and 'Cappadocia' is very surprising [cp GEOGRAPHY, § 26, end]. That Jews understood the speakers really did not need to be said. Already in Tertullian and (once) in Augustine we read Armenia; in Jerome Syria. Others have conjectured Idumæa, India, Ionia, Bithynia, Cilicia, Lydia, and even the N. Syrian kingdom of Yaudi with which we are acquainted from the inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser [cp UZZIAH, § 7].

(i) In other passages (10 46, 19 6) Acts mentions tongue-speech without the idea of a speaking in foreign languages and without the addition of 'other' (ἑτέραις) to 'tongues' (γλώσσαις), so that there is no reason for doubting that the same thing is intended as that which we find in Paul. Now, this cannot by any means lead to our finding ourselves compelled, at the cost of whatever violence to the words, to find the same view of the matter also in Acts 2; but it does doubtless tend to raise the question whether perhaps Acts 2 also may not depend on an underlying source which spoke of tongue-speech as fittingly as did those which have been used in 10 46 19 6. The same idea is suggested also by the remark of Peter in 10 47 that Cornelius and his house 'have received the Holy Ghost as well as we' (cp 11 15, 17). Further it has long ago been remarked that the reproach of drunkenness in 2 13, if the languages of foreign nations were what was being heard, would by no means have been appropriate, and that the speech of Peter in 2 14-36 has no relation to hearers from foreign parts or to any miracle of this description, but explains the event by the prophecy in Joel (3 1-5) as to the outpouring of the Holy Spirit with prophetic speeches, visions, and dreams (2 16-18). Of the various attempts at separation of sources (see ACTS, § 11) the simplest and therefore the most probable is that which holds the source to have contained v. 4 (without 'other,' ἑτέραις) followed immediately by vv. 12*f.*; in fact the conjecture has been hazarded that 4 31 presents only another account of the same event.

It would also be conceivable that a fragment of the source is preserved likewise in the words 'Jews dwelling in Jerusalem' (εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ κατοικοῦντες Ἰουδαῖοι) in 2 5. The source in that case will have mentioned not foreigners but only men of Jerusalem as witnesses of the occurrence, and it would justly become a question whether the event occurred at Pentecost (see MINISTRY, § 21 c, d). Yet by its whole structure the sentence is fitted to describe a speech-wonder. Should 'Jews dwelling' then not be a gloss (see above, f), we should have to suppose that the redactor had very unskilfully retained these words from his source.

(k) The occasion for bringing in the idea of the giving of the law at Sinai, and thereby completely altering the character of the narrative, can perhaps be looked for in the increasing importance which gradually had come to be attached to the event of Pentecost as marking the presumed moment of foundation of the church (against this see MINISTRY, § 21, b, d). Yet subsidiary circumstances can also have contributed to the same result. One such can be sought for in the passage of Joel cited in Acts 2 19 in so far as it speaks of 'wonders in the heavens above and signs on the earth beneath,' and of 'fire,' even if this be associated there with 'blood' and 'vapour of smoke.' A still more obvious suggestion is that the occasion may have been furnished by a misunderstanding of 1 Cor. 14 21 for which Paul himself is responsible.

In 1 Cor. 14 21 Paul cites Is. 28 11 f. as evidence of the unintelligibility and uselessness of tongue-speeches without observing that in Isaiah in the case of the Assyrians by whom God is about to speak to the people of Israel it is not the language spoken by them that matters but only the sword by which they are to destroy Israel. Paul, moreover, contrary alike to MT and the LXX, makes of the whole a divine utterance, and introduces the words 'saith the Lord' (λέγει κύριος) at the end, changes the preterite of the last verb ('they would not hear') into a future, and adds, 'not even thus' (οὐδ' οὕτως). By this means and by the freely chosen composite verb 'will they give heed' (εἰσακούσονται) he has correctly reproduced one solitary feature of MT and the LXX. In the interests of his parallel with tongue-speech what he ought to have taken from the OT passage was: 'one will not be able to understand the men of foreign speech.' Paul, however, actually says—quite unsuitably for the purpose he has in hand—in real if not in verbal agreement with Isaiah ('they would not hear'): 'one will not give heed to them.' Yet it is very intelligible that a superficial reader could draw from the entire citation in Paul nothing further than that the speakers with tongues had spoken in the languages of foreign peoples.

(l) As Mk. 16 9-20 is entirely derived from the NT literature, including Acts (see RESURRECTION-NARRATIVES, § 8 b, c), there need be no hesitating in interpreting the 'they shall speak with new tongues' (γλώσσαις λαλήσουσιν καιναῖς) of v. 17 simply as meaning 'they shall speak in languages' previously unknown to the speakers, 'new' (καιναῖς) thus being substituted for greater clearness for the 'other' (ἑτέραις) of Acts 2 4. It is quite improbable that an independent tradition lies before us here.

Interesting but not indispensable is the conjecture of Michelsen (Het Evangelie naar Marcus, 29) by which 'new' is made to disappear. WH has before 'will lift up serpents' (ὄφεις ἀροῦσιν) in brackets the additional words 'and in their hands' (καὶ ἐν ταῖς χερσίν). Out of this 'and in their' (καὶ ἐν ταῖς) or rather out of the contracted form (κἀν ταῖς) arose 'new' (καιναῖς) and then 'hands' (χερσίν) fell away. Instead of 'in' (ἐν), Michelsen further conjectures that the original text read 'if' (ἐὰν), and writes 'lift' (ἄρωσιν): 'and if they lift up serpents with their hands' (κἂν ταῖς χερσὶν ὄφεις ἄρωσιν κἂν θανάσιμόν τι πίωσιν οὐ μὴ αὐτοὺς βλάψῃ).

Returning once more to 1 Cor. 14, the next interpretation of 'tongues' (γλῶσσαι) that invites our consideration is the old Greek one, according to which are meant archaic expressions no longer understood among the people, or, strange and unusual locutions generally, including new coinages. On this head see especially Bleek (below, § 21), and Heinrici in his own commentary and in Meyer's.

11. 'Tongues' not = 'archaic expressions.'

(a) On this interpretation, however, 'kinds of tongues' (γένη γλωσσῶν) can hardly be distinguished. (b) The sing. 'speak in a tongue' (γλώσσῃ λαλεῖν) or 'pray in a tongue' (γλώσσῃ προσεύχεσθαι) can in this view, as Heinrici himself says, mean no more than the utterance of a shout of praise or the heaving of a sigh. In that case the question arises as to how a complete prayer of such a kind as to require an interpreter can be produced (14 14) and why Paul should be indisposed to allow more than two or three such 'speeches' (v. 27), each of which would occupy a minute. (c) Even a stringing together of such expressions, for which, according to Heinrici, the plural 'speak with tongues' (γλώσσαις λαλεῖν) is employed, can have resulted in no speeches of such length as to render regulations necessary for their restriction in this respect; on the other hand Paul gives not the slightest hint at discourses in which such 'tongues' were a characteristic feature, but which on the whole consisted of intelligible words and therefore could extend to considerable length. Heinrici infers discourses of this kind only from v. 19. The statement here made, however, would be quite ineffective if its meaning was: I had rather deliver five discourses with my understanding than ten thousand discourses in which archaic expressions occur. It becomes effective only if the meaning is (as in EV): 'I had rather speak five words . . . than ten thousand words.' (d) Why the Spirit should have inspired precisely expressions of this sort, and how the employment of them could have served for private edification (vv. 4 18 f. 28) remains wholly obscure. (e) For interpretation of this kind of 'speech' what is needed is not the gift of the Holy Spirit, but philological knowledge. (f) But above all we must ask, How is to be explained the ecstasy that accompanies the use of such out-of-the-way expressions? In short, whilst the interpretation of 'tongues' as meaning speeches in foreign languages still allowed the supernatural character of the occurrence to remain, that which takes them to mean mere rare expressions is simply a means of eliminating that character along with the ecstasy. Heinrici says (in Meyer: 1 Cor.[7] 362 = [8] 378) expressly that the outsiders alluded to in 14 23 could have taken the speakers with tongues to be men possessed, because they confounded their condition with that of the Pythia and others who really spoke in ecstasy.

Beyschlag (below, § 21) accepts the speaking in ecstasy, and in fact actually proposes to explain the expression 'speaking with tongues' by means of it, referring for the expression (though not for the thing) to Acts 2 3. He holds that the tongues of fire are an echo of the fact that the tongues of speakers were actually moved with fiery eloquence. This figurative way of speaking about a tongue of fire is the origin of the name (γλῶσσα). The pl. 'tongues' is to be explained, he thinks, even in cases where a single speaker is in question, by the circumstance that such a tongue of fire was regarded as having been bestowed anew on each occasion of its exercise. The oldest expression accordingly was (he thinks) 'to speak with other (or new) tongues' (ἑτέραις [or καιναῖς] γλώσσαις λαλεῖν); the simpler 'speak with tongues' (γλώσσαις λαλεῖν) is merely an abbreviation of this. In abbreviation, however, it has to be replied, it is not usual to drop precisely the most important part of the expression; the correct abbreviation must have been 'to speak with other (or new)' (ἑτέραις [or καιναῖς] λαλεῖν). The impossibility of this whole view of Beyschlag's is clearly exhibited, however, in 1 Cor. 14 26. Along with a psalm, a teaching, a revelation, and interpretation, a tongue of fire cannot fittingly be enumerated as a thing which one who takes part in a religious meeting has; for in the connection 'has' (ἔχει) means 'has to contribute.' In more points than one Beyschlag nevertheless comes very near the truth.

12. Tongues not metaphorical.

Above all, Beyschlag has rightly recognised that the literal sense—the bodily member within the mouth—is to be taken as the fundamental meaning of 'tongue.'

13. The tongue as a bodily member.

(a) The decisive passage for this is 1 Cor. 14 9. In connection with v. 7 f. the sense must be: as the sound of pipe, harp, and trumpet cannot be rightly understood if they give out no clear sound, so also what is spoken by you cannot be understood if you give forth no clear speech with your tongue.

This is the exact logical course of the comparison: to the musical instruments which give forth either a clear or an unclear sound, corresponds as instrument of speech the member in the mouth. If here by 'tongue' were meant the particular manner of speech that is known as 'speaking with tongues,' the case that an unintelligible speech is given could not for a moment be suggested as merely a possible case; for according to Paul this happens in all circumstances. Nor, again, have we here a new example, parallel to that of the musical instruments, but one drawn from what is observed in ordinary human speech. We do not reach this till we come to v. 10 f.; and as the application of that example to the Corinthian speakers with tongues is made in v. 12 by the expression 'so also you' (οὕτως καὶ ὑμεῖς), in like manner we must regard the same expression in v. 9 as introducing an application of the preceding illustrations drawn from the musical instruments to the same persons. 'Tongue' here thus signifies in actual fact the tongue of the Corinthian speakers, yet neither as producing the so-called tongue-speeches nor yet as producing ordinary human speech, but simply in so far as it is capable of giving forth alike the (always unintelligible) tongue-speech, and also a kind of speech parallel to this, still intelligible, in the church meetings—such speech as prophecy, for example.

(b) Here then we have the origin of the expression 'speak with a tongue.' If all discourse is effected by means of the human tongue and yet only this particular kind of speech is named from it, the idea can only be this, that in the case in question the part it plays is particularly strong, or even, so far as may be, exclusive. In excellent agreement with this is the use of the opposite expression 'speak with the understanding' (τῷ νοΐ λαλεῖν). In intelligible speech the 'understanding' (νοῦς) has a part, indeed so prominent a part that it alone calls for mention; in the contrasted case it is not engaged, and thus it might seem as if it were the tongue alone that produced the speech.

Needless to say, the belief was that in 'speaking with tongues' the tongue was set in motion by the Holy Ghost (vv. 2, 15), just as in intelligible speech it was set in motion by the 'understanding' (νοῦς); but '(to speak) with the spirit' (πνεύματι [λαλεῖν]) was not an appropriate verbal expression for this, because it would have applied equally well to prophecy, wisdom-speech, knowledge-speech, and so forth. It is also quite fitting that the designation of so characteristic a matter should be chosen with express reference to the impression which it produced upon the senses, and in this case it really appeared as if the tongue alone were speaking. True, that the lips, teeth, palate, etc., are also engaged. But a designation that is to be in daily use needs to be short, and here it was enough to name the most important organ; and that the tongue is in popular belief the most important organ of speech is evident.

(c) This explanation nevertheless leaves something still to be desired. The plural 'speak with tongues' (γλώσσαις λαλεῖν) is accounted for by it only in cases where it is used with reference to more speakers than one (12 30 14 5*a* 22 f. 39); and thus not in 14 6 (and v. 18 according to WH), nor yet in v. 5*b* 12 10, although here the singular, used of the person speaking, has a collective sense. Where only one speaker is in question, the attempt has been made to explain the plural (γλώσσαις) as arising from the idea that in passing from one manner of speech to another the 'tongue' is in some degree changed; but such an idea is much too fantastic to have arisen in popular speech, which nevertheless we must certainly assume to have been the case with all such expressions as this. And what of cases in which 'tongues' stands alone, without a verb (12 10 28 13 8 14 22)?

All the conditions are satisfied only by one assumption: 'tongue' (γλῶσσα, apart from 14 9) must be rendered 'tongue-speech,'—i.e., speech which, in the manner described in § 13*b*, seems to be produced by the tongue alone. This is by no means a departure from the literal sense; rather is it simply an instance of the same transition from the instrument to its product which is exemplified in ordinary Greek when 'tongue' (γλῶσσα) is used in the sense of 'language.' It is necessary to assume that this transition was effected anew in the primitive Christian usage in a narrower sphere, for the reason that all other explanations have been shown to be unworkable. If 'tongue' could mean the language of a foreign nation, or an archaic individual expression, 14 26 would at least be intelligible; as these meanings are unpracticable we should have to render: 'when ye come together, each one hath a psalm, hath a teaching, hath a revelation, hath a (human) tongue (in his mouth), hath an interpretation'—which clearly is meaningless. 'Tongue' must necessarily be something of the same order as the other things enumerated; and thus a definite kind of discourse which is capable of being delivered in a religious meeting.

So also v. 6: 'if I come unto you speaking with tongues, what shall I profit you, unless I speak to you [we must supply: at the same time] either by way of revelation, or of knowledge,' and so forth. Similarly too 13 8: 'whether there be prophecies . . . whether there be tongues . . . whether there be knowledge, it shall be done away.' Indeed, in the plural 'tongues' we now recognise everywhere the different 'kinds of tongues' (γένη γλωσσῶν).

In accordance with the attribution of tongue-speech to the operation of the Holy Ghost, the interpretation of it also is regarded as a spiritual gift.

15. Interpretation of tongue-speeches.

(a) It is in the first place to be remarked that the tongue-speaker himself, as well as another, can possess this gift. The first is established by 14 13, the second by the co-ordination in 12 10 14 26; for as not every one is capable of giving all the kinds of discourse there enumerated, the meaning must be: 'when ye come together each one hath either a psalm or a teaching . . . or a tongue-speech or an interpretation.'

In this sense then, we must interpret v. 27 f. also. 'If any man speaketh in a tongue, let it be by two, or at the most three . . . and let one interpret.' If this interpreter is one of the tongue-speakers, who expounds his own tongue-speech, then what immediately follows will mean: 'but if he is not an interpreter' (ἐὰν δὲ μὴ ᾖ διερμηνευτής); and this seems to be absolutely necessary, since the sentence closes with 'let him keep silence' (σιγάτω), whilst if all the tongue-speakers whose speech had no interpreter at hand had to keep silence, the expression ought to have run: 'let them keep silence' (σιγάτωσαν). In that case, however, Paul would on the one hand be enjoining that of the two, or three, tongue-speeches delivered, one, or two, should remain uninterpreted, which is directly contrary to the principle laid down by him in vv. 2-11 16-19 22 f. 26—and on the other hand he would be excluding interpretation by some other person than the speaker, whilst yet such interpretation is, according to 12 10 14 26, a spiritual gift. Thus we must, after all, suppose that Paul, in a somewhat careless way, thought of 'the person concerned' as the subject of the singular 'keep silence' (σιγάτω)[1] and that we ought to render (with EV): 'if there be no interpreter.' This too is inexactly said: 'let [only] one interpret' (εἷς διερμηνευέτω). What Paul had in his mind perhaps was: 'let one at least interpret.' The continuation 'but if there be no interpreter' fits this well.

If this view be correct, we learn from the passage before us that those persons in the church who were in a position to interpret tongue-speeches were generally known and thus exercised this function with some regularity. The possibility was not excluded, indeed, that some one on some occasion might give an interpretation who had not previously done so. Clearly, however, Paul is not disposed to rely upon the uncertain, and therefore he prescribes that if an interpretation is not assured (such doubtless will be the intention of his words) the tongue-speech is to be from the outset suppressed.

(b) What, next, were the means by which an individual other than the tongue-speaker became able to understand the tongue-speech? If this faculty was a purely supernatural one, our question has no point; but the case was assuredly otherwise. With what degree of precision the interpreter was able to elucidate the sense of a tongue-speech we cannot tell. The more one was disposed to rest satisfied with general renderings, the easier was it to supply them. The tone of the voice, the gestures, the recurrence of particular words or sounds certainly offered clues.[1] Further help was gained from observation of the habits of the tongue-speakers. We can hardly imagine otherwise than that their speeches readily assumed a stereotyped character. If, however, at any time a tongue-speaker brought forth something unaccustomed, a knowledge of what experiences he had recently been having would certainly not be useless towards an understanding of his speech.

1 Similarly, 'the persons concerned' is to be supplied as the subject of the plurals γαμείτωσαν (1 Cor. 7 36) and παρελάβοσαν (2 Thess. 3 6) as WHmg. and Tischendorf read.

(c) It must be expressly noted that the things enumerated in 14 6 along with tongue-speech—revelation, knowledge, prophesying, teaching—do not constitute the interpretation of tongue-speech in some such sense that the meaning will be 'when I come unto you speaking with tongues what shall I profit you if I do not forthwith interpret these tongue-speeches in the form of revelation' etc. This misunderstanding is from the outset precluded by this, that in v. 26 'interpretation' stands in co-ordination alike with 'revelation,' etc., and with 'tongue.' On the other hand, it is possible that interpretation of tongue-speech is intended in v. 15: 'I will pray with the Spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also,' that is to say while I repeat in intelligible language the substance of the prayer I have originally uttered in ecstasy. This view is recommended by the fact that, immediately before (v. 13), the tongue-speaker is admonished to aim at being able to interpret his own tongue-speeches.

On the subject of the diffusion of the tongue-charism our information is very defective. (a) We are not aware that tongue-speech (and the allied charisms) had any considerable diffusion within the Jewish-Christian area; but neither is there adequate ground for denying to the Jewish Christians all aptitude for such charisms, or for accusing the author of Acts of having as a Paulinist arbitrarily introduced it into his account of the primitive Christian world. If he had not found them in the sources on which he drew for 2 1-13 10 46 f. 19 6, but merely drew upon his imagination, we may be pretty confident that he would have brought in the same elements at other points as well. Of course, the mere fact that they were present in his sources does not of itself give any security that their picture of the diffusion of the charisms is historically correct.

16. Spread and end of 'tongue-speech' and 'prophecy' charisms.

(b) In exact proportion to the intensity with which the charism of tongue-speech was exercised in Corinth in Paul's time does the complete silence of the Epistle to the Romans on the same subject invite remark. In 1 Thess. 5 19 ('quench not the spirit') it may perhaps be intended, or at least included. In any case it cannot have long survived its most flourishing period. The author of Acts certainly can never have heard it exercised, otherwise he could not possibly have fallen into the mistake of supposing that it was speech in the language of foreign nations, or into the confusion of identifying with this foreign speech the speaking with tongues which occurred at the conversion of Cornelius (Acts 10 46 f. 11 15 17). It is a significant fact that Justin for his own period (about 155 A.D.) mentions only prophetic gifts (προφητικὰ χαρίσματα) but no speaking with tongues (Dial. 82, begin.). Irenæus (about 185 A.D.), in his detailed treatment of the charisms of which numberless instances happened every day (Hær. ii. 49 3 [=32 4]; also ap. Eus. HE v. 7 3-5), speaks only of exorcisms of demons, prophetic visions and utterances, healings, and some cases of raising of the dead. In another place (v. 6 1; also ap. Eus. HE v. 7 6) he mentions tongue-speech also, but only as something with regard to which he hears that it happens in the case of many brethren in the Church and without letting us know whether by it he understands the phenomena met with in 1 Cor. 14, or what is described in Acts 2. Irenæus says:

'We hear of many brethren in the church possessing prophetic gifts and speaking through the Spirit in all kinds of tongues and bringing to light for the general advantage the hidden things of men and setting forth the mysteries of God' (πολλῶν ἀκούομεν ἀδελφῶν ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ προφητικὰ χαρίσματα ἐχόντων καὶ παντοδαπαῖς λαλούντων διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος γλώσσαις καὶ τὰ κρύφια τῶν ἀνθρώπων εἰς φανερὸν ἀγόντων ἐπὶ τῷ συμφέροντι καὶ τὰ μυστήρια τοῦ θεοῦ ἐκδιηγουμένων). It is to be noted that the making manifest of the secrets of men of which Irenæus speaks immediately after mentioning tongue-speech is in 1 Cor. 14 24 f. attributed to the prophets, not to those who speak with tongues. Tertullian also does not say that there was speaking with tongues in his day; all that he does is contemptuously to call upon Marcion to exhibit in the case of any of his followers the exercise of spiritual gifts which, says he, 'are forthcoming from my side more easily' ('a me facilius proferuntur'): 'exhibeat Marcion . . . aliquos prophetas . . . qui et futura prænuntiarint et cordis occulta traduxerint (or: produxerint?); edat aliquem psalmum, aliquam visionem, aliquam orationem, dumtaxat spiritalem, in ecstasi, id est, amentia, si qua linguæ interpretatio accessit' (adv. Marc. 5 8, end). Thus tongue-speech appears, not as an independent thing, but merely in an added sentence which with the whole of its surroundings is clearly reminiscent of 1 Cor. 14 25 f. The ecstatical spiritual utterance, of which Tertullian speaks, in his time refers not to 'tongue-speech' but to 'prophecy.'

(c) For the ecstatical form of utterance did not disappear so quickly as did tongue-speech. On the contrary it became merged in the exercise of 'prophecy.' This was favoured in the highest degree by the circumstance that already the OT prophecy was conceived of as wholly ecstatical (above, § 8 b). This form of utterance was most strongly prevalent in Montanism. This may be the reason why stress is laid upon it by Tertullian; but as Montanism altogether was nothing new, but only a strong revival of a tendency which had once before had prevalence within the church although subsequently repressed, so also its view of prophecy was, even if not exactly what might be called the primitive Christian one, then at least the post-apostolic-churchly one (Weinel, 78-96). It was only by way of reaction against the exaggerations of this and against the dangers for ecclesiastical office which grew out of it that brought churchmen at last to the view which finds expression in the title of the treatise of Miltiades (Eus. HE v. 17 1), 'On the necessity of a prophet's not speaking in ecstasy' (περὶ τοῦ μὴ δεῖν προφήτην ἐν ἐκστάσει λαλεῖν). As to how it came about that 'prophecy' also in its turn had to recede into the background and give place to the ecclesiastical office, see MINISTRY, § 38.

If, finally, we proceed to inquire into the value which the charisms possessed for primitive Christianity, we shall find that judges differ. (a) In the church of Corinth (which is almost the only authority to which we can refer) they were valued very highly. They were regarded, and quite naturally, as evidences of special grace and favour, and were therefore zealously striven after (14 12). This zeal, if a right zeal, was manifested in prayer (14 13 does not mean that he who speaks in tongue-speech is to pronounce this ecstatic prayer of his with the purpose of interpreting it afterwards: the meaning is that when not exercising his charism of tongue-speech he is to pray for the gift of being able himself to interpret any tongue-speeches he may subsequently receive). But we shall hardly be doing the Corinthians an injustice if we suppose that many of them sought to secure for themselves those 'gifts' by other means also—by imitation, or by artificially working themselves up into a condition of excitement, by efforts constantly repeated. Vanity, it would seem, was not altogether without its part in the matter; otherwise the gift most prized and coveted would hardly have been that of tongue-speech, the most conspicuous indeed of them all, but at the same time the least fruitful. In the mouth of the Corinthian Christians the tongue-speaker alone was the 'spiritual' person (πνευματικός: 14 37, and, in accordance with this, in all probability 12 1 also).

17. Popular view of the charisms.

[1] The most familiar example, by which it has been attempted to explain the process, is the following: a tongue-speaker babbled disconnectedly the syllables ab and ba; the interpreter believed himself to have discovered the Aramaic word abba. Possibly the matter often fell out so. It must not, however, be thought that precisely this word was known only to certain interpreters. As Paul employs it in Rom. 8 15 Gal. 4 6 it must have been known to Gentile Christians generally.

(b) From this we can see, at the same time, what it was that properly speaking was regarded as the valuable element in the charisms. It was the extraordinary, the wonderful or miraculous, that quality in them which conferred a special importance on those who possessed them. Fundamentally the view taken does not differ from that of the Greek religion. Man desires to enjoy the possession of the godhead, bestowing itself on him individually. The same view dominates in the OT; and in Gentile-Christian circles also the OT conceptions of the operations of the Spirit of God can have been familiar and influential. This conception has a marked leaning towards the quaintly, or even, one might say, grotesquely miraculous. Thus it is the Spirit that enables Samson to rend a lion or burst his own fetters, that is able to convey Elijah from place to place at pleasure (Judg. 14 6 15 14 1 K. 18 12 2 K. 2 16; cp in NT Acts 8 39). Whether the thing done has a religious purpose comes but little into the question.

This way of looking at the charisms is precisely that which makes it possible to attribute the same workings to other spirits than the Holy Spirit.

18. Discerning of spirits.

(a) The belief in the existence of such spirits was at that time exceedingly prevalent. Broadly speaking, they do not fall simply under the two categories of good and evil, but many of them are regarded simply as of a subordinate character and as restricted in their insight. Whether they were called demons in accordance with pagan ideas, or angels in accordance with those of the OT, was indifferent; in either case they were thought of as quite personal and as very active. Of such a spirit it is, for example, presupposed in 2 Thess. 2 2 that it can produce the erroneous belief that the day of the Lord is immediately at hand.

(b) That these conceptions are present in 1 Cor. 14 also is shown by the plural, 'spirits' (πνεύματα) which, for linguistic reasons, cannot be taken to mean 'operations of the spirit'—a meaning, moreover, which in v. 32 is excluded by the connection in which the word occurs ('the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets'). Thus to each prophet is assigned a proper spirit, conceived of personally, by which he is inspired (cp Rev. 22 6: 'the God of the spirits of the prophets'). Quite similarly 1 Cor. 14 14 also: 'if I pray in a tongue, my spirit prayeth.' Here it is not the proper spirit, so to say, with which a man is born, that is intended; for this the apostle designates rather by the word 'understanding' (νοῦς), and distinguishes in this very verse from 'my spirit.' From this it follows that v. 12 also is to be understood quite literally: 'ye are zealous of spirits,' that is to say, one of you seeks to obtain an inspiration from one spirit, another from another.

(c) If this were not the meaning, no such thing as the 'discerning of spirits' would be possible. By the 'spirits' here interpreters indeed have proposed to understand distributions of the one Holy Spirit such as in point of fact were actually believed in (Nu. 11 25 Rev. 1 4 3 1 4 5 5 6, Hermas, Sim. ix. 13 2 15 1-6 and often). Only, in this case also, any 'discerning' would be meaningless. For, beyond question, any act of 'discerning' would consist in judging as to whether an utterance founded upon spiritual suggestion was true or false, one to be followed or rejected. 1 Cor. 7 40 shows us how easily it could happen that conflicting judgments were put forward on the ground that they were inspired. Since Paul here supports his judgment on the subject of re-marriage of widows with the words: 'I think that I also have the Spirit of God,' we must conclude that in Corinth other persons on the ground of suggestion by the Spirit had decided in the opposite sense. Cp 14 37 f. where the best reading (ἀγνοεῖται) is to be pronounced as an imperative (ἀγνοεῖτε): if any man is ignorant, ignore ye him.

(d) In all places where it occurs the 'discerning of spirits' is mentioned directly after 'prophecy' (1 Cor. 12 10 14 29, cp 1 Thess. 5 21). In itself considered, it is not easy to see why mention should not be made of it in connection with 'word of wisdom' or 'word of knowledge.' Yet it is easy to understand how it needed specially to be called into requisition in connection with 'prophecy,' if this last gave definite directions as to what ought to be done in definite particular cases (§ 7 d). From 1 Cor. 14 29 we cannot infer that only those who also possessed that of 'prophecy' possessed the gift of 'discerning'; 'the others' (οἱ ἄλλοι) can include others also.

(e) The recognition of a 'discerning of spirits' involves in principle a complete abandonment of the belief in suggestion of the Holy Spirit. With the utmost emphasis Paul insists (1 Cor. 12 4-11 14 33) that all charisms proceed from the Holy Spirit or from God; but at the same time they can also come from evil spirits and the listeners must decide for themselves as to this, and in fact decide again upon the basis of inspiration. Here the most important point is that it is not Paul who introduces the 'discerning of spirits' as something new; rather does it exist in Corinth as a thing of course. Here reveals itself the impossibility of continuing to hold fast the belief in divine inspiration if a free use of it is made in the actualities of life.

Already in the OT it had been found necessary to set up criteria for discriminating between false and true prophets. But that the one class relate dreams, the others 'speak my word faithfully' (Jer. 23 28) was, naturally, a quite inadequate distinction. That the true prophet must be a prophet of evil (Jer. 28 8) may have been true in Jerusalem in Jeremiah's day; but at other times, as, for example, in those of Deutero-Isaiah, this maxim might have been turned against the prophets now become canonical, and Jeremiah in fact finds himself constrained to add, 'if a prophet prophesies peace and his word comes to pass, then shall he be known to be a true prophet' (28 9). The result is set up as a criterion quite expressly in Dt. 18 20-22, cp Ezek. 33 33. Not only, however, does this criterion fail to be available early enough; in Dt. 13 2-4 is contemplated the case in which it may prove to have been deceptive, and for discerning the true prophet the only way left is to ask whether he labours in the service of Yahwè and (so Jer. 23 22) seeks to bring back the people from the error of their ways. [Cp PROPHET, §§ 23 25.]

Equally inadequate is the criterion set up in 1 Cor. 12 3: 'no man speaking in the Spirit of God saith, Jesus is anathema.' As to the difficulties and inconveniences experienced by the apostolic age from the impossibility of finding proper norms by which prophets could be tested, see MINISTRY, § 38 a, b.

But what did Paul think of the charisms? (a) On the one side he entirely shares the popular opinion.

19. Paul's view of the charisms.

He holds them all for operations of the Holy Spirit, and is not sensible of the contradiction which we have discovered (above, § 18 b, c, e) in his own words, to the effect that such operations can proceed from other spirits also, in fact from evil ones. At the close of the discussion, in order that any remarks of his in disparagement of tongue-speech may not be misunderstood, he says: 'forbid not to speak with tongues' (1 Cor. 14 39). He makes no effort to bring into action a criterion for tongue-speakers analogous to the 'discerning' applicable in the case of prophets. That no such criterion should have presented itself of its own accord is to be accounted for, on the one hand, by the consideration that tongue-speeches were too unclear to admit of their showing themselves to such disadvantage as in certain cases definite sayings of prophets did, and, further, that even in cases where they threatened to do so they could be explained away; on the other hand, by the consideration that in the case of a tongue-speaker, one was, more than in the case of a prophet, face to face with a seemingly supernatural communication which could be received only with reverence and awe. The first-mentioned consideration would hardly have restrained Paul from setting up a criterion to be applied to tongue-speeches; for his disposition towards them is much the reverse of favourable, and he has every reason for seeking to limit their undesirable influence. The second consideration, however, did, in point of fact, hold him back, especially as, according to 14_{18}, he himself was a speaker with tongues more than any of the Corinthians.

(b) Alongside of this agreement with the popular view there presents itself, however, in the case of Paul, the great thought that every Christian has the Holy Spirit (Gal. 3_{25} etc.), and that the whole life of the Christian is an expression of the Spirit's activities (1 Cor. 12_{3} Gal. 5_{22} f. Rom. 5_{5} $8_{4\text{-}16}$). This thought could not fail, in the case of every manifestation that laid claim to the character of a spiritual gift, to lead to the question being asked as to its spiritual value, but also, at the same time, to lead to a lowering of the estimate put upon gifts in which their wonderful character was the most important thing, and to an increased appreciation of those which consisted in an intensified exercise of the new Christian life on its moral side. In the first characteristic of our definition (§ 1) we have already seen that the idea of the charisms is by no means uniform. Some of them are expressly regarded as miraculous, in others it is very difficult to perceive anything wonderful. To this latter category belongs 'ministry' in all its forms; 'government' also, and the simpler forms of devotional utterance. It is hardly probable that all these things owed their designation as charisms to the pagan or OT presuppositions which had a share in the building up of the conception 'charism' (χάρισμα). Since, then, this idea must have come to its maturity in the course of the missionary activity of Paul, under his eyes and with his co-operation, it is hardly too bold to conjecture that it was through his influence that these comparatively non-miraculous, but, from an ethical point of view, all the more important, manifestations should have come to be included in the number of the charisms.

(c) To the same order belongs also the most important modification which Paul applied to the idea of a charism when he refused to recognise as being such anything which had no utility for the life of the Christian community (12_{7}, τὸ συμφέρον, 'profit'; 14_{26}, οἰκοδομή, 'edification'; see above, § 3 d). By this miraculous manifestations were by no means excluded; but it was no longer their miraculous character that supplied the measure according to which they were to be valued. It was with this principle as his basis that Paul entered especially on his campaign against the over-valuing of tongue-speech. Broadly speaking, his great merit in this field consists in his having moralised, in accordance with truly Christian principles, an idea that was only half religious, and essentially miraculous, and, so far forth, unfruitful.

We must proceed still farther in the same direction if we are to arrive at an ultimate judgment on the historical significance of the primitive Christian charisms.

20. Conclusion. It is easily intelligible that the joy of enthusiasm over the possession of a new redeeming religion should have expressed itself in an exuberant way which, according to the ideas of that time, could only be regarded as the miraculous operation of the Holy Spirit. Apart from the exceptions specified above (§ 17 a) we have no reason for doubting that these manifestations were genuine expressions of the feeling of a strong religious life, not mere artificial imitations derived from the pagan cults. On the other hand, we know with regard to Paul that his ecstasies in which he had visions coincided in point of time with the attacks of his malady (see GALATIA, § 27); we shall, therefore, hardly err if we bring into causal connection with this malady the strong tendency to tongue-speech also, which, in any case, was intimately associated with the ecstatic condition. The ecstatical has always something of the unhealthy about it. Thus it is not difficult to explain why extensive circles in the early church kept entirely free from such manifestations. The church could get on very well in their absence. It is, on the other hand, equally intelligible that, once they had made their appearance they were infectious, that they brought the church life into serious danger, and that they led to reaction. Paul led this reaction on sound principles; the later church led it increasingly in the interests of its conception of church office which was itself very unsound; Paul by the endeavour to persuade, the later church too often by the exercise of force. The phenomena in question owe their disappearance, however, by no means to this reaction merely, but quite as much to their own degeneration. This degeneration was in large measure due to the faith in their miraculous character. In this case also it was demonstrated that miracles produce a favourable impression only when seen from a distance; where they have to be fitted into the daily realities of actual life they always bring evil consequences in their train. This holds true of the gift of healing the sick also, and of miracle-working generally. The reaction just spoken of did not venture to deny the miraculous character of the charisms. We for our part, however, are constrained to do so, and to account for everything in the phenomena to which a miraculous character has been attributed by the known psychological laws which can be observed in cases of great mental exaltation, whether in persons who deem themselves inspired or in persons who simply require medical treatment.

The non-miraculous charisms on the other hand, which, from the outset, possessed a moral character were of abiding value. Without them the church could not have lived; but they have never failed her and are destined never to become extinct; even should they have ceased to be called charisms, it will remain everlastingly true that they come from the Spirit of God.

SPRINGS. In a country where perennial streams are rare, and where months of summer may pass without rain, the possession and preservation of water has always been a matter of serious concern. Water means life, and its value to the people of Canaan is illustrated by manifold references and numerous beautiful metaphors in the OT. For details concerning the amount of rainfall in Palestine, see RAIN, § 2, and on the distribution of springs and other sources of supply, see PALESTINE, § 13. Generally speaking, it may be affirmed that the most poorly watered districts are the table-land of Judæa on the W. of Jordan and the heights of the Belkā on the E.[1] Some of these tracts, however, were once better supplied, cp NEGEB, § 1.

1. Distribution and preservation of water.

Constructions for the preservation of water rank among the oldest specimens of masonry in Palestine. The simplest plan was to dig a hole, with perhaps a shaft of masonry, where springs were known to exist. Such a pit (bĕ'ēr, בְּאֵר, φρέαρ) was often covered over with a large flat stone, partly, no doubt, as a precaution against accident (Ex. 21 33), and partly to prevent its being easily discovered. For this latter purpose sand or earth might be strewn over the cover (cp also 2 S. 17 19).

The water was drawn up by a pitcher (kad, Gen. 24 16) or bucket (dĕlī, Is. 40 15, cp verb in Ex. 2 16, 19), and for the watering of cattle was poured into a trough (rahaṭ, Gen. 30 38 41 Ex. 2 16, šōḳeth, Gen. 24 20 30 38).[2] When dry a pit of this kind might be used as a prison, and as no attempt was made to keep it clean the accumulation of miry mud (ṭīṭ, Ps. 40 2 [3], cp Jer. 38 6) at the bottom added to the discomfort of the prisoner.

The Heb. and Gk. terms for 'Spring' which require mention are:[3]—

2. Words rendered 'spring.'

1. 'ayin (עַיִן), Gen. 16 7 24 16 1 S. 29 1, etc.; AV's 'well' in Gen. 24 13 49 22, etc., obscures the force and meaning. The 'spring of Jacob' (Dt. 33 28) refers to J's descendants; cp the metaphors in Is. 48 1 Ps. 68 26 [27]. For particular springs, see reff. above in § 1. The connection with 'ayin 'eye' is doubtful, nor, if the two are identical, is it easy to say which is older. The 'spring' can scarcely take its name from the circular shape of the orifice since this (as in English) is called the mouth (Gen. 29 2 f.). On the other hand, the eye could easily be called the fountain of the tears (as in Jer. 9 1 [8 23] עיני מקור דמעה). Perhaps some primitive belief underlies the usage.

2. ma'yān (מַעְיָן), derived from the above, properly a place of springs, cp Ps. 84 6 [7], Josh. 18 15 (AV 'well'), etc.

3. bĕ'ēr (בְּאֵר, cp above § 1, and see CONDUITS, § 1 [1]) occurs chiefly in the Hexat.; for place-names compounded with it, see NAMES, § 101 (b).

4. mabbūa' (מַבּוּעַ), Eccles. 12 6 (AV 'fountain'), Is. 35 7 49 10. Properly a place where water bubbles or gushes up, cp the verb in Prov. 18 4 of a bubbling spring, and metaphorically, of a gushing man in Prov. 15 2 28, etc.

5. māḳōr (מָקוֹר), a spring that has been dug (verb in 2 K. 19 24 Is. 37 25). Mostly used in a figurative sense (Prov. 13 14 16 22 18 4 etc.).

6. mōṣā (מוֹצָא), properly, 'place of exit' (cp also above col. 883, n. 2), with מַיִם, 2 K. 2 21 Ps. 107 33, 35 (διέξοδος), Is. 37 25 (συναγωγή), etc.

7. nēbek (נֵבֶךְ, orig. obscure) in Job 38 16, and perhaps also ib. 28 11 for מִבְּכִי, see BDB ad loc.

8. gullōth (גֻּלֹּת), Judg. 1 15†; see GOLATH-MAIM. True meaning unknown, perhaps a Canaanite word. On the supposition that the word is corrupt see KEILAH.

9. אַשְׁדּוֹת, Dt. 3 17 RVmg., see ASHDOTH-PISGAH.

10. πηγή (the usual word in 𝔊 for nos. 1 f., 4 ff.), Jn. 4 6 Jas. 3 11 2 Pet. 2 17, etc.

11. φρέαρ (𝔊's word for no. 3), Lk. 14 5 etc., an artificial well as opposed to κρήνη (cp POOL, 2).

A full supply of water, rivers on bare heights, wells in valleys, pools of water in place of a wilderness, and springs instead of dry land characterise the highest possible happiness to the Hebrew mind (Is. 41 18 cp 35 7 44 3 Ps. 107 35). The possession of water is the one indispensable acquisition without which the right of pasture is useless. Hence, as Robertson Smith suggested, property in water is more important and probably older than property in land (RS(2) 104 f., cp CATTLE, § 5). The digging of a well, accordingly, was an important function, and a typical specimen of one of the rites accompanying it has been fortunately preserved in Nu. 21 17 f. (see BEER, col. 515). Here the spring is addressed as a living being, and indeed not only is spring-water called 'living water' (Gen. 26 19 Nu. 19 17 etc.), but springs are regarded as endowed with life. They are regarded with reverence, credited with oracular powers, and frequently associated with sacred beings.[1] On the widespread beliefs connected with springs and wells among the Semites see IDOLATRY, § 2, NATURE-WORSHIP, § 4, Robertson Smith, RS(2) (reff. in Index). STACHYS (στaχυς [Ti. WH]), greeted by Paul as 'my beloved' (Rom. 16 9).

He is mentioned in the apocryphal lists of the 'seventy,' and according to pseudo-Dorotheus was consecrated first bishop of Byzantium, by the Apostle Andrew. In the apocryphal Acta Philippi, a believer of the name of Stachys is the host of Philip in Hierapolis. The name has been found among the remains of the imperial household (CIL 6 8607).

STACTE (נָטָף, nāṭāph, 'that which drops'; cp Job 36 27; στακτη) is mentioned with onycha and galbanum as an ingredient in the holy incense (Ex. 30 34; Ecclus. 24 15, RVmg. 'opobalsamum,' AV STORAX). A fragrant resin is obviously intended; but whether opobalsamum, storax, or some other substance, is uncertain. Jewish tradition identified nāṭāph with opobalsamum; but against this see BALSAM, § 4, and MYRRH. Perhaps gum tragacanth is meant; see STORAX, 2.

ness of references. By far the most interesting is Heb. 11 21, cp Gen. 47 31, where it is said that Jacob, after blessing Joseph's sons, 'worshipped upon the top of his staff' (προσεκύνησεν ἐπὶ τὸ ἄκρον τῆς ῥάβδου αὐτοῦ), implying הַמַּטֶּה (the reading of 𝔊, Pesh., It.) instead of הַמִּטָּה. Chabas justifies this reading by a reference to an Egyptian custom.[1] But it is clearly wrong, as the parallel passage 1 K. 1 47 shows. The 'head' of the bed is no doubt a peculiar expression; Holzinger suggests that a 'teraphim' may have been placed at the bed's head. But the true explanation is much simpler. ראש should of course be עֶרֶשׂ 'couch'; cp ערש יצועי 'the couch of my bed,' Ps. 132 3, RVmg. The other words are—

1. משענה, משענת, mašʿēnāh, mišʿeneth (√שען to lean), Ex. 21 19 Is. 36 6, etc. Used of the pastoral rod (‖ שבט) in Ps. 23 4 (see note in Che. Ps.(2)).

2. עץ, ʿēṣ, of the 'staff' of a spear (1 S. 17 7 [Kt. is wrong], 2 S. 21 19 23 7 1 Ch. 20 5).

3. פלך, pélek, in David's imprecation, 'let there not fail from the house of Joab one that hath an issue, or that is a leper, or that leaneth on a staff,' etc., 2 S. 3 29. So EV after 𝔊 (κρατῶν σκυτάλης [-η, or -ην]) and Tg. Jon. (מתקיף באנר; so read, not באנר). The rival rendering—'that holdeth the spindle'—does not suit the context nearly as well (cp H. P. Smith, ad loc.), but has a philological basis lacking to the first explanation. Moved by Driver's learned note (TBS 192, with n. 1) Löhr and H. P. Smith adopt 'spindle' for פלך (cp Prov. 31 19, and Toy's note). There can hardly be a clearer evidence of corruption; no philology can save this unsuitable reading. Read מ׳ בְּמַקֵּל, 'one that leans on (lit. grasps) a staff'—i.e., a lame person. In Prov. 31 19 the reading is of course undisputed (cp WEAVING, § 2).

4. מוט, mōṭ, Nu. 13 23 (a pole, for bearing a huge grape-cluster).

5. בַּד, bad (in plur.), Ex. 25 13 ff. 1 K. 8 7 f. (to bear the ark).

6. ξύλον (in plur.), Mt. 26 47 Mk. 14 43, coupled with 'swords' (Jn. 18 3 speaks of ὅπλα). Cp the use of מַטֶּה and שֵׁבֶט (ROD, 1, 2).

STAIRS. The rendering 'stairs' in AV is generally misleading.

1. In 1 K. 6 8†, no doubt, לוּלִים, lūlīm (ἑ[ι]λικτὴ ἀναβάσις; cochlea) can be plausibly rendered 'winding stairs' (EV; see however, Stade, ZATW 3 136 ff., and cp TEMPLE, § 11, n.).

2. In 2 K. 9 13 'on the top of the stairs' (אֶל־גֶּרֶם הַמַּעֲלוֹת) can hardly be the right description of the place where Jehu's supporters acclaimed him as king (see JEHU).

3. In Neh. 9 4 it was not on the stairs but on the 'scaffold' (מַעֲלֵה, ma'ăleh; ἀνάβασις) prepared for the occasion that Jeshua and Bani stood. So AVmg. Cp PULPIT.

4. In Ezek. 43 17 (מעלות, ma'ălōth) 'stairs' should be 'steps' (RV); the steps of the altar are meant.

5. In Cant. 2 14 'the secret places (מדרגות, madrēgōth; ἐχόμενα τοῦ προτειχίσματος; in caverna maceriæ) of the stairs' forms a bad parallel to 'in the clefts of the rock.' מדרגה, madrēgāh (in plur.), is again rendered 'stairs' in Ezek. 38 20; most scholars suppose 'steep, ladder-like hills' (RV 'steep places,' 𝔊 φάραγγες) to be the true meaning. The word, however, is suspicious.

6. 'Stairs' is right for ἀναβαθμοί in Acts 21 40.

STARS. To the Hebrews, as to other races, the heavenly bodies were a constant source of interest and wonder. Their great number, comparable to the sand of the sea-shore (Gen. 15 5 22 17 26 4 Jer. 33 22), and known only to God (Ps. 147 4), their immeasurable height above the earth (Job 22 12 Ob. 4 Is. 14 13; cp Dan. 8 10*a*), and the brightness of their shining (Job 25 5 31 26 Dan. 12 3), formed subjects for comment; but it was their movements that excited the keenest attention, and opened up the widest field for the imagination.

To realise the Hebrew conception of this phenomenon, it is necessary to make some reference to their cosmology.

1. Earth and Heaven. This bears close resemblance to the scheme of the Babylonians (Jensen, Kosmol. 9 ff.), and may be thought to have formed part of the common property of the primitive Semitic family.

The earth was regarded as a flat surface, bounded upon all sides by the watery deep. Above, the heavens formed a hollow vault, which, resting on the waters, might be said to describe a circle upon them (Job 26 10 Prov. 8 27). This vault was thought to be solid, and was spoken of as a firmament (רָקִיעַ, rāḳīă', something beaten or hammered out; Gen. 1 6 etc.), or, in the language of poetry, a tent spread out above the earth (Is. 40 22 Ps. 19 4). Upon the farther side of the firmament, called by the Babylonians kirib šami, 'the inner part of the heavens,' there was again water, 'the waters which are above the firmament' (Gen. 1 6 f.). Indeed, one of the earliest of creative acts was the placing of the vault of the heavens, in order to cleave in twain the watery deep (תְּהוֹם, tĕhōm, Bab. Tiâmat), and thus make possible the appearance of dry land (Gen. 1 6-8 Prov. 8 28 f.). Beneath the earth was the realm of the underworld (שְׁאוֹל, Shĕōl), and the whole was perhaps conjectured to rest ultimately upon the waters of the deep (Ps. 24 2 136 6).

Across the fixed vault of the firmament the heavenly bodies appeared to move, seeming, no doubt, to the

2. Movements of heavenly bodies. Hebrews as to the Babylonians, to enter by a door in the eastern quarter of the heavens and to make their exit in the W. by a similar means. Thus, to the poet's mind, the sun has his tent in the heavens, and at his rising is like a bridegroom who issues from his bridal chamber (Ps. 19 5 f.).

The regularity of the movements of the stars arrested the attention. They are governed by 'ordinances' established by Yahwè and unalterable (Jer. 31 35 f.), beyond the reach of human understanding (Job 38 33). The spectacle of the heavenly host, led forth in full tale, is a wonderful proof of Yahwè's mighty power (Is. 40 26). Thus they naturally serve to mark divisions of time. They are set in the firmament 'to divide the day from the night' and to 'be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years' (Gen. 1 14, cp Ps. 104 19). The Hebrew month (חֹדֶשׁ, ḥōdeš; יֶרַח, yéraḥ) is a lunar month, and the quarter of this period—one phase of the moon—appears to have determined the week of seven days (see MONTH, §§ 1, 6; WEEK, § 1). Since this constancy in the courses of sun, moon, and stars was so impressive, it is natural that anything which appeared to be of the nature of an interruption should, by the unscientific mind, be regarded as a portent of catastrophe. Of such a nature would be eclipses of the sun or moon, meteorites or falling stars, and comets.

So we find the darkening of sun and moon and the falling of stars associated with troublous times of direst calamity (Am. 8 9 Is. 13 10 Ezek. 32 7 Joel 2 10 31[3 4]=Acts 2 20 Joel 3[4] 15 Job 9 7; cp Mt. 24 29 Rev. 6 12 f. 8 12).[1] Comets, as moving in orbits which baffled the calculations of the ancients, can be spoken of as 'wandering stars, for whom the blackness of darkness is reserved for ever,' and thus serve to depict the lot of the reprobate.

[1] Mélanges égyptologiques,(3) 1 91. 'He then pronounced the ordinary oath, "By the life of the Lord Life-Health-Force," striking his nose and ears, and placing himself on the top of the staff. The reference is to the baton which the magistrate kept stretched out during the ceremony. By this attitude and by these gestures the prisoner testified his submission towards the magistrate.'

[1] An eclipse of the sun which occurred in the year B.C. 763 is recorded in the Assyrian Eponym Canon. See AMOS, § 4.

STARS

To the primitive imagination that which moves is regarded as possessing life. Thus the heavenly bodies are pictured as living beings, and form subject of folklore and legend. Stars, in particular, are closely associated with angels.

The phrase 'the host of heaven' generally denotes the stars (2 K. 17 16 21 3 5 23 4 f. Dt. 4 19 17 3 Jer. 8 2 19 13 Zeph. 1 5; cp Gen. 2 1 Ps. 33 6 Is. 40 26 45 12); but in some cases, especially in late writings, invisible agencies are also denoted by the same term (1 K. 22 19 Is. 34 4 Neh. 9 6, and perhaps Dan. 8 10). Cp also Is. 24 21 and the fine poetical statement in Job 38 7 (cp CREATION, § 21, e).

Special stars or constellations mentioned in the Bible are as follow:—

(a) עַיִשׁ, 'áyiš (Job 38 32); on the versions and on the supposed form עָשׁ, 'āš (Job 9 9), see ARCTURUS. The allusion to the 'children' of 'áyiš limits the possibilities of interpretation to such constellations as can be pictured under the form of a mother with children. Among the ancients there appear to have been two such—Ursa major, and the Pleiades.

3. Special stars or groups.

In favour of Ursa major is cited the Arabic title for this constellation.

This is na'š, 'the bier,' the four stars forming the quadrilateral being regarded as a bier, which is followed by three mourners, banāt na'š, 'the daughters of the bier.'

It is, however, quite impossible philologically to connect the Arabic word na'š with the Hebrew 'áyiš; nor is there, in the passage of Job in which 'áyiš appears, any trace of the idea of bier and bearers or mourners. It is the merit of M. A. Stern[1] ('Die Sternbilder in Hiob 38 31 f.,' in Geiger's Jüd. Zeitschr. 3 258 ff.) to have been the first among moderns to adopt the interpretation 'Pleiades,' and to have stated his case with great cogency. Stern disposes of the claims of Ursa major by pointing out that 'áyiš, with the three other constellations mentioned in Job 38 31 f., is cited by the poet on account of its meteorological importance.

This is evident from the context. In vv. 22-30 we have mention of snow and hail, light and east wind, thunder-shower and lightning, rain and dew, ice and hoar-frost. Then follow the three vv. 31-33 with reference to certain constellations; and in immediate succession, further notice of meteorological phenomena—clouds and the outpouring water, lightning and the bottles of heaven.

Thus the inference is clear that the constellations mentioned are such as have special significance as weather-signs. Now Ursa major, as a circum-polar constellation, never passes below the horizon in the N. hemisphere;[2] and, being therefore a conspicuous object at all seasons, could never be regarded as possessing any kind of meteorological importance. Thus its mention in such a context would appear to be quite misplaced.

On the other hand, the Pleiades, though but a small group, possessed for the ancients great meteorological significance.

By their rising at dawn the Greeks and Romans divined the approach of summer, whilst their setting at dawn, heralded the approach of the wet and stormy season (Hesiod, Opp. 383 f. 571 f. 619 ff.; Virgil, Georg. 4 231 ff.; Ovid, Fast. 5 599 ff.). The expression ''áyiš with her children' bears close resemblance to the name 'hen with her chickens' applied to this group of stars among both eastern and western peoples and actually employed in this passage as a translation of the Targum (ותנתא על אפרחהא תדברנון).[3]

The name 'áyiš may then be thought to denote, not the group as a whole, but the principal star, known to astronomers as Alcyone. It must be deemed uncertain whether the Massoretic vocalisation עַיִשׁ is correct. The Peshiṭtā renders by 'iyyūtha,[1] which probably has philological connection with the Hebrew name, and perhaps upon this analogy we may vocalise עֲיֻשׁ, 'ăyūš (Hoffmann), or else, with closer approximation to the Syriac, עַיּוּשׁ, 'ayyūš, or עִיּוּשׁ, 'iyyūš.

(b) כְּסִיל, kĕsīl (Job 9 9 38 31 Amos 5 8) is generally supposed to denote ORION (q.v.), the most remarkable of constellations, both on account of the brilliancy and colour of the three principal stars,[2] and the striking resemblance of the figure to a gigantic human form equipped with belt and sword. The position of this group, a few degrees S. of the Ecliptic, renders it a very conspicuous object as viewed from the N. temperate zone, and among the Greeks and the Romans it was much observed as a sign of the seasons.

Thus its heliacal rising, southing, and setting are severally connected with different agricultural operations (Hes. Opp. 595 ff., 609 ff., 614 ff.); but, especially, the time of its setting marks the commencement of wet and stormy weather, when navigation becomes dangerous (Hes. Opp. 618 ff.; Hor. Ep. 15 7; Virg. Æn. 1 535 4 52).

The mention of the 'bands of Orion' in Job 38 31 is perhaps an allusion to the three stars of the belt, and refers to the chains with which the giant—'dull-witted obstinate' giant—(כסיל) was thought to have been confined by the Deity. If man can loose these bands—the poet seems to mean—he may then hope to gain control over those changes in the season which the constellation marks. In Job 9 9 Amos 5 8 kĕsīl appears to be cited on account of its great brilliancy.[3]

(c) כִּימָה, kīmáh (Job 9 9 38 31 Amos 5 8) is translated 'Pleiades' by EV and many moderns, in accordance with the rendering of 𝔊 in both passages of Job,[4] Symm. and Vg. in Job 38 31, and Symm. and Theodot. in Amos. If, however, the grounds upon which 'áyiš has been identified with the Pleiades can be considered sufficient, it is evident that we must look elsewhere for the constellation represented by kīmáh. Stern presses the claims of Canis major with its bright star Sirius—by far the largest of the fixed stars—known to the Greeks as τὸ ἄστρον par excellence.[5]

A constellation of so great a meteorological interest as Canis major and possessing a star of such brilliancy as Sirius, may naturally be expected to find mention in Job 38; and the identification with kīmāh is rendered plausible by the close connection with kĕsīl, just as the Great Dog lies nearly to the S. of Orion and close to his feet. A further point is the allusion to the 'chains[6] of Kīmāh' (מַעֲדַנּוֹת כִּימָה), which on this interpretation yields a good sense, since Canis major is the hound of Orion.

(d) The meaning of מַזָּרוֹת (Job 38 32; see MAZZAROTH), is highly uncertain. By most scholars the term is supposed to be identical with מַזָּלוֹת (see MAZZALOTH), the worship of which, in conjunction with that of the sun, the

1 Stern is followed by G. Hoffmann (ZATW 3 107 f.) and by Nöldeke (Bib. Lex. 4 370).

2 Cp Homer, Od. 5 275, οἴη δ' ἄμμορός ἐστι λοετρῶν 'Ωκεανοῖο. Virg. Georg. 1 246, Arctos Oceani metuentis æquore tingi. Ovid, Met. 13 727, Arcton æquoris expertem.

3 It is also worthy of notice that R. Yehūda's explanation of 'āš as יותא, yūthā (Bĕrākhōth 58*b*) is interpreted by later Talmudists as זנב טלה, 'the tail of the Ram' (i.e., Pleiades), or ראש דעגלא, 'the head of the Bull' (i.e., Hyades).

1 The same rendering is employed for עָשׁ, Job 9 9, כֶּסֶל, Job 15 27, כְּסִיל, Amos 5 8. The Talmudic יותא, yūthā (note above), perhaps represents the same word with rejection of ע.

2 αβγ Orionis, named Betelgeuse, Rigel, and Bellatrix: the first and the second, of the first magnitude; the last, among the largest stars of the second magnitude.

3 On the phrase 'their kĕsīlīm' (כְּסִילֵיהֶם) in Is. 13 10 see ORION.

4 In 𝔊 Job 9 9, ὁ ποιῶν Πλειάδα καὶ Ἕσπερον καὶ Ἀρκτοῦρον καὶ ταμεῖα Νότου, it is quite clear that the order of the constellations has been changed, כימה being brought to the beginning and rendered Πλειάδα as in 38 31, whilst עש, which thus stands second, is translated Ἕσπερον as עיש in 38 32. This change of order, which seems to have been overlooked by critics, is substantiated by Pesh. ܗܘ ܕܥܒܕ ܟܝܡܐ ܘܥܝܘܬܐ ܘܓܒܪܐ ܘܐܣܪ̈ܐ ܕܟܠ ܬܝܡܢܐ.

5 For the ancients Sirius marked the time of greatest summer heat (Hom. Il. 22 27-31, Hes. Opp. 417, Sc. 397; etc.), and its connection with this period is still preserved in the popular expression 'the dog days.'

6 The rendering 'sweet influences' AV, RVmg. can be traced back to Sebastian Munster (1535 A.D.), but appears to be philologically untenable.

STARS

moon, and all the host of heaven, was put down by Josiah (2 K. 23 5); and 𝔊 in both passages employs the transliteration μαζουρωθ, whilst Targ., in accordance with Kings, uses in Job the rendering שׁטרי מזליא. In Rabbinic Hebrew the mazzālōth are the twelve zodiacal signs (Bĕrākhōth 32*b*; Shabbāth 75*a*), but also the planets, regarded as stars of good or ill fortune (Bĕrēshīth rab., § 10, 10*c*, etc.). In agreement with this latter signification, we have, according to the restoration of de Vogüé, the dedication למזל נעם answering to the Greek Ἀγαθῇ τύχῃ in a Phœnician inscription from Larnaca of about the 4th century B.C. (CIS 1 95). It is doubtful, however, whether we can safely argue back in explanation of the earlier use of the expression. In Arabic manzil denotes a 'lodging-place' or 'mansion'; and the plural al-manāzil is used of the twenty-eight 'mansions' of the moon. In Assyrian, according to Friedr. Delitzsch (Ass. HWB), manzazu denotes 'a place of standing,' from the root nazâzu 'to stand'; just as in Heb. מָקוֹם, 'place,' is derived from קום. Manzazu occurs on the fifth table of the Babylonian Creation series (see CREATION, § 2) which begins [1] 'He made the mansions (manzazi) of the great gods.' Further, there is a fem. form of manzazu—viz., manzaltu (= manzaztu), mazaltu. For this Delitzsch quotes 3 R. 59 35a: 'The gods in heaven in their mansions (man-zal-ti-šu-nu) set me.' Jensen (Kosmol. 347 f.) mentions the same facts. Whilst, however, Delitzsch identifies these manzalti with the zodiacal stations (Prol. 54), Jensen thinks that they were perhaps fifty in number,[2] corresponding to the number of the great gods, and represent, not merely the signs of the zodiac (cp Lockyer, Dawn of Astronomy, 133 ff.), but rather certain fixed stars and planets, lists of which are to be found in the inscriptions, but of which the identification appears to be possible only in a few cases (Kosm. 146 ff).[3] Here, then, it may be supposed that we have the original of mazzālōth of 2 K. 23 5; though, as is plain from the diverse opinions noticed above, the precise reference of these 'mansions,' as objects of worship borrowed by the people of Judah from the Babylonians, still remains uncertain.

With regard to mazzārōth, Stern is undoubtedly correct in stating that in the words of Job 38 32 'Canst thou bring forth mazzārōth in its season (בְּעִתּוֹ),' mazzārōth in conjunction with 'in its time' (בעתו) denotes a plurality which can be spoken of as a unity, and so a group of stars which form a single constellation. This consideration, which gains weight from the connection of mazzārōth with 'ayiš, kĕsīl, and kīmāh, each of which describes a single special star-group, cuts at the root of the identification of mazzārōth in Job with mazzālōth as mentioned in 2 K. 23 5, upon the view which has above been taken of the latter. The special constellation represented by mazzārōth can, however, in default of evidence, be merely conjectural. Stern's view, that the word denotes the Hyades, is not open to objection, and is to some extent supported by the position of mazzārōth after kīmāh and kĕsīl and before 'ayiš, according to the position of constellations in the heavens. But that this is the intention of the order of citation may be questioned, since in such a case the more natural method would be to reverse the order, and to speak of Pleiades, Hyades, Orion, Canis major, according to the order of rising. The Hyades were of meteorological importance to the ancients, who regarded their heliacal rising as the portent of wet weather (Hom. Il. 18 486; Hes. Opp. 613; Virg. Æn. 1 744, etc.). Stern, who would identify mazzārōth and mazzālōth, attempts to connect mazzālōth with the verb הִזִּיל (hizzīl) in the sense 'rain-producers'; but this is certainly inferior to the derivation adopted above (see further MAZZAROTH).

(e) The expression, 'the inner chambers of the south' (Job 9 9[1] חַדְרֵי תֵימָן, ḥadrē thēmān), is too indefinite to be taken as a reference to any special star or group of stars, such as the bright star Canopus or the constellation of the ship to which it belongs (Stern). Probably Dillmann is correct in suggesting that the author of Job, as a man of travel, would know that in journeying towards the S. more and more stars and constellations appear in the heavens, and might therefore reasonably refer in such terms to the stars of the southern hemisphere.

(f) On kēwān as a representation of the planet Saturn (Am. 5 26), hēlēl (?) as the planet Venus, and Dioscuri as the constellation Gemini (indirectly referred to in Acts 28 11), see CHIUN, LUCIFER, CASTOR AND POLLUX. [There is according to Crit. Bib., reason to think that the Arabic name of Saturn, zuḥalu, underlies the חזאל of 1 K. 19 15. It is held that the 'Hazael' referred to was probably a N. Arabian, not a Syrian, king. Adhuc sub judice lis est.]

4. Star-worship. It is highly improbable (cp CALF, GOLDEN) that the Hebrew tribes in Egypt came under the influence of the Egyptian religion, which was based upon the worship of the sun.

But such place-names as Beth-shemesh in SW. Judah, Har-ḥeres, Timnath-ḥeres, and Ḥeres on the E. of the Jordan permit the inference that the local Baal of the Canaanite, whose cults confronted the Israelites on their immigration into Canaan, was sometimes connected with the sun. See, however, SUN, and on this and other difficult points which here suggest themselves for consideration see ASHTORETH, BAAL, PHŒNICIA, § 11. On the much disputed statement of Am. 5 26 see CHIUN AND SICCUTH, SALMA.

Am. 5 26 introduces us to the subject of star-worship. The compiler of the Book of Kings regards the worship of 'all the host of heaven'—doubtless introduced from Babylonia—as one of the causes of the fall of the northern kingdom (2 K. 17 16). In the case of the kingdom of Judah we possess fuller information. Star-worship was here, apparently, not introduced before the time of Manasseh; but of this king it is related that he built altars to all the host of heaven in the two courts of the house of Yahwè (2 K. 21 5). Priests were appointed to offer sacrifice to the sun, the moon (see MOON), the mazzālōth (see above, § 3 [d]), and all the host of heaven, and special horses and chariots were dedicated to the worship of the sun, probably to be employed in processions (2 K. 23 4 5 11). Cp NATHAN-MELECH. It was not until the reformation in the 18th year of Josiah (B.C. 621) that measures were taken to root out this Babylonian astral worship (2 K. 23), owing to the influence of the book of Deuteronomy which contains special injunctions against the worship of the sun, moon, and stars (Dt. 17 2 f.; cp 4 19).

Josiah's efforts, however, were by no means wholly successful. The new cult seems to have been largely embraced by private individuals, who worshipped the heavenly bodies upon the roofs of their houses, burning offerings and pouring out libations (Zeph. 1 5 Jer. 8 2 19 13). More especially does the worship of the QUEEN OF HEAVEN (q.v.)—i.e., probably, Ištar as a celestial goddess—appear to have enjoyed popularity among women[2] (Jer. 7 18). The reformation of Josiah, which must have been mainly concerned with public and national religious abuses, could not eradicate such private cults. Ezekiel (writing in the 6th year of the captivity of Jehoiachin, 591 B.C.), pictures the worship of the sun as carried on at Jerusalem within the Temple-court (Ezek. 8 16 f.)[3] and, as Jeremiah assures us, even after the fall of Jerusalem the Jews still persisted in the worship of other gods, and especially of the queen of heaven (Jer. 44). The reference in Job 31 26 f. to the adoration of sun and moon by kissing of the hand sufficiently shows the danger which still beset the Jews when the poem of Job was written.

1 See Jensen, Kosmol. 288 ff.; Schrader, COT 1 15.
2 The number of the manzazi appears to have originally been given in the Creation tablet.
3 Jensen finds allusion to the zodiacal signs in the Maši stars of l. 2 of the Creation tablet above cited. The word misrāta (not mizrāta) or iṣrāta, which occurs in 1 3, cannot, with Sayce (Religion of Bab. 389), be identified with Mazzārōth.

The only distinct reference to astrology in the OT occurs in Is. 47 13, where the exilic writer, in predicting the imminent downfall of Babylon, advises her in mockery to resort to her astrologers, if perchance they may save her from the impending catastrophe. Several peculiar expressions are used (see 'Isa.' SBOT). The phrase 'dividers of the heavens' alludes to a division of the sky for the purposes of astrology, and the reference of 'the monthly prognosticators,' or, 'those who make known at every new moon' seems to be to the official reports drawn up by the Babylonian astrologers to be sent in to the king month by month (see MAGIC, § 3 [5]). Many such Assyrian reports are still extant, and one of them gives us an astrological calendar, each month or day of which is noted as being lucky or unlucky for the commencement of a campaign, or for other operations.[1]

5. Astrology.

The interest and importance of astrology to the Babylonians is well known. According to the Chaldean priest Berossus (quoted by Pliny, NH 7 57) astronomical observations had been carried on by the Babylonians for 490,000 years before his day. In the sixteenth century B.C., a great astrological work was drawn up on seventy clay tablets, and deposited in the library of Sargon of Agade (see Sayce in TSBA 1 45 ff.).

The word אַשָּׁפִים, aššāphīm, which (in its Aramaic as well as its Hebrew form) occurs several times in the Book of Daniel, is rendered 'astrologers' by AV (RV 'enchanters'); but this interpretation is merely assumed. The word is of Assyrian origin (aššapu, ašapu, etc.), and means rather sorcerer, charmer (COT on Dan. 2 4; Del. Proleg. 141; cp Syr. āšōphā).

A late evidence of the celebrity of Babylonian astrology appears in the narrative of the Messiah's star in Mt. 2. [On the star cp NATIVITY, § 18.] For whatever the description ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν ('from the East') may mean, the title magi (μάγοι: see ZOROASTRIANISM) implies that the lore of the wise men was Babylonian. The star which they saw at its rising (ἐν τῇ ἀνατολῇ) was evidently such as to be regarded as a portent only by practised astrologers. Herod and 'all Jerusalem' appear not to have noticed the phenomenon until their interest was aroused by the inquiries of the strangers, and then the king had to 'inquire diligently' the time of the star's appearance. Thus the hypothesis which represents the star as a comet or new star of exceptional brilliancy may be considered to be excluded. Kepler (De J. Chr. servatoris nostri vero anno natalitio, 1605 A.D.) thought of a close conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn in the constellation Pisces, which occurred in the year 747 A.U.C., and in this view he has found many followers (cp Ideler, Handb. d. Chronol. 2 399 ff.).[2] A similar conjunction in the year 1463 A.D. led the Portuguese Rabbi Abarbanel (1437-1509) to infer (Comm. on Daniel) that the birth of the Messiah was shortly to be expected. J. H. Stockwell (Astr. Jour. Nov. 26, 1892; quoted in Nature, Dec. 22, 1892) argues in favour of a conjunction of Jupiter and Venus which took place in the spring of 6 B.C.

It should be observed that the objection of Meyer (Comm. ad loc.), that the hypothesis of such a conjunction is excluded by the singular ἀστήρ, is quite alien to the question, since the reference of 'his star' would not necessarily refer to the conjunction taken as a whole, but rather to one member of the conjunction, which, by its peculiar position, was calculated to cast the nativity of the King of the Jews.

For star-worship see further NATURE WORSHIP, § 5. Cp Campbell Thomson, Reports of the Magicians and Astrologers of Nin. and Bab. in the Brit. Mus. (1900). C. F. B.

1 [In Is. 47 13 W. Muss-Arnolt (AJSL 16 223 [1900]), developing an idea of Zimmern, would read הַבָּרִים בשמים, 'those who scan the heavens,' בָּרִים being regarded as = bāru the Assyrian class-name for the soothsayers called seers. Another view, proposed in Crit. Bib., is to read line 2 of stanza 5 of the Song of Triumph thus,

וְיוֹשִׁיעֻךְ חֹבְרֵי ישמעאל | קסמי ירחמאל,

'Let the spell-repeaters of Ishmael, the diviners of Jerahmeel, deliver thee,' supposing בבל to mean the capital of Jerahmeel in N. Arabia. T. K. C.]

2 See, on the other hand, the damaging criticism of this view by C. Pritchard in Smith's DB, 'Star of the Wise Men'; also Mem. Roy. As. Soc. 25.

STATER. The word στατηρ means properly a weight, and was used generally by the Greeks for the unit of weight, corresponding to the eastern shékel.

There is no reason to doubt the current derivation of the word from the root στα-, to weigh; the attempt to connect it with Ištar (Jensen, ZA 14 183, and Johns, Assyr. Deeds and Documents, 2 284), apart from philological difficulties, rests on the assumption that money was originally coined in Nineveh, and that some early coin might bear the head or figure of the city goddess Ištar.

The word is used in Mt. 17 27 (AV 'piece of money,' RV 'shekel'), where it means a stater or four-drachm piece of the Phœnician standard. As regards the actual coin intended, it must have been a stater either of Tyre or of Antioch, since at the time concerned these were the only mints issuing coin of the right standard. Under SHEKEL (§ 5) will be found an illustration of the silver didrachm or half-stater of Tyre; the figure given here represents a silver stater of Antioch.

Stater of Antioch.

The obverse bears the head of Augustus with the title ΚΑΙΣΑΡΟΣ ΣΕΒΑΣΤΟΥ. On the reverse is a figure of the Fortune of the City of Antioch seated on a rock, wearing a mural crown, and holding a palm branch; at her feet is the river-god Orontes, in the attitude of swimming, half-emerging from the waves. (This type is a copy of the famous group by the sculptor Eutychides set up soon after the foundation of Antioch.)

The coin is dated 'in the thirtieth year of victory'—i.e., of the era of Actium—and 'in the thirteenth consulship' of the emperor; hence it belongs to the year 2-1 B.C. This specimen weighs 229.5 grs. troy. Others of other dates bear the name of Antioch (Ἀντιοχέων μητροπόλεως).

Staters or shekels are probably meant by the word ἀργύρια used for the 'thirty pieces of silver' (Mt. 26 15 27 3 5).

That denarii (see PENNY, § 1) cannot be meant is proved by the analogy of Ex. 21 32 (thirty shekels of silver the price of a servant gored by an ox) and Zech. 11 12 f. (where denarii are out of the question). On the other hand, the 50,000 pieces of silver of Acts 19 19 (the value of the magical books) may have been denarii, as indeed the Vulgate translates them. G. F. H.

STEPHANAS (στεφανας [Ti. WH]), a member of the Corinthian church. His 'household' (cp the household of CÆSAR [q.v.]), 'the first fruits of Achaia,' had been baptized by Paul, and its members had afterwards distinguished themselves by the zeal with which they had set themselves to minister to the saints (1 Cor. 1 16 16 15), the ministry intended being doubtless chiefly that of hospitality. Of Stephanas personally, all that we learn is that, along with Fortunatus and Achaicus, he had brought news to the apostle at Ephesus which had 'refreshed his spirit' (1 Cor. 16 17 f.).

STEPHEN

The narrative in Acts (§§ 1 f. 7).
The charge (§ 3).
The speech (§ 4 f.).
Style of the narrative (§ 8).
Significance of episode (§ 9).
Bibliography (§ 10).

Stephen (ϹΤΕΦΑΝΟϹ) in the NT is the name borne by an early Christian agent in Jerusalem, who was the first to suffer for his faith. As narrated in Acts (6 1-8 3, cp 11 19 22 20) the pregnant and tragic episode of Stephen falls into three sections: (a) the prologue (6 1-15), containing an account (i.) of Stephen's appointment as one of the Seven, and (ii.) of his subsequent arrest; (b) the speech (7 1-53) which he is represented as having delivered upon that occasion; and (c) the epilogue of his murder and its effects (7 54-8 3). Although by common consent this narrative is regarded critically as undeniably historical, it requires to be subjected to a close analysis before it can be employed as evidence for its period.

1. Acts 6 1-7. The isolated character of 6 1-6 [7] indicates that the editor here has a special source or tradition before him. Note the first occurrence of 'disciples,' μαθηταί, the solitary instance (in Acts) of 'the Twelve' (cp Lk. 8 1), the church still meeting as one small body (as against 4 4 5 14), the conception of communal charity (cp COMMUNITY OF GOODS, § 5, and O. Holtzmann, Ztschr. für Kirchengesch. 14 327-336), and the strange position of the Seven (ACTS, § 10) who, though ostensibly appointed to the delicate and responsible subordinate task of superintending charity and money-matters (see Field, Otium Norvicense, pars tertia, 1899, p. 113), really do as spiritual work[1] as the apostles (cp 6 8 f. 8 4 f. 21 8; Holtzmann, HC 1 2 [1901], 52-54). The irrelevant summary of 6 7 is certainly an editorial addition which, like 5 14, interrupts the run of the narrative. For the increase of the church has nothing to do with what immediately precedes, and the conversion of priests has no connection with what follows. 6 8 f. is the original and natural sequel to 6 1-6. 6 1-6 has, indeed, a retrospective glance. It sums up the primitive Jerusalem-period (1 8) of the history, as 6 7—where otherwise the words 'in Jerusalem' (ἐν Ἱερουσαλήμ) would be superfluous—is meant definitely to show; but its main object is prospective. The editor's aim is to introduce two new figures in Philip (8 4-39; see col. 3697-8) and especially Stephen (6 8-8 3), whose activities form the pivot of the next stage in the early church's history, as well as to connect Antioch (6 5 11 19-21) with the new mission-impulse. There may be a dramatic touch in 6 1 f., where the preceding outward success of the young church is set beside the first sign of inner friction. Yet the immediate interest of the historian is not this juxtaposition or even the office of the Seven—a vague order, who drop out of sight at once—but with the man who was their most prominent member, and who found before long that his energy led to his arrest 6 8-15.

Like some or all, perhaps, of his fellow-officials Stephen was probably a Hellenist—i.e., a Greek-speaking Jew resident in some Greek city (HELLENISM, § 2)—and it is significant that his opponents (probably including Paul himself, 22 3) came from his compatriots (see LIBERTINES, DISPERSION, §§ 17 f., 22, CILICIA, § 3, PROSELYTE, §§ 3 f., also the Lucan touch in Lk. 21 16, 'delivered up by kinsmen'). The circumstances of their origin rendered Hellenists often somewhat suspect in the eyes of rigid Palestinian Jews. Hence, by the operation of a common psychological law, many of them—so far from being more liberal and open-minded—cultivated exceptional strictness and suspiciousness in the practice of their religion. Just as the convert frequently outdoes those born in the faith by his eager zeal to accentuate the difference between his past and his present, so Hellenists were by no means ipso facto emancipated from the particularism of the Jewish faith. Their 'colonial life' did not naturally create an atmosphere in which 'the hard lines faded and the ideal depths were opened.'[1] In practice and theory, as the subsequent narrative shows (cp 9 29 21 27 22 3 f.), they often attached themselves to the most pronounced and bigoted habits of Judaism practised by the Pharisees. And this throws light at once upon their antipathy to Stephen, who perhaps had set himself to labour among his former associates (6 9 f.), no less than upon his own exceptional character. To their scrupulous conscience he appeared a renegade, a discredit to them personally and a revolutionary force within the religious praxis of the nation. They were the first to detect and challenge this liberal preacher, and their antagonism proves that his wider outlook and unique grasp of the spirituality of religion were by no means an inevitable product of his training. As in the case of Paul, so with Stephen: Hellenism furnished merely the soil of the religious growth (6 5 8 10).

2. Acts 6 8-15. The dual nature of the narrative in 6 8-15, fluctuating between the riotous justice of a mob and a trial before the Sanhedrin, is patent.[2] As almost all the critical editors are agreed, the conception of a trial is editorial or subordinate, and the alternatives are to regard the passage as a combination of two sources or as a single source edited and modified. In the case of a single source, the alterations and additions (possibly due to a correct enough impression of the speech and situation) are to be found in vv. 11 f. (13) 15 (in whole or part); so e.g., Weiss, Wendt, and Moffatt. In the case of two sources, it is most tempting to agree with those (Spitta, J. Weiss, Hilgenfeld) who find the second (inferior) source in 12*b*-15 (12*b*-14, Jüngst). The isolated allusion to miracles in v. 8, and the better connection of v. 9 with either 5 or 7, suggest that v. 8 is also editorial.[3] Why the Sanhedrin-notion was introduced, it is not easy to say. Probably the editor regarded the Sanhedrin as the representative body of the Jews, just as he concluded the apostles to stand for the Christian community, and considered that here as hitherto any Jewish prosecution must proceed from or at least through them, to be judicial and regular. Whether this idea was purely pragmatic, or based upon some independent oral

[1] The pragmatism of the editor is shown in 6 6 where he suggests that the apostles' ratification was needed for every new office and departure (cp 13 1-3) in the church (even though in this case the recipients of their blessing were already full of the Spirit, v. 5), and that those who afterwards became preachers to the Gentiles were sanctioned by the heads of the Christian community. It is certainly not Stephen's efforts in charity organisation which involve him in the controversy of 6 9 f. On the other hand, the incident of this internal discussion and its satisfactory treatment indicates not merely a certain liberality of spirit—however tardy—on the part of the Hebraist majority but also an absence of ecclesiastical pretension on the part of the apostles, since their action showed that the church was to be a church indeed: 'not a mere horde of men ruled absolutely by the Apostles, but a true body politic, in which different functions were assigned to different members' (Hort, Christian Ecclesia, 52). Both of these ideas were probably present to the editor of Acts (cp CHURCH, § 11). Cp also 1 Pet. 4 11.

[1] Martineau (Seat of Authority, 631), who goes on, however, to point out that the fusion of Jewish and heathen thought in Hellenistic culture could not of itself have produced the Christian universalism. That reaches back, past Stephen, to Jesus and 'his infinite longing to open the soul of man to the life in God, unhindered by the mediation of priest and ritual. Thus the fountain of catholicity is in no confluence of philosophic, no combination of external conditions, but in the unique personality of Jesus of Nazareth.'

[2] Similarly in the account given by Josephus (Ant. 20 9) of James's murder some thirty years later (see JAMES, § 3; and von Dobschütz, Die Urchristlichen Gemeinden (1902), 110 f. 121 f., 272). It is curious that these two martyrs, who represented the opposite wings of early Christian sentiment, should die—or be represented as dying—in somewhat similar fashion.

[3] Bacon drastically regards 6 11-7 1 (reproducing Mk. 14 55-60), 7 55-56 58*a*-60 8 1*a c*, 3 (reproducing Acts 22 4 f. 20 26 10 Lk. 22 69 23 34 46) as editorial modifications added to bring the speech into line with the general Lucan scheme; whilst the reference to miracles in 6 8 has been substituted for the substance of 9 29 (unhistorically—cp Gal. 1 21-24—transferred to Paul), and the words 'and of them of Cilicia and Asia' (καὶ τῶν ἀπὸ Κιλικίας καὶ Ἀσίας) in 6 9 are an editorial (cp 7 58 8 1) addition to a source which knew of only one synagogue (i.e., an Alexandrian or North African one).

tradition which alluded to an appearance of Stephen before the Sanhedrin, or an inference from the rôle undoubtedly played by it in the subsequent persecution, we are not able to determine. The slight obscurity resting on the details shows that the editor's distance from the period prevented him from supplementing in strictly accurate fashion the gaps in his source. Fortunately the haze does not blur the main outlines of what happened: Stephen's arrest was the result of a popular émeute, which restrained itself just long enough to allow him to defend himself before a suspicious and exasperated audience, which numbered—perhaps unofficially—several members of the Sanhedrin.

3. The charge against Stephen. Stephen's persistent propaganda had created quite a new situation. The people (6 12 cp 2 47 5 13) were now up in arms against Christianity, and the charge was both grave and religious. Whether 6 11 or 6 13 f. be taken as the original source, the accusation was that of rank blasphemy against the Mosaic law and the temple-cultus. To rigid high-churchmen, like these Pharisaic Hellenists (cp APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, §§ 56, 58), and indeed to the people as a whole, especially in the capital, where prejudices naturally ran hot and hard, it seemed a horrid impiety to suggest that these ancestral privileges (law and cultus) were neither final nor absolutely essential means of grace. Stephen had probably appealed to the authority of certain familiar sayings of Jesus, analogous to, if not identical with, those cited in Mk. 7 13-23 13 2 14 58 (cp 15 29 ||.)[1] Without suggesting that Stephen spoke disrespectfully of the law or of the temple[2]—which would have been untrue to the spirit of Jesus (particularly when Lk. had expressly maintained the genuinely Jewish piety of Jesus and his attendance on the temple, Lk. 2 22-49), as well as out of keeping with the normal tone of contemporary Christianity—Lk. implies that Stephen had assumed an attitude less of antagonism than of comparative indifference to such national institutions, refusing to treat (e.g.) the sacrificial system as of absolute validity for Jews who believed in a Messiah about to return and establish a spiritual era. Zealots are angered as much by a refusal to echo their beliefs to the letter as by deliberate opposition; to ignore their tenets is as keen an insult as to attack them; and it is a fair inference from the historical data to assume that the negative and positive aspects of Stephen's preaching were alike interpreted by the sterner fanatics as a danger and a defection. Their fierce attachment resented his looser attitude as bitterly as a Roman procurator's public insults. Like one of their number, who afterwards recanted, they were shrewd enough to anticipate disastrous consequences to Judaism, if such liberal ideas prevailed (Gal. 1 13 f.).

4. The speech: its nature. In its extant form the speech put into the mouth of Stephen is, like the other addresses of Acts, the composition of an author who possesses considerable historical insight into his subject; the diction, style, and general standpoint of the address are sufficient to show its Lucan colouring and ability (cp 13 16-41, and the frequent analogies to Lk. 1-2, Acts 7 48 = 17 24, etc.). In the nature of the case, too, it is impossible to think of hearers taking down a verbatim report, or of the author having access to such archives of the court as furnished later martyrologists with graphic and accurate details of a Christian's last defence and struggles. But, from the verisimilitude of the contents as a whole[1] and the points which differentiate it alike from Petrine and from Pauline speeches, it is plain that the source drawn upon by the editor, to say nothing of such oral traditions (from Paul and other eye-witnesses, like Philip) as may have reached him, must have sprung from the vivid memories of some early Christians, possibly Hellenistic refugees at Antioch or Cæsarea; judged on the principles of comparative historical criticism, the speech therefore takes high rank as substantially exact. It is not difficult to suppose that so memorable a death—memorable for its consequences to the early church, as well as for its intrinsic details—made an exceptionally deep impression upon contemporaries,[2] and that this impression passed rapidly into some literary shape. Certainly the speech, as it stands, does not give one the impression of an unpremeditated reply, and (as many scholars have noticed) it hardly lies in line with the historical situation presupposed, even when the latter is critically analysed. But though the report is probably inadequate, it echoes an impromptu survey of history delivered from a familiar position. Elaborate rather than extempore, yet with gaps for all its elaborateness, it is an outline or authentic summary, representing in all likelihood ideas often repeated by Stephen in his synagogue-preaching as he encountered objections urged by people who, in ostentatious reliance upon the authority of Moses, found the rejection of Jesus by his nation an insuperable barrier to faith in him as the true Messiah, and also cavilled at his attitude towards the ancestral law and temple of the land. The speaker does not seize the occasion to preach repentance to the audience. Nor does he even attempt to clear himself specifically from the charges brought against him, being sensible from the first that the case was hopeless. His aim is to say all he has to say,[3] and he manages to do this by giving a reading of history in the light of religious experience—a light that is intensified as the speech proceeds, and hurriedly closes with a flash of lightning.

In several details of this speech, as elsewhere, Acts illustrates

1 Cp Keim, J. v. Naz. (ET), 1 71 f. 5 226-230. There can be little doubt (but cp SON OF MAN) that Jesus did actually anticipate a messianic triumph for himself which involved at his return the downfall, not merely the supersession, of the Jewish temple; and yet a passage like Rev. 11 1 f. indicates how unable certain Judaistic circles of primitive Christianity were to sympathise with this outlook. It is true that, even beyond the Essenes (ESSENES, § 5), there were abroad in Judaism movements of thought which attached quite a subordinate value to the sacrificial cultus and the temple itself (cp Holtzmann, NT Theol. 1 104 f. 391 f.). These, however, could hardly be very influential in Jerusalem, although the Alexandrian culture of Stephen probably made him susceptible to such tendencies parallel with the teaching of Jesus. He does not notice, what a modern reader would be impressed by, that the very temple in question (6 13) had been erected by a man whose sympathies could not be termed—in any sense of the term—Jewish by conviction (see ISRAEL, § 88). A rather ancient reading which adds, after 'nation' (ἔθνος) in Lk. 23 2, 'and destroying the law and the prophets' (καὶ καταλύοντα τὸν νόμον καὶ τοὺς προφήτας)—is found not only in some Latin MSS but also in Marcion.

2 The greater prominence assigned to the temple in Stephen's oration is due historically to the fact that Jesus, to whom he appealed as his authority, had—once at least—spoken more explicitly upon the cultus than upon the law, and intrinsically to the fact that the one involved the other. Since the exile 'the cultus was but a portion of the law, to be minutely maintained no doubt, but maintained because the law ordained it. God's glory and Israel's were realised, not in the temple-worship, but in the fulfilment of the law of which that worship was but a part' (Montefiore, Hibbert Lect. 387). Notice that if Lk. omits Mt. 17 24-27 he also omits Mt. 12 6. On the early Christian conception of God's spirituality and the universalism it implied, see Titius, Die vulgäre Anschauung von der Seligkeit im Urchrist. 8 f. (1900).

1 'In psychological truth it has not its like in all Acts' (Spitta, 117). At the same time this long speech, the longest in the whole book, is evidently meant and (less evidently) arranged by the author to subserve the general apologetic motives of the volume. The writer's sense of the situation and the literary ability he displays here are the kind of evidence which makes it not irrelevant to say that Acts is 'the only one of the NT books which anyone would think of calling clever' (W. H. Simcox, Early Church History, 41).

2 It is certain, however, that Stephen died under the stones. The narrative lends no support to the idea (Wendt) that he recovered (cp 14 19 f.) in time to breathe his last among pious Christians who heard him repeat his testimony. The devout men who buried him were, in all likelihood, respectable Jews who had little or no sympathy with the fanatical excesses of their fellow-citizens.

3 Consonant with the Lucan idea of Lk. 21 13, where the sense of Mk. 13 9 is altered into that of arrest giving an opportunity for witnessing to the gospel.

STEPHEN

the midrashic tendency which had already embellished OT stories with rabbinic modifications and enlargements (see CHRONICLES, § 6, HISTORICAL LITERATURE, §§ 14 f.). No significance attaches to the apparent confusion of Horeb and Sinai (7 29 f., cp Ex. 3 1; MIDIAN, SINAI), the use of the round number 400 in v. 6 (as occasionally in Josephus), the divergence between 7 29 and Ex. 2 14 f. (cp Heb. 11 27), the loose version of 2 S. 7 2 f. in Acts 7 46 and of Ex. 1 16 22 in Acts 7 19, or the alteration of 'Damascus' into 'Babylon' (v. 43). Other variations and innovations,[1] however, are more serious. Thus (a) in 7 2 the theophany to Abraham is antedated (as by Philo and Josephus), nor can an interpolation (Blass, St. Kr. 1896, 460 f.) be suspected; (b) Terah's initiative is ignored and his death antedated in 7 4 (as in Philo; see rabbinic traditions cited by Hamburger on this point); (c) Jacob's family is numbered (v. 14) not after the Massoretic (70=Gen. 46 27 Ex. 1 5) but after the 𝔊 text (75: known already to Philo); (d) Shechem is confused (v. 16) with Machpelah in Hebron, and all the patriarchs—instead of Joseph only—buried at Shechem (perhaps a Lucan home-thrust [see GOSPELS, § 109] at the contempt felt by rigid Jews for the Samaritans; see Lk. 9 51 f. 10 33 17 11 f. Acts 1 8 8 4 f.), a curious divergence not only from the OT narrative but even from the tradition followed by Josephus who buries them all at Hebron (Ant. ii. 8 2); (e) vv. 20-24 are tinged with the Jewish legends (MOSES, §§ 20 f.), current also in Philo and Josephus, upon Moses' beauty, eloquence (in contradiction to Ex. 4 10 f.), wisdom, and martial prowess, v. 25 (acquitting Moses of rash violence and making his chivalrous interference the first step in the deliverance) being reproduced from the tradition in Philo, Vit. Mos. 1 8 f. and Jos. Ant. ii. 9 2 f.; (f) the rabbinic division of the lawgiver's life into three periods of forty years each, is followed in vv. 23 36; (g) the 'Red Sea' (v. 36) is an Alexandrian touch (Wisd. 10 18 19 7 1 Macc. 4 2 Heb. 11 29), taken evidently from Ass. Mos. 3 10 f. 'nonne hoc est quod testabatur nobis tum Moyses in profetiis, qui multa passus est in Ægypto et in mari rubro et in eremo annos quadraginta'; (h) the association of angelic agency with the law (7 36 53), though free from the depreciatory spirit of Gal. 3 29 Heb. 2 2, etc., is like them (cp Everling, Die paul. Angelologie, 61-65) due to the rabbinic development of Dt. 33 2 𝔊 (cp Jos. Ant. xv. 5 3); and (i) the citation from Amos in vv. 42 f. reproduces the mistranslation of an obscure and corrupt original (cp AMOS, § 13, CHIUN, MOLECH, § 1), Stephen arguing—in opposition to the normal and traditional view—that while the wilderness period had its divine means of grace (v. 44), it was yet a period of idolatry and apostasy punished by the Exile.

Such phenomena, though quite minor in importance, indicate a speaker or an author who is drawing upon his memory of popular religious tales and has been trained in the spirit of that Alexandrian Judaism which, for all its reverence, could sit wonderfully free to the letter and even the traditions of the OT records.

In his brilliant and skilful address (7 2-8 9-16 17-43 44-50 51-53), Stephen urges one or two extremely effective and apposite arguments, which amount to a counter-accusation against his opponents. In the opening sketch of patriarchal history, which is quite in keeping with the sententious and discursive style often affected by Orientals in unfolding some grave issue, the speaker is mainly concerned to explain the origin of the covenant and promise[2] which culminated in the Mosaic legislation and the Solomonic temple. But he manages indirectly to express his personal reverence for God (6 11, cp 7 2 55) and the temple (6 13, cp 7 7), as well as the common ancestry of Jew and Christian alike (our father, 7 2, cp 12, etc., also Lk. 1 73). Then comes the development of two leading ideas; one already suggested, the other novel, yet both showing his desire to justify himself by an appeal to the original basis and trend of OT revelation. (a) Charged with depreciating

6. Contents.

[1] The use of ἐκκλησία (38, cp 8 1 3) is deliberate. The author hints at the normal position of the early Christians, who never dreamed of founding a sect but of continuing and developing the ancient people of God—to whom they served themselves as lineal heirs.

[2] Cp Rom. 9 4 'Israelites, whose is the glory [Acts 7 2] and the covenants [cp Acts 7 8] and the giving of the law [Acts 7 38 53], and the [divine] service [Acts 7 7] and the promises' [Acts 7 5]—(Ἰσραηλῖται, ὧν ἡ δόξα, καὶ αἱ διαθῆκαι, καὶ ἡ νομοθεσία, καὶ ἡ λατρεία καὶ αἱ ἐπαγγελίαι). The allusion to the other prerogative of the 'inheritance' (ἡ κληρονομία, Acts 7 5) is too incidental to afford any basis for a theory (Bacon) which regards this section in the speech as an attempt to show the Alexandrian spiritualising of the territorial 'inheritance' into a non-local worship (Lk. 1 73-75). 7 5 is answered by 7 45. Stephen does not, like the author of Ep. Barn., spiritualise 'the inheritance' by denying any local material fulfilment of it; he merely argues that, however real, the local and national culmination of it in the history of Israel was not final, implying that its fulfilment lay in the far future (cp Heb. 4 1 f. 8-11).

the temple, he argues (40-43 44-50) that neither law nor temple had come until comparatively late in the national history, the temple in fact only in Solomon's reign; yet, previously to that, the spiritual revelation of God had been carried on in foreign lands (for Abraham, v. 2, Moses, vv. 30 33, and Israel, v. 38). Even the temple itself, as the prophets testified, formed no adequate or absolute medium for such a spiritual revelation (the tacit inference being, of course, that it could not therefore be any blasphemy or treachery to OT religion to assert, as Jesus had done, that even the temple was not indispensable or final).[1] And as for the law of Moses (b), with its divine vitality and power (to which, answering 6 13 f., Stephen does ample justice, 38 53), not only had it, like the temple, been preceded by revelations (e.g., of circumcision), but its founder had been misunderstood (7 25 Lk. 2 50), rejected, and thwarted by the very people (in Egypt 24-35, in the wilderness 36-39) to whom God had sent him as ruler and redeemer. Thankless, perverse, and obtuse: such had been their nature all along. Hence their failure to welcome Jesus with his authority and creative power to establish a new and final form of worship which should correspond to the ideal of the OT. This resistance, so far from being loyalty to religion, spelt both unfaithfulness and disaster to it, representing indeed a conservatism to the letter and the form of religion which the fresh and fuller current of the spirit would leave stranded. Moses predicted[2] that the Messiah would be a second Moses, and Stephen argues vehemently (in quite a characteristic Lucan fashion, cp Lk. 16 29 f. 24 27 f. Acts 28 23, etc.) that the true observance of the Law would lead its devotees to Jesus (51-53): real loyalty to the Law and the prophets culminates in Christian faith, the line of continuity running from the OT prophets to the gospel of Christ. Whereas, he grimly suggests, Jesus had been indeed a second Moses:[3] his rejection, due to the same obstinacy and rebellious spirit (51 f.) that Moses and his successors[4] (52) encountered, is really a proof of his genuine Messiahship. In short, the argument ends with a flashing retort. Stephen hurls back the charge of disloyalty on his accusers, implying, in characteristically Alexandrian and yet also in OT fashion, that the Jewish

[1] Stephen's reference to the Solomonic temple is curt and cool, but intended to depict its relative worth rather than its utter incompatibility with OT religion. His point, driven home by the citation from Is. 66 1 f., is that God is not bound to the temple in Jerusalem, but free to reveal himself in wider and less external ways; compared to the spiritual worship of God given by Jesus (4 1 48), even the temple service is merely another golden calf. It is obvious that, in a book circulated after 70 A.D., this line of argument would be specially apt, proving that the destruction of the temple was no irreparable loss to religion.

[2] v. 37 is of cardinal moment to the argument of the speech in its extant form, since it destroys the Jewish claim that the Mosaic cultus and legislation were final. The prophet-Messiah, as a second Moses, at least equal to the first in authority, must have the right to supersede or transcend previous revelations. True, the Jews had rejected him whom Stephen claimed as the true Messiah. But that was no decisive argument against him, for they had done the same to the first Moses. Thus, although v. 37 has all the appearance of a parenthesis or editorial addition of Lk., even so it would only sharpen an idea already present in the original and (like 6 11) reflect a correct reading of the primitive source.

[3] So the Lucan addition (7 10) 'and wisdom' καὶ σοφίαν (cp 22)=Lk. 2 40 52 (Bacon)? The idea dominates the Clementine Recognitions (e.g., 1 36). Cp Acts 3 13 f.=7 35 (Lk. 6 22 f.). Of course the Messianic interpretation of Dt. 18 15 f., reproduced in Acts 7 37, is a misapplication of the original sense, which refers not to an individual but to a succession or order of prophets in Israel.

[4] Why the prophets (42-52)? Because (WRS, OTJC, 294 f.) they had vainly but vigorously protested against the formal tendencies of OT piety which with the temple became crystallised into yet more ceremonial worship. Without pronouncing the establishment of the temple itself a fresh token of the nation's sensuous bias, the speaker plainly hints that the Levitical ritual had thereby acquired a fatal prominence which tended to obliterate that spiritual worship for which the prophets stood, and to produce the further effect of rendering the worshippers incapable of estimating God's better and spiritual revelation.

rejection of Jesus was an integral part of the sensuous temper and externalism with which they had all along been blind and dull to the spiritual significance of the Law and the prophets.[1] Circumcision they had had; but it had brought no moral devotion (8, 58). Prophets they had had; yet only to disbelieve and persecute (37 42 48 52). A spiritual and heavenly law (λόγια ζῶντα, 'vim vitalem habentes,' Blass) they had received;[2] yet only to prove unfaithful to it (38 f., 53) by turning it into a dead letter.

7. Acts 7 54-8 3. As we possess only an epitome of the speech, it is useless to inquire whether vv. 51-53[3] imply some interruption on the part of the angry audience, now awakening to the speaker's drift, or whether some part of the source has been omitted by the editor (Schwanbeck). The words are abrupt and final. This curt, stinging thrust, which formed the climax of the harangue, roused a heat of anger in the audience which, at Stephen's further blasphemous cry (56), passed into a scream of horror. Nothing is said about any formal conviction before the Sanhedrin. The offender is simply stoned to death outside the city—the regular method and place of punishment for blasphemy (Lev. 24 14-16, cp Lk. 4 29).

For the Jews to put any criminal thus to death upon their own responsibility was utterly illegal (cp Jn. 18 31); and the difficulty of the story is enhanced by the absence of any explicit evidence to show that a year or two after the death of Jesus Roman authority in the capital was seriously relaxed, or that—as afterwards (61, 62 A.D.) at the murder of James the brother of Jesus—an interregnum between two procurators was taken advantage of, or that the sentence of the Sanhedrin was formally connived at, if not ratified, by the Roman officials. At the same time, the broad unquestionable fact that the Jews proceeded to persecute the Christians without hindrance, whilst the Christians not merely fled from Jerusalem, where the Roman power was strong, but never had recourse to the civil power as a shield against their tormentors, suggests that the Jewish authorities must have had some sanction or other[4] for their outburst, although the historian—wishing perhaps[5] to convey the impression that such

1 Stephen makes no attempt to explain the cause of this obduracy. He seems to regard it as innate. In Ep. Barn. 9 f., where the allegorical interpretation of the Mosaic customs is propounded as their original sense, the failure of the Jews to apprehend this is attributed to the influence of an evil angel (ἐσόφιζεν αὐτούς) and to their lapse into idolatry. Stephen's speech, upon the other hand (as Sabatier rightly points out), is at once the complement and the development of Jesus' parable in Lk. 20 9 f. As a historical retrospect it is unduly severe; but as a word for the immediate situation of the speaker it possessed a telling force. The thought of 7 51 f. is remarkably in line (cp O. Holtzmann, Leben Jesu, 336) with Lk. 13 34 f. (cp 11 49), where Jesus speaks in the name of God, who has repeatedly sent messengers to the Jews, and finally the Messiah, only to meet the same fate. See Ep. Barn. 5 11 'So the Son of God came in the flesh in order that he might sum up and complete the sins of those who persecuted his prophets to the death.'

2 Stephen does not go nearly as far as Ep. Barn. (4 6-8) which flatly denies that the Jews possessed the real law of God: 'ours it is, they lost it' by the idolatrous aberration mentioned in Acts 7 39-41. He distinctly upholds the living authority of the Law (in contrast to Paul, Gal. 3 21); only, whilst Ep. Barn. 14 1-4 denies that the Jews ever got this divine covenant, Stephen argues that they got it and failed to keep it (Acts 7 53). So 4 Esd. 14 29 f. from the Jewish standpoint: 'our fathers received the law of life which they kept not, which ye also have transgressed after them'; also Acts 15 10.

3 Lucan close to original (48-50), Holtzmann, ZWT (1885), 434-438. McGiffert finds in them the theme of the speech, viz., that temple-worship is not enough, demanding obedient and spiritual hearts among the worshippers. But there is nothing distinctively Christian in such an attitude.

4 Though this finds no support in the words 'I gave my vote,' κατήνεγκα ψῆφον (26 10), which are merely a rhetorically vivid expression of agreement (8 1). Paul was not a member of the Sanhedrin.

5 Consonant with his usual tendency to emphasise the Jews as the real enemies of the faith and to avoid blaming the Roman authorities. The first martyrdom of Christianity was brought about by false evidence and tumultuous justice on the part of the Jewish authorities (as 12 1 f., etc.), and betokened no collision of the Roman authorities with the new faith.

violence was illegal—has failed to notice it. The fairest solution of the critical problem is to suppose that Stephen perished in a fanatical riot, the account of which ended with 8 2. The editor, however, has added not merely 6 11 f., 15 but also 7 58 8 1*b*, 3 to the original source, drawing in the latter interpolations upon a tradition which was no doubt accurate.

The editorial hand, or a different source, in at least 7 58 8 1*b*, 3 is widely recognised—e.g. by Bleek, Weiss (adding 7 55 59*b c*), Clemen, Sorof, Krüger (TLZ 1885, 299), Wendt, Hilgenfeld (adding 56, 59), Schmiedel (ACTS, § 10), Moffatt (Historical New Test., 429, 431, 667-670), and Bacon. Originally the source (58 f.) ran 'they stoned Stephen,' etc. (ἐλιθοβόλουν τὸν Στέφανον κ.τ.λ.); the insertion of 58*b* left 'stoned' without an object, and necessitated its repetition awkwardly in 59. Again 8 1*a* is obviously parenthetic, whilst 8 3 repeats the proleptic 8 1*b c* unless the latter be also excised (as by Weiss and Schmiedel). It is plain that Stephen died, not on the testimony of witnesses (6 13 7 58*b*), but on account of his own recent word and confession. The references to Saul, which are quite authentic, link the source to what follows, and it is needless to dwell on the dramatic effect[1] of this silent figure watching the opening struggle of a campaign in which he himself was presently to play so diverse and prominent a part.[2] A similar result in general is reached by those who bisect the whole narrative—e.g., Feine (6 1-6 12-14 7 2-21 29-34 44-50 57 f. 8 1*a* 3 with 6 11 15 7 22-28 35-43 51-53 54-56 59 f. 8 1*b*-2), Jüngst (6 9 f. 12*c*-14 7 1-21 29-34 44-50 58*b*-60 8 1*b c*, with 6 1-6, 7*b c*-8 11 15 7 22-28 35-43 51-58*a* 8 1*a* 2-3), and Spitta (6 1-6 9-12*a* 7 2-54 57-58*a* 8 1*b*-2, with 6 7 f. 12*b*-15 7 1 55 f. 58*b*-60 8 1*a* 3), or by less radical investigators such as Blass (7 59*b*, a Lucan touch) and Ramsay (7 58 8 1, Lucan touches reproducing Paul's agonised confession when Philip narrated the episode, 6 9-8 39, at Cæsarea). If one is disinclined to follow those who (Spitta, J. Weiss, Hilgenfeld, etc.) adhere to the substantial integrity, as to the historicity, of the speech, the most tenable alternative is to consider that it represents a single source more or less edited (B. Weiss, Wendt, Holtzmann): it is quite in keeping with the author's practice in the third gospel (Wernle, Synoptische Frage, 18, cp 146) to deal more freely with narratives than with discourses in the traditional materials which lay before him.

The chief linguistic terms characteristic of 6 1-8 3 (especially in the speech), which do not recur elsewhere either in Acts or in the rest of the NT literature, are:—'defend,' †ἀμύνω (7 24); 'murder,' †ἀναίρεσις (8 1); 'resist,' †ἀντιπίπτω (7 51); 'uncir-

1 The whole story is full of admirable effects produced by an author who could write effectively as well as piously; e.g., the literary art shown in the sonorous opening of the speech, dramatic touches like the glow of 6 15, 'they understood not,' 'and kept it not,' and 'he fell asleep' (contrasting this death with the three already mentioned, viz., Judas, Ananias, and Sapphira), the vision of 7 59 with Jesus standing (not 'sitting' as usual) to welcome his martyr (cp Rev. 5 6), the contrast of Stephen's denunciation and his forgiving spirit, and the oratorical handling of the various themes in the harangue. 7 59 f. seems to echo a belief that the spirits of the dead (especially the martyrs) passed directly to God: cp Titius, 45; Schür. Hist. ii. 2 180.

2 See PAUL, § 7. Mommsen (ZNW, 1901, 85 f.), taking ἐν τῷ γένει μου (Gal. 1 14) in its local sense (=birthplace, cp Acts 4 26 18 2 24), considers that Paul directed his attack upon the separatists (including e.g., Andronicus and Junias? Rom. 16 7) in Tarsus; which gives a good sense to Gal. 1 22, but hardly fits in with Acts 8 3 9 1 f. In a famous passage (Essay on 'Secret Societies,' Works [1863] 6 285-289) de Quincey discusses the uneasiness and fascination stirred by such martyrdoms in some of the more thoughtful spectators, and argues that the radiant countenance of Stephen 'bringing down to earth some revelation of a brightness in the sky, the fountains of which were intercepted to Paul, perplexed him; haunted him sleeping, troubled him when awake. . . . Upon this we may be sure that Paul brooded intensely, and that the noonday scene on the road to Damascus did but quicken and ante-date a result which would at any rate have followed in the end.' [Cp col. 4081 f.] The psychological nexus, alluded to in this passage, is reflected in the narratives of Acts, and probably formed one of the subordinate aims which the writer had in view as he fused the Stephen-source and the Pauline tradition together. 'deal craftily,' †κατασοφίζομαι (7 19); 'possession, †κατάσχεσις (7 5 45); 'lamentation,' †κοπετός (8 2); 'ravage,' λυμαίνομαι (8 3); 'redeemer,' †λυτρωτής (7 35; cp Heb. 9 12 Lk. 1 68 2 38); 'remove,' †μετοικίζω (7 4 43); 'make a calf,' μοσχοποιέω (7 41); 'neglect,' παραθεωρέω (6 1); 'corn,' σιτίον (7 12); 'stiffnecked,' †σκληροτράχηλος (7 51); 'stir up,' συγκινέω (6 12); 'bury,' συγκομίζω (8 2); 'set at one,' συναλλάσσω (7 26); 'slain beast,' †σφάγιον (7 42); 'suborn,' ὑποβάλλω (6 11); 'sustenance,' †χόρτασμα (7 11); 'buy,' †ὠνέομαι (7 16); 'appeared,' †ὤφθη (of sudden human appearance, 7 26). Of these 31, no fewer than 18 (marked †) come from the LXX or Philo, a fact which (especially as the citations are loose and unintentional) corroborates the impression of Hellenistic or Alexandrian colour.[1] Even more remarkable is the absence of such distinctively Lucan traits as ἄν with optative, δὲ καί, ἐγένετο with infinitive, ἐν τῷ with infinitive, καθ' ἡμέραν, καὶ αὐτός, ὀνόματι, πᾶς (ἅπας) ὁ λαός, τις with a noun, and τὸ or τὰ before prepositions.

At the same time, the Lucan phraseology of the passage shows that if a written source underlies the record it has been worked over[2] by the editor: see the following favourite or characteristic Lucan traits (words peculiar to Lk.-Acts marked with an asterisk)—'holy,' ἅγιος (6 13 7 33); 'bring,' ἄγω (6 12); [ἀνάγω 7 41]; 'bring up,' *ἀνατρέφω (7 20); 'men brethren,' ἄνδρες ἀδελφοί (7 2); 'look steadily,' ἀτενίζω (6 15 7 55); 'till,' ἄχρι (7 18); 'and there arose,' ἐγένετο δέ (8 1); 'babe,' βρέφος (7 19); 'ministry,' διακονία (6 1 4); 'open,' διανοίγω (7 56); 'cut,' *διαπρίω (7 54); 'scatter abroad,' *διασπείρω (8 1); 'arrange,' διατάσσω (7 44); 'just,' *δικαίος (Messianic title, 3 14 7 52 22 14); 'seventy,' *ἑβδομήκοντα (7 14); εἰμί with dative (7 5 44); εἶπεν δὲ (7 1 33); 'expose,' *ἐκτίθημι (7 21); 'before,' ἐνώπιον (6 5 f., 7 46); 'the following [day],' *τῇ ἐπιούσῃ [ἡμέρᾳ] (7 26); 'in those days,' ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ταύταις (6 1); 'send forth,' ἐξαποστέλλω (7 12); 'year,' ἔτος (7 6 34 42); 'devout,' *εὐλαβής (8 2); 'find grace,' εὑρίσκω χάριν (7 46 Lk. 1 30, cp Heb. 4 16); 'rejoice,' εὐφραίνω (7 41); 'come upon,' ἐφίστημι (6 12); 'having kneeled down,' θεὶς τὰ γόνατα (7 60 cp Lk. 22 41); 'named,' καλούμενος (7 58); 'behold,' κατανοέω (7 31, cp Heb. 3 1 9 24); 'famine,' λιμός (7 11); 'after these things,' μετὰ ταῦτα (7 7); 'summon,' *μετακάλεω (7 14); 'month,' μήν (7 20); 'young man,' *νεανίας (7 58); νομίζω = suppose (7 25 = Lk. 2 44); 'now,' νῦν (7 4 34 52); 'house of Israel,' οἶκος Ἰσραήλ (7 42); 'with one accord,' ὁμοθυμαδόν (7 57); 'sight,' ὅραμα (7 31); ὅς in attraction (7 16 f. 45); 'at the feet,' παρὰ τοὺς πόδας (7 58); πλῆθος (6 2 5 = community, Deissm. Neue Bibelstudien, 59); 'multiply,' πληθύνω (6 1); 'except,' πλήν (8 1); 'full of the [Holy] Spirit,' πλήρης πνευμ. (8 1); besides the proper names like 'Libertine,' *Λιβερτῖνος; 'Chaldæan,' Χαλδαῖος; 'Hellenist,' Ἑλληνιστής; and 'Rephan,' Ῥεφάν; the phrase 'Son of Man' (7 56 = Lk. 22 69, almost only use of name outside gospels), 7 9 = 5 17 (Clem. Rom. 4 f.); the conception of Jesus as the prophet like Moses (7 37, cp 3 22 and Lk. 7 16 39 16 29 f. 24 27), Acts 7 27 = Lk. 12 14; ἀκούειν with ptc. (7 12, cp Lk. 4 23), Acts 6 10 = Lk. 21 15 Acts 7 22 = Lk. 24 19—'preserve alive,' ζωογονεῖσθαι (Lk. 17 33 Acts 7 19 1 Tim. 6 13, only); 'visit,' ἐπισκέψασθαι (7 23, cp Lk. 1 78 7 16); and one instance of the Lucan partiality for Is. 40-66 (Acts 7 47 f.; as in Barn. 16 2 with ἢ τίς for καὶ ποῖος and οὐχί for γάρ).

9. Significance of episode.

The significance of this episode for early Christianity is thus twofold. It formed one of those outstanding crises when, as the historian of Acts loved to show, the fanatical and malicious opposition of Judaism to the new faith only served to accelerate the extension of that faith to the Gentiles. But, further, it was an epoch when persecution broke upon the Church in general as well as upon individuals, owing to the fact that the Jewish authorities for the first time (within a year or so of the Crucifixion—i.e., 30-31 A.D.)[1] realised the radical consequences of the gospel as preached by more outspoken Christians, who could appeal honestly to the authority of Jesus himself. Hitherto these distinctive principles of Christianity, with their far-reaching issues, had been tolerated mainly because they had not been adequately expressed. Hence the fitful and comparatively ineffective attempts of the authorities to keep the new movement in check, as well as the general popularity enjoyed by the Nazarenes in Jerusalem. The twelve lacked neither courage nor sincerity. For various reasons, however, they do not appear to have shown anything of the same insight into the tradition of Jesus which they preserved, as outsiders like Stephen, Philip, and Paul. Upon men like these fell the brunt of the advance which had to be made, if Christianity was ever to be anything more than a Jewish sect. With the spiritual freedom and universal range of the new faith, as urged by Stephen and others, the twelve probably were in essential sympathy; indeed there is every reason to suppose that Stephen carried the majority (yet cp 21 20-22) of the church, willingly or reluctantly, with him in his outspoken statements. It is one thing, however, to approve a course of action, another and a nobler thing to start it. All credit for the more difficult step, with the wisdom and courage which it involved at this period, is due to Stephen, whose stand had a further liberating effect—hardly contemplated by himself—of forcing the early Christians into a consciousness of their real relation to the orthodox Judaism, side by side with which most of them had hitherto lived in peace. The break had to come, although as yet both sides had been for different reasons slow to disturb the status quo.[2] 'There is an inner freedom which may grow side by side with an allegiance fostered by birth and custom, prejudice and piety. But men first become conscious of this freedom when a demand is made that restricts it, or when it is assailed on account of some consequence already deduced from it by the enemy, but not as yet patent to the mind that cherishes it' (Weizsäcker). Such an awakening came to early Christianity at the martyrdom of Stephen. He first expressed a latent antithesis of principle, grasping the gospel of Jesus with a thoroughness and penetration which enabled him to formulate certain questions, afterwards elaborated differently yet along the same line by one who had been an accomplice in his murder. This is all the more remarkable, because the stimulus originally came not—as in later controversies—out of practical exigencies due to the unlimited preaching of the gospel, but entirely from the inward fidelity of one man (who had not belonged to the original disciples) to the principle of religious freedom in the spirit and sayings of Jesus.[3]

The dependence of the Stephen-narrative upon several of the best authenticated portions of the Synoptic tradition (for the Johannine, see Wendt's Lehre Jesu [ET], 2 35 f.) has been already noted;[4] the general similarity of several details in the accounts of his death and of the trial of Jesus (e.g., Lk. 22 66 =

[1] Peculiar to Hebrews and Lk.-Acts (including Acts 6-8 3) are: 'goodly,' ἀστεῖος; 'star,' ἄστρον; 'custom,' ἔθος (except Jn. 19 40); 'bring in,' εἰσάγειν-εσθαι (except Jn. 18 16); 'trembling for fear,' ἔντρομος; Red Sea, Ἐρυθρὰ θάλασσα; 'devout,' εὐλαβής (group); 'he that bears rule,' ἡγούμενος (except Mt. 2 6 citation); 'rest,' καταπαύειν -σις; 'change,' or 'remove,' μετατιθέναι (except Jude 4); sojourn -er, παροικέω -ος (literal sense): 'patriarch,' πατριάρχης; hand of God (except 1 Pet. 5 6); 'made with hands,' χειροποίητος of temple (except Mk. 14 58). See also Acts 7 44 = Heb. 8 2-5.

[2] This is perhaps betrayed also in the occasional roughnesses of construction—e.g., the change of subject in 4 ('removed,' μετῴκισεν), 8 ('begat,' ἐγέννησεν), and 10 ('made,' κατέστησεν), though Weiss goes too far in taking passages like 10 c-16 and 19 5-23 a, 26-29, 36 f., as editorial additions inserted in view of Lk.'s Gentile-Christian audience.

[1] One early tradition, followed by Usuardus, Petavius, and other mediæval and later scholars, put Stephen's martyrdom in the same year as the Ascension.

[2] As the subsequent history, down to the third century, shows, there was a recurring tendency to gravitate back into Judaism on the part of certain Christian circles (cp Harnack's Dogmengeschichte, ET 1 294 f.).

[3] In its account of the persecutions conducted by that 'inimicus homo' (i.e., Paul), Clem. Recogn. 1 70 f., like Hegesippus, ignores Stephen; James is for Hegesippus the protomartyr, though in Eus. HE v. 2 5 Stephen reappears as the model witness of Christ.

[4] It depends upon the critical view taken of Jn. 4 21-24, whether that passage be regarded as a later expansion of the idea suggested in Acts 7 48 f., or as embodying a genuine logion of Jesus (cp Jn. 2 19-22) to the effect that only spiritual worship in his name answered to the true ideal of the OT revelation.

Acts 6 12) is not unnatural in a historian who is concerned to describe how loyalty to the authority and ideas of the great proto-Martyr brought one of his followers to a like fate. Such conformation was inevitable, though it is not easy to determine how far it was conscious and literary. It is distinctly curious, however, that false witnesses and an allusion to Jesus' saying about the temple should be introduced here by an author who deliberately omits both facts from his narrative of Jesus' trial; and also that the authentic saying on the Cross (Lk. 23 34*a*)—which does not form part of the original third gospel (see Hist. New Test. 654)—should be reflected in Acts 7 60 (cp Lk. 6 28, Acts 3 17 13 27), just as it was actually quoted by the brother of Jesus at his martyrdom (ἔθηκε τὰ γόνατα λέγων κύριε θεέ πάτερ ἄφες αὐτοῖς· οὐ γὰρ οἴδασι τί ποιοῦσιν, cp § 2), and by the Lyons martyrs (Eus. HE v. 2 5). There is one very significant change, however, in Acts 7 59 (= Lk. 23 46), emphasised by the preceding words 'calling upon,' ἐπικαλούμενον (sc. Ἰησοῦν). The similar parallels between Stephen and Paul (6 13 = 21 28 6 9 = 21 21 27, cp 24 12) are of no literary significance whatever, nor is Stephen's speech a literary expansion of certain Pauline ideas. For, whilst criticism has learned to do justice to the powerful impression (see above; also R. H. Hutton's Theological Essays, 318 f., and Feine, Das Gesetzesfreies Evang. des Paulus, 1899, pp. 16 f. 88 f.) made by Stephen's religious consciousness upon Paul, Stephen cannot be described as a forerunner of Paul without serious limitations. In Stephen an original element worked like a ferment, which differentiated him not simply from his leading contemporaries, but from the line subsequently followed by Paul. The very occurrence of similar ideas—e.g., in Rom. 9-11 (Acts 7 52 = 1 Thess. 2 14 f., see Origen on Mt. 13 57)—is one of several proofs that such ideas were widespread in certain circles of early Christianity, and the points of difference are upon the whole more tangible than the points in common between the two men. Paul was not interested in the cultus-question at all; Stephen was. Yet Stephen never raised the question of the Gentiles,[1] as Paul did from the first. Nor did he, like Paul in general, view the Law as superseded by grace; in Hellenistic fashion Stephen traces a spiritual current through Jewish history, believing that a proper interpretation of the Law, and obedience to the spirit, would have saved the Jews from their ancient lapses, even from the culminating lapse at the crucifixion. Per contra, as has been already indicated (§§ 3, 6), Stephen had not advanced to the position which in later writers may be termed distinctively Alexandrian.

The scanty and worthless legends upon Stephen, collected by Tillemont (Mémoires; Eng. ed. 1735, pp. 353-359), mainly cluster round the place and time of his death, and the finding of his relics. According to one tradition of the fifth century, he was buried, thanks to the friendly intervention of Gamaliel, at Kafr Gamala in presence of the lamenting apostles. His festival seems to have been held generally on the 26th of December, the day following Christmas; which occasioned Augustine's saying that unless God had first become man to die for men, men would never have found courage to die for God. Epiphanius (Hær. 20 4) numbers Stephen among the Seventy, and one curious tradition (followed by Dante, Purg. 15) describes him as a youth.

STOICS (ϲτοικοι [Ti.], ϲτωικοι [WH], Acts 17 18). The Stoa was founded at Athens, about 300 B.C., by Zeno; and many of its distinctive doctrines were added during the third century by Cleanthes and Chrysippus. Stoicism was brought to Rome by Panætius about 140, and many distinguished Romans learnt its principles from Posidonius (about 86-46). It was the leading philosophical school in the early empire; the chief writers are Seneca (4-65 A.D.), Epictetus (flor. circa 100), and Marcus Aurelius (121-180). The Stoic doctrine was divided into logic, physics, and ethics. In logic its most characteristic feature is the search for a criterion of truth, and the placing of this criterion in the feeling of certainty. In physics the Stoics returned to the crude pre-Socratic views, and especially to those of Heraclitus. They were strict materialists, and conceived God, or nature, to be in essence a fiery process. In ethics, Zeno formulated the end of life as τὸ ὁμολογουμένως ζῆν, 'consistency'; but this was expanded by Cleanthes into 'life consistent with nature,' and by Chrysippus into 'life according to our experience of what happens by nature.' Thus ethics was set on a basis of theoretical knowledge—though the physical theory does not furnish any very obvious ethical guidance. Virtue alone was good, vice alone bad. Other things were indifferent—e.g., life and pleasure, death and pain. But of these the former were normally preferable to the latter—only normally, however, so that when life was blighted suicide was laudable.

The Stoics were the first to introduce into morals the idea of law—which is law for man because it is the law of the universe. In passing from 'end' to 'duty,' from 'virtue' to 'conscience,' they are the forerunners of modern ethics. But in abandoning the Greek standpoint they fall into rigorism, and set up in the passionless sage a colourless and uninviting ideal.

It was entirely in a practical spirit that ethics was developed by the Romans. Seneca dwells chiefly on the wickedness of man and on the constant war which must be waged against sin. Epictetus' teaching is summed up in his maxim ἀνέχου καὶ ἀπέχου, and that of Marcus Aurelius in the words, 'to be sufficient unto oneself by doing justly and thereby having calm.'

Stoicism owes something of its character to Heraclitus, something to the Cynics, something to the political indifference of the times. But its preoccupation with conduct it probably owes to a Semitic origin. Zeno came from Cyprus, and was commonly called 'the Phœnician'; Chrysippus came from Cilicia. Babylonia, Palestine, Syria, Cilicia, Phrygia, and the Phœnician colonies were the homes of the sect, of which European Greece produced not a single distinguished member. Naturally then there are resemblances between Stoicism and some of the post-exilic biblical writings. The author of Ecclesiastes had probably a general

[1] One proof that the speech rests on a special source; for the idea of universalism was thoroughly Lucan (cp Lk. 24 47 Acts 28 25 f.). In 7 42 another comparatively isolated feature occurs, in the reference of sin directly to providence (Titius, 23 f.).

[1] Cp POTTERY, § 8 (2).

acquaintance with Stoic ideas (see ECCLESIASTES, §§ 10, 13). Some of the apocryphal writings—4 Macc. and the Wisdom of Solomon—display rather more than this. Seneca has very many sayings which recall the words of Jesus (especially in the SERMON ON THE MOUNT [q.v.]) and of the Epistles (and above all those ascribed to Paul). Many of the parallelisms are more apparent than real; but the frequency and closeness of those which remain exclude the hypothesis of mere coincidence, and it is almost certain that the influence was reciprocal. Seneca may well have met Christians and heard Christian views at Rome. And Paul must have known something of Stoicism, of which Tarsus was perhaps, next to Athens, the headquarters. Stoicism would have its attractions for a Pharisee. Paul can quote the Stoic Aratus (Acts 17 28), and he has at least two conceptions which owe something to Stoicism—the world-wide city of God (1 Cor. 12 12 f. 27 Gal. 3 28 Eph. 2 19 Col. 3 11), and the αὐτάρκεια of the Christian (2 Cor. 6 10 9 8 11 Phil. 4 11 13 18). In addition to the more specific names for precious stones to be discussed later there occur the following more general terms:—

1. Vagueness of terms.

אֶבֶן יְקָרָה, 'ében yĕḳārāh, λίθος τίμιος, lapis pretiosus gemma, 2 S. 12 30 1 K. 10 2 10 f. 1 Ch. 20 2 29 2 2 Ch. 9 1 9 f. and freq. [yĕḳārāh, prob. orig. 'heavy'; cp 2 Ch. 3 6; then 'rare'; cp 1 S. 3 1]: cp אַבְנֵי חֵפֶץ, 'abnē ḥēphes, λίθους ἐκλεκτούς, lapides desiderabiles, Is. 54 12 [cp Pr. 3 15 8 11]; אֶבֶן חֵן, 'ében ḥēn, μισθὸς χαρίτων (!), gemma gratissima Prov. 17 8; אַבְנֵי מִלֻּאִים, 'abnē millū'īm [from מלא 'fill up'], λίθους εἰς τὴν γλυφήν, gemmas ad ornandum [ornatum], Ex. 25 7 35 9 = τοὺς λίθους τῆς πληρώσεως, gemmas, Ex. 35 27; אַבְנֵי פוּךְ, 'abnē pūk, λίθους ποικίλους, [lapides] diversorum colorum, 1 Ch. 29 2: the last-named passage gives several of these phrases together. See also MARBLE, COLOURS, and the names of particular stones.

It is only with long experience, and wide knowledge, that the distinction between 'precious,' 'fine,' and merely 'ornamental' stones becomes established. The majority of the 'precious stones' of the modern world were unknown in Western Asia, and still more in the Mediterranean, until Ptolemaic and Roman times; and even then they were regarded merely as rare varieties of the commoner stones which most nearly resembled them—e.g., the many varieties of smaragdus known to Pliny, which, even so, do not include the modern 'emerald.'

2. Uses.

Natural stones which are in any way remarkable—for brilliance, colour, crystalline form, or any other property—are prized and treasured by many primitive peoples; either simply for ornament, or, more commonly, for use as charms (for real or imaginary influences); as engraved seals (for their hardness and resistance to wear); or as currency (for their rarity, value in exchange, and extreme portability).

3. Stones actually known to the ancients.

The first step towards identification of ancient 'precious stones' is to record what stones are actually found to have been in use on ancient sites of different ages and countries: as in the table below.

From this it will be seen (1) that universally the commoner have preceded the more 'precious' stones; (2) that even quartz and its varieties (chalcedony, sard, agate) were not much worked, except in Egypt, until late Babylonian and Assyrian time; (3) that really hard stones, such as beryl, are very rare until the time of Alexander the Great; and (4) that it is only after his time that the wealth of the farther East became available except by accident. For this latter period, however, the centre of the Hellenistic jewel trade was in Alexandria; the translators of the LXX were therefore most favourably situated for the collection of authentic evidence as to the names of the stones.

It is not to be expected, therefore, that the biblical vocabulary will be either copious or precise; or that the Hebrew terms, being of (at lowest) pre-Alexandrine date, will be found to correspond accurately with those of 𝔊; for the latter belong to a period when the influx of gems from the far East had recently depreciated many stones which thitherto had been relatively 'precious.' Still more is this the case as between the ancient versions and AV, the vocabulary of which represents a similar period of acute transition, due mainly to the recent exploitation of the sea-routes to farther Asia and to America; moreover AV's vocabulary seems to be used quite at random—e.g. the persistent interchange of 'emerald' and 'carbuncle'; and the use of 'ruby' for 'coral.' RV is equally erratic, but without the same excuse.

4. Hebrew names.

The Hebrew phrases (e.g., 1 Ch. 29 2) clearly include all ranks of valuable stones, from 'stones to be set' and treasured gems to the 'stones of divers colours' which are coupled with 'marbles' (abnē šáyiš, אַבְנֵי שַׁיִשׁ, πάριον, marmor Parium), and were used simply 'to garnish the house.' No hard and fast line, however, can be drawn between these ornamental stones, and the 'precious stones' in the stricter sense; and the word šōham in particular, though it occurs in the 'breastplate' of the high priest, and is used for the engraved 'onyx-stones' (AV) on his shoulders, seems also to be used generically for the whole category of variegated or brightly coloured stones (see § 18, below).

The interpretation of the several names does not take us much further, except to classify the qualities for which different stones were prized. Of the descriptive names :—(a) the majority refer simply to brilliance and must be restricted to transparent or translucent stones; they give no clue as to colour.

1. בָּרֶקֶת, bārēḳeth, Ex. 28 17, etc., from √'flash'; see § 9.

2. אֶקְדָּח, eḳdāḥ, Is. 54 12, from √'kindle' [cp CRYSTAL]. 𝔊 λίθος κρυστάλλου arises from confusion with קֶרַח, ḳēraḥ, 'ice'; Aq. λ. τρυπανισμοῦ gives the sense 'kindle by rubbing'—i.e., either 'polished' or 'striking sparks.' Compare Ezek. 28 14 16, 'stones of fire' (אַבְנֵי־אֵשׁ, on which, however, cp CHERUB, § 2, n. 2, with the Assyrian reference).

3. כַּדְכֹּד, kadkōd, Is. 54 12 Ez. 27 16, from √'strike fire'; but perhaps = Ar. 'red,' or a place-name. 𝔊 variable: see § 21 [and cp CHALCEDONY, 1].

(b) Next come descriptions of colour, without reference to brilliance, though not therefore to be confined to opaque stones: these names are rare and doubtful.

1. אֹדֶם, ŏdem, Ex. 28 17, etc., properly 'red'; 𝔊 σάρδιον (cp Pers. zerd, 'yellow-red'); but perhaps a place-name 'Edomite stone'; see § 7.

2. שְׁבוֹ, šĕbō, Ex. 28 19, etc., may perhaps = Ar. 'red'; but is more probably a loan-word or a place-name; see below, § 15.

3. שֹׁהַם, šōham, Ex. 28 20, etc., from √'pale' = Ar. šōham, or perhaps Ar. musaḥham 'striped garment' (Ges.), which if established would be decisive in favour of a banded stone: or Ass. sâmtu, a dark stone from Meluḫḫa in W. Babylonia (Del. HWB, s.v., and Schrader, COT(2) 1 30 [cp, however, BERYL, § 4]): or a place-name: or corrupt; see ONYX, and § 18 below.

(c) Other names describe qualities or uses other than brilliance or colour :—

1. אַחְלָמָה, aḥlāmāh, Ex. 28 19, etc., perhaps from √'dream,' which identifies the stone as the well-known charm against bad dreams and drunkenness = 𝔊 ἀμέθυστος, the mod. 'amethyst.' [But see AMETHYST, end, and Hommel, AHT 205 f. 283.]

2. סַפִּיר, sappīr, Ex. 28 19, etc. from √'engrave'; the 'inscription stone' par excellence (Tg. says the Tables of the Law were made of it); or perhaps akin to Ass. ṣupur 'thumb-nail' signature—i.e., signet-stone, see § 5. It is described as 'like the body of heaven,' Ex. 24 10; and 𝔊 σάπφειρος identifies it as lapis lazuli. See SAPPHIRE.

3. שָׁמִיר, šāmīr, Ezek. 3 9, etc., from √'sharp,' 'hard,' Eg. asmer, Gg. σμύρις, Germ. Smirgel, Eng. emery, is not strictly a 'precious stone,' though translated 'diamond' in Jer. 17 1 AV, and 'adamant' in Ezek. 3 9 Zech. 7 12; see ADAMANT.

4. יַהֲלֹם, yahălōm, Ex. 28 18, etc., from √'strike hard': cp perhaps ḥallāmīš 'flint,' and Ass. elmēšu, a hard stone used for rings and on chariot wheels (ZDMG, 40 728). [To the references in FLINT (q.v.) add ZDMG 46 570.]

(d) Others again are clearly place-names, denoting the source of supply:

1. kadkōd (see a, 3, above) for which 𝔊 has χορχορ in Ezek. 27 16. In Is. 54 12, Symm. has καρχηδόνιον; cp Plin. HN 37 30 for the 'Carthaginian carbuncle,' and Pesh. karkednā for šĕbō in Ex. 28 19 39 12.

2. רָאמוֹת, rā'mōth, Ezek. 27 16 𝔊 ῥαμωρ, Vg. sericum, RV 'coral,' need not be a stone at all. [See CORAL, but cp also RUBY.]

3. šĕbō (see b 2, above), Ex. 28 19 39 12, may be the ψεφω, 'Psepho,' of Strabo, 822, Theophr. 34, an island up the Nile, S. of Meroë, celebrated for its gems; but it is perhaps a loan-word; see below, § 15.

4. תַּרְשִׁישׁ, taršīš, Ex. 28 20, etc., cp 'stone of Tarshish,' Ezek. 10 9, etc.; see TARSHISH.

5 and 6. 'ŏdem ('Edom,' see b 1, above) and šōham (see b 3, above; sāḥīm, 'Soḥeim' in Yemen) may also be place-names.

(e) Finally, several names, which have no clear significance in Hebrew, are probably loan-words :—

1. לֶשֶׁם, lĕshem, Ex. 28 19, etc., recalls Eg. reshem (Hommel, AHT, 283). [For another view see JACINTH.]

2. נֹפֶךְ, nōphek, Ex. 28 18, etc., has been compared with Eg. m-f-k-t and Ass. lupakku. The latter is more probable; see EMERALD, and § 10 below.

3. פִּטְדָה, piṭdah, Ex. 28 17, etc., seems to be Ass. ḥipindu. The Skt. pita, 'pale-yellow,' is unlikely; see TOPAZ, and § 8 below.

4. šĕbō (see b 2, d 3, above), Ex. 28 19 may be Ass. šubu; but perhaps also Ar. 'red'; or the place-name 'Psepho,' see b and d above.

5. יָשְׁפֵה, yāšĕphēh, Ex. 28 20, etc. seems to be Ass. yaspu, aspu; and perhaps also = Eg. ḫ-s-p-d, see § 13 below.

These vague terms [see also PEARL] obviously give little information; and in no case do we know the colour of the Assyrian and Egyptian equivalents. If any conclusions, therefore, are to be drawn from them at all, it must be by means of the renderings of 𝔊.

5. Greek names.

The Greek vocabulary may be classified in the same way as the Hebrew.

(a) Brilliance is denoted only by ἄνθραξ and σμάραγδος.

ἄνθραξ, 'hot coal,' for nōphek (§ 4, e 2, above); σμάραγδος, 'dazzling,' for bārēḳeth (§ 4, a 1, above), and also for šōham (§ 4, b 3, above), Ex. 28 9 35 27 39 6 (cp μαραγέω, μαραυγέω, and perhaps μαρμαίρειν; Skt. marakata is a derivative, like It. esmeralda and Eng. emerald; σμ. itself may be a corruption of bārēḳeth above).

(b) Colour gives ὑάκινθος, λίθος ὁ πράσινος, χρυσόπρασος and χρυσόλιθος; cp σάρδιον below (only in NT: from the blue flower of that name; the Ind. jacut seems to be a derivative, like Eng. jacinth).

πράσινος (λ. ὁ πρ. for šōham [§ 4, b 3, above], Gen. 2 12; cp χρυσόπρασος, Rev. 21 20), 'leek green.'

χρυσόλιθος (for tarshish [§ 4, d 4, above]), 'gold-stone.'

(c) Other qualities give the following :—

ἀδαμαντινός, 'intractable.' In class Gk. = 'steel-like.' For šāmīr (§ 4, c 3, above), Jer. 17 1; cp στερέα πέτρα, Ez. 3 9, and the corrupt διὰ παντὸς (ἀδάμαντος), Ez. 3 9.

ἀμέθυστος, 'charm against drunkenness'; for aḥlāmāh (§ 4, c 1, above), the Greek superstition taking the place of the Hebrew.

κρύσταλλος, 'ice'—i.e., 'crystal.' In Is. 54 12 a misreading of אֶקְדָּח (see § 4, a 2, above). In Rev. 4 6 22 1 a simile for clear water; in Rev. 21 11 κρυσταλλίζοντι, 'turning into crystal.'

ὄνυξ, 'finger-nail' (for šōham [§ 4, b 3, above]. Popularly supposed, later, to be descriptive (Plin. HN 37 24); but probably a loan-word, see below.

σαρδόνυξ—i.e., 'sard-onyx'; Rev. 21 20†, but cp Vg. sardonyx for šōham, ἐν ὄνυχι, Job 28 16.

(d) Place-names are responsible for the following :—

ἀχάτης (= šĕbō [§ 4, b 2, d 3, e 4]), from the river Achates in Sicily.

λιγύριον (= lĕšem [§ 4, e 1, above]), from Liguria in N. Italy. The descriptive talismanic λυγγούριον does not occur in 𝔊.

σάρδιον (= 'ŏdem [§ 4, b 1, d 5, above], popularly derived from Sardis in Lydia; but probably originally a loan-word; see below (e).

χαλκηδών (Rev. 21 19† only), from Chalcedon in Bithynia.

Cp θάρσεις, ραμωθ, and χορχορ, transliterated, and the καρχηδόνιον of Symm. in Is. 54 12 (= kadkōd [§ 4, a 3, d 1] ἴασπις).

(e) Loan-words, finally, are the following :—

βηρύλλιον (= šōham [§ 4, b 3, above], and [by error] yāšĕphēh [§ 4, e 5, above], see below); Pers. billaur, Skt. vaidūrya, Prakt. velūriya, Pesh. b-r-w-l-a.

ἴασπις (= yāšĕphēh), Heb. cp Ass. aspu.

σάπφειρος (= sappīr [§ 4, c 2, above]), Heb.

σάρδιον (= 'ŏdem [§ 4, b 1, d 5, above), though actually obtained near Sardis in Lydia, is probably from Pers. zerd, 'yellow-red.'

τοπάζιον (= piṭdāh [§ 4, e 3, above], perh. Heb., cp Ass. ḥipindu; but derived by Pliny (HN 37 8) from the word 'to seek' in the language of the 'cave-dwellers' of the Topaz-island in the Red Sea. In Ps. 119 127 τοπάζιον = τὸ πάζιον = paz (פָּז), 'refined gold'; cp παζ in Cant. 5 11 [on which see GOLD, § 1 f.; TOPAZ, § 2, n. 1; UPHAZ].

ὄνυξ, ὀνύχιον (popularly derived from ὄνυξ, 'finger-nail') is probably Ass. unḳu, 'ring,' cp kunuku, 'conical seal'; cp Eg. anak (Muss-Arnolt, Sem. Words, 139). The explanation, ὄνυξ = 'finger-nail,' occurs first in Pliny, HN 37 24 (quoting Sudines), and is supported by the remote resemblance of a pale onyx (the black onyx was not worked till late Hellenistic times) to a finger-nail with its lunula in the flesh beneath. But the word is as old as Ktesias (about 400 B.C.) and may have arisen from the Assyrian custom of using the impression of the thumb-nail (ṣupur; see sappīr, above) as the signature of a clay-tablet: ὄνυξ would then mean 'thumb-nail stone' in the sense of 'signet.'

For the interpretation of this Greek vocabulary, we have fortunately a good and slightly earlier authority in the treatise of Theophrastus, περὶ λίθων (about 300 B.C.), which sums up Greek knowledge on the subject just at the moment when Alexander's conquest had thrown open the farther East, but before its effects had become generally felt. For the interpretation of the additional terms added by the Apocalypse, we have again a nearly contemporary commentary in Pliny, who represents the abundant materials, but mainly empirical classification, of the lapidaries of the Early Roman Empire. That the vocabulary of the LXX is probably trustworthy, is suggested by the general uniformity of its rendering. So uniform, indeed, are these, that in the four cases in which serious discrepancies occur (see under AGATE, BERYL, ONYX, and below), it is probably safe to assume that it is the Hebrew text which is at fault. The phrases in the Apocalypse, also, display close acquaintance with current terminology, and supply more than one striking confirmation of the conclusions derived from the comparison of MT and the LXX.

We may, therefore, proceed to discuss the identifications supplied by the LXX renderings. Of these, by far the greater number are contained in the description of the high priest's breastplate, Ex. 28 17 ff., to be read with the parallel passage Ex. 39 10 ff. and the corrupt variant, Ez. 28 13 (the 'covering of the king of Tyre'). It will therefore be convenient to take these stones in the order in which they occur, and to append (§ 21 ff.) those which do not occur in the breastplate.

6. High priest's breastplate.

Two preliminary considerations should be noted. (1) The BREASTPLATE (q.v.), when folded for use, measured a span (about 8 in.) in each direction. The space available for each stone with its setting was therefore as much as $2 \times 2\frac{1}{2}$ in.; and if the same proportion was observed between stone and setting as was customary in ancient jewellery, the stones themselves may have been as large as $2 \times 1\frac{1}{2}$ in., and cannot have been much less than half that size. They were therefore each a good deal larger than the average size of the common Babylonian cylinder or Egyptian scarab. We are therefore probably safe in excluding, on the ground of size alone, stones which are really rare and 'precious,' even if these stones themselves could be shown to have been known. (2) Each stone was engraved with the name of a tribe, and some of these names are of some length. This again postulates a large surface and low hardness. The private Jewish name-signets vary from $\frac{3}{4}$-$1\frac{1}{2}$ in. in length, and are of a very moderate degree of hardness (7 or less).

7. Identification of stones, OT: 'Odem.

i. 'Ōdem, σάρδιον, sardius, Ex. 28 17 39 10 (cp Ez. 28 13, and sardius, Rev. 21 20). Both names signify 'red' (see above, §§ 4, b 1, 5*d*), and the stone is no doubt the modern red or orange 'sard,' the commonest of all engraved stones in ancient times (cp Plin. HN 37 106). The best of them came in Greek times from Sardis and Babylon, and a fine deep red kind from Yemen (hence perhaps [cp SARDIUS] 'Edomite stone,' from the proximate source of supply). The material (translucent quartz stained with iron) is quite common, and merges in the clearer and lighter-tinted 'carnelian' and 'red agate.' As this is probably denoted by šĕbō ἀχάτης (§ 15), it is not impossible that 'ōdem may originally have meant the opaque blood-red jasper,[1] which is common in early Egypt, was used in Babylonia and Assyria, and also in Greece, and was valued as a charm against hemorrhage.

8. Piṭdāh.

ii. Piṭdāh, τοπάζιον, topazius (Ex. 28 17 39 10, cp Ez. 28 13; in Rev. 21 20 τοπάζιον is exchanged with σαρδόνυξ, see below) is identified with Ass. ḫipindu, a 'flashing stone' which recalls the 'stones of fire' in Ez. 28 14 16, and the abnē ekdāḥ in Is. 54 12. The rendering τοπάζιον makes it clear that the LXX understood by piṭdāh, a stone which was (1) translucent, (2) yellow. As the modern 'topaz' was hardly known[2] before Greek times, and is indistinguishable, except by its superior hardness, from 'false topaz,' or yellow rock-crystal, it is possible that the latter is meant. The τοπάζιον of the Greeks was a translucent, golden-coloured (χρυσοειδὲς ἀποστίλβον φέγγος, Strabo, 770), or yellow-green, stone (e virenti genere, Plin. HN 37 8), probably the modern 'chrysolite,' or 'peridot'. This was a noble variety of olivine, and consequently of the yellow 'serpentine' (Ar. 'aṣfar, 'yellow'), which was in common use for scarabs and cylinders of all dates. It is identified by Petrie [and independently by Cheyne; see GOLD, § 1 b; OPHIR, § 1; TOPAZ, § 2] with the original piṭdāh; the only objection to this being that ḫipindu was a 'flashing' stone. This 'chrysolite' was found in the Levant, and occasionally in considerable masses; but the ancient supply came from an island (τοπάζιος νῆσος) in the Red Sea, which was the monopoly of the kings of Egypt (Strabo, 770; Diod. Sic. 3 39; Plin. HN 37 8 6 34). Like olivine, 'chrysolite' is soft and easily engraved—eadem sola nobilium limam sentit (Plin. HN 37 8).

9. Bārĕḳeth.

iii. Bārĕḳeth, σμάραγδος, smaragdus, Ex. 28 17 39 10 (Ez. 28 13, σμάραγδος; but bārĕḳeth [smaragdus] changes places with yahălōm [iaspis], cp § 12 f. below); Rev. 21 20 has σμάραγδος, smaragdus, in the place of bārĕḳeth, and Rev. 4 3 has ἶρις . . . ὅμοιος ὁράσει σμαραγδίνῳ. In Ex. 28 9 35 27 39 6, σμάραγδος translates šōham (Vg. onyx) where it is used of the high priest's shoulder-stones. Both bārĕḳeth and σμάραγδος originally denote brilliance only; e.g., Herod. 2 44 describes a στήλη (probably a columnar natural crystal) σμαράγδου λίθου λάμποντος τὰς νύκτας μέγαθος,[1] 'so large as to give light at night,' but says nothing of the colour either of the stone or of the gleam. Of this same σμάραγδος Theophrastus (25) says that it was of the 'Bactrian' variety, εἰ μὴ ἄρα ψευδὴς σμάραγδος, and he adds (24) other instances of gigantic specimens which came to Egypt, ἐν δώροις παρὰ τοῦ Βαβυλωνίων βασιλέως, but confuses them all with the 'copper-emerald' (dioptase) of Cyprus and Chalcedon (χαλκήδων, Rev. 21 20). Now, only two brilliant stones occur in such columnar στῆλαι—the 'rock crystal,' and the 'beryl.' In favour of 'rock crystal' we may quote (1) the comparison of the rainbow with σμάραγδος in Rev. 4 3; (2) the statement of Pliny (HN 37 64), quoted by Petrie (Hastings' DB), that Nero used a σμάραγδος to aid his sight—a statement to be compared with the superstition, which survives, that better spectacles are made from rock crystal than from glass; (3) Martial's association of smaragdus with adamas (v. 11 1); (4) the probability that hexagonal beryl in its paler varieties was regarded as a harder and greenish variety of 'milky quartz'; (5) the certainty that, as early as Theophrastus, a very large number of stones, all brilliant, and of all shades of green, from aquamarine to dioptase (χαλκήδων), were included generically under σμάραγδος.

In favour of 'beryl,' on the other hand, are the following considerations: (1) From Theophrastus onward the σμάραγδος was more or less definitely coloured—Theophrastus, however, does not say what colour—and was believed to originate by the action of water upon green jasper (ἴασπις, Theophr. 27, see § 13). (2) Both the 'beryl' and its deep-green 'emerald' variety have been universally believed to give relief to the eyes; but this was through their restful colour, not through their refractive powers, and 'beryls' in particular had already given rise to It. barelle and High-Germ. brille, before the invention of spectacle-glasses. (3) The [1] So F. Petrie, in Hastings' DB, s.v. 'Precious Stones'—a valuable and suggestive commentary based largely upon new material.

[2] Brit. Mus. Guide to Bab. and Ass. Antiq. (p. 136) gives both 'emerald' and 'topaz' in a list of materials used for cylinders; and nos. 27 and 39 in the Babylonian Room are apparently of a variety of base emerald or beryl ('mother of emerald'). Dr. Budge kindly supplies the further information 'we have no cylinders which may be certainly called topaz, but I have seen several in Mesopotamia among the natives'; he adds that nos. 128 and 679 (of Pehlevi time) are of 'topaz.' In PEFQ, 1902, p. 326, the announcement is made that a fragment of 'emerald' has been found in a pre-historic deposit at Gezer; but no authority is given for the mineralogical determination.

[1] So MSS.; see Stein (1881). Wiedemann defends the conjecture μεγάλως, 'shining with great brilliancy,' and ascribes the glow to ancient use of a phosphorescent paint.

kindred belief that 'beryl' shed a light of its own was known to Theophrastus (l.c., 23), and has survived in It. brillare (Low Lat. *berillare) and Eng. brilliant. (4) The probability that σμάραγδος could be imitated (ψευδὴς σμ., Theophr. 25) suits the prevailing greenish tinge of ancient glass better than a quite colourless stone; cp, moreover, Rev. 46, θάλασσα ὑαλίνη ὁμοία κρυστάλλῳ. (5) The collocation of κρυστάλλῳ with σμαραγδίνῳ in Rev. 4 vv. 6 3 suggests that after all this writer distinguished 'rock crystal' and 'smaragdus.'

As to bārēḳeth, the probability is (1) that originally it meant the colourless flashing 'rock crystal,' which was commonly used for engraving, in Egypt of all periods, in Mesopotamia from the later Babylonian time onwards, and more rarely in prehistoric Greece; (2) that this meaning did not wholly die out even after the LXX translation was made, but survived in the use of σμάραγδος in Rev. 4 3, and in the confusion with yahălōm in MT of Ez. 28 13 (see below, § 19); (3) that the obvious likeness between the words, and the current confusion between the hexagonal forms of 'quartz' and pale 'beryl,' caused the LXX to render bārēḳeth by σμάραγδος, and provoked the substitution for yāšĕphēh of yahălōm in MT, so as to separate what now were two adjacent green stones.[1]

iv. Nōphek, ἄνθραξ, carbunculus (Ex. 28 18 39 11); in Ez. 28 13 ἄνθραξ remains, but nōphek [Vg. carbunculus]

10. Nōphek. changes places with sappīr [sapphirus] of § 11. In Ez. 27 16 the LXX mistranslates, and Vg. has simply gemmam; Rev. 21 20 substitutes χαλκηδών). If nōphek could be identified with Egyptian m-f-k-t (see EMERALD [end]), either malachite or turquoise would be meant; and this is supported by the equivalent χαλκηδών (copper-emerald) of Rev. 21 20; see § 23, below. But this identification would ignore the uniform rendering of both the LXX and Vg.; and as ἄνθραξ (carbunculus) is descriptive and appropriate, whilst nōphek (probably a loan-word) gives no clue, it is better to accept the identification of the LXX with a translucent red stone. This latter, since the 'ruby' of Ceylon and Burma, and likewise the true 'carbuncle,' were unknown to Theophrastus (see CARBUNCLE), must denote the large class of red 'garnets' ('pyrope,' 'almandine,' etc.), which are found in abundance and of very considerable size, were known in Egypt from prehistoric times, were commonly used for signets in Hellenistic times, and are easily engraved. As to nōphek itself, the alternative derivation, from the lupakku of Am. Tab. 202 16 [cp EMERALD, 2], may probably be accepted. Of the colour of this lupakku we have no information; but we know that it came as tribute to Egypt from Ashkelon —i.e., from the NE. This fact is compatible with the occurrence of nōphek among the wares sent from Syria to Tyre in Ez. 27 16.

v. Sappīr, σάπφειρος, sapphirus (Ex. 28 18 39 11); in Ezek. 28 13 σάπφειρος remains, but sappīr [Vg.

11. Sappīr. sapphirus] changes places with nōphek, [carbunculus] [§ 10]; Rev. 21 20 has σάπφειρα). The true 'sapphire' (blue corundum) was almost unknown before Roman Imperial times, and when known was included, from its clear blue colour, under ὑάκινθος[2] (see § 23, below). The adamas Cyprius, which occurred in the copper-mines and was known to Pliny for its sky-blue colour, was probably 'azurite.' Σάπφειρος, on the other hand, is identified (Theophr. 37; cp 55, κύανος σκύθης, and Plin. HN 37 120 'optime apud Medos'), with the opaque blue 'lapis lazuli' of Turkestan, and the uknu of Babylonia and Assyria, which was known also in Egypt and Greece from prehistoric times, and was frequently sent as a present from Babylon to Egypt in the Tell-el-Amarna period. As its Hebrew name implies, it is easily engraved, and occurs in large enough masses to make tablets like the 'Tables of the Law' (acc. to Targ.; cp the temple dedication on lapis lazuli, Brit. Mus. [Depart. Assyr. Antiq.] No. 91013). [Cp SAPPHIRE.]

vi. Yahălōm, ἴασπις, iaspis (Ex. 27 18 39 11); in Ezek. 28 13 ἴασπις remains, but yahălōm [Vg. iaspis]

12. Yahălōm and Yāšĕphēh in MT. changes places with bārēḳeth [smaragdus] see § 9). It is most improbable that yāšĕphēh (§ 13) could have so far changed its significance that ἴασπις should be used by preference to render yahălōm. [Cp JASPER, ad fin.]. Either ἴασπις, therefore, or yahălōm must be transferred to the twelfth place (§ 19), and we have seen reason already (under bārēḳeth, § 9) to suppose that yāšĕphēh should be restored here, and yahălōm transferred to no. xii. For other reasons identifying yahălōm with no. xii. see below, § 19.

Yašĕphēh, which is a loan-word (Ass. yašpû ašpû, Eg. ḫ-s-p-d), gives no clue, save that ašpû was large

13. Yāšĕphēh. enough, and not too hard, to be employed for the royal seal of Ašur-bāni-pal (Nabunahid stele). That ἴασπις, on the other hand, was (1) a dull or opaque stone, is shown by the combination ἰάσπιδι καὶ σαρδίῳ in Rev. 4 3 (see § 23, below), by the compound terms iaspachates and iasponyx known to Pliny (HN, xxxvii. 10 54 9 37), and by Martial's association of iaspis with sardonychus (v. 11 1 ix. 60 20); and (2) that it was a green stone is probable from association with the σμάραγδος of the Cypriote copper-mines in Theophrastus (27; cp ἰάσπιδι κρυσταλλίζοντι, 'jasper turning into a clear ice-like stone,' Rev. 21 11) and from its mediæval character (see JASPER). But (3) it had many variants; among them a red (ἴασπις = kadkōd Is. 54 12, cp Symm. καρχηδόνιον, cp iaspachates, above), a yellow (fulva, Virg. Æn. 4 261), and an opalescent, perhaps actually the 'opal' (opalus, Plin. HN 37 21: √Skt. opala, 'stone'). [Cp JASPER.] All this combines to show that yašĕphēh, ἴασπις, is the modern 'jasper' (opaque massive silica), and especially its green variety, which is widely distributed, often of considerable size, and easily engraved, being used commonly for Egyptian scarabs of all periods, for Babylonian and Assyrian cylinders, and for the seal-stones of prehistoric Greece (for engraved specimens from the Syrian coast [in Louvre], see Ledrain, Notice Sommaire des Monuments Phéniciens, Nos. 408, 427, 432 f. 437). All varieties of jasper are liable to occur together, and are associated, and easily confused, with the green chalcedony ('plasma,' 'prase'; the common 'bloodstone' is plasma spotted with red jasper), with the more opaque varieties of agate, and with the opal group, which all have practically identical composition. The green jasper, being the rarest, was not unnaturally the most prized in antiquity, and gave its name to the group. As the Cypriote passage (Theophr. 27) shows, green jasper was not clearly distinguished from the harder varieties of 'malachite' and other green copper-minerals (see § 18, below).

vii. Lĕšem, λιγύριον, ligurius (Ex. 28 19 39 12); in Ezek. 28 13, 𝔊 has ἀργύριον καὶ χρυσίον καὶ λιγ.; MT

14. Lĕšem. Vg. omit, ending the list with zāhāb (aurum) in the tenth place, see § 22, below (Rev. 21 20 gives χρυσόπρασος in the corresponding place: see § 23). Lĕšem, probably a loan-word (? Eg. reshem, but cp JACINTH), gives no clue. Λιγύριον was taken by some to be a place-name, and the stone seems to have been confused with 'amber,' from its electrical qualities (which are possessed by several different gems); but Theophr. 28 gives λιγγούριον (i.e. λυγκὸς οὐρόν) with a folk-tale about its origin, and a distinction between a clearer and a darker tinted variety. RV gives 'jacinth' (with mg.,

[1] The 'oriental emerald' (green corundum) is in any case out of the question. It does not seem to have been known in antiquity, and Sanscr. marakata, apparently a loan-word from Gk., suggests that, when discovered, it was regarded merely as a superior variety of σμάραγδος.

[2] The only indubitable description is that of Solinus, see King, Nat. Hist. of Prec. Stones, 245 f.; the earliest specimens are noted in King, l.c. 253.

‘or, amber’); but there is no evidence that the jacinth was either found in Liguria, or was known at all till Roman times. Probably a clear yellow stone is meant, like ‘cairngorm’ or ‘false topaz’ (iron-tinted quartz). The rendering of Rev. 21 20, χρυσόπρασος, suggests a greenish yellow stone, and perhaps serves to differentiate the adjacent yellow χρυσόλιθος (§ 17).

15. Šĕbō.

viii. Šĕbō, ἀχάτης, achates (Ex. 28 19 39 12: in Ezek. 28 13 𝔊 has ἀχάτης: 𝔊 MT Vg. omit; Rev. 21 20 in the corresponding place has ὑάκινθος). Šĕbō may be a loan-word (Ass. šubu) or the place-name Ψεφώ, an island S. of Meroë, noted for its gems (Theophr. 34, Strabo, 8 22). [Cp CHALCEDONY, 2.] ’Αχάτης (also a place-name) is definitely the ‘Sicilian agate.’ Pesh. karkednā in Ex. 28 19 39 12 may be a corruption of καρχηδόνιος (cp Symm. on Is. 54 12, kadkōd, and § 21, below), or of kadkōd itself. For (1) Sicilian stones going eastward would probably travel viâ Carthage, (2) similar ‘agates’ may have been found in N. Africa, (3) a Carthaginian ‘carbuncle’ is known to Pliny, HN 37 92 95. What particular variety of ‘agate’ (banded translucent silica) was exported from Sicily is not known: but banded agates, particularly of the deeper red varieties[1] (approximating to sardonyx and iaspachates) were in common use in Egypt throughout (the source here may well have been Ψεφω on the upper Nile), in Greece from prehistoric times (esp. common in early Crete), in later Babylonia, in Assyria throughout, and on the Syrian coast (engraved specimens in Louvre, Ledrain, l.c., Nos. 413, 420, 422, 440, 449 red; 409 white).

16. ’Aḥlāmāh.

ix. ’Aḥlāmāh, ἀμέθυστος, amethystus (Ex. 28 19 39 12; in Ezek. 28 13 𝔊 has ἀχάτης; MT Vg. omit; Rev. 21 20, ἀμέθυστος). The folklore of the Hebrew and Greek names identifies with the modern ‘amethyst’ (transparent purple quartz), which was commonly used, and freely engraved in Egypt throughout (esp. under XII. dyn.), in Greece from prehistoric times, on the Syrian coast (Ledrain, l.c. Nos. 407, 414, cp 392, 421), and more rarely, in Babylonia and Assyria. [See also references in § 4 (c), 1.]

17. Taršīš.

x. Taršīš, χρυσόλιθος, chrysalithus (Ex. 28 20 39 13; in Ezek. 28 13 𝔊 has χρυσόλιθος here; and MT ‘Tarshish,’ Vg. chrysolithus at no. iv., see § 22, below; in Ezek. 10 9 Vg. has chrysolithus, but 𝔊 ἄνθραξ [perhaps by identification with the Carthaginian carbuncle of Plin. HN, 37 25, see § 21, below]; in Dan. 10 6, θαρσεὶς, chrysolithus; in Cant. 5 14 𝔊 θαρσεὶς, Vg. hyacinthus; Symm. has ὑάκινθος here and Ezek. 1 16 28 13; in Ezek. 1 16 𝔊 has θαρσεὶς, Vg. visio maris). Taršīš is simply a trade-name and gives no clue. Χρυσόλιθος is vaguely descriptive. A stone may be a ‘gold-stone’ in three different ways. (1) It may apparently contain grains of gold—e.g., ‘avanturine quartz,’ and the epithet χρυσόπαστος applied to ‘sapphire’ (Theophr. 23, cp Plin. HN 33 31, ‘aurum in sapphiro scintillat,’ 37 38, ‘aurum punctis conlucet’). (2) It may be golden yellow and opaque—i.e., yellow jasper or yellow serpentine. The former is adopted here by Petrie (Hastings, DB, s.v. ‘Precious Stones’), and both were used commonly in Egypt and Babylonia at all periods, and in prehistoric Greece. (3) It may be golden yellow and transparent. This would be inartistic in juxtaposition with the transparent yellow lĕšem, λιγύριον (§ 14), but would agree better with the later uses of chrysolithus, which seems to represent the modern ‘topaz’ (as topazius is the modern ‘chrysolite,’ see § 8, above), and was found of very large size in Spain (‘Tartessus’), Pliny, HN 37 127. Petrie notes that the topazius of the ancients (peridote) is actually a ‘noble’ variety of yellow serpentine, and so may have taken its place as the ‘stone of Tarshish’ in course of time; compare the correlation of ἴασπις and σμάραγδος (opaque and clear green) in Theophrastus, 27.

[1] For the bearing of this on Rev. 21 20, ὑάκινθος, see below, § 23.

STONES (PRECIOUS)

The rendering ἄνθραξ may be a reminiscence of the Carthaginian ‘carbuncle’ (Plin. HN 37 25, see § 21, below), ‘Tarshish’ being taken for Carthage; and ὑάκινθος similarly may point to either ‘sapphire’ or ‘zircon’ as one of the products of an eastern ‘Tarshish’ towards India (see TARSHISH).

[For other solutions of the problem of the Tarshish-stone (to retain the traditional name), see TARSHISH, STONE OF.]

xi. Šōham, βηρύλλιον, onychinus (Ex. 27 20, onyx, Ezek. 28 13; in Ex. 39 13 ὀνύχιον, onychinus: βηρύλλιον being transferred, cp § 19. Josephus, too (BJ v. 5 7) gives ὄνυξ and for yahălōm, βηρύλλιον; but he also makes šĕbō and aḥlāmāh change places, as also sappīr and yahălōm [ἴασπις]. Elsewhere also, šōham is very variously rendered in 𝔊, by σμάραγδος, Ex. 28 9 35 27 39 6 (of the high priest's shoulder-stones); λίθος ὁ πράσινος, Gen. 2 12; λ. σαρδίου, Ex. 39 9 (same context as 39 6; perhaps for σμαράγδου miswritten σραράρδου, perhaps a variant for ὀνυχιον, cp sardonyx, Job 28 16, Vg.); ὄνυξ, Job 28 16; λίθος ὀνυχός, 1 Ch. 29 2 (with 5 1 σοομ = šōham transliterated). Vg. has onyx or onychinus everywhere; except Job 28 16, sardonyx, where 𝔊, however, has ὄνυξ. [Cp BERYL, § 4, ONYX.]

Thus the versions everywhere vary between (a) a green stone (λίθος ὁ πράσινος), whether clear (σμάραγδος) or cloudy (βηρύλλιον),[1] and (b) an opaque banded stone (ὄνυξ, sardonyx ? σάρδιον), the rendering adopted in EV. Between these two renderings we must decide according to (1) the evidence as to šōham itself, (2) the evidence as to yahălōm (MT yāšĕphēh) in xii. (§ 19), which likewise shares βηρύλλιον and ὀνύχιον in 𝔊, and has probably contributed to the confusion.

1. The word šōham has no clear meaning. It may be a loan-word (a) from Ass. sâmtu, the ‘dark’ or ‘cloudy’ stone, (b) from Ar. ‘pale’ (Ges.), which suits ‘onyx’ (see § 19, below) or ‘beryl’ (the commoner varieties, and the ‘aquamarine,’ not the deep green ‘emerald,’ σμάραγδος) almost equally well, (c) from Ar. musaḥḥam, ‘striped garment’ (see § 4 b 3), which, if it were established, would be decisive in favour of a banded stone; or it may be, (a) a place-name (cp Ar. Soḥeim in Yemen), which would not be inconsistent with the indication in Gen. 2 12 that šōham (λίθος ὁ πράσινος) came from HAVILAH (q.v.). It is clear, however (from passages like Job 28 16 and 1 Ch. 29 2, cp Ex. 25 7 35 9 35 27), either that the word had a wide generic sense (e.g., ‘variegated stones’), or that some form of šōham-stone was important enough to deserve separate mention apart from ordinary ‘stones to be set.’ Moreover, in 1 Ch. 29 2 šoham is coupled with abnē pûk, ‘stones of pigment,’ which is likewise generic, and here šōham might well mean ‘variegated’ or ‘striped’ stones.

Now there is one such stone, not yet accounted for in our list of identifications. It was common in Egypt in all periods, obtained from the Sinaitic mine-country, and used throughout, both solid and as a ‘stone of pigment.’ It was known to Babylonia and Assyria, probably from the copious Siberian source. At the same time it is green enough (though only rarely and partially translucent) to be compared with σμάραγδος (which we have seen was regarded by Theophrastus as the ‘noble’ offspring of the opaque green ἴασπις) and still more with the cloudy ‘beryl’; and also opaque and striped enough to be described as a variety of ‘onyx.’ This stone is the ‘malachite’ (green copper carbonate) with its wavy or concentric bands and cloudy (sâmtu) patches of light, vivid, and dark green, and its occasional crystalline varieties. It is soft enough, like ‘lapis lazuli,’ to be easily engraved, and occurs in large enough pieces to serve as a tablet for a six-line inscription like that of the high priest's shoulder-stones. If šōham (λ. ὁ πράσινος, par excellence; cp the later Gk. μαλαχῖτις, ‘marsh-mallow stone’) be identified with ‘malachite’ (the Eg. m-f-k-t, according to W. M. Müller) the association of šōham with sappīr in Job 28 16 (𝔊 ὀνυχὶ τιμίῳ καὶ σαπφείρῳ) would find a close parallel in the ‘pyramids of green and blue stones’ which are quoted to illustrate the wealth of Rameses III. (Brugsch, Gesch. 596).

[1] Whence Petrie (Hastings, DB, ‘Precious Stones’) concludes in favour of (1) ‘green felspar,’ passing later into (2) ‘beryl’: cp the argument in favour of the latter s.v. BERYL (q.v.).

In Greek times, 'malachite,' owing to its comparative softness, and its profusion in Cyprus and other sources of copper, either ceased to be held in regard, or was confused with green jasper (ἴασπις). Meanwhile, other 'striped stones'—namely 'onyx,' 'sardonyx,' and 'banded agate'—came rapidly into vogue, as soon as the art of engraving through a surface-layer was perfected; and consequently šōham came to be rendered either by words for 'green' (βηρύλλιον, σμάραγδος) or by words for 'banded' (ὀνύχιον: sardonyx). Consequently, confusion arose on the one hand between šōham (onyx) and its neighbour yahălōm (which includes the white-faced 'onyx'; see below), and on the other, between šōham (green malachite) and yāšĕphēh (green jasper), as soon as yahălōm and yāšĕphēh were interchanged owing to the ambiguity of bārĕḳeth in No. i. (see above, § 9).

2. For the correlative argument from yahălōm, see next §.

19. Yahălōm. xii. Yahălōm (Ex. 28 20 39 13, MT yāšĕphēh; Ezek. 28 13, MT bārĕḳeth)=(1) βηρύλλιον, Ex. 39 13, Josephus (=Vg. beryllus, Ex. 28 20 39 13; berillus, Ezek. 28 13): =(2) ὀνύχιον (Ex. 28 13 Ezek. 28 13 cp § 18; Vg. has beryllus throughout). The transposition of yahălōm has been discussed already in § 12, above, where the LXX ἴασπις presumes an original yāšĕphēh. For xii. the balance of textual evidence favours ὀνύχιον in the LXX, just as it favours βηρύλλιον in xi.; and beryllus in Vg. may result from the same source as that followed by Josephus.

The word yahălōm seems to be connected with √הלם, 'strike hard,' and (possibly) with חַלָּמִישׁ, ḥallāmīš, 'flint' (πέτρα στερέα, Job 28 9, ἀκρότομος, 'abrupt-edged,' Ps. 114 8); with Ass. elmêšu, Aram. 'almās; and with Greek 'pyrites'—(i.e., 'fire-striking stone'). [Cp FLINT, but also DIAMOND]. The Assyrian elmêšu was a hard and probably colourless stone (nowhere either 'clear' or 'brilliant') which was used, with gold, to decorate chariot-wheels (cp the 'stone of Tarshish,' Ezek. 1 16 [RV 'beryl']); and also alone, for whole rings (Del. Prol. 85, HWB, s.v.). What is wanted, therefore, for yahălōm is a hard stone, colourless or of indifferent colour; of which whole rings could be made; and recognisably akin to the 'fire-striking stone,' to the hard stone for hammers and pounders, and to ordinary 'flint' or 'chert.' The alternatives are rock-crystal and white chalcedony; the one clear or milky, the other milky or opaque. Both were fairly common, in association with either quartzite or flint; but both were rare in their 'nobler' varieties. Both were used for whole rings, as well as for engraved seal-stones, in prehistoric Greece, and in Egypt of all periods; and also commonly for later Babylonian, and for Assyrian cylinders.

At this point it should be recalled that the etymology 'finger nail' for ὄνυξ (§ 5) cannot be traced back earlier than Pliny—i.e., among Roman lapidaries, who took over an apparently Greek word, and gave it its Greek sense, though it is not at all an adequate description of the majority of 'onyx-stones.' Meanwhile the compound σαρδόνυξ shows that to denote a white-and-red 'onyx' it was the red which must be specified; the white surface therefore is the essential character of the generic 'onyx.' On the other hand, the etymology, ὄνυξ= Assyrian unḳu, 'ring,' would make ὄνυξ an obvious equivalent for a 'ring-stone,' like elmêšu or cognate words—especially as elmêšu was apparently colourless, and ὄνυξ meant a stone which had a surface, at least, of 'white carnelian' or 'chalcedony.' It follows from this identification that yahălōm was liable to be confused on the one hand with bārĕḳeth (in the sense of 'rock-crystal'); on the other (together with ὄνυξ) with šōham (in the sense of 'striped stone'); and yet again with yāšĕphēh, when later study had once revealed the many intermediates (e.g. Pliny's iasp-achates, iasp-onyx and sard-achates, HN, 37 54).

20. High priest's breastplate. Thus the high-priestly breastplate, as a whole, may be conceived as having presented the following series of stones:—

HIGH PRIEST'S BREASTPLATE

iii. Bārĕḳeth 1. ROCK CRYSTAL white: clear 2. GREEN BERYL green: clear.	ii. Piṭdah 1. FALSE TOPAZ yellow: clear 2. CHRYSOLITE yellow: clear.	i. Ṓdem ? RED JASPER red: opaque SARD red: dull.
vi. [Yāšĕphēh] GREEN JASPER green: opaque.	v. Sappīr LAPIS LAZULI blue; opaque.	iv. Nṓphek GARNET red: clear.
ix. Aḥlāmāh AMETHYST purple: clear.	viii. Šĕbō RED AGATE red: opaque striped.	vii. Lĕšem CAIRNGORM yellow: clear ? CHRYSOPRASE (Rev.) yellow-green: dull.

or, in order of colours:—

	opaque	clear
Red	ʼŌDEM	NṒPHEK	striped ŠĔBŌ
Yellow	TARŠĪŠ	PIṬDAH	? greenish LĔŠEM
Green	YĀŠĔPHĒH	BĀRĔḲETH* (later)	striped ŠŌHAM
Blue	SAPPĪR	AḤLĀMĀH	(purple)
White	YAHĂLŌM	BĀRĔḲETH* (originally)

21. Kadkōd. One stone remains, which does not appear in the breastplate, but is mentioned in several other passages. This is kadkōd (AV 'agate,' RV 'ruby'), which is rendered in Is. 54 12 by ἴασπις, iaspis, Symm. καρχηδόνιον, and in Ezek. 27 16 by χορχορ, chodchod. The word kadkōd may be from √כרר 'strike fire' (cp Ar. red'); but the renderings χορχορ and καρχηδόνιον suggest confusion of d and r; cp Pesh. karkednā for šĕbō, [ἀχάτης] in Ex. 28 19 39 12. The rendering καρχηδόνιον suggests the 'Carthaginian carbuncle' of Pliny; and if, as seems probable, a red stone is intended, the ἴασπις of Is. 54 12 must be interpreted as a red, not a green jasper. See Yāšĕphēh, § 13 above, and cp AGATE, RUBY.

For šāmīr ('emery') which is not a 'precious stone,' and for the descriptive 'eḳdaḥ and rā'mōth, see above, § 4.

22. 'Covering of King of Tyre.' A distorted version of the 'high priest's breastplate' is offered by the 'covering of the king of Tyre'[1] in Ezek. 28 13, the individual stones of which have already been discussed above. In this passage the LXX repeats its list of Ex. 28 17-20, in the same order, but inserts καὶ ἀργύριον καὶ χρυσίον between ἴασπις (vi.) and λιγύριον (vii.). This arose probably through (1) a misreading, ΑΡΓΥΡΙΟΝ for ΛΙΓΥΡΙΟΝ, and (2) a misunderstanding of the last word in the list in MT (zāhāb=Vg. aurum), which would be facilitated by the double meanings of both λιγ. and ἤλεκτρον. On the other hand, MT followed by Vg. gives only nine stones, and in a new order, as follows:—Ṓdem, piṭdah, yahălōm (=the 'first row,' (i.) and (ii.) of Ex. 28 17 f., followed by (vi.) interchanged with (iii.), by confusion of yahălōm and barĕḳeth); then taršīš, šōham, yāšĕphēh (=the 'fourth row' [x., xi., xii.] of Ex.): so that yāšĕphēh is brought into its right place at (vi.) of the present list (=ἴασπις of 𝔊); then, sappīr, nṓphek, bārĕḳeth (=the 'second row' of Ex., but with sappīr and nṓphek transposed, and bārĕḳeth instead of yahălōm); then zāhāb (Vg. aurum, 'gold') as noted above.

[1] [Cp CHERUB, § 2, PARADISE, § 3, and Crit. Bib. where the text of Ezek. 28 12 ff. is considered.]

These derangements are instructive. That they represent an old text is clear from Vg.; but that the corruption is later than 𝔊 is probable, firstly because 𝔊 follows Ex. 28 13 ff. (the variant ἀργ. κ. χρ. being mainly explanatory of λιγ.), secondly, because the derangements are all explicable on the single supposition that they are intended to remove difficulties which are raised by the identifications propounded by the LXX.

(1) The identifications ŏdem = σάρδιον, and nŏphek = ἄνθραξ, brought two red stones together. So long as 'ōdem, which is 'red' in any case, meant red jasper, it was opaque, and gave a certain contrast. 'Sards,' however, are often nearly clear. Hence a difficulty, which was removed by transposing nŏphek and sappīr; the further difficulty thus created, that the red nophek is brought next to the red šĕbō, ἀχάτης, not being felt, because, as we shall see, the 'third row' dropped out altogether.

(2) The identification bārĕḳeth = σμάραγδος had already brought about the transposition of yāšĕphēh and yahălōm, so as to separate the two green stones, and had caused the confusion in the LXX between ὀνύχιον and βηρύλλιον in xi. and xii. In MT it has had the further result that barĕḳeth in the old sense of a clear colourless stone became interchanged with the opaque colourless yahălōm. Moreover bārĕḳeth, if it meant σμάραγδος, meant 'green'; and ἴασπις was 'green,' whereas σμάραγδος was ambiguous, and yahălōm had no special colour. So on all grounds barĕḳeth went down to (vi.) and yahălōm up to (iii).

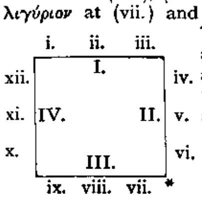
(3) Further, to restore yāšĕphēh to its proper place at (vi.), and perhaps as an alternative method of separating ŏdem and nŏphek, the whole of the 'fourth row' was interpolated between rows one and two.



(4) Finally and consequently, the 'third row' fell out altogether; lĕšem, λιγύριον, being taken for ἤλεκτρον—i.e. ἀργύριον καὶ χρυσίον—and confused with the zāhāb (= Vg. aurum), which actually ends the description both in MT and 𝔊.

Another distorted version of the same list of stones is supplied by the 'Foundations' of the New Jerusalem, in Rev. 21 19 f. Here, as regards the order, the problem has been, how to adapt the twelve stones of the breastplate, in their four rows-of-three, to the foundations of a 'foursquare' city. The result is as follows:—

23. Foundations of New Jerusalem.

I.	ἴασπις	σάπφειρος	χαλκήδων.
II.	σμάραγδος	σαρδόνυξ	σάρδιον.
III.	χρυσόλιθος	βηρύλλιον	τοπάζιον.
IV.	χρυσόπρασος	ὑάκινθος	ἀμέθυστος.

Of these rows-of-three, the first row is the second row of the 'breastplate,' given in reversed order, (vi.), (v.), (iv.), with χαλκήδων for (nŏphek) ἄνθραξ at (iv.). The second row is the first row of the 'breastplate,' also in reversed order (iii.), (ii.), (i.), with σαρδόνυξ exchanged for τοπάζιον at (ii.). The third row is the fourth row of the 'breastplate' in direct order (x.), (xi.), (xii.), but with τοπάζιον exchanged for σαρδόνυξ at (x.). The fourth row is the third row of the 'breastplate' also in direct order (vii.), (viii.), (ix.), but with χρυσόπρασος for λιγύριον at (vii.) and ὑάκινθος for ἀχάτης at (viii.).

That is to say, the 'Foundations' are conceived as in the diagram appended, and to describe them the writer has started from the angle * between sides II. and III. He has first described II. and I., in correct sequence; but when he reached IV. and III., he has recurred to the traditional order within each of the 'rows-of-three,' or has perhaps attempted to work outwards again from his starting-point at the angle between II. and III.

This account also adds several minor points. (1) The confusion between σαρδόνυξ and τοπάζιον suggests that the authority, which is followed, read βηρύλλιον for šōham at no. xi. (§ 18), and ὄνυξ, or σαρδόνυξ for yahălōm at no. xii. (§ 19). (2) The χαλκήδων which takes the place of ἄνθραξ at no. iv. substitutes a green gem ('dioptase' or copper silicate) for the red 'garnet'; giving some slight support to the discarded rendering m-f-k-t ('malachite') for nŏphek, but confirming the view that σμάραγδος in Rev. does not mean a green stone merely—for χαλκήδων was itself regarded as a variety of σμάραγδος. Σμάραγδος here, therefore, may perhaps still be translated 'crystal' as in its primary meaning. (3) The χρυσόπρασος which takes the place of λιγύριον and is not otherwise found in OT or NT, belongs, like χαλκήδων and σαρδόνυξ, to a more advanced stage of experience, when intermediate tints were recognised; it may represent either a greenish 'chrysolith,' or, more probably, the opaque applegreen 'chrysoprase' (chalcedony tinted with nickel oxide), which is intermediate in tint between a yellow serpentine or yellow jasper, and the λίθος ὁ πράσινος (cp μαλαχῖτις) of Gen. 2 12. The modern 'prase' (deep green chalcedony) and its variant the jasper-spotted 'bloodstone' were used for scaraboid gems as early as the sixth century B.C. in the Levant (e.g. Myres and Ohnefalsch-Richter, Cyprus Museum Catalogue, No. 4581), but are not clearly to be identified even in Pliny. (4) The ὑάκινθος, which takes the place of ἀχάτης, is similarly mentioned in OT or NT only here and in Rev. 9 17, ὑακίνθινος; cp Enoch 71 2 (of 'streams of fire'). Pliny (37 40) represents it as a dull sort of 'amethyst.' Solinus describes what is evidently the modern 'sapphire (blue corundum) and says that it came from Ethiopia; probably he is thinking of a port-of-exchange on the Red Sea, and consequently of the true Indian gem. Later, the meaning expanded, including many different-coloured varieties (five according to Epiphanius, six according to Ben Manṣūr [quoted at length in King, Nat. Hist. of Prec. Stones, 250 ff.]). But the use of hyacinthus in Vg. Symm. to render taršīš in Cant. 5 14 (where the LXX has ἄνθραξ) as well as by Symm. in Ezek. 1 16 28 13 (where the LXX has the normal χρυσόλιθος) suggests that an early use of ὑάκινθος may have been to render the native Indian word which appears in Arabic as yāḳūt—this denoting the modern 'jacinth,' a 'noble' variety of 'zircon' (zirconium silicate), which is a transparent deep-red stone. Now the ὑάκινθος of Rev. 21 20 takes the place of a dark-red translucent stone, šĕbō, ἀχάτης. The epithet ὑακινθίνους of Rev. 9 17, too, is coupled with πυρίνους 'fire-like' (cp Enoch 71 2, above, and the equation hyacinthus = ἄνθραξ in Cant. 5 14), so that in both cases 'sapphire' is out of the question, whilst the sultry glow of the 'jacinth' is exactly what is wanted. Moreover, both ὑάκινθος and ἀχάτης might very well stand as parallel attempts to transliterate yāḳūt, and the displacement of the one by the other becomes in every way intelligible.

Other passages in Rev. dealing with 'precious stones' have been noted already above—e.g. ἴασπις, κρυσταλλίζων, 21 11 (§ 13); ἶρις ὅμοιος ὁράσει σμαραγδινῷ 4 3 (§ 9); θάλασσα ὑαλίνη ὁμοία κρυστάλλῳ 4 6 (§ 9). The striking simile ὅμοιος ὁράσει λίθῳ ἰάσπιδι καὶ σαρδίῳ recalls the portrait statues of Roman Emperors and others, in which the raiment is worked out in hard-coloured stones—a fashion introduced in the last years of the Republic from Ptolemaic Egypt. STOOL, in 2 K. 4 10, represents כִּסֵּא, kissē (Δıφροc), on the original meaning of which word see THRONE, 1.

STORAX. 1. It is plausible to find the storax (so RV^mg.) mentioned in Gen. 30 37 as לִבְנֶה, libneh, where EV has POPLAR (ῥάβδος στυρακίνη; Ar. lubnā = storax). In Hos. 4 13, however, the libneh is mentioned as a shady tree; this does not suit the storax, which is a mere bush. The shrub called storax by the ancients (Diosc. 1 79; Plin. HN 12 17 25) is the Styrax officinalis, a showy shrub covered with a profusion of white flowers, found throughout Syria and Palestine and abundantly in the hill regions of Gilead, Carmel, Tabor, Galilee, etc., and other places (FFP 354).

Storax exuded a gum, which was used for incense (and also for medicinal purposes), and at an early period formed an important article of Phœnician trade. It is to be carefully distinguished from the modern article, which is the product of the Liquidambar Orientale. Lagarde (Mitth. 1 234) has suggested with great probability that the name Storax is derived from the Heb. צֳרִי, ṣŏrī ('balm'); but whether the two words denote the same thing is doubtful. See BALM, § 1.

2. RV^mg. also gives 'storax' in Gen. 37 25 43 11 for נְכֹאת, nĕkō'th (after Aq. στύραξ [in both], Sym. στύραξ, and Vg. storax [in 43 11], which was adopted by Bochart); EV, however, has SPICERY, SPICES (q.v.). More probably (so RV^mg.) the gum intended is the Tragacanth (Ar. nakā'a, Syr. anḳath ailā, cp Löw, 24), which is the resinous gum of the Astragalus gummifer, of which numerous species exist in Palestine.

Like צֳרִי (in connection with which it occurs), tragacanth was an article of commerce imported to Egypt (according to Ebers, Egypten, 292, the word has been found in Egyptian), and also to Tyre (Ezek. 27 17, see Co. ad loc.). There is no reference to this product in the בֵּית נְכֹתֹה of 2 K. 20 13 Is. 39 2 (EV^mg 'house of his spicery'; so Aq. Sym., Vg.), on which see TREASURY.

3. AV has 'storax' for στακτή in Ecclus. 24 15; but RV (as EV in ‖ Ex. 30 34) has STACTE (q.v.). The fragrant resin intended may perhaps be the gum tragacanth mentioned above (2).

STORE CITIES, STORE HOUSES (מִסְכְּנוֹת), Ex. 1 11 1 K. 9 19, etc. See CITY (f.), PITHOM, § 4.

According to Winckler (GI 2 210), the phrase means 'cities of the governors' (Ass. šaknu, plur. šaknûtu; Phœn. סכן; cp FRIEND).

STORK (חֲסִידָה; from חֶסֶד 'pietas' [see LOVING-KINDNESS], in allusion to the mutual affection of parents and young; Lev. 11 19 Dt. 14 18 [17] Job 39 13[1] Ps. 104 17 Jer. 8 7 Zech. 5 9; 𝔊 α[σ]σ[ε]ιδα [in Job and Jer.], ἔποψ [in Zech.], ἐρωδιός or ἀρ. [in Lev. and Ps.], πελεκάν [in Dt.]; Vg. herodio [in Lev.], herodius [in Job and Ps.], onocrotalus [in Dt.], milvus [in Jer. and Zech.]). One of the unclean birds.

Both the White (Ciconia alba) and the Black Stork (C. nigra) are found in Palestine.

The White Stork is a well-known visitant to Europe, and is occasionally, though rarely, seen in Great Britain; in Palestine it is usually met with during the month of April (Jer. 8 7), on its way N. to its breeding-places from its winter quarters in Central and S. Africa. It is regarded as a sacred bird and never molested, and in return acts to some extent as a scavenger. It frequents the haunts of man, and usually nests on such prominent structures as chimneys or towers, more rarely on trees. Many legends and stories have grouped themselves around this bird.

The Black Stork has a black head, neck, and back; it winters in Palestine, and, avoiding the habitations of man, frequents the deserts and plains, especially in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea. As a rule it lives in small flocks and breeds on trees or rocks; in the summer it migrates northwards. A. E. S.

[1] AV^mg. and RV^mg. both recognise 'stork' as the right rendering of ḥăsīdāh. The former gives, 'or the feathers of the stork and ostrich,' the latter, 'But are her pinions and feathers (like) the stork's?' In the text AV, 'or wings and feathers unto the ostrich'; but RV (agreeing with Di.), 'But are her pinions and feathers kindly?' The text is difficult, and most probably corrupt (see Budde and Duhm).

STRANGER AND SOJOURNER. This phrase, together with 'stranger or sojourner' and 'sojourner or stranger,' is used by AV to translate P's phrase גֵּר וְתוֹשָׁב; RV more consistently has 'sojourner' for תּוֹשָׁב uniformly.

1. Terms.

גֵּר, gēr and תּוֹשָׁב, tōshābh denote a resident alien or μέτοικος, a foreigner settled for a longer or shorter time under the protection of a citizen or family, or of the state; as distinguished from בֶּן־נֵכָר, ben-nēkhār, or נָכְרִי, nokhrī (fem. נָכְרִיָּה), which simply denote a foreigner. זָר, zār, is a more general term, including both foreigner and stranger. It is used in Nu. 16 40 of anyone strange to—i.e., not belonging to—the priestly clan. It is often used of persons who might also be called nokrī, Is. 1 7. The distinction between gēr and tōshābh will be considered later (§ 11 f.). The verb גּוּר, gur, is sometimes a denominative of gēr in its technical sense of resident alien, and sometimes has the more general sense of abide.

𝔊 usually has προσήλυτος for gēr, less frequently πάροικος; which latter is the usual rendering of tōshābh; gûr is usually παροικέω; and ἀλλότριος is the usual rendering alike of nokhrī, nēkhār, and zār; zār, however, is often rendered by ἀλλογενής. The Vulgate does not clearly distinguish these terms, but uses advena, colonus, and peregrinus, etc., for gēr and tōshābh; alienus, etc., for nēkhār and zār, and gives very various renderings of nokhrī.

I. Foreigners, other than gērīm (strictly so-called), in the land of Israel.—Jud. 1 19 21 27-36 (J_1) make it clear that Canaanite clans maintained themselves in the land long after the settlement.

2. Remnant of Canaanites.

At first, many of these clans stood to the Israelite tribes in the ordinary relations of neighbouring independent states. In conquered districts surviving Canaanites would be reduced to slavery. Where, however, they were too numerous, or submitted on conditions, they were employed in forced labour (corvée), וַיָּשֶׂם . . . לָמַס, Jud. 1 28. Thus in Josh. 9 27, JE, the Gibeonites are spoken of as temple-servants. Probably the status of such subject-clans was similar to that of the gērīm; but the data do not enable us to decide whether they were formally reckoned as gērīm, or placed in a distinct category. The deuteronomic editor of Joshua supposes that the Israelites exterminated the Canaanites at the Conquest, Josh. 10 40 11 20. Such a view could not have been held unless, long before the exiles, the Canaanites in Israel had disappeared as a distinct class and been absorbed in Israel and its gērīm. This absorption is also attested by the inclusion in Neh. 7 7 25 57 60 of the Gibeonites, Solomon's Servants, and the Nethinim among the Men of Israel.[1]

Many of the slaves owned by Israelites were of foreign birth; but the slaves became members of the family and shared its sacra, and thus virtually became Israelites.

3. Slaves; foreign wives.

Thus, in Israel, the slave was circumcised (Gen. 17 12 f. P), kept the Sabbath (Ex. 20 10 E), and the Passover (Ex. 12 44 P). See SLAVERY.

The examples of Moses, Boaz, David, Solomon, etc., and the law as to marriage with a female captive (Dt. 21 10-14), show that Israelites during the monarchy frequently married foreign wives. These, like the slaves, became Israelites in civil and religious status; thus Ruth, though a widow, assumes that, if she remains in her mother-in-law's family and settles in her late husband's native land 'thy people shall be my people, and thy god my god' (Ruth 1 16). See MARRIAGE.

The trade of Israel was mostly in foreign hands, and trade-routes passed through the land. For the most part traders would enter or pass through the country in caravans.

4. Traders, nomads, mercenaries.

Similarly, nomad clans would be occasional visitors, especially in the border lands. In ordinary times such caravans and clans could rely on their own strength and the general moral sentiment without seeking any special protection. Dt. 2$_{27}$ f. gives us the terms on which caravans might pass through a foreign country. They were to keep to the beaten track and pay for food and water. Further, the more powerful Israelite kings were anxious to foster commerce, and no doubt did what they could to afford a general protection to traders. Facilities for foreign traders were sometimes guaranteed by treaties; e.g., the 'streets' or quarters which the Syrians had in Samaria, and the Israelites in Damascus, 1 K. 20$_{34}$. Cp TRADE AND COMMERCE, §§ 46 ff. The mercenaries of the royal bodyguard formed another important class of resident foreigners (2 S. 8$_{18}$ 15$_{18}$ 20$_{7}$ $_{23}$ 1 K. 1$_{38}$ 50 $_{44}$ 2 K. 11$_{4}$ RV); cp CHERETHITES and PELETHITES. It is noteworthy that David addresses the mercenary captain Ittai the Gittite as a nokhrî who came but yesterday and might be expected at once to quit a service that promised little advantage (2 S. 15$_{19}$). On the other hand, in Uriah the Hittite we have a foreign soldier who married a high-born Israelite woman (2 S. 11).

[1] Kittel, Hist. of Isr. (ET) 2 187, points out that the subjection of Israelites to the corvée, 1 K. 12 4 18, must have tended to obliterate any surviving distinction between Israelites and Canaanites. 1 K. 9 21 22 is by a late editor. [Cp SOLOMON, § 6.]

STRANGER AND SOJOURNER

II. Gērīm in the technical sense.—The peculiar status of the gēr arose (1) from the primitive sentiment that a stranger was an enemy, an outlaw; (2) from the absence of any public police.

5. Temporary guest.

The guarantee of security of life lay in the blood-bond between a man and his kinsfolk. He was protected by the assurance that his kinsmen would avenge his murder upon the criminal and his kinsmen. Thus the foreigner, who was far away from his kin, was at the mercy of any evil-disposed persons. His only safety lay in putting himself under Israelite protection, by becoming the gēr or guest of an Israelite family. He then became included in the blood-bond, and his hosts defended or avenged him as if he were of their own kin. As in Arabia, such protection was freely accorded even to complete strangers. Abraham and Lot (Gen. 18 f.) press their hospitality on unknown travellers. In Judg. 19 the depravity of the men of Gibeah is shown by their inhospitable behaviour; and in Job 31$_{32}$ it is a mark of the righteous man that he does not leave the gēr—i.e., the stranger who wishes to be received as gēr—to lodge in the street. In Arabia (WRS, Kin., 41 ff.) the stranger becomes a gēr by eating or drinking with his patron; 'even the thief who has surreptitiously shared the evening draught of an unwitting host is safe. Nay, it is enough to touch the tent-ropes, imploring protection.' Further (259), 'he who journeys with you by day and sleeps beside you at night is also sacred.' But the hospitality so readily accorded can be enjoyed unconditionally only for three or four days. The gēr who stays longer ceases to be a guest and becomes a dependent (Bertholet, 27). But, while the relation lasted, the obligation laid upon the host to protect the gēr was stringent; the stories of Lot and of the Levite at Gibeah show what extraordinary sacrifices a host would make to defend his guests. The latter narrative reminds us that, in early times, an Israelite in a strange tribe was almost as helpless as a foreigner.

Analogy suggests that whole clans or tribes might put themselves under the protection of a more powerful people and become its gērīm.

6. Clans, etc.

'The several Jewish clans of Medina were compelled by their weakness to become jīrān (gērīm) of the Aus and Khazraj. Or a group might attach itself to its cousins—i.e., to a tribe with which it reckoned kindred' (WRS Kin. 42). Thus the Israelites were gērīm in Egypt, Ex. 22$_{21}$; Bertholet, 50, considers that the subject Canaanites became a kind of gērīm to Israel, and that foreign traders and mercenaries may be considered gērīm of the kings; but the terms gēr, gūr, are not applied to any of these classes. Both the Israelites and the Canaanites rendered service to their patrons. We might perhaps regard as bodies of gērīm the 'mixed multitude'—Ex. 12$_{38}$ JE עֵרֶב, Nu. 11$_{4}$ JE אספסף—that went up from Egypt with Israel. Possibly, too, the Kenites might stand in the same relationship. See MINGLED PEOPLE, KENITES.

The traveller's necessities might be met by a few days' protection; but foreigners often came into the country needing a permanent home.

7. Permanent gēr.

Like Jacob, they might have provoked the dangerous hostility of powerful enemies. In Arabia, 'men are constantly being cut off from their own tribe, generally for murder within the kin, sometimes for other offences against society, or even for dissipated habits. . . . There were, however, many other circumstances that might lead free Arabs, either individually or in a body, to seek the protection of another tribe and become its jīrān' (Kin. 42). In such cases the gēr became for a longer or shorter period the settled client of a clan, or chief, or other individual head of a family.

Bertholet maintains with great probability that such gērīm would often attach themselves to the king; and that he would welcome them as a means of strengthening his authority. He includes among the royal gērīm the mercenaries and foreign traders. He further supposes that a foreigner might attach himself to a sanctuary as gēr of Yahwè, and understands Ps. 15$_{1}$ 61$_{4}$ as referring to such cases. The Gibeonites would be another case in point.

The express references to gērīm in Israel, however, deal with the gēr who is a dependent member of an ordinary family; in Ex. 20$_{20}$, etc., the gēr is grouped with the slaves and the cattle. There are constant exhortations to deal justly and generously with the gēr (Ex. 22$_{21}$, etc.); he is grouped with other needy and helpless classes, the Levites, orphans, widows (Dt. 26$_{11-13}$ Ps. 94$_{6}$), and the poor (Lev. 19$_{10}$). The gēr was at the mercy of the individual or the clan within whose gates he took refuge. They could take advantage of his helplessness to accord protection only under oppressive and burdensome conditions. The prophets (Jer. 7$_{6}$ 14$_{8}$ 22$_{3}$ Ezek. 22$_{7}$ $_{29}$ Zech. 7$_{10}$ Mal. 3$_{5}$) and the Law (Ex. 23$_{9}$ Dt. 24$_{17}$ Lev. 19$_{34}$) alike protest against such oppression. It appears, moreover, from Dt. 1$_{16}$ 24$_{17}$ 27$_{19}$, that the gēr was not wholly at the mercy of his patrons; disputes between them might be referred to judges.

The gērīm, however, were not always poor; Lev. 25$_{47}$ contemplates the possibility that the gēr may prosper and purchase impoverished Israelites as slaves. Shebna, Hezekiah's treasurer (Is. 22$_{15}$), was probably a foreigner, and the captains of foreign mercenaries and other foreign courtiers would readily acquire power and wealth.

The relation of the gēr to his patron was voluntary on both sides, and there was nothing in the nature of the relationship to prevent its being terminated at will by either party; but circumstances—the need of the gēr and the power of his patron—tended to make the relation permanent. In Arabia (Kin. 43) 'sometimes the protectors seem to have claimed the right to dismiss their jîrân at will . . . at other times . . . protection is constituted by a public advertisement and oath at the sanctuary, and holds good till it is renounced at the sanctuary.'

The terms upon which gērīm were received were matter of agreement between them and their patrons, and their position was similar to that of 'hired servants,' שָׂכִיר, sākhīr, with whom they are classed (Lev. 25 6$_{40}$ Dt. 24$_{14}$). Only, the gēr was more helpless than the native sākhīr, and less able to insist on favourable terms. Jacob at Haran, Israel in Egypt, rendered service for their hosts; David fought for Achish—or pretended to do so. Micah's Levite came to Mt. Ephraim to find someone with whom he might live as gēr (לָגוּר, lāgūr), and agreed to serve Micah as a priest for board and lodging, and ten pieces of silver and a suit of clothes annually (Judg. 17). The prosperity of Jacob illustrates the possibility of a gēr becoming rich; and his stealthy flight shows that a gēr might find it difficult to leave his patron.

Naturally—just as Jacob married Laban's daughters, and Moses Jethro's—gērīm sometimes married Israelite women—e.g., Uriah and Bathsheba. But the case of Jacob and Arabian parallels (Bertholet, 62) suggest that a gēr who returned to his native land could not compel his Israelite wife to accompany him. The gērīm, as a class, would necessarily be landless. Moreover, both prophets and lawgivers did their best to keep family estates in the family. Their efforts, and the sentiments that prompted them, would tend to exclude even the rich gēr from acquiring land.

8. Pre-exilic period. In pre-exilic literature gēr is essentially a term describing civil, not religious, status. But civil status involved religious consequences. Various religious observances were matters of public order and decency, and as such would be required from gērīm. Thus, in the Book of the Covenant, the duty and privilege of the Sabbath extend to the gērīm (Ex. 20 10 23 12;[1] cp Amos 8 5). Further, a foreign gēr would naturally wish to worship Yahwè as Lord of the land of Israel, without necessarily renouncing his allegiance to the god of his native land (cp 2 K. 17 24-41). Moreover, it is probable, though by no means certain, that the gēr may sometimes have been included in the sacra of his patrons, as a member of the family. On the other hand, Moabite, Ammonite, and Phœnician communities at Jerusalem maintained their native worship for centuries (1 K. 11 5 7 2 K. 23 13). But in any case the religious obligations and duties of the gēr are simply the consequences of his civil status as an inhabitant of the land of Yahwè, a guest of the people of Yahwè; they are limited by his non-Israelite blood.

9. In Dt. In Deuteronomy, the gēr seems expressly included in the family sacra; in 16 9-17 the gēr is to share in the rejoicings at the feasts of Weeks and Tabernacles—i.e., partake of the flesh of sacrifices, amongst other food. The teaching of the prophets and Deuteronomy, which drew a sharp religious distinction between Israelites and foreigners, naturally furthered the assimilation of the gēr to the Israelite—the only alternative, the entire exclusion of gērīm, was impossible. Thus, in the deuteronomistic passage Dt. 31 12, the gēr is to be exhorted to study and obey the law, and in 29 10-13 the gēr is to enter into covenant with Yahwè.

10. Later. The exile and return further promoted the religious identification of Israel and the gērīm; those who shared these experiences with their patrons became united by close ties. Moreover, in the restored community, gēr lost its civil, and acquired a religious meaning. A subject community, under a foreign governor, hemmed in by settlement of foreigners, was not likely to include a class of dependent foreigners. The tendency was for the Jews to unite with their neighbours to form a heterogeneous community. They were saved from this fate by asserting an exclusive relation to Yahwè and his Temple. Under such circumstances the foreigner who united himself with Israel had to become a worshipper of Yahwè, gēr came to mean proselyte. Constantly, especially in the Law of Holiness, laws are said to apply equally to the Israelite and the גֵּר, according to the common formula kaggēr kā'ezrāḥ (Lev. 24 16, etc.). The gērīm must refrain from idolatry (Lev. 18 26 20 2), from blasphemy against God (Lev. 24 16), must observe the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16 29-31), the Passover (Ex. 12 19 48 Nu. 9 14; but cp below), must abstain from eating blood (Lev. 17 10-13), and must observe certain rules in offering sacrifices (Lev. 17 8 22 18). The religious status of the gēr is almost the same as that of the Israelite—almost, not quite. In Lev. 23 42 it is the native Israelite, the 'ezrāḥ, who is to observe the Feast of Tabernacles, in express contradiction to Dt. 31 12, which includes the gēr; but in view of this, and of the fact that everywhere else 'ezrāḥ is combined with gēr,[1] Bertholet suggests that in Lev. l.c. gēr may have dropped out. Ex. 12 48 lays down that if the gēr wishes to eat the Passover he must be circumcised. Probably, with circumcision, the gēr, or at any rate his descendants, attained to the full civil and religious standing of an Israelite. For in Dt. 23 8 we are told that the children of the Edomites and the Egyptians shall enter into the congregation of Yahwè in the third generation, and this may be extended to gērīm generally. It is true that, in spite of Ezekiel's direction that gērīm should be given land in Israel (47 22 f.), P's Law of the Jubilee theoretically reserves the land for the original Jewish holders. Such a law, however, could scarcely have been enforced against foreigners in a country under foreign rule. And generally, the tendency must have been for gēr-families to be absorbed in the Jewish community. The main distinction between the gēr in P and the later proselyte is that the gēr is still thought of as coming to live in a Jewish community. On the use of gēr as proselyte, as in 2 Ch. 30 25, see PROSELYTE.

III. The distinction between gēr and tōshābh.—

11. Gēr and tōshābh. Outside of the Priestly Code tōshābh occurs only in Ps. 39 13[2] (= 1 Ch. 29 15). In eight passages it is either coupled with, or parallel to, gēr; in three others it is, like gēr elsewhere, coupled with sākhīr; and in two others it is qualified by haggārīm, 'that are gēr's.' Neither the usage, nor the versions (see above, § 1), suggest any clear distinction of the two terms, and of the many distinctions drawn, none have met with much acceptance. Probably the passages in which tōshābh occurs represent an unsuccessful attempt to substitute a new term for the old gēr. The older gērīm were now incorporated with Israel, and a new term—either gēr qualified by an addition, or simply tōshābh—might have served to distinguish newcomers from the descendants of former gērīm, and to indicate that the status of new foreign adherents was different from that of the old gērīm. The familiar term gēr, however, persisted.

12. Lev. 15 35. Lev. 25 35, 'And if thy brother be waxen poor, and his hand fail with thee; then thou shalt uphold him: as a stranger [gēr] and a sojourner [tōshābh] shall he live with thee,' RV, or better 'thou shalt uphold him as a gēr and tōshābh, and he shall live with thee' presents peculiar difficulties. Gēr and tōshābh are usually the antithesis of 'brother.' The Hebrew naturally implies that the poor Israelite would actually take the position of a gēr—i.e., fall from his full Israelite citizenship; it might, perhaps, be strained to mean that he was to receive the same help and protection; or this meaning might be obtained by reading כ 'like' before gēr with 𝔊. Driver and White (SBOT), with Dillmann and Siegfried-Stade, excise gēr wᵉ tōshābh as a gloss.

1. A town in Gadite territory (Josh. 1327: GAD, § 12 [col. 1587]) in 'the valley' ('ēmeḳ). It is also mentioned in 1 K. 746, 2 Ch. 417, in connection with Solomon's foundries, which were in 'the clay ground (?) between Succoth and Zarethan.' The description has been held to point to 'Ain es-Sāḳūt, an old site, close to the Jordan, but on 'this' side, some 9 m. S. of Beth-shean (so Robinson), which is supposed to be referred to in these words of Jerome (Quaest. Hebr. in Gen.), 'est autem usque hodie civitas trans Jordanem hoc vocabulo in parte Scythopoleos.' Against this view, however, see ADAM. Merrill (PEFQ, 1878, p. 83) and Conder adopt as the site the large Tell or mound now called Dēr 'Alla, about 1 m. N. of the Zerḳā, discovered by Warren;[1] the special reason is that the Talmud identifies Succoth with תרעלה, Ter'ala (Neub., Géogr. 248), which seems to be this Dēr 'Alla. This is rejected by Moore as not agreeing with the topographical details in Judg. 84-17. All this, however, is precarious, unless supported by a thorough textual criticism.

(1) As to Josh. 1327. The text must originally have belonged to a geographical survey of the Negeb, in which 'the rest of the kingdom of Cushan, king of Heshbon' was assigned to the Gadites. סכות is mentioned just before צפן (see ZAPHON), and most probably is miswritten for מעכת, 'Maacath' (in Negeb).[2]

(2) As to 1 K. 746 (and the ‖). The true text probably stated that Hiram the artificer cast the vessels in Maacath-jerahmeel, between Maacath and Zarephath. See TEBAH.

The other occurrences of the name in MT are very doubtful. It has been inferred from Gen. 3317 (J), where Jacob appears to have crossed the Jabboḳ before moving on to Succoth and thence to Shechem, that Succoth lay on the S. side of the Jabboḳ, near the point where it forces its way into the Jordan. This is thought to agree with the representation in Judg. 85, where Succoth is apparently the first town reached by Gideon after crossing the Jordan somewhere near Zererah (Zeredah) and Abel-meholah. This may possibly have been the notion of the redactor of the narrative; but it is not what the original story intended to convey. 'Succoth' is a corruption either of סַלְכָה, Salecah = צלחד, Ṣalḥad, the border city at the S. E. corner of Bashan (cp JEGAR-SAHADUTHA), or, more probably, of Maacath, a district of the Negeb. (Cp, however, GIDEON.)

In Ps. 608 1088 the 'valley of Succoth' is thought to be that part of the Jordan valley which adjoins Succoth (cp Josh. 1327); but this unique and obscure phrase is improbable. The boldest but also perhaps the most critical conjecture is that the psalmist wrote 'I will mete out Cusham and Maacath' (see Ps.(2)).

𝔊 also recognises a place-name Succoth in 1 K. 2016 (εν σοκχωθ [B], εν σοκχω [AL]). Both here and in v. 12 probably we should read על־כסאתם, 'on their thrones'; see Crit. Bib.

2. A station (סֻכֹּת) mentioned repeatedly in the Exodus narrative (Ex. 1237 [σοκχωθα BF1, σοχωθα F*, σοχωθ L] 1320 σοχωθ [L] Nu. 335 f. σοχωθ [B* v. 5]). See EXODUS, i. § 10, GOSHEN, and PITHOM, § 2. Here, too, 'Maacath' may originally have stood (sub judice lis est). See WILDERNESS OF WANDERINGS. T. K. C.

SUCCOTH-BENOTH (סֻכּוֹת בְּנוֹת; ροχχωθβαινειθει [B], σοκχωθβενιθει [A], -βανειθα [L]), a Babylonian idol introduced into Palestine (2 K. 1730). As some critics think, a Hebraised form of Sarpanitum, consort of Marduk (on the name see Jastrow, RBA, 121 [Germ. ed. 115], 449). So Rawlinson, Schrader, Hommel. Delitzsch (Par. 215) explains Sakkut-binutu ('supreme judge of the world'?). But surely if the usual explanation of Am. 526 is correct we can hardly doubt that it is a corruption of סַכּוּת כֵּיוָן, Saccūth-Kēwān (two names of Saturn combined; see CHIUN AND SICCUTH).

There is, however, a better theory. It is probably of the non-Israelite Negeb that the original narrative spoke as the country from which the new colonists of the cities of שמרון (see SHIMRON) came. Among them were the men of בבל—i.e., Jerahmeel; the idol they made was of סכות, or rather כֻּשִׁית, 'Cushith,' a title of the so-called 'Queen of Heaven' (or, 'of Jerahmeel'?) worshipped by the N. Arabians. See Crit. Bib. בנות possibly comes from וכות (כ' written too soon). The men of Cuth, or rather Cush, made Nergal—i.e., Jerahmeel (a name for the Jerahmeelite Baal); those of Hamath (Maacath) made Ashima—i.e., Ishmael; the Arvites (Arabians) made Nibhaz and Tartak (= Terah); the Sepharvites (Zarephathites) made Adrammelech and Anammelech (= Jeraḥmeel). SUD (σουδ [BAQ]; ṣûr [Syr.], sod), a Babylonian stream (canal) near which Jewish exiles are said to have been settled (Bar. 14). Cp BARUCH [BOOK], §§ 1, 4. There must be some error in the text. Since Bar. 11-38 probably had a Hebrew original, we may venture to assume a confusion between ר and ד, and read either סור, Sūr, i.e., Sora, the seat of a famous Jewish academy (so first Bochart), or more probably שִׁחֹר, 'Shihor,' the name of a wādy in the Negeb, assuming that בבל in the source from which the writer drew meant Jerahmeel. See SHIHOR. For a less probable view, see Wetzstein in Del. Jes.(3), 701 f. T. K. C.

[2] 'In the valley,' Josh. 1327, should be 'in Maacath.' Cp Ps. 608*b*, where עמק סכות represents a twice written מעכת (see Ps.(2)).

the army of SHISHAK (q.v.) is described as consisting of soldiers 'of Egypt, the Lubim (i.e. Libyans), the Sukkiim (סֻכִּיִּים), and the Ethiopians.' By Sukkiim, evidently an African nation is meant; and considering the position between Libya and Ethiopia, one understands why 𝔊 and Vg. guess at the Trog(l)odytæ (the l correctly wanting in B). This, however, is only a guess; no such name is known in antiquity. The Egyptian name for those nomadic tribes of Hamitic blood, living between Egypt and the Red Sea, was Anti. This seems to have about the same meaning as the Greek name, viz., 'inhabitants of rocks, cliff-dwellers.'[1]

Gesenius's explanation, 'dwellers in booths' (סֻכּוֹת) is philologically and practically impossible. C. Niebuhr, OLZ 3 69, has observed that the name is almost the same as the תֻּכִּיִּים (tukkiyyim), 1 K. 10 22 2 Ch. 9 21, the supposed 'peacocks' (see PEACOCK) brought to Solomon, and conjectures that the word really means there 'black slaves,' correcting into sukkiyyîm, as above. As such a word or name remains unknown, W. M. Müller proposes, 2 269, to assume חסמים, 'grey-hounds' (from Egyptian tsm), as the original reading in the African curiosities brought to Solomon, and thinks that the chronicler mistook this for a name of an African nation. Thus C. Niebuhr's observation, which is undoubtedly correct as far as the similarity of both words in vocalisation, is just reversed. Of course, the last explanation rests on a somewhat bold assumption. W. M. M.

SUN (שֶׁמֶשׁ, חֶרֶס; on etym. see BDB). As to the gender of the sun, Šemeš or the corresponding word is masculine in Heb. generally,[2] Aram. and Ass. In Arabic it is feminine, but the heathen Arabs knew Šams as a sun-god (see further below). For sun-worship among the early Israelites there is little positive evidence, and that little (one would far rather think otherwise) threatens to disappear as the result of a searching criticism of the place-names Beth-shemesh, En-shemesh, Har-heres, Kir-heres, Timnath-heres, which it is possible are comparatively late corruptions of Beth-cusham, En-cusham, Har-ashhur, Kir-ashhur, Timnath-ashhur (see Crit. Bib. on 1 S. 6 12 Judg. 1 35, and other related passages). The ordinary view, of course, is that שֶׁמֶשׁ, šémeš, and חֶרֶס, ḥéres, in the traditional forms of these names, prove that the places to which the names are taken to have belonged were centres of the cultus of the sun-god. We must remember, however, that the solar character of the Baals has not been made out (BAAL, § 2 f.; NATURE-WORSHIP, § 5), and (not to fall into repetitions) that it is in S. Arabia that the worship of sun and moon was 'strikingly prevalent.' On the other hand, Winckler has produced a considerable body of evidence (most of it, to be sure, is unsafe) from the early narratives, to show that solar and lunar mythology is represented in Hebrew legends, and holds that the god variously called Ramman, Hadad, and Yahu is not only the storm-god, but at the same time the god who, in the spring-tide, restores fruitfulness to the earth, and one of whose forms is the well-known Tammuz (GI 2 78). In Gen. 49 10, where Dillmann supposes the moon to be represented by Joseph's mother, Winckler holds that, since שֶׁמֶשׁ may be feminine (see Gen. 15 17; and cp Ges. Thes., s.v. שֶׁמֶשׁ) and יָרֵחַ, yārēăḥ, neither is nor can be feminine, the mother is the true representative of the sun, and we have here a sign of the influence of a different form of mythology from the pure Babylonian—viz., the S. Arabian, in which the children of the moon-god are 'Athtar, who is masculine, and Šams, who is feminine. Winckler also (GI 2 70) thinks we may infer that in the early Hebrew myth (which was also the original Semitic as well as S. Arabian myth) Šams, the sun-deity, was the mother, 'Athtar the wife of the moon-god. Zimmern (KAT(3), 365, 369) gives a qualified support to Winckler's theories, but thinks that Egyptian influences on Hebrew cults may be presumed, in addition to Babylonian. If we throw back this influence far enough, the possibility of this may be granted. But, so far as the biblical evidence goes, it is surely Babylon (directly or indirectly) rather than Egypt which is indicated as the source of such influences. We must also desiderate a much keener and more methodical criticism of the Hebrew texts, especially of names and phrases bearing on cults and myths, than is yet habitual among biblical and archæological scholars. For instance, is it safe to build either on the place-name Beth-shemesh, or on the personal names SAMSON and SHESHBAZZAR (qq.v.)? However this may be, the worship of the sun and moon and of the 'host of heaven' in general among the Israelites in the seventh and sixth centuries is not doubtful (see MOON, NATURE-WORSHIP, § 5, STARS, § 4, TAMMUZ).

The neighbouring names in the traditional text are as perplexing as Suph, and there is some reason to think that D_2 has, either by accident or under the influence of theory, misread an earlier text which lay before him.

מול סוף may originally (cp 𝔊, Nu. 21 14, ἐφλόγισε = סופה) have been מול צרפת[1], and the whole verse may have run, 'These are the words which Moses spoke to all Israel in Arabia of Jerahmeel, in the wilderness [in Arabia], opposite Zarephath, between Paran and Peleth and Libnah and Miṣrim.' If, however, OCINA is Accho, this violates the geographical order of the places. Most probably Judith (like Tobit; see THISBE) was redacted from a narrative in which the scene of the events was mainly in the Negeb. The place-names easily adapted themselves to this view. SWADDLE, SWADDLINGBAND. The verb (חתל, ḥāthal, in Pu. and Hoph.) is found in Ezek. 16 4; the noun ḥăthullāh (חֲתֻלָּה), in Job 38 9, figuratively of the dark cloud enveloping the circumambient ocean.

The mortal speaker in Wisd. 7 3 f. says, 'I also when I was born, drew in the common air, and fell upon the kindred earth, uttering, like all, for my first voice, the selfsame wail. In swaddling clothes was I nursed and in [watchful] cares (ἐν σπαργάνοις ἀνετράφην καὶ ἐν φροντίσιν).' See also Lk. 2 7 12 (ἐσπαργάνωσεν, ἐσπαργανωμένον). Cp ROLLER; FAMILY, § 10; MEDICINE, § 1. In Lam. 2 22 the verb is טפח, ṭippaḥ, more probably 'dandled': so RV. See SPAN.

SWALLOW. 1. דְּרוֹר, dĕrōr: Ps. 84 3 [4], Prov. 26 2 †; τρυγών in Ps., στρουθοί in Prov. See below.

2. סוּס, sūs, Is. 38 14 Jer. 8 7,† Kt.; סִיס Kr.; χελιδών[1]; correctly rendered in RV; AV wrongly CRANE (q.v., for explanation of error).

Canon Tristram considers that dĕrōr is rightly interpreted swallow or martin, whilst the identity of sīs[2] with the swallow or swift has been satisfactorily proved by Bochart 2 1 10 (cp Lagarde in GGN 1888, p. 6 f.), and receives interesting confirmation from the fact that Tristram heard this name given to the swift (Cypselus apus, L) by the present inhabitants of Palestine (FFP, 82 f.).

Although zoologists place the Hirundinidæ (swallows and martins) some distance from the Cypselidæ (swifts), swallows and swifts are very frequently mistaken for each other, and it seems improbable that the ancient Jewish writers distinguished between them.

There are three species of swallow, Hirundo, now found in Palestine. (1) The common swallow, H. rustica, which, like its congener (2) H. rufula, returns from its winter quarters towards the end of March, whilst (3) H. savignii, the oriental swallow, winters in the Holy Land. Four species of martin and three species of swift are known in Palestine, one of them being the common swift, Cypselus apus, referred to above.

The swifts fly, like the swallows, with great rapidity, and their return from the S. in the early spring is a most striking event (Jer. 8 7). It usually occurs at the beginning of April. 'Clouds pass in long streams to the north, but still leave prodigious numbers behind.'

They return to their winter quarters in November. It is thought that the reiterated complaining cry of the swift is referred to by the prophet (Is. 38 14) rather than the more musical and less frequent note of the swallow (see further Che. ad loc.).

Both swifts and swallows frequent towns and villages. The swallows build their nests of mud (Ps. 84 3). The swift usually builds its nest of straws, feathers, etc., cemented together by saliva; it uses such materials as it can obtain without recourse to the ground, as with its long wings and short legs it experiences difficulty in rising from the earth.

3. (עָגוּר, 'āgūr: Is. 38 14 Jer. 8 7 †), rendered in RV CRANE (q.v.). A. E. S.—N. M.

[It seems probable that עָגוּר should also be substituted for MT's אֶרֶז in Job 7 6. 'My days are swifter than a crane' will be instinct with pathetic force to those who remember travellers' descriptions of the migration of the crane. See Crit. Bib. T. K. C.]

SWAN (תִּנְשֶׁמֶת, tinšĕmeth, Lev. 11 18 [πορφυριων [BFL] -ρων [A]], Dt. 14 16 [(ε)ιβιc BAFL]).

Two species of swan, Cygnus musicus (C. ferus), the Whooper or Wild Swan, and C. olor (C. mansuetus), have been found in Palestine; but they appear to be comparatively rare, and scholars do not now defend AV.

Following 𝔊 in Dt., Tristram identifies tinšĕmeth with the sacred ibis (Ibis æthiopica; but see HERON), or with the purple gallinule (Porphyrio cæruleus) allied to the moor-hen. See, however, OWL.

The same Hebrew word is found in Lev. 11 30 in the list of unclean quadrupeds, where AV has MOLE (q.v., 2), RV CHAMELEON. See LIZARD, 6. A. E. S.

[1] χελιδών represents both סוס and עגור in Is., in Jer. χελιδὼν ἀγροῦ = סוס or סיס. Aq. ἵππος in Is. 38 14; Sym. χελιδών in Is. 38 14, τέττιξ in Jer. 8 7; Theod. σίς in Is. 38 14.

[2] This form, which is the Kre in Jer. 8 7, is also supported by Th. in Is. 38 14 and is the name which Tristram heard (see above).

SWEARING (√שׁבע, Gen. 21 23, etc.; ομνγειν, Mt. 5 34, etc.). See OATH.

SWEAT, BLOODY. Of the passage in Lk. 22 44 (the agony in the garden), 'and his sweat became as it were great drops of blood falling down upon the ground' (καὶ ἐγένετο ὁ ἱδρὼς αὐτοῦ ὡσεὶ θρόμβοι αἵματος καταβαίνοντος ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν), three interpretations are current: (a) that a literal (and preternatural[1]) exudation of blood is intended; (b) that the sweat-drops resembled blood-drops in colour, size, abundance, or the like; (c) that the expression is to be taken rhetorically, somewhat as the modern 'tears of blood.'

It is to be observed that vv. 43 f. are absent from many MSS (see the discussion in WH 264 ff.). It is a question whether they were suppressed by the 'orthodox' (ὀρθόδοξοι δὲ ἀφείλαντο τὸ ῥητόν, Epiphanius, Ancorat. 31), or whether they are to be regarded as a later insertion, explicable perhaps on some such principle as that suggested above in col. 1808, middle. Among the most recent commentators Holtzmann accepts them as genuine, whilst B. Weiss rejects them. There is a recent discussion of the subject by Harnack (SBA W, 1901, 251-255), who holds it to be certain that BNA give an intentionally shortened text, and places the excision perhaps in the beginning of the second century, but perhaps also many decades later. His arguments are four: (1) Every feature in the disputed passage which can be compared with certainly genuine Lucan passages bears the Lucan stamp. (2) There is no direct evidence that the words were wanting in the MSS. before 300, whilst Justin, Tatian, and Irenæus attest them for the first half of the second century. (3) In two important points the passage could not fail to offend the orthodox: (a) the statement that an angel strengthened Jesus: we remember how earnest was the struggle in the earliest times for the super-angelic dignity of Jesus; (b) the ἀγωνία with its consequences was produced not by external attacks but by a terrible inward struggle (this goes beyond Heb. 5 7). (4) We cannot, it is true, give a full answer to the question whence the fourth evangelist drew his material; but it is clear that in the narrative of the Passion and the Resurrection he had no other source than the Synoptics. Now is it not highly probable, asks Harnack, that Jn. 12 27 ff. is the Johannine transformation of Lk. 22 43 f.? Cp CROSS, § 5.

SWINE (חֲזִיר; cp Ass. ḫumṣiru;[2] γc; χοιρος, Lk. 8 32 f. 15 15 f. etc.). Apart from the prohibition of eating

1. Biblical references. swine's flesh (Dt. 14 8, cp Lev. 11 7) there is probably no pre-exilic reference to this animal in the OT. The fine proverb comparing a 'fair woman without discretion'

[1] According to Professor Macalister (Hastings, DB 3 330*a*): 'There are no modern trustworthy cases of genuine bloody sweat; and although in some older writings comparable instances are quoted, none of them are properly authenticated.'

[2] Ḫumṣiru and piazu are two animals which belong to the class represented ideographically by SAḪ (i.e., swine). They lived in reedy, marshy districts. Whether ḫumṣiru is quite the same as the Arabic ḫinzīr is uncertain; but the affinity must be great (Jensen, ZA 1 309). The Aramaic ḥĕzīrā is, like the Arabic form, derived from Babylonian; cp references in Muss-Arnolt, s.v. ḫumṣiru. 'Narrow-eyed' (BDB) is not a satisfactory explanation.

to 'a jewel of gold in a swine's snout' (Prov. 11 22) may already presuppose the proximity of Gentiles who kept swine. This is certainly the case with the two most familiar NT references to swine—viz., 'he sent him into his fields to feed swine' (Lk. 15 15), and 'neither cast ye your pearls before the swine' (Mt. 7 6). But we can go deeper into the meaning than this. It is difficult not to think that, at any rate in its present form, the crowning error of the 'prodigal son' consisted in his becoming paganised[1] (an ever present danger of Jews in the Roman period); 'the swine,' as well as 'the dogs' (note the article) in Jesus' warning, are Gentiles of the class described so often in the OT as 'the wicked' (contrast Is. 42 4*b*). Such passages are intelligible only at the period when both Judaism and the young religion of Christ were confronted by an alien religious system in the very midst of the sacred land. No more striking exhibition of this perpetual contrast can well be imagined than that in the narrative of the demoniacs of Gerasa (see GERASA). This place was (like Gadara) in the heathen territory of Peræa, where a 'herd of many swine' (Mt. 8 30 Lk. 8 32)—we need not lay stress on the too definite detail in Mk. 5 13[2] ('about two thousand')—was a familiar sight.

It is probable that the story of the Gerasene demoniac or demoniacs has not reached us in its earliest form, and that the departure of the 'legion' of demons into the half-legion of swine is a secondary element.[3] If so, we gain a fresh illustration of the Jewish way of regarding heathenism as a 'swinish' error (see Weizsäcker's weighty remarks, Apost. Age, 265). The author of 2 Peter regards the immoral heresy of his day as just such another (2 Pet. 2 22,[4] where EV 'sow,' ὗς).

There are three references to swine in 𝕲 which are not found in MT. Probably, however, they are due to corruption of the text. See 2 S. 17 8 (where 𝕲B appears to insert ὡς ὗς τραχεῖα ἐν πεδίῳ; but see Klo. ad loc.) and 1 K. 20 19 22 38 (where the [αἱ] ὕες of BAL and BA respectively has evidently sprung out of κύνες).

2. A sacred animal.

The swine occupied a highly honourable place as a sacrificial animal in Asia Minor, Greece, and Italy, but was neither sacrificed nor eaten by the Jews.[5] Their feeling of repugnance was not shared by the Assyrians, who relished swine's flesh;[6] though the hog, which was only half-tamed, was not included among their ordinary domestic animals.[7] In Egypt the pig was unpopular, if not tabooed.[8] Swine were certainly kept, but only in certain localities—e.g., in the district of el-Kāb (the city of Eileithyia). Among the live stock belonging to Renni, whose tomb is at el-Kāb, 300 swine are mentioned. As Renni (13th dynasty) was a prophet of the goddess at el-Kāb (perhaps to be identified with Selēnē; cp Herod. 2 47), it is probable that he had to provide swine for sacrifice; for swine, as Herodotus states, were sacrificed to Selēnē and Dionysus (Osiris). The drove of swine depicted in the tomb of Paheri (18th dynasty) at the same place may be for agricultural purposes. Elsewhere swine came to be regarded as embodiments of Set and Typhon, and were loathed accordingly. To the Syrians and Phœnicians, however, the swine was sacrosanct and its flesh prohibited (cp Lucian, Dea Syr. 54). Antiphanes states that it was sacred to Aphrodite or Astarte (Athen. 3 49).

Probably it is from the European boar (Sus scrofa) that the domesticated swine of Palestine is derived, though this is still to some extent a matter of conjecture. Swine are very uncommon in Palestine, and there may have been the same scarcity in Jewish territory in ancient times on account of the repugnance of the Jews to this animal. This repugnance (which is shared by Mohammedans) is not to be explained on mere sanitary grounds (cp Plut. De Is. et Osir. 8). It is but the reverse side of that earlier veneration for the swine as sacrosanct,[1] which also accounts for the original taboo upon swine's flesh; and the legend of the death of ADONIS may be a primitive (Phœnician) explanation of this change of feeling. There is indeed some evidence among the Jews of a survival of the ancient feeling in certain quarters. As Robertson Smith has pointed out,[2] the strange statements in Is. 65 4 (cp 66 17) and 66 3 are most easily explicable if the flesh of swine was partaken of in secret sacrificial meals.

The correctness of this view is by no means bound up with his view of the date of Is. 65 f., which later criticism regards as belonging to the time of Nehemiah, and referring to certain unorthodox rites practised by some at least of the Jews and by the Samaritans, or the N. Arabians (Che.), and denounced by the adherents of a legal orthodoxy. It has also been made at any rate plausible by Robertson Smith that the swine, the dog, and the mouse (see DOG, MOUSE) were the totems of the Jewish families which took part in the mysteries described in those strange prophecies.[3]

3. References to boars.

The BOAR in Hebrew bears the same name as the swine. The Talmud for clearness uses the phrase חֲזִיר הַבָּר (cp בַּר, 'the open country,' Job 39 4); a psalmist (Ps. 80 13 [14] σῦς [BA], ὗς [א ART]) once speaks of 'the boar from the jungle'[4] (מִיַּעַר, EV 'out of the wood'). This is in fact the more descriptive phrase. It is in the 'jungle' of the Jordan, from Jericho to the Sea of Galilee, that the wild boar specially dwells, though he is also to be found in the lowlands of S. Philistia and Beersheba and on the slopes of Hermon. 'A party of wild boars,' says Tristram (NHB 54), 'will uproot a whole field in a single night.' The Assyrian storm-god in his fury is likened to a wild boar (ḫumṣiru); not unnaturally we may interpet Ps. 80 13 [14] of the havoc wrought in Palestine by the armies of Artaxerxes Ochus. Similarly in 4 Esd. 15 30 the CARMANIANS [q.v.] are compared to 'the wild boars of the forest' (in one of the late additions to 4 Esd.); and in Enoch 89 72 the Samaritans who attempted to prevent the rebuilding of the Jewish temple are symbolised by wild boars.

SWORD (חֶרֶב, ḥéreb; μαχαιρα, ρομφαια, ξιφος). In Ecclus. 46 2 ῥομφαία (EV 'sword)' represents kīdōn, כִּידוֹן. See JAVELIN, 1, 5. In Job 20 25, bārāḳ, בָּרָק, lit. 'lightning,' is poetically used for 'sword' or 'blade' (cp Dt. 32 41).

[1] The parable is even literally accurate. That Jews were sometimes tempted to keep swine is proved for the time of John Hyrcanus by a prohibition quoted by Grotius in his comment on Mt. 8 32.

[2] Keim's statement (Jesu von Naz. 2 457) is correct; 'the report of Matthew is by far the simplest, the most original.' Cp Badham, S. Mark's Indebtedness, 42 f.

[3] Nestle (Philologica Sacra, 21) suggests that the story may have arisen as a popular explanation of a place-name such as Rās el-ḫinzīr, 'swine's head' (or 'promontory'), or Tell abu-l-ḫinzīr, 'hill of the father of swine.'

[4] In this passage the reference to the wallowing of the swine appears to have sprung from a misreading of a well-known proverb (Prov. 26 11).

[5] Cp Frazer, Pausanias, 4 137 ff.

[6] On certain days it was expressly forbidden to eat it (Jastrow, Relig. Bab. Ass. 381). Was it sacred to Bel at Nippur? See Peters, Nippur, 2 131.

Other words doubtfully or wrongly rendered 'sword' are:

1. šélaḥ, שֶׁלַח, Joel 2 8; RV 'weapons' (EV's usual rendering). 'Dart' would be better (שׁלח, to send, shoot). So in Neh. 4 17 [11], and elsewhere, 'weapon' should be 'dart' (𝔊BℵA βολίς).

2. mĕkērāh, מְכֵרָה, Gen. 49 5†. So AVmg., RV. The meaning is suitable; but the sense has no philological justification (see Spurrell's note). See SHECHEM.

3. réṣaḥ, רֶצַח, Ps. 42 10 [11]; 𝔊 καταθλάσαι (-θλᾶσθαι [ℵc.a]); AVmg., 'Or, killing'; RVmg., 'Or, crushing.' Baethgen agrees with RV, comparing 62 3 [4]. See Che. Ps.(2), We. SBOT, on the text of both passages.

The ḥéreb or sword (the sheath of which was called תַּעַר, tá'ar, or נָדָן, nādān) was suspended from the girdle (Gen. 48 22 1 S. 17 39 25 13 2 S. 20 8), probably on the left thigh (cp Judg. 3 16, with Moore's note), as was also usual with the Assyrians (see Layard, quoted below) and the Greeks. Though so frequently mentioned in the OT, we need not infer that it was in very common use; the sword cannot have been so easy to make as the arrow (see WEAPONS, § 2) or SPEAR. Nor must we suppose that an instrument of the same size and shape is always intended by ḥéreb; the same word may have denoted the most primitive form of sword, as well as the later knife-like weapons (cp Josh. 5 2 and see KNIFE, 2), including scimitars and the longer poniards.

Taking a wider survey of the evolution of the sword, we notice that the earliest form of this weapon was of wood; the antelope's horn, merely sharpened, which is still used in every part of the East where the material can be procured, may also, as a writer in Kitto suggests (Bibl. Cycl.), have served the same purpose. The Egyptian soldiers of the first Theban Empire were armed in some cases with wooden swords (Maspero, Dawn of Civilisation, 452), and swords of heavy wood are said to be still used in Nubia; in Mexico and Yucatan the wooden sword was provided with a flint edge, and 'the destructive powers of this formidable weapon are frequently dwelt upon by the early Spaniards' (Wilson, Prehistoric Man, 1 190). Later, bronze and iron were used.

The sword, however, would not appear to have been a favourite weapon in ancient times. Where it is found, it seems to be carried as a rule as an additional security. The Chaldæan soldiers, whose equipment was of the rudest kind, though they seem to have used the dagger, did not apparently carry a sword (see Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 722). According to Erman (Life in Anc. Egypt, 516), the swords (ḥurpu) imported into Egypt in the eighteenth dynasty came from Syria. Wilkinson (Anc. Egypt, 1 210 f.) gives the following description of the Egyptian sword:

> 'The Egyptian sword was straight and short, from two-and-a-half to three feet in length, having apparently a double edge, and tapering to a sharp point; and Herodotus compares the sword of Cilicia to that of Egypt. It was used for cut and thrust; but on some occasions they held it downwards, and stabbed as with a dagger. The handle was plain, hollowed in the centre, and gradually increasing in thickness at either extremity' (cp the picture of the storming of Dapuru, the fortress of the Ḥeta, by Rameses II., reproduced above, col. 1223).

This is very like the sword of the bronze age as we find it elsewhere (cp the bronze swords given in Evans, The Ancient Bronze of Great Britain, 273-300; Wilson, Prehistoric Annals of Scotland, 1 352). Like other bronze swords it is without cross-piece[1] or handguards; and like these, in spite of what Wilkinson says, it was perhaps 'intended for stabbing and thrusting rather than for cutting' (Lubbock, Prehistoric Times(6), 30).[2] The swords of the Mediterranean pirates seem to have been of the same kind (Wilkinson, 246; cp WMM, As. u. Eur. 375); and we meet with it again on the silver patera found by Gen. di Cesnola (Cyprus, pl. xix., opp. p. 276) at Curium.[1] For cutting, a curved sword, like a sickle, was often used. In the nineteenth dynasty the Pharaoh himself is represented as fighting. 'He even takes part in the hand-to-hand fight, and his dagger and sickle-shaped sword are close at hand' (Erman, Anc. Egypt, 527).[2] The Assyrians, whose martial equipment was remarkable, used swords of various kinds and sizes. The spearman, besides his spear and shield, often carried a short sword in his belt (Maspero, Ancient Egypt and Assyria, 321). But Assyrian soldiers also used long swords; 'the swords were worn on the left side, and suspended by belts passing over the shoulders, or round the middle' (Layard, Nineveh and its Remains, 2 342); some of the swords have quite a modern appearance (see Ball, Light from the East, 199). That amongst the Israelites the sword was sometimes slung in the same way seems to be shown by such passages as 1 S. 17 39 2 S. 20 8 1 K. 20 11. Both sword and sheath amongst the Egyptians and Assyrians were often highly ornamented (see Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, 1 210, Layard, Nineveh and its Remains, 2 298; cp also the poniards found in the coffin of 'Aḥ-ḥotep, as shown in Maspero, Egyptian Archæology, 318 f., Struggle of the Nations, 97).

Amongst the metal objects found by Bliss (A Mound of Many Cities, 105) were spear-heads, lance-points, and knives, but apparently no swords. On p. 106, however, he gives what he describes as 'a large knife, which fitted on to a wooden handle, as a few slivers of wood still clinging to the end show.' Perhaps this was rather a poniard. Schliemann in his Mycenæan explorations (Mycenæ, 283) found swords the length of which 'seems in a great many cases to have exceeded three feet . . .; they are in general not broader than our rapiers.' But, strange to say, he found no swords on the supposed site of Troy (see Ilios, 483). At Hissarlik 'weapons of copper and bronze occur frequently—lance-heads, daggers, arrow-heads, knives, if we may designate these as weapons—but no swords' (Preface by Prof. Virchow, xii). The reputed sword of Goliath was preserved as a sacred object in a sanctuary (1 S. 21 8 f.). There are Babylonian parallels (see GOLIATH, § 3), and Lubbock (Origin of Civilisation(5), 323) points out that to some peoples the sword itself has been an object of veneration and even of worship. M. A. C.

SYCAMINE TREE (ϲυκαμινοϲ, Lk. 17 6†) is, as all agree, the mulberry, that being the invariable meaning of the Greek word (Cels. 1 288 ff.).

Both the black and the white mulberry (Morus nigra L. and M. alba L.) are at this day commonly cultivated in Palestine. The Greek name is probably derived from Heb. שִׁקְמִים, šiḳmīm, though this denotes a different tree—the sycomore or fig-mulberry. The Mishnic name for the mulberry is תות. 'Mulberry trees' as a rendering for בְּכָאִים is a mere guess. Cp MULBERRY TREES. N. M.

SYCHAR (ϲυχαρ [Ti. WH]), mentioned in the account of the conversation of Jesus with a Samaritan woman (Jn. 4 5). It was a 'city of Samaria,' and it was 'near the piece of ground (χωρίον) which Jacob gave to his son Joseph.' 'Jacob's fountain' (πηγή) was there, by which we are told that Jesus sat, 'wearied with his journey.' From the expression 'a city . . . called Sychar' (cp 11 54, 'a city called Ephraim') we may plausibly assume that the place referred to was not very well known. On the other hand, it is not impossible that the redactor of the Gospel may have misread the manuscript which lay before him, and that, not knowing any places called Sychar and Ephraim, he

[1] Cp the earlier broadsword of the ante-Norman period; see Evans, Ancient Armour and Weapons in Europe, 1 31 ff.

[2] 'The handles of the bronze swords are very short, and could not have been held comfortably by hands as large as ours, a characteristic much relied on by those who attribute the introduction of bronze into Europe to a people of Asiatic origin' (Lubbock, op. cit.).

[1] The weapons of Cyprus were greatly prized; 'Alexander had a Cyprus sword given him by the king of Citium, and praised for its lightness and good quality' (p. 10).

[2] Cp the curved sabre of Rammān (Adad)-Nirari I.; Maspero, Struggle of the Nations, 607; Ball, Light from the East, 133. The Etruscans also used the curved sword; Dennis, The Cities and Cemeteries of Etruria, 1 201 2 442.

may have modified the phraseology so as to suit these apparently obscure places.[1] Naturally there has been much debate as to this 'city called Sychar,' otherwise unmentioned; and the theory which has the first claim to be considered is that which identifies 'Sychar' with συχεμ (Sychem)—i.e., the chief city of the Samaritans, Shechem.

1. Sychar = Shechem.

From the time of Eusebius, no doubt has been entertained as to the identity of 'Jacob's fountain.' It is called later in the gospel narrative a well (φρέαρ = בְּאֵר, bĕ'ēr), and this double title is, in fact, applicable to the venerable 'Jacob's Well' of our day, if the various reports of travellers are correct. It is no doubt rain-water that produces the softness claimed for the water of 'Jacob's Well'; but it may nevertheless also be true that, as Conder says, the well fills by infiltration.[2] Few of the sacred sites in Palestine thrill one so much as this, because of the beauty of the narrative with which it is connected, and because of the unquestioning and universal acceptance of the early tradition. Jacob's Well is situated 1½ m. E. of Nāblus, 1100 yards from the traditional tomb of Joseph (Josh. 24 32). It is beneath one of the ruined arches of the church which Jerome, as we shall see (§ 2), speaks of, and is reached by a few rude steps, being some feet below the surface. The situation is very appropriate, if the well was designed for the use of the workers in the grain-fields of el-Maḥna;[3] for it is at the point where the Vale of Nāblus merges into the plain of el-Maḥna. The reputation of its water for sanctity and for healthfulness might conceivably have led a woman to go there from Shechem (if Sychar = Shechem) to draw water, although the well was 'deep.' A doubt may, indeed, arise as to whether the city of Shechem could have been described by the narrator as 'near the piece of land which Jacob gave to Joseph,' if this piece of land enclosed the present 'Jacob's Well' and 'Joseph's Tomb.' It would seem, however, that a writer who had the statement of Gen. 33 18-20 in his mind would almost inevitably speak of the 'piece of land' as near Shechem; for the writer of that passage (we assume the text to be correct) certainly suggests that Shechem and Jacob's purchased estate were near together. If, therefore, our present 'Jacob's Well' was already known by that name in the time of the evangelist (or the writer on whom the evangelist relies) there is no difficulty in the statement that Sychar (if Sychar = Shechem) was near Jacob's possession. Nor can we, in accordance with the tenor of the narrative, venture to place 'the city' very near Jacob's Well, for Jesus' disciples, who had gone away into the city to buy food, returned (Jn. 4 8 27) only after Jesus had had a conversation with the woman, which we cannot well suppose to have been a short one.

If 'Sychar' were the only somewhat improbable place-name in the Fourth Gospel, it might perhaps be rash to question the accuracy of the reading; but Ænon, Salim, Ephraim all warn us to caution in the treatment of 'Sychar.' Jerome long ago ascribed the reading to the error of a copyist, nor has modern criticism disproved the possibility of his hypothesis.[4] It is, however, in the document used by the redactor of our Gospel, not in the Gospel itself, that we may suppose the corruption to have arisen. The text may have become indistinct, and the redactor may have misread 'Sychar' for 'Sychem.'

To suppose that the narrator, being an allegorist, deliberately changed 'Sichem' into 'Sychar' in order to suggest that the Samaritan religion was a 'lie' (שֶׁקֶר, šéker; cp Hab. 2 18), or that the Samaritans were 'drunkards' (šikkōrīm, cp Is. 28 1), is rash in the extreme. The latter suggestion (Reland) is absurdly inappropriate, for Is. 28 1 relates to the nobles of ancient Samaria, and has nothing to do with Shechem. (Cp, however, GOSPELS, § 54 γ.)

The above, however, is not the only solution of the problem of Sychar. By a curious coincidence it happens (a) that early Christian travellers in Palestine speak of a Sichar distinct from Sichem, (b) that the Talmud several times speaks of a Suchar, and (c) that at the present day the name 'Askar is found in the neighbourhood of Jacob's Well.

2. Sychar distinct from Shechem.

(a) As to the early travellers' notices, it is almost enough to refer to G. A. Smith's compact and lucid summary. Every one who either has, or desires to have, an intelligent delight in biblical geography knows this writer's Historical Geography, and may therefore be aware that the Bordeaux Pilgrim (about 333 A.D.) speaks of a Sychar, about 1 R. m. from Shechem. The pilgrim also says that the monument of Joseph was at the place called Sichem, by Neapolis at the foot of Mt. Gerizim. The abbot Daniel (1106-1107) speaks of 'the hamlet of Jacob called Sichar. Jacob's Well is there. Near this place, not half a verst away, is the town of Samaria . . . at present called Neapolis.' Fetellus (1130) says, 'A mile from Sichem is the town of Sychar; in it is the fountain of Jacob, which, however, is a well.' John of Würzburg (1160-1170) says, 'Sichem is to-day called Neapolis. Sichar is E. of Sichem.' Quaresmius (about 1630) gives the report of Brocardus (1283) that 'to the left (N.) of Jacob's Well' he saw 'a certain large city deserted and in ruins, believed to have been that ancient Sichem'; the natives told him that they now call the place Istar.[1]

In addition to other notices we may add the Itinerary of Jerusalem (333 A.D.), which places Sychar at the distance of mille passus from Neapolis, and the following testimony of Eusebius (OS 297 26): 'Sychar, before Neapolis, near the piece of ground, etc., where Christ according to John discoursed with the Samaritan woman by the fountain; it is shown to this day,' to his translation of which Jerome adds (OS 154 31) in lieu of the closing words, 'where now a church has been constructed.'[2] The latter statement, it may be said in passing, throws back considerably the date of the belief in the traditional Jacob's Well. It should also be noticed that Eusebius in the same work writes thus of Sychem or Shechem: 'The place is shown in the suburbs of Neapolis, where, too, the Tomb of Joseph is shown' (OS 290 56), with which compare this statement of Eusebius on Βάλανος Σικίμων (the Oak of Shechem = the present hamlet of Balaṭa): 'It is shown in the suburbs of Neapolis at the Tomb of Joseph' (OS 237 69). Now if the Tomb of Joseph was in the suburbs of Neapolis, surely the Well of Joseph must have been there too. Both Tomb and Well were certainly placed in the traditional 'piece of land' purchased by Jacob, 'before Shechem.' It may be added that there is abundant evidence in the texts of early and mediæval pilgrims for identifying Sychar and Sychem (see HG 373, n. 1).

(b) It was long ago pointed out by Lightfoot († 1675) that the Talmud mentions a place called Suchar (סוכרא ,סוכר) or Sichar (סיכרא ,סיכר), and a fountain of Suchar (עין סוכר), and a plain of En Suchar (בקעת עין סוכר). It was from En Suchar (fountain of S.) or the plain of En Suchar that the Passover sheaf and the two Pentecostal loaves were brought to Jerusalem during the war of Aristobulus II. against Hyrcanus II. (Bābā ḳammā, 82*b*; Mĕnāḥōth, 64*b*). The other references (Bābā mĕṣī'ā, 42*a* [Pĕsāḥim, 31*b*] and 83*a*; Nidda, 36*a*; Ḥullīn, 18*b*) relate to a time when the Samaritan population had no doubt given place

[1] It is remarkable, however, that in Gen. 33 18, as the text stands, the well-known Shechem is described in a way which would rather befit an obscure place like 'Sychar' (on the assumption that 'Sychar' is right).

The ruins of the church have doubtless raised the bottom of the well.

to a Jewish.[1] That at the time referred to by the evangelist a Samaritan population occupied Sychar is explained by the fact that under Herod the Great, Archelaus, and the Roman procurators, the Samaritans were able to recover from the fearful blow dealt to them by the vindictive John Hyrcanus.

It is difficult not to conjecture that the localities intended in the Talmud are the Sahil el-'Askar (Plain of el-'Askar) and the 'Ain el-'Askar (Fountain of el-'Askar) discovered early last century by Berggren. Though Prof. G. A. Smith does not mention this evidence, it is hardly likely that he rejects it.

(c) On the slope of Mt. Ebal, about 1¾ m. ENE. from Nāblus and little more than half a mile N. from Jacob's Well, is a little hamlet called 'Askar, with rock-tombs and a fine spring called 'Ain el-'Askar (or el-'Asgar). The neighbouring plain, too, bears the name Sahil el-'Askar. It is tempting to think that this is the Sychar of the Fourth Gospel (cp Conder, Tentwork, 175). Not only does it at once virtually prove the traditional Jacob's Well to be the true one, but it seems also to show conclusively that the evangelist had a singularly minute and accurate knowledge of the scene of his narrative, and this suggests in turn that the narrative itself may be, at least, founded on fact. It is true, there still remains the difficulty that nothing is said of a Sychar distinct from Sychem before the fourth century; that Eusebius's language is indecisive; and that Jerome, the most learned scholar of his time, and, like Eusebius, a resident in Palestine, maintains that Sychar is a bad reading; but perhaps the evidence of the Talmud and of the native nomenclature may plausibly be held to counterbalance this. Von Raumer, Ewald, Keim, Furrer, Lightfoot, etc., adopt this theory.

The disputants on either side may sometimes have been unduly influenced by their interest in the question,

3. Conclusion. Did the fourth evangelist make great mistakes in his geography? The author of Supernatural Religion, for instance ([2], 2 421 [pop. ed. 531]), whose tone is not altogther dispassionate, holds that the mention of a city of Samaria called Sychar is one of several geographical errors which show the author not to be a disciple of Jesus, or indeed a Jew. There is another point of view, however, already briefly referred to. The Fourth Gospel, as it now stands, may have several errors in names; but these errors may not be due to the writer, whose work has been edited and largely transformed by a redactor. It is most unlikely that the city which fills such a prominent place in the narrative of Jn. 4 should be any other than Shechem. Sychar is most probably incorrect, and it is a mere coincidence that the Talmud contains the name סוכר—i.e., probably Sychar—and that the native nomenclature has preserved the name 'Askar. How סוכר, 'Sychar,' is to be explained, is by no means clear; it can, of course, have no connection with שְׁכֶם, Shechem. 'Askar, however, may quite well have grown out of Suchar; the 'Ain, as G. A. Smith well remarks,[2] may quite well represent an original 'Elif. It is one of the many plays on names discernible in the Arabic nomenclature, 'Askar being a common Arabic word for 'soldier, army.' 𝔊 wrongly renders by συκάμινος (-η in R of Ps. 78 47, -α in Am.), a word which is probably derived from šiḳmīm, but denotes the mulberry. Šiḳmāh (שִׁקְמָה) and Aram. šeḳmā, on the other hand, denote a quite different tree—Ficus sycomorus, L.—whose leaves to some extent resemble those of the mulberry, but its fruits those of the fig.

From the deep shade cast by its spreading branches the sycomore is a favourite tree in Egypt and Syria, being often planted along roads and near houses. It bears a sweet, edible fruit, somewhat like that of the common fig, but produced in racemes on the older boughs. The apex of the fruit is sometimes removed, or an incision made in it, to produce earlier ripening. This is the process denoted by the verb bālas (בלס) in Am. 7 14 (cp FIG, § 3). The sycomore, as a common and a lowland tree, is repeatedly contrasted with the more valued and majestic mountain cedars (1 K. 10 27, etc.). At the present time, it grows in Palestine mainly on the coast and in the Jordan valley (FFP 411). Cp AMOS, § 2, end, PROPHET, § 35.

The British 'sycamore,' which is a species of maple, is of course an entirely different tree. N. M.

Cornill, following 𝔊, sees the same name in 30 16: 'Syene (reading סון*, swn, for סין, Sin) shall have great pain,' ‖ Thebes—that is to say, even the most remote cities of Egypt shall tremble (in 5 15, however, Cornill keeps סין Sin as Pelusium). Cp also SIN, SINIM. S'wēnēh, or S'wēneh (סְוֵנֵה or סְוֵנָה), is rendered in Ezek. Συήνη (A. Σοηνη [cp 𝔊 in Is. 43 3, see SEBA], Σουηνη) in 𝔊, Syene, Vg., and the context shows that this is correct; cp especially the allusion to the Ethiopian frontier with Strabo, 32, 118, 669, 693, 787; Jos. BJ iv. 10 5; Plin. v. 10 11. The ancient Egyptians wrote Swn, Swnw, Swnt (no safe etymology of the name is possible); cp Brugsch, Dict. Géogr. 666; the Coptic form is ϲουαν. The Arabs rendered this Uswān(u); the modern orthography is Aṣwān. The Massoretic punctuation is, evidently, taken from the Greek form, which also the English Bible has taken from the Versions.

This cataract-city seems to have been very old; but it was completely eclipsed by the capital of the nome, the island-city of Elephantine (Egyptian Yēbu), directly opposite. Syene does not seem to have been more than the landing-stage for the famous quarries, from which the ancient Egyptians cut e.g. most of their obelisks. The stone, however, they called 'stone of Elephantine,' and the troops guarding the Nubian frontier had their headquarters in that island-city. Herodotus therefore does not mention Syene, not because he had not been there (Sayce, Journ. Phil. 14 271), but because for him it belonged to Elephantine. The great garrison of Elephantine, of which he speaks, must have had its quarters mostly around Syene (not on the island) to protect the desert roads alongside of the cataracts against inroads of the nomadic Ethiopians. It is the more remarkable that Ezekiel knows the name of Syene and its importance as a frontier-fortress. Under the Romans Syene came more into prominence, receiving a garrison of 3 cohorts (Strabo, 817); Juvenal lived there in exile as governor of the city. Elephantine still had the temples. Under the Arabs Elephantine was deserted, and Syene became a very considerable town, being the point of arrival for the caravans from the Sūdān. Modern Asuān (Aṣwān) is a very small town, owing to the decline of the caravan trade; its population, which had fallen to 6000, is said to be now about 10,000. The most remarkable antiquities are the tombs of the monarchs of Elephantine (beginning from dyn. 6) on the mountain opposite, discovered in 1885, large Arab cemeteries, and the quarries. W. M. M.

SYNAGOGUE

narrower and a broader meaning: in the broader meaning, a synagogue is a local community in its corporate capacity and as under religious and more or less civil jurisdiction; in the narrower, it is the building with its assemblies and services. Naturally, the two meanings often merge into one. The designation common to both is kĕnēseth.

The Heb. כְּנֶסֶת, and the Aram. כְּנִשְׁתָּא,[1] are derived from כָּנַס and כְּנַשׁ respectively, 'to gather'; hence they strictly correspond to the Gk. συναγωγή,[2] 'congregation' or 'assembly.' The narrower meaning is expressed also by בֵּית הַכְּנֶסֶת, Aram. בֵּי כְנִישְׁתָּא, and in Gk. by προσευχή,[3] συναγώγιον (Philo, 2 591 1 675), προσευκτήριον (Philo, 2 168), and σαββατεῖον (Jos. Ant. xvi. 6 2).

At first, the church also seems to have been called synagogue.[4] Ja. 2 2 is often quoted as evidence; but it may well be questioned whether 'assembly' (as ἐπισυναγωγήν, in Heb. 10 25) would not meet all the requirements of the passage (so v. Soden, HC on Ja. 2 2). Of more weight is the fact that the Ebionites called their church 'synagogue'; that the anti-Jewish Marcionites inscribed upon one of their church-buildings: συναγωγὴ Μαρκιωνιστῶν κώμ(ης) Λεβαβων;[5] and that in patristic literature συναγωγή is occasionally used for the church.[6] That the church abandoned the term in favour of ἐκκλησία may be accounted for by the fact of the separation of the two faiths; the two terms are used interchangeably in the LXX, and ἐκκλησία was like and unlike enough to be just the designation wanted. Schürer thinks that the word ecclesia was adopted because of its deeper ideal and spiritual significance (see GVI 2 433, and cp ASSEMBLY, CHURCH).

2. Origin.

The origin of the synagogue as an organised religious community is bound up with the general history of Israel after the exile (cp GOVERNMENT, §§ 25-31). When the assemblies first began, and when buildings were first set aside for this specific purpose, cannot be definitely stated. It seems most probable that the assemblies originated during the exile (cp Wellh. IJG(3), 193). In strange environment, and in default of a centre of worship, something of this sort in a limited form and extent must be presupposed to account for the religious zeal that emanated from the exiles. Whether, on the return to Palestine, any need was felt for such assemblies, the sanctuary becoming now again the centre of worship, may well be questioned. The activities of Nehemiah and Ezra and the introduction of the Law must in time, and in connection with the springing up of Jewish communities outside of Jerusalem, have given a new occasion for them (see CANON, § 18). No reference to the institution of the synagogue, however, is met with in the canonical or apocryphal books of the OT except Ps. 74 8, where mō'ădē ēl (מוֹעֲדֵי אֵל) is best taken as meaning 'sacred meeting-places,' and as belonging to the Maccabean period. (See Che. Psalms(1), ad loc., but cp PSALMS, § 28, v.) In NT times the synagogue is already a well-known institution with a hoary past; 'Moses from generations of old (ἐκ γενεῶν ἀρχαίων) has in every city those that proclaim him, being read in the synagogues every Sabbath' (Acts 15 21). (For full references in NT see § 1 n. 4; see, further, § 8.)

3. Function, etc.

In considering the function and organisation of the synagogue, it will greatly conduce to clearness if the distinction between the broader and the narrower meaning of the term is observed. The synagogal assemblies and services presuppose the existence of an organised Jewish community of which they form an essential part. The wider function is evident in ἀποσυνάγωγος, 'put out of the synagogue' (Jn. 9 22 12 42 16 2), which means more than mere exclusion from the synagogal assemblies—viz., exclusion from social and religious intercourse, that is, from community life (cp EXCOMMUNICATION). The wider function included not only the religious but also the civil and municipal affairs of the community. The distinction between secular and religious is foreign to Judaism. Mishnic legislation throughout presupposes Jewish control of civil life (Nĕdārīm 5 5, Mĕgilla 3 1); but this is ideal, and could not actually prevail except in towns where the Jewish population preponderated. Where that was not the case the organised synagogal community was found by the side of the civil. In the former case, the synagogal officials were identical with those of the town; in the latter case, they only ruled more or less the Jewish portion of it. Larger towns had more than one synagogal community. In Jerusalem, for example, according to Acts 6 9, the Hellenistic Jews had either two or five separate organisations, representing aggregations homogeneous in nationality or condition (cp Schürer, l.c. 2 430 f. 176 ff.).

4. Government.

Members of the synagogal community (בְּנֵי הַכְּנֶסֶת, Bĕkōrōth 5 5) were subject to discipline and punishment by the synagogal government. The local governing body, within whose jurisdiction it lay to try disciplinary cases, was called bēth dīn, בֵּית דִּין, 'court,' or (its Gk. equivalent) sanhedrīn, סַנְהֶדְרִין,[1] συνέδριον, 'council' (Mt. 5 22 10 17 Mk. 13 9); also βουλή (Jos. BJ ii. 14 1). It was composed of twenty-three members in larger towns; and in smaller, of seven members (cp GOVERNMENT, § 31; and see Schür. 2 176 ff.). The members were called 'elders' (πρεσβύτεροι, Lk. 7 3) or 'rulers' (ἄρχοντες, Mt. 9 18 23 Lk. 8 41), and the chief γερουσιάρχης (see Schür. 3 46 f.).

The chief methods of punishment were (a) scourging, (b) excommunication, and (c) death.

(a) Scourging (מַכּוֹת [Makkōth, 3 12], Gk. μαστιγόω [Mt. 10 17 23 34] and δέρω [Acts 22 19 Mk. 13 9]) was inflicted in the synagogue building by the synagogue attendant (חַזַּן הַכְּנֶסֶת, ὑπηρέτης, Makk., ibid.). The minor offences for which it was administered are given in Makkōth 3 1 ff. The number of stripes was forty save one (Makk. 3 10, 2 Cor. 11 24, Jos. Ant. iv. 8 21). The tribunal competent to decide upon the punishment is variously given as consisting of three or twenty-three members (Sanhedrīn, 1 2).[2]

(b) The punitive exclusion of unsubmissive members of the Jewish community is met with already in Ezra 10 8; it was to be the means by which to keep exclusive Judaism intact. There seems to have been at first (so in NT times) but one form of excommunication—viz., ḥērem (חֵרֶם),[3] 'ban,' that is, absolute exclusion from the synagogal community. Its origin and conception lie in the OT (see BAN). Ḥērem and its Gk. equivalent ἀνάθεμα mark an object as 'devoted,' or under the curse of God and deserving death (cp Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgesch. 150).

Ḥērem meant, in fact, the penalty of death, and its infliction was prevented only by lack of power. We must take it that the NT terms ἀφορίζειν, ὀνειδίζειν, ἐκβάλλειν τὸ ὄνομα (Lk. 6 22), ἀποσυνάγωγον γίνεσθαι or ποιεῖν (Jn. 9 22 12 42 16 2), and ἀνάθεμα or ἀναθεματίζειν (Rom. 9 3 1 Cor. 12 3 16 22 Gal. 1 8 f. Mk. 14 71 Acts 23 12 14 21), all contain this meaning.[1]

(c) The tribunal composed of twenty-three members was competent to inflict the penalty of death (Sanh. 1 4), and it is most probable that excommunication was pronounced by it; if so, 'shall incur the penalty of the judgment' (ἔνοχος ἔσται τῇ κρίσει), Mt. 5 22, refers to the lighter punishment of scourging; 'shall incur the penalty of the council' (ἔνοχος ἔσται τῷ συνεδρίῳ), to the severer punishment of excommunication or death.

The Mishna mentions a second kind of excommunication—viz., niddūy, נִדּוּי, 'isolation,' called also by its Aram. equivalent šammattā, שַׁמְתָּא. Its main purpose seems to have been to guard the dignity and authority of the rabbinical teacher; it might be imposed for disobedience to a rabbinic decision, for an impertinent remark to a teacher, or for failure to greet him properly. It might be imposed by a mere hint—for instance, by saying, 'I have never known thee!' or 'Some one is calling thee outside!' The Gĕmārā mentions a third kind of excommunication—viz., nĕzīphāh, נְזִיפָה, 'rebuke.' It seems to have been a severe reprimand uttered by a rabbi, carrying with it in Palestine one day's, in Babylonia a seven days', overhanging displeasure. The niddūy-ban, according to the Gĕmārā, extended over a period of thirty days, and involved greater restraint as to intercourse, though not exclusion from the temple or synagogue service. But both forms are later than NT times, and they are too mild to represent the NT terms quoted above.[2]

5. The synagogue building.

Recently discovered ruins of synagogues in Northern Galilee, belonging probably to the second, some perhaps to the first, Christian century, furnish scanty, but the safest, information regarding the architecture of ancient synagogues. Negatively, they show that the rabbinic directions (Tōs. Mĕg. 4 22 f.) that synagogues should be built on a height of the city and should have the entrance on the E. (like the temple) had not yet come into force. The ruins do not lie in the most prominent positions of the towns, and, with the exception of the synagogue at Irbid, whose entrance is E., they were built from N. to S. with the entrance on the S. On the whole, a Græco-Roman influence in style is noticeable. The buildings were quadrangular in form, divided into five or three aisles by means of four or two rows of massive columns. The columns bore an architrave of stone, the roof was of wood, and the ornamentation, especially of the cornices, was extremely rich, and figures of animals are frequently met with. The entrance was by means of three front portals, a larger for the centre and two smaller for the sides; the lintels have carved on them Hebrew inscriptions and sacred Jewish symbols.[3]

Various parts of the synagogue building, outside of Palestine, find occasional mention in Gk. inscriptions: ἐξέδρα, 'portico'; πρόναος, 'vestibule'; περίβολος τοῦ ὑπαίθρου, 'court.'[4] The synagogue of Ḥammām-Lif, not far from Carthage, had a mosaic floor with varied animal forms in its design (see Schürer, 2 437, n. 26). Kaufmann has shown that both painting and sculpture were in use in decorating the synagogues, even at a later time, the lion being a favourite symbol ('Art in the Synagogue,' JQR 9 254 ff. [1897]). In a rabbinic description of the synagogue of Alexandria we meet the following terms: בסילקי, βασιλική, basilica; דיפלסטין, διπλῆ στόα, a double-colonnade; סטיו, στόα, colonnade.[1]

6. Site.

The synagogue of Philippi was outside the city gate by a river (Acts 16 13), and a decree of Halicarnassus (in Jos. Ant. xiv. 10 23) speaks of synagogues as customarily placed by the sea-side (on these passages see PRAYER, § 4). This, however, does not seem to have been the usage in Palestine, nor is it taken account of in the ideal rabbinic legislation. Schürer's contention (2 444), as against Löw (MGWJ, 1884, pp. 167 ff.), that the ceremonial ablutions made the water-site preferable, is overdrawn. These ablutions do not require a river, and though orthodox Judaism now, more than ever, demands them, no preference is shown for such sites, which are, moreover, opposed to the positive requirement to build them on the highest point of the town. Neither does the position of the discovered ruins bear out Schürer's view. It would seem then that in foreign lands a preference was shown for sites outside the city (for obvious reasons), and then near the water-side; whilst on native soil, or in strong Jewish environment, a central site was chosen.

7. Interior.

The chief piece of furniture was the 'ark' (אָרוֹן, תֵּיבָה, Aram. אֲרוֹנָא, תֵּבוּתָא) containing the scrolls of the Law and other sacred writings, which probably stood by the wall farthest from the entrance. In the centre, upon a raised platform (בִּימָה, βῆμα), stood the lectern (ἀναλογεῖον, Heb. אַנְלוֹגִין or אַנְלְגִין). The rest of the room contained wooden seats (סַפְסָל, subsellium; קַלְטֵּר, κλιντήρ) for the congregation (cp Jer. Mĕgillā, 73 d foot; Kēlīm, 16 7). The chief seats of the synagogue (πρωτοκαθεδρία) were near the ark, facing the people, and were occupied by those held in highest honour. (Mt. 23 6 Mk. 12 39 Lk. 11 43 20 46; Tos. Mĕgillā, 4 21.) Schürer (2 451) takes it for granted that the women were seated separately in the synagogue. This is not at all certain; such evidence as there is points the other way. That the Talmud and all the ancient sources should not mention such an arrangement is hardly accidental, and the facts gathered by Löw (MGWJ, 1884, 364 ff.) show a prominent activity of woman in the synagogal service; to these should be added what Schürer himself mentions (3 50), that they could bear the titles of honour, ἀρχισυνάγωγος and mater synagogæ, and could sit in the seats of honour in the synagogue (2 451). The present writer has pointed out elsewhere ('Woman in the Ancient Hebrew Cult,' JBL, 1898, p. 111 ff.) that the exclusion of woman from the cult was gradual, and came with the progress in the development of the cult itself. Relegation to the galleries of the synagogues was seemingly the last stage and belongs to the Middle Ages (cp Israel Abrahams, Jewish Life in the Middle Ages, 25 f.).

8. Synagogue assemblies.

The primary function of the synagogue assemblies was the popular instruction in the law. The children were taught in the 'school' (בֵּית הַסֵּפֶר; Jer. Kĕtūb. 32 c, Kĕtūb. 2 10), and the more technical training was furnished in 'the college' (בֵּית הַמִּדְרָשׁ; Jer. Mĕgillā, 73 d); but the synagogue assemblies were for the religious instruction of the people. Worship, in the narrower sense, was only a secondary object. That this was so in the times of Jesus we learn from Josephus (c. Ap. 2 17; Ant. xvi. 2 4), from Philo (2 168), who calls the synagogues διδασκαλεῖα,[2] 'schools,' and from the NT, where 'to teach' (διδάσκειν) appears as the chief function of the synagogue (cp Mt. 4 23 Mk. 1 21 6 2 Lk. 4 15 31 6 6 13 10 Jn. 6 59 18 20). But there is evidence that at this time the synagogue assemblies stood, as it were, in the medium stage of their growth. In earlier times the synagogue was called 'the assembly of the common people' (כְּנֶסֶת הָעָם; Shabbāth, 32 a), and corresponded more nearly to the 'gate' (שַׁעַר) as a common meeting-place.[1] The Targum translates 'gate' (שַׁעַר) in Am. 5 12 15 bēth kĕništā (בֵּית כְּנִשְׁתָּא). But after the destruction of Jerusalem, when the synagogue began more and more to take the place of the temple, the assemblies took on gradually more of the form of worship. The name 'assembly of the common people' (כנסת העם) was then seriously objected to (Shab. 32 a), and the sacredness of the synagogue was specially asserted (Tos. Mĕg. 3 7).[2] 9. Officers.

The full details of procedure in excommunication, as found in Hamburger, RE, s.v. 'Bann,' and in Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, 2 183 f., are based upon a codification of Talmudic law of the Middle Ages and do not illustrate NT times.

For conducting the synagogue service, an official, strictly speaking, was not deemed necessary; any competent Israelite could officiate. The freedom with which Jesus and Paul took part in the service illustrates this fact. The person who led in the exercises was called 'representative of the community' (שְׁלִיחַ צִבּוּר), and if he erred while performing his duty, some one else present might immediately take his place (Bĕrākōth 5 3). The same freedom still prevails, in theory at least, in the present synagogue service; but naturally those who are especially qualified by experience and efficiency are preferred.

The chief official of the synagogue as a religious assembly was the ἀρχισυνάγωγος, EV 'ruler of the synagogue' (Mk. 5 22 35 f. 38 Lk. 8 49 13 14 Acts 13 15 18 8 17; Heb. רֹאשׁ הַכְּנֶסֶת, Sōṭā 7 7 f.). The office was not identical with that of the 'elder' (πρεσβύτερος) or 'ruler' (ἄρχων), nor with that of the 'president of the gerousia' (γερουσιάρχης; see § 6), though one might serve in both capacities at the same time. The duties of the Archisynagogos related to the care and order of the synagogue and its assemblies and the supervision of the service.

A second functionary was the ḥazzān (חַזַּן הַכְּנֶסֶת, Sōṭā 7 7 f., Yōmā 7 1), the ὑπηρέτης, AV 'minister,' RV 'attendant' of Lk. 4 20. It was his duty to present for reading, and return to the ark after the reading, the sacred scrolls; he also taught the children (Shab. 1 3), and acted as the lictor in scourging, as the agent of the synagogue council (בֵּית דִּין); cp § 8.

The giving of alms was a religious service in the time of Christ, and was administered in the synagogue by special officials called 'administrators' (פַּרְנָסִים), who had under them 'collectors of alms' (גַּבָּאֵי צְדָקָה), and 'distributors of alms' (מְחַלְּקֵי צ׳); see Shab. 118 b, and cp ALMS, § 3 f.

The rabbinic requirement was that at least ten men must be present for the conduct of divine service (Mĕg. 4 3). Whether this was already in force in NT times is doubtful; but it led in post-Talmudic times to the custom of providing by payment 'ten men of leisure' (עשרה בטלנין, decem otiosi), whose business it was to attend the service; they possessed, however, no official rank.

10. The service.[3]

The Mishna (Mĕg. 4 3) enumerates five principal parts of the service: (a) the Shĕma'; (b) prayer; (c) the reading of the Law; (d) the reading of the Prophets, and the benediction; but to these must be added (e) the translation and explanation of the Scripture lesson. How much of each of these was already in use in NT times will appear in the sequel. On the whole, as has been indicated above (§ 8), the synagogue service was much simpler before the destruction of the temple; that crisis in Judaism exerted a strong influence upon the development of synagogal institutions.

(a) The Shĕma' (שְׁמַע, 'Hear!'), so called from the opening word of the first passage, 'Hear, O Israel: Yahwè our God, Yahwè is one,' is composed of three passages of Scripture (Dt. 6 4-9 11 13-21 Nu. 15 37-41), two introductory benedictions for morning and evening, one closing benediction for the morning, and two for the evening.[1]

That the benedictions in their present form are the result of gradual additions was pointed out by Zunz (Gottesdienstl. Vorträge d. Juden [1832], 369 ff.); the same is most probably true also of the selection of the Scripture passages.

The origin of the reciting of the Shĕma' (קְרִיאַת שְׁמַע) is most probably to be sought in the endeavour to inculcate the sacredness and importance of the Law, for which the selections are most admirably adapted in that they not only emphasise these attributes, but also insist on certain outward symbolic signs as reminders of them (see FRINGES, FRONTLETS). As the phylacteries and fringes are well known in NT times (Mt. 23 5; Jos. Ant. iv. 8 13), the origin of the reciting of the Shĕma' must date back into the pre-Christian period as probably one of the first customs introduced by those who caught the spirit of Nehemiah and Ezra. That the object of the ceremony was accomplished may be seen from the fact that the act is regarded in the beginning of the second century A.D. as 'receiving the yoke of the kingdom of God'—i.e., the obligation to keep the Law of Moses (Bĕrākh. 2 5; see Dalman, Worte Jesu, 1 80). The conception of it as a confession of faith (Schür. 2 459), or as a substitute for the daily sacrifices (Hamb. RE 2 1088), belongs to later times.[2] In the NT the opening words of the Shĕma' are quoted in Mk. 12 29 (cp Mt. 22 37 Lk. 10 27), but without any reference to its liturgical character.

(b) That the disciples could ask Jesus, 'Teach us to pray, even as John taught his disciples,' Lk. 11 1, would seem to indicate that a fixed form of prayer was at that time not in vogue (cp PRAYER, § 7). This is made the more probable by the history of the most ancient synagogal prayer, the Shĕmōnĕ 'esrē (שְׁמֹנָה עֶשְׂרֵה), the 'eighteen'—i.e., petitions and benedictions. There are now two recensions of this prayer, a Babylonian and a Palestinian.[3] It appears evident that in the original form each of the petitions consisted of two members; the Palestinian recension has more nearly retained its original form, and is the shorter as well as the older; the Babylonian has received considerable additions. We have, therefore, here also to deal with a piece of synagogal liturgy which has passed through various stages of growth. The present writer is inclined to take the hint of Dalman (PRE(3), 7 10) and regard the eight petitions mentioned in Jer. Yōmā, 44 b, as pointing to an earlier form of the Shĕmōnĕ 'esrē. If the legislation regarding these eight petitions is not ideal, they fit into a period prior to the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A.D.). The fuller forms cannot be as early. The arrangement in the present order of sequence is ascribed to Shimeon ha-Peḳōli (about 110 A.D., Bĕrākh. 28 b). Dalman thinks it probable that, as petitions 7 and 10-14 are later than the destruction of Jerusalem, the form in vogue before that event consisted of three opening benedictions (1-3), six petitions (4-6, 8, 9, 15), and three closing benedictions (16-18), and holds that this prayer, composed of twelve petitions, may be regarded as the Pharisaic-Judaic counterpart of that of Jesus, composed of five or seven petitions (Mt. 6 9-13 Lk. 11 2-4). An abbreviated form of the Palestinian recen-

[2] At the end of the first century A.D. it was still possible to class sitting in the synagogues with sleeping away the morning, drinking wine at noon, and playing with children, as bringing failure in life ('Ābōth 3 14).

[2] Detailed rubrics, dealing with the manner and time of recitation and the persons who are and who are not under obligation to perform it, are given in Bĕrākhōth 1-3. The authorities differ as to whether it may be begun in the morning when it is light enough to distinguish between sky-blue and white, or between sky-blue and leek-green.

[3] The Palestinian was recently discovered by S. Schechter in a Gĕniza of Cairo, and published by him in JQR 10 654-659 (1898). sion (from Jer. Bĕrākh. 8 a) is here given for comparison with the 'Lord's Prayer.'

'Grant us understanding; graciously accept our repentance; forgive us, our redeemer; heal our diseases; bless our years; for thou gatherest the scattered, and it is thine to judge the erring; put thy hand upon the wicked; and may all who trust in thee rejoice in the building of thy city, the renewal of thy sanctuary, in the Branch of David, thy servant (v.l. the sprouting of a horn for David); for thou answerest before we call. Blessed art thou, Lord, who hearest prayer.'[1]

Petition 12 of the Palestinian recension calls for special mention. The text and its translation are as follows:

לַמְשֻׁמָּדִים אַל תְּהִי תִקְוָה [2]
וּמַלְכוּת זָדוֹן מְהֵרָה תְעָקֵר [בְּיָמֵינוּ
וְהַנּוֹצְרִים וְהַמִּינִים כְּרֶגַע יֹאבֵדוּ]
[יִמָּחוּ מִסֵּפֶר הַחַיִּים וְעִם צַדִּיקִים אַל יִכָּתֵבוּ]
בָּרוּךְ אַתָּה יְיָ מַכְנִיעַ זֵדִים׃

May the apostates have no hope;
And the kingdom of arrogance be quickly uprooted in our day;
And the Christians and heretics perish in a moment;
Let them be blotted out of the book of life, and not be written with the righteous.
Blessed art thou, Lord, who bringest low the arrogant.[3]

The third line has settled it beyond question that Justin Martyr and the Church fathers were right in their statements that the Christians were mentioned in the daily synagogal prayers (Dial. c. Tryph. 93 133 137; and see Schür. 2 463).

By the end of the second century A.D. it was an established custom to close the synagogal service with the priestly benediction (בִּרְכַּת הַכֹּהֲנִים), Nu. 6 22-26. As this was originally a part of the temple service, it was probably not introduced into the synagogal liturgy until after the cessation of that service. When priests were present, they pronounced the benediction, standing between the ark and the congregation and facing the latter (Tos. Mĕgillā, 4 21); raising the hands as high as the shoulder (Sōṭā, 7 6), and repeating the formula after the precentor word by word, the congregation responding after each of the three parts with Amen. In the absence of priests the benediction was offered in prayer, and then, just before the closing prayer for peace, petition 18 (Mĕg. 18 a).

(c) The Sabbath lesson from the Law and the Prophets, and the occasional exposition or exhortation following upon them, were customary in NT times (Lk. 4 16 f. Acts 13 15 27 15 21; cp 2 Cor. 3 15; Jos. c. Ap. 2 18; Philo, 2 630). The lesson from the Law was unquestionably the oldest, and so the most prominent, part of the synagogue service. The tradition says that 'Moses instituted the reading of the Law on the sabbaths, feast-days, new moons, and half feast-days; and that Ezra appointed the reading of the Law for Mondays and Thursdays and the Sabbath afternoons' (Jer. Mĕg. 75 a). Such early and general origin, however, is out of the question. That here also there has been a gradual development is made probable by the fact that the present system of dividing the Pentateuch into fifty-four sections (סְדָרִים), to be completed in an annual cycle, can be traced back to an earlier cycle of two years' duration, and that again to one of three years and three years and a half. The special lessons still in use for the sabbaths of new moons, the four sabbaths before the Passover, and for other festivals (Mĕgillā 3 5 f.) give ground for the supposition that the lessons originated in the selection of appropriate passages for particular occasions, and that only out of these grew the more definite arrangement.[4] Since the reading of the Law was binding upon all, every Israelite, even minors, could partake in the public reading; and on the Sabbath morning seven, at least, were called upon. Each person read his own portion; and only in cases of inability to read was a public lector employed (Jer. Mĕg. 75 a; Phil. 2 282). The Mishna (Mĕg. 4 4) provides for a benediction before and after each person's reading. According to Sōphĕrīm 13, both closed with: 'Blessed art thou, Lord, who hast given the Law.'

(d) The selection of a portion from the second part of the Jewish canon, 'the Prophets' (נְבִיאִים), to be read after the lesson from the Law, marks a further step in the synagogue ritual. Its original aim may be gathered both from the term by which it was called and from the character of the earliest selections. The term Haphṭārā (הַפְטָרָה; Aram. אַפְטַרְתָּא) is derived from pāṭar (פטר), which, in the Hiphil, means 'to dismiss' or 'to adjourn a meeting'; the Haphṭārā was, therefore, the closing exercise. The selections show that they were meant to enforce, by an historical example or by a promise, the lesson from the Law on a particular occasion.

The Haphṭārā for the first day of the Passover was Jos. 5 9 ff.; for the second day, 2 K. 23; for Pentecost the lesson from the Law was, Dt. 16 9 ff., the Haphṭārā, Hab. 3, including vv. 17 ff.; on the Day of Atonement, it was in the morning Is. 57 15 ff., in the afternoon Jonah. Here again the earliest selections on record (Tos. Mĕg. 4 1-4; Mĕg. 31 a) are those for special days; and most likely they served as the nucleus for the present arrangement.

It is most probable that in NT times the prophetic portions were not yet fixed, but were chosen by the reader, and that the selection of Jesus (Lk. 4 16 f.) was his own choice.

(e) Both the lessons from the Law and those from the Prophets were translated or paraphrased into the vernacular Aramaic by an interpreter (מְתֻרְגְּמָן): in the case of the Law, one verse at a time; in the lessons from the Prophets, three verses might be taken at once (Mĕg. 4 4). These translations and paraphrases (תַּרְגּוּם) were of the nature of explanations, and led gradually to the more extended expositions (מִדְרָשׁ, דְּרָשׁ). Of teaching in the synagogues the NT contains many illustrations (Mt. 4 23 Mk. 1 21 6 2). The preacher (דַּרְשָׁן) sat while speaking (Lk. 4 20). The Scripture exposition was not a required part of the service; neither was it the prerogative of an ordained class; any one able to instruct might be invited to speak (Acts 13 15), though ordinarily it fell to the rabbis of the community (Bĕrākhōth, 28 a). Cp JESUS, § 9.

11. Literature. Much of the literature has already been mentioned; the chief place still belongs to Schürer, GJV(3), 2 427-463. Dalman, 'Synagogaler Gottesdienst,' PRE(3), 7 7-19, has added richly to both the subject and the bibliography, and signally distinguishes himself by a severer caution in using the Mishnic material to illustrate the time of Christ. To the literature given by Schürer and Dalman add: Duschak, Gesch. u. Darstellung d. jüd. Cultus, Mannheim, 1866; Nowack, Hebr. Archaeologie, 2 83 ff.; Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgesch. 147 ff.; Dembitz, Jewish Services in Synagogue and Home (popular), Philad. 1898.

SYNEDRIUM (συνέδριον), a Greek word which means 'assembly' and is especially used of judicial or representative assemblies, is the name by which (or by its Hebrew transcription, סנהדרין, sanhedrīn, sanhedrīm) is known that Jewish body which in its origin was the municipal council of Jerusalem, but acquired extended functions and no small authority and influence over the Jews at large (see GOVERNMENT, §§ 29 ff.; ISRAEL, §§ 81 ff.; SYNAGOGUE, § 4). In the Mishna it is called

1. Meaning and constitution. 'the sanhedrīn,' 'the great sanhedrīn,' 'the sanhedrīn of seventy-one [members],' and 'the great court of justice' (bēth dīn haggādōl). The oldest testimony to the existence and constitution of the synedrium of Jerusalem is probably to be found in 2 Ch. 19 8; the priests, Levites, and hereditary heads of houses there spoken of as sitting in Jerusalem as a court of appeal from the local judicatories do not correspond with

[1] The Hebrew text may be found in Dalm. Worte Jesu, 1 304.

[2] Another fragment of this recension adds, אם לא ישובו לתורתך, and omits l. 4. The parts that are bracketed are regarded as later additions by Dalm. Worte Jesu, 1 300.

[3] The Babylonian recension of this petition omits נצרים, and for מינים it reads מַלְשִׁינִים, 'slanderers.' According to Bĕrākhōth 28 b, Samuel the Small added the petition against heretics to the original eighteen, making thus really nineteen; the Palestinian recension combines the petitions for the restoration of Jerusalem and the coming of the Messiah into one, and so has only eighteen in all.

[4] Cp Hamb. RE 2 1263 ff.; Büchler, 'The Reading of the Law and the Prophets in a Triennial Cycle,' JQR 5 420 ff. (1893), 6 1 ff. (1894).

anything mentioned in the old history, but may be taken as representing an institution of the Chronicler's own time. And just such an aristocratic council is what seems to be meant by the gerusia or senate of 'elders' repeatedly mentioned in the history of the Jews, both under the Greeks from the time of Antiochus the Great (Jos. Ant. xii. 3 3) and under the Hasmonean high priests and princes. The high priest, as the head of the state, was doubtless also the head of the senate, which, according to Eastern usage, exercised both judicial and administrative or political functions (cp 1 Macc. 12 6 14 20). The exact measure of its authority must have varied from time to time, at first with the measure of autonomy left to the nation by its foreign lords, and afterwards with the more or less autocratic power claimed by the native sovereigns.

As has been shown under ISRAEL (§ 81 ff.), the original aristocratic constitution of the senate began to be modified under the later Hasmoneans by the inevitable introduction of representatives of the rising party of the Pharisees, and this new element gained strength under Herod the Great, the bitter enemy of the priestly aristocracy.[1] Finally, under the Roman procurators, the synedrium was left under the presidency of the chief priest as the highest native tribunal, though without the power of life and death (Jn. 18 31). The aristocratic element now again preponderated, as appears from Josephus and from the NT, in which 'chief priests' and 'rulers' are synonymous expressions. But with these there sat also 'scribes' or trained legal doctors of the Pharisees, and other notables, who are called simply 'elders' (Mk. 15 1). The Jewish tradition which regards the synedrium as entirely composed of rabbis sitting under the presidency and vice-presidency of a pair of chief doctors, the nāsī and āb bēth dīn,[2] is quite false as regards the true synedrium. It was after the fall of the state that a merely rabbinical bēth dīn sat at Jabneh and afterwards at Tiberias, and gave legal responses to those who chose to admit a judicature not recognised by the civil power. Gradually this illegal court usurped such authority that it even ventured to pronounce capital sentences,—acting, however, with so much secrecy as to allow the Roman authorities to close their eyes to its proceedings (Origen, Ep. ad Afr., § 14). That this was possible will appear less surprising if we remember that in like manner the synedrium of Jerusalem was able to extend an authority not sanctioned by Roman law over Jews beyond Judæa —e.g., in Damascus (Acts 9 2 22 5).

The council-chamber (βουλή) where the synedrium usually sat was between the Xystus and the temple, probably on the temple-hill, but hardly, as the Mishna states, within the inner court. W. R. S.

2. τὸ συνέδριον in NT. The term 'Sanhedrīn' does not occur in EV; but the Greek συνέδριον is found in a number of passages in NT where EV has 'the council.' In some cases it denotes an ordinary Jewish tribunal (Mt. 10 17); in others it seems to be used of the supreme Jewish Council, the Sanhedrīn (Mk. 14 55 Acts 5 21). In this latter sense the writers are commonly understood to have employed the word in the narratives of the trials of Jesus. It may be doubted, however, whether we have before us the original text.

In Mk. 14 55 (= Mt. 26 59) the writer, after relating that Jesus was led away to the high priest, adds: 'Now the chief priests and the whole council (ὅλον τὸ συνέδριον) sought witness against Jesus to put him to death.' In Mk. 15 1 again it is said, 'And straightway in the morning the chief priests with the elders and scribes, and the whole council (ὅλον τὸ συνέδριον), held a consultation'; but the parallel passage, Mt. 27 1, has simply 'all the chief priests and the elders of the people took counsel.' In the narrative in Lk. the word is introduced very awkwardly. In Lk. 22 66 it is said, 'And as soon as it was day the assembly of the elders of the people was gathered together, both chief priests and scribes; and they led him away into their council, saying, If thou art the Christ, tell us' (καὶ ἀνήγαγον [v.l. ἀπήγαγον] αὐτὸν εἰς τὸ συνέδριον ἑαυτῶν [v.l αὐτῶν], λέγοντες, κ. τ. λ.). Here the abruptness with which the λέγοντες and following words come in, together with the use of συνέδριον for the place of assembly as well as for the Council itself (for which the evidence usually brought forward from other sources is not very strong), arouses suspicion. εἰς τὸ συνέδριον looks very like an insertion, and καὶ ἀπήγαγον (or ἀνήγαγον) αὐτόν an alteration of καὶ ἐπηρώτων αὐτόν.

It has been found that whereas τὸ συνέδριον occurs in Mk. 15 1 it does not appear in the parallel passage, Mt. 27 1. If, in addition to this, the word is a late insertion in Lk. 22 66, it is a question whether in an earlier stage of the narratives τὸ συνέδριον was present in any of the passages.

When this article was already in print, an important work, by Dr. Adolf Büchler, Das Synedrion in Jerusalem, appeared (1902). He thinks that the 'scribes' in Mk. 14 34 are clearly an addition, and that in all the passages ἀρχιερεῖς means (not the 'chief priests' but) the Temple authorities, by whom (and not by the Synedrium) Jesus was seized (see p. 200).

3. Jewish trial? In any case the narratives of the trial are not satisfactory when examined from a critical and scientific[1] standpoint.

'The meeting in the palace of the high priest which condemned our Lord was exceptional. The proceedings also on this occasion were highly irregular, if measured by the rules of procedure which, according to Jewish tradition, were laid down to secure order and a fair trial for the accused' (WRS, EB(9) 22 812 b). Cp SON OF MAN, § 37, end.

It has been pointed out by Brandt (Die Evang. Gesch. p. 67) and Edersheim (Life and Times of Jesus, 2 553) that the whole proceedings of the Sanhedrin, if they were such as they are represented to have been, contradict all that we know about the Jewish method of trial from other sources, even when we admit an ideal element in the Rabbinic notices.[2] The Jews, no less than the Romans, have at all times shown great reverence for the law (see Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie 2 1151). If, as Renan (Life of Jesus, p. 252) supposes, Jesus was condemned not so much by Tiberius or Pilate as by the old Jewish party and the Mosaic law, it is remarkable that 'Paul' in dealing with this very law is silent on the subject (cp Brandt, p. 56).

But it is still possible to hold that Jesus was condemned at an informal meeting of the Sanhedrin (Edersheim), or by a smaller Court of Justice (Graetz, Hist. of the Jews, 2 163). Edersheim (2 557) thinks there can be no question that Jesus was condemned and done to death by the whole body of Sanhedrists, if not by the Sanhedrin, 'in the sense of expressing what was the judgment and purpose of all the Supreme Council and leaders of Israel, with only very few exceptions.' It is difficult, however, to think that the Romans would pay much attention to an informal Council. The high priest's task was simply, Edersheim thinks, 'to formulate a charge which would tell before the Roman Procurator'; but the charge he selects, that of blasphemy, however serious its estimation among the Jews, could hardly influence a Roman (cp Keim, p. 83). The charge of claiming to be the Messiah (Keim) might have had more weight; but Keim admits that the refusal of Jesus to explain what he meant by the claim is 'surprising' (p. 89). It is more reasonable to suppose that the charge (whatever it was) was formulated by a mere clique of Jews who in no way represented the nation,[3] and that the condemnation and crucifixion were brought about by the hirelings of such a clique.[4] It is true that Josephus (Ant. xviii. 3 3) is

[1] The name synedrium first appears under Hyrcanus II. (Jos. Ant. xiv. 9 4).

[2] Nāsī properly means the sovereign, and āb bēth dīn the president of the tribunal. The false traditional application is post-Mishnic.

[1] We are thinking of 'Science' as defined by Huxley (Essays) and Herbert Spencer (Education), and are not unmindful of what Tolstoy (Modern Science; cp his recently published [1902] What is Religion?) has said on the subject.

[2] 'All Jewish order and law would have been grossly infringed in almost every particular if this had been a formal meeting of the Sanhedrin' (Edersheim, l.c.). On Jewish 'law' cp Pascal, Thoughts on Religion, chap. 8, towards end.

[3] This seems to be the view of Jost, Gesch. d. Judenth. 1 402-409 (as cited in Edersheim, Life, 2 553, n. 2). He describes it as 'a private murder (Privat-Mord) committed by burning enemies, not the sentence of a regularly constituted Sanhedrin, etc.'

[4] The Jewish punishment was by stoning (cp the case of supposed to assert that Jesus was condemned 'at the suggestion of the principal men among us'; but it has been contended that this passage is an interpolation (De Quincey, Collected Works, 7 127 [1897]), and in any case the statement would not prove much.

The trial before Pilate, as it is represented in the Gospels, seems to have been no less irregular, and the judge's conduct can only be accounted for by making him quite an exception to the general rule,[1] a man of all men the most perverse and inconsistent (see Keim, 6 83 ff.; Farrar, Life of Christ, chap. 60).[2] Pilate, however, it would seem, was not such an exceptional character. See PILATE. When, therefore, he condemned Jesus to suffer crucifixion he must surely have done so on other grounds, and the proceedings must have been different from those recorded by the synoptists. The charge would have to be a political one (cp Tac. Ann. 15 44). It may have been, as Lk. 23 2 suggests, only with more circumstantial evidence arising out of misconstruction of 'sayings,' that of 'forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar' (cp Mt. 17 24-27 22 17-22 = Mk. 12 14-17 = Lk. 20 22-26, where the words of Jesus, as reported, are ambiguous). With this charge Pilate would have been competent to deal, as Roman Procurator, more perhaps than with any other.[3]

4. Roman trial.

5. Origin of Narratives.

Keim has made a serious and important attempt to give a reasonable account of the trials of Jesus on the basis (mainly) of the synoptic narratives. His work is the more valuable as it takes note of the investigations of so many other critics. But the variety of views to which he refers, and his own failure to present a satisfactory picture, show the insurmountable difficulties of his task.[4] It seems better, therefore, to admit that it is difficult, if not impossible, to gather from the NT really reliable details of the trial that resulted in the crucifixion of Jesus (cp Brandt, p. 67).[5] In trying to transmit a complete life of Jesus the biographers may have done Jesus himself, the Jews, and the Romans some injustice. They can hardly have had more than rumours about the trial to draw upon;[6] but they also seem to have made free use of the OT[7] and of the Messianic interpretations.[8] There are perhaps also indications in the narratives that they, or their redactors, borrowed features from the ceremonies connected with festivals kindred to the Saturnalia;[1] or it may even be that in collecting materials for an expanded life of Jesus the editors seemed to find in the ceremonies that were performed at the sacrifice of the corn- and wine-gods information regarding the Master who suffered a somewhat similar fate.[2] The narratives in their present form seem also to indicate that at the time the Life was re-edited, the gap between Jews and Christians had become wider, and the effort to win converts among the Gentiles keener.

6. Literature.

Of the older literature of the subject it is enough to cite Selden, De Synedriis. The most important critical discussion is that of Kuenen in the Verslagen, etc., of the Amsterdam Academy, 1866, p. 131 seq. A good summary is given by Schürer, Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes(2), § 23, 3. See also Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie, s.v.; Ginsburg, 'Sanhedrin' in Kitto's Bibl. Cyclop., and the works on the Life of Jesus; and for an apocryphal account of the trial, E. v. Stephen). At a moment of great excitement, and on such an occasion, would the cry of condemnation that would burst from the lips of Jews be 'Crucify him!'? Edersheim, in spite of his view mentioned above, confesses 'that such a cry should have been raised, and raised by Jews, and before the Roman, and against Jews, are in themselves almost inconceivable facts, to which the history of these eighteen centuries has made terrible echo' (2 577).

1 'It was their appreciation of law, their respect for law, their study of law, far more than anything else, which gave its greatness to the character of the Roman people. Even in the most degraded ages of their history, and with the worst individual types of men, this is the one bright spot which relieves the gloom' (Lightfoot, Pilate [a sermon]).

2 Cp Pearson, An Exposition of the Creed, art. iv. Jeremy Taylor (Life of Christ, Works 2 613) says, 'Not only against the divine laws, but against the Roman too, he condemned an innocent person, upon objections notoriously malicious; he adjudged him to a death which was only due to public thieves and homicides (crimes with which he was not charged), upon a pretence of blasphemy, of which he stood accused, but not convicted, and for which by the Jewish law he should have been stoned if found guilty. And this he did put into present execution, against the Tiberian law, which about twelve years before decreed in favour of condemned persons that, after sentence, execution should be deferred ten days.'

3 See Pearson, art. iv. p. 284 (1866).

4 He is obliged to admit that the actors in this drama acted in quite an extraordinary and exceptional manner. Cp Renan's account.

5 The end therefore is as uncertain as the beginning. See MARY, NATIVITY, RESURRECTION. These matters should not be made of vital importance. 'About the birth of Jesus I know nothing,' says Tolstoy (Faith); 'nor do I need to know.' Cp Brandt's eloquent conclusion to his work, Die Evang. Gesch. p. 577; see also Leo Tolstoy, What is Religion?, Herbert Spencer, First Principles, chap. v.

6 Cp Brandt, Die Evang. Gesch. p. 81. The 'Pauline' Epistles have no details to give us, though the authors know that Jesus was crucified (Rom. 6 6 1 Cor. 1 13 23 2 2 2 Cor. 13 4 Gal. 2 20 3 1 5 24 6 14) by 'the rulers of this world' (1 Cor. 2 8). SYNTYCHE (ϹΥΝΤΥΧΗ [Ti. WH]), Phil. 4 2. See EUODIA.

SYNZYGUS (ϹΥΝΖΥΓΕ [Ti. WH]) in Phil. 4 3, though rendered '[true] yokefellow' in EV, is, though not met with elsewhere as such, almost certainly to be regarded as a proper name (Σύνζυγε [WH^mg.]). Various unsuccessful attempts have been made to guess who is meant, the Pauline authorship of the epistle being assumed. Clement of Alexandria thought that the apostle's own wife was intended; Chrysostom, the husband or brother of Euodia or of Syntyche; Lightfoot, Epaphroditus; others, Timothy, Silas; Ellicott and De Wette, the chief bishop at Philippi; Wieseler, even Christ himself, 'ναί introducing a prayer.' Judging from the context, we can only say some one who was worthy of that designation and thus could be addressed in the words γνήσιε Σύνζυγε, 'genuine Synzygus'—i.e., 'Synzygus who art rightly so named' (Vincent). In fact, Σύνζυγος means, as contrasted with ἑτερόζυγος (cp ἑτεροζυγεῖν, 'to yoke incongruously,' in 2 Cor. 6 14), one who has the power of bringing together what belongs together. The name is a symbolical one, the use of which in this passage cannot be explained as coming from Paul, who is represented as writing to the church 'with the bishops and deacons' (1 1). The force of the name does not become clear until we suppose it to come from an unknown author writing to the Philippians in the character of Paul. In addressing a certain circle he introduces the name with the purpose of showing in what manner men of high ecclesiastical position ought to act with regard to brethren from a distance visiting their church. SYRACUSE (ϹΥΡΑΚΟΥϹΑϹ, Ti. WH), a city on the SE. coast of Sicily, famous in Greek and Roman history, is mentioned in the journey-narrative of Acts (28 12) as having been for three days a halting-place of Paul on his way from Melita to Rome. Cicero often speaks of Syracuse as a particularly splendid and beautiful city, and still in his own day the seat of art and culture (Tusc. 5 66, De Nat. Deor. 3 81, De Rep. 1 21), and in his speech against Verres (5 2-54) gives an elaborate description of its four quarters (Achradina, Neapolis, Tyche, the Island), or rather the four cities which composed it. We hear nothing of importance about Syracuse during the period of the Empire. It had local self-government—its own senate and its own magistrates—like most of the Greek cities. Caligula restored its decayed walls and some of its famous temples (Suet. Caius, 21). Tacitus, in a passing mention of it (Ann. 13 49), says that permission was granted to the Syracusans under Nero to exceed the prescribed number of gladiators in their shows.

1. Name. 'Syria' is unknown to Hebrew, but possibly identical with Bab. Suri, a N. Euphratean district of uncertain boundaries. We find Syria first in Herodotus (2 12, etc.). In Homer's list (Il. 2 783) only Ἄριμοι (Aramæans) appear. 𝔊 employed Συρία to translate ARAM (q.v.) in its divers applications (e.g., Συρία Δαμασκοῦ, 2 S. 8 5; Μεσοποταμίας Συρία, Gen. 25 20), and EV followed. Herodotus (7 63), misled (?) by the resemblance of Ἀσσύριοι and Σύριοι, stated that these were 'barbarian' and Greek forms of a single ethnic. In consequence he used 'Syria' and 'Syrians' even more widely than OT used 'Aram'; and his vagueness reappears in Xenophon (Anab. i. 4 4) and in one passage of Strabo (16 737).

2. Greater Syria. Strabo, followed by Pliny and Ptolemy, in stricter use (see § 1, end) confined Syria to the geographical area bounded N. by Taurus, S. by the Arabian Desert, W. by the Mediterranean, and NE. by Euphrates. The SE. limit was formed by the vague frontier of the 'Syrian' desert, known in antiquity as the 'Arabian.' Both ancient 'Arabia Deserta' (=N. Ḥamād) and 'Arabia Petræa' (i.e. the Arabia of Petra=S. Ḥamād) would be included now by most geographers in Syria; whilst Arabia would be restricted to the ancient 'Felix,'[1] i.e., all peninsular Arabia S. of and including the Nefûd or desert belt between the heads of the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf. In the Roman provincial arrangement 'Arabia'=Petræa and Deserta. Roman 'Syria' (at first one province and under Hadrian three) ended S. with Palestine, and E. with the limit of the Ḥamād Steppe. So also Byzantine Syria split into seven districts. Moslem geographers had some doubt whether to reckon the Ḥamād to Syria or to Arabia. Muḳadassi (early 10th cent. A.D.) protested against the extension of Syria or esh-Shām (i.e., the 'left-hand' land, relative to one facing E. in Mekka) into the E. desert; and the later geographers (e.g., Edrīsi and Abulfeda) mostly agreed with him in drawing the limit of Arabia obliquely NE. from 'Aḳaba to Raḳḳa on Euphrates, thus detaching the Ḥamād from Syria. For the purposes of the present article we shall follow them, and confine Syria to the area contained by N. lat. 38° and 31°, by the Mediterranean sea, and by an imaginary line drawn roughly parallel to its coast and on an average 150 m. inland.

3. Lesser Syria. There seems also to have been a special use of 'Syria,' which still prevails, restricting the term to that part of the wider area which lies N. of Palestine, but excluding the Lebanon littoral (Phœnicia). This territory was regarded as peculiarly Aramæan, and when the large Roman province Syria was divided, it retained its name without qualification. It had at most periods a distinct history, having been successively the peculiar seat of the 'Hittite' dominion, of the Aramæan confederate power, and of the Seleucid monarchy, at a time when Palestine and Phœnicia were Egyptian. Only the inclusion of the whole of wider Syria in a great alien empire, such as the Egyptian or Assyrian, ever made the history of all parts identical.

[1] The vulgar restriction of 'Arabia Felix' to the SW. of the peninsula (Yemen and Ḥadramaut) is due to a mediæval error, repeated and confirmed by D'Anville. Strabo, Pliny, and Ptolemy alike apply the term Felix to all peninsular Arabia.

4. Boundaries of Greater Syria. Syria has strong natural boundaries: high mountains N. (average summits 8500 ft.), sea W., and deserts S. and E.; but there are weak points, whose influence is shown in Syrian history. The deserts S. and E. being of the steppe character form very indeterminate social limits. Supporting nomad populations, which are constantly being reinforced from foci in the Arabian oases, and forced outwards by the inability of the desert to maintain their increase, these steppe-deserts do not divide nearly as sharply as the N. mountains, which retain barrier populations of peculiar character. Settled folk do not migrate into deserts, but desert folk constantly migrate into settled lands. Throughout the S. and E. border of Syria, therefore, 'Arabisation' has always gone on; and especially in Palestine, even W. of the Ghōr, many features of nomadic life appear intrusively in the settled society. The history of the Aramæan Semites has never been wholly distinct from that of the Arabian.

NE. and NW. are easy passes. Euphrates, fordable in an ordinary summer at various points below the Taurus gorges, has not served strongly to differentiate N. Mesopotamia from N. Syria. These regions are of very similar character, and the eastward roads pass readily from one to the other. On the other hand the Amānus mountains, though rising to 6000 ft., have many low and not difficult passes, notably those traversing the depression which divides the two main constituents of the system, the Elma and the Giaur chains, and will shortly be traversed by a railway. The strong boundary lies much farther W., where the main Taurus runs obliquely down to the sea in the 'Rugged' Cilicia (Tracheia). Eastern influence, therefore, which entered Syria from NE. passed readily out of it to NW. and caused the civilisation of Tarsus to be more Mesopotamian than that of Jerusalem. 'Plain' Cilicia may more fitly be reckoned to Syria than to Asia Minor, as indeed was apparently the view of Herodotus, who included Commagene in Cilicia (cp CILICIA, § 2). The influence of Mesopotamia is, therefore, as marked in N. Syria as that of Arabia in S. Syria.

5. General geography. The area within these limits has always presented a certain social homogeneity; but its great excess of length over breadth has militated against political unity, and given to its internal geographical barriers a separative power which their own character would hardly confer. The main internal barrier is a mountainous region extending to almost an equal distance N. and S. of lat. 34°. Here the land slopes up from N. and S. to a sill of 3000 ft. elevation (Cœlesyria). On either flank E. and W. of the plateau so formed rise longitudinal calcareous ranges. That on the E. (Antilibanus—J. esh-Sharḳi) is a five-fold system, radiating N. from a lofty nucleus on SE. of the plateau (J. esh-Sheikh, Hermon, 8600 ft.). The average elevation of the other principal summits is about 8000 ft. and of the valleys between the radii 5000 ft. The main drainage of the E. slopes flows SE. into a lacustrine pan, about 30 m. in diameter, where it is absorbed by irrigation, or goes to form marshy inundations, united or divided according to the season. Of these the principal are Baḥr el-'Ateiba N., fed by the Baradā (Abana) and Baḥr Ḳiblīyeh S., fed by the A'waj (Pharphar). E. of this oasis stretches a very barren steppe falling away to Euphrates. N. of it the swell of the central plateau is continued NE. from the spurs of Antilibanus by a barren ridge which runs to Euphrates and beyond. W. there is easy approach from the central sill of the plateau by a pass (4200 ft.) which leads between Hermon and the spring of the radii of the Antilibanus system to the upper valley of the Baradā. SW. there is also an easy, though at first barren road to the low country S. of the central plateau (=Palestine). This oasis of Damascus, therefore, placed almost on the axis of partition between N. and S. Syria, and communicating readily with both these regions and with the elevated frontier district, is marked by nature for the locality of the capital city of an independent and undivided Syria. Were it not for its oasis character, Damascus would have played the part of capital more often. The W. range of the central plateau (J. el-Gharbi or Libnān = Lebanon) is a single chain of jurassic limestone with basaltic intrusions, very steeply inclined and without passes under 6000 ft. The highest summit reaches 10,200 ft. (see LEBANON, § 6). This walls off from the rest of Syria a narrow maritime strip, stretching from N. el-Kebīr (Eleutheros) on the N. to Carmel on the S., much interrupted by spurs of Lebanon, very fertile, thanks to the heavy precipitation on the western slope, and supplied with many harbours, good in the days of small sailing craft. Communication being difficult both with the interior (except by artificial ways made at great cost, such as the French mountain railway opened from Beyrout viâ Zaḥleh to Damascus in 1896), and within the littoral strip itself, the inhabitants of this region have not shared in the main currents of Syrian life, but have been attracted towards navigation (see PHŒNICIA, § 9). The distinctive character of their small territory was recognised by its constitution under Hadrian as a separate province (Syria Phœnice). The main floor of the central Syrian plateau falls gradually N. and S. from a scarcely perceptible sill just N. of Ba'albek, which is the main water-parting of Syria. It is an ancient lake-bed and the most important part of the mod. 'Lebanon' district, administered since 1861 as a province independent of the vilâyet of Syria. Along this deep and easy upland valley of el-Bukā' (anc. Cœlesyria), and between the flanking ranges, flow to N. the head-waters of the 'Āṣī (Axios or Orontes): to S. those of the Līṭānī (Leontes), called in its lower course el-Ḳāsimīyeh, which force their way W. between the S. butt of Lebanon and its continuation, the massif of Galilee, to the sea; and those of the Wādy et-Teim, which, after receiving the drainage of the S. butt of Hermon, becomes Nahr el-Kebīr (Jordan), and flows down into the rift of the Ghōr and to the Dead Sea (see JORDAN, § 3 ff.), where it is dissipated by evaporation at 1300 ft. below sea-level. The Beḳā' and the central plateau in general terminate S. in a steep and rugged hill-system, rising to 3860 ft. in J. Jarmak. This, which is the N. beginning of Galilee, renders access from the S. difficult, and diverts the natural trunk road eastward of the E. flanking range and to Damascus, whence it either gains the Buḳā' through the Baradā pass (see above), or it continues N. under the E. flank of Antilibanus, to debouch in the 'Āṣī valley lower down (near Ḥumṣ), or it crosses the steppe N. or NE. to Euphrates. S. Syria is all that lies S. of the central plateau and the oasis of Damascus, from the sea to the Euphratean watershed and the edge of the steppe-desert, which is here fringed in great part by lava-fields. All this district formed the Syria Palestina of Hadrian's provincial arrangement. It is divided longitudinally by the deep rift in which Jordan flows; and its eastern half, being thus in great measure detached from the western, and from all maritime influences, is especially open to influences of Arabia. W. Palestine merges insensibly in the desert on the S. For further geographical details concerning S. Syria see PALESTINE, § 2 ff. D. G. H.

5b. Fauna. It has been pointed out under PALESTINE (col. 3542 ff.) that, owing to the geographical position of the land, the fauna, though in the main Palæarctic in character, was modified by the intrusion of certain forms from the Oriental region towards the E. and from the Ethiopian region towards the S. Syria, lying to the N. of Palestine, is equally with it subject to invasion from the E., but is naturally much less exposed to intruders from the S., which, indeed, in Palestine, chiefly affect the hollow cleft which contain the Dead Sea and the valley of the Jordan.

The fauna of Syria, like that of Palestine, is to a great extent a steppe-, desert-, and rock-fauna, but it differs considerably from that of southern or even central Palestine in the character of its mammals. As might be expected, there are many animals with a northern provenance found in Syria which do not penetrate as far S. as southern Palestine, whilst the latter area harbours many forms which extend into the Peninsula of Sinai, Egypt, and Nubia, but which do not reach into Syria. Nehring[1] has recently pointed out that a line which leaves the coast in the neighbourhood of Kartha, skirts the southern limits of the Carmel group of hills, and then turns NE. to strike the Sea of Galilee a little W. of the exit of the Jordan, corresponds with the lower limit of the distribution of several of the more conspicuous Syrian mammals. Nehring's line, although it includes a considerable portion of Galilee, may be taken as the boundary of Syria considered from a zoological standpoint. It does not of course correspond with any historical limit; but animals are seldom found to respect political deliminations.

N. of this line we find the Syrian variety of the bear, Ursus isabellinus, which frequents the heights of Lebanon, Hermon, and is met with in Bashan and Gilead. The badger, Meles taxus, like the bear, seems to reach its southernmost limits in the wooded and hilly districts just mentioned. The pole-cat, Mustela putorius, and the ermine, M. erminea, are found on the slopes of Hermon, Lebanon, and Tabor, but do not pass Nehring's line. Their congener, M. foina, the beech-marten, however, spreads through Palestine. The otter, Lutra vulgaris, is also not uncommon on the shores of the Sea of Galilee. The striped hyæna, Hyæna striata, a nocturnal animal, the hunting-leopard, Cynælurus jubatus, are amongst the commoner carnivora, whilst Felis chaus, the jungle-cat, is found in Syria in a special variety. The roe-deer, Capreolus capræa, reaches its southernmost limit on the slopes of Mt. Carmel; neither it nor the fallow-deer passes the above-mentioned line. The Syrian wild-ass, Equus hemippus, is another conspicuous form which very rarely enters Palestine. The wild-boar, Sus scrofa, is more widely distributed. It frequents not only wooded and marshy localities, but even the desert, where it lives on roots. The gazelle, Gazella dorcas, extends southward from Lebanon, as does the Syrian hare, Lepus syriacus. Of the enormous family Rodentia, which supplies so large a proportion of the mammals in this part of the world, the Alpine-vole, Microtus nivalis, and the water-vole, M. amphibius, are common in Syria but do not pass Nehring's line. On the other hand, several species of ground-vole extend far beyond it, as do three common species of dormice, Myoxus glis, the squirrel-tailed dormouse, M. nitela, the garden dormouse, and M. dryas. The Syrian squirrel, Sciurus syriacus, is peculiarly Syrian, and the pouched-marmoset or souslik, Spermophilus xanthoprymnus, is not encountered S. of Gilead. The gerbille, Gerbillus tæniurus, is also peculiar to Syria. According to Nehring, the Psammomys myosurus mentioned under PALESTINE (§ 14 d) is more correctly referred to the genus Nesokia, and thus represents one of the intrusive elements from the Oriental region.

It will be seen from the above that Syria has several mammals peculiar to itself, and a number which reach their southernmost point in or about Mt. Carmel. The fauna of this region is further characterised by the absence of many creatures we are accustomed to associate with the Bible-lands. Conspicuous amongst these are: the coney, which recent research seems to confine to southern Palestine; the genus Acomys, a hedgehog-like mouse with spiny fur; the fascinating little jerboas, and several other rodents; and the Syrian ibex or beden. Enough has been said to show that the mammalian fauna of Syria (including a large part of Galilee) differs considerably from that of S. Palestine, and that probably there are few spots on the world of so restricted an area in which the mammals at one extremity differ so much from those at the other as they do in the little country of Palestine. A. E. S.

6. Lesser Syria. N. Syria is all that land which lies N. of the central plateau, and E. of Lebanon; but politically it has always tended to include not only the plateau itself (there being no such barrier to the N. as the mountains of Galilee form to the

1 Globus, 81, 1902, p. 309. See also WMM, OLZ, 1902, p. 394.

S.), but also the oasis of Damascus, between which and Palestine intervenes a barren tract. It comprises the NE. steppe as far as Euphrates, and all the N. land up to Taurus. Since this region is most strictly 'Syria' and is not treated elsewhere, a more particular description is subjoined.

(a) The 'Āṣī[1] basin.—The Buḳā' valley, after a course of about 100 m., opens out in lat. 34° 40'. The mountains on either hand fall to grassy downs, and the river 'Āṣī leaves the rocky gorge in which it has fallen over 2000 ft. and expands at a level of about 1600 ft. into a lake of 30 m. area, formed in part by an artificial dam of ancient construction. At the head of this stood the ancient Kadesh; at the foot now stands Ḥumṣ (anc. Emesa)—to hold the pass between the plateau valley and the lower Orontes lands, the heart of Syria proper (Seleucis). At the same point come in natural roads (1) from Tripoli (Ṭarābulūs) on the W. coast, round the N. butt of Lebanon by way of the valley of the N. el-Kebīr, (2) from Tadmor and Damascus round N. of Antilibanus. Railways will, not improbably, be laid shortly over both these roads, and Ḥumṣ will regain its old importance. The 'Āṣī flows on through a widening valley for about 25 m. to the rich marshy district of Ḥamāt (Hamath-Epiphaneia), to the E. of which point the steppe grows more down-like and habitable as far as the Euphrates, while to the W. rises a broad, low, and fertile range (J. Nuṣērīyeh) which on the W. leaves considerable littoral strips here and there of its own creation between itself and the sea. The most important of these contains the town el-Lādaḳīyeh (Laodicea). The range ends N. in the abrupt mass of J. el-Aḳra' (Casius), 5750 ft., which falls direct to the sea and closes the littoral. A road over J. Nuṣērīye meets, at Ḥamāt, the direct Aleppo road, which continues the easiest route from Euphrates.

Leaving Ḥamāt, the 'Āṣī bends somewhat W. of N. and flows through rich pastures (el-Ghāb) bounded on the E. by a triple system of basaltic hills (J. el-A'lā) with fertile intervals, which contain numerous remains of ancient inhabitation. It passes successively the sites of Larissa (Sējar) and Apamea (Ḳal'at el-Mudīḳ), and after a course of 50 m. from Ḥamāt, is turned sharply W. by a rocky obstruction (Jisr el-Ḥadīd) and hugs the N. butt of J. Nuṣērīye. To the N. in the line of its former course now opens out a wide plain (el-'Amḳ), partly filled by a marshy lake (Baḥr-el-Abyaḍ, or Aḳ-Deniz) into which it once flowed, and where it once met important tributaries, the Afrīn and the Kara Su. These now feed the lake which discharges into the 'Āṣī by the channel, Nahr el-Kowsit. The Afrīn flows down a broad valley (anc. Cyrrhestica) from the NE., which prolongs the plain far up towards Euphrates and carries a trunk road thitherward, which crosses a low water-parting E. of 'Ain Tāb and strikes the great river at Bīre jik, or following the valley of the Sājūr at Carchemish a few miles S. The proposed Baghdād railway will ascend the Afrīn valley after descending that of Kara Su. The Kara Su comes from the N. bringing the eastward drainage of S. Amānus. A natural road leads up its valley to its source on the marshy sill of Zinjirli (1650 ft.), and there forks (1) W. through the lowest Amanus passes to Cilicia and Asia Minor, and (2) NE. into the valley of Mar'ash and ancient Commagene. Ancient remains of a palatial Assyrian fortress of an importance suitable to its strategic position have been explored at Zinjirli by Dr. Von Luschan (FORTRESS, § 5). From the 'Amḳ plain a direct road also leads due E. to Aleppo and the Euphrates near Raḳḳa (Thapsacus). The deep and fertile region in which all these waters and roads meet is the natural centre of N. Syria, and accordingly the locality in which its greatest city of antiquity, Antioch, was situated (see ANTIOCH, § 1). The modern Anṭākieh lies near the point at which the 'Āṣī, having at last rounded the butt of J. Nuṣērīye, is about to plunge SW. into a gorge worn down between that range and the S. masses of Amanus. Through this it falls about 150 ft. in 10 m. to the sea in a series of unnavigable rapids. On the small deltaic fan N. of its mouth stands Suediah (anc. Seleucia of Pieria) which was the port of Antioch. But the unsheltered character of the port and the difficulties of the road in this gorge have caused N. Syrian trade to seek the more distant Alexandretta (Iskanderūn), which lies NE. of the plain of Antioch and behind the S. extension of Amanus, here crossed by the low col of Beilān (2230 ft.), about to be pierced by the Aleppo railway. The whole course of the 'Āṣī is about 170 m.

(b) Commagene.—To the N. of the 'Āṣī basin a small district intervenes before Taurus closes Syria. It is bounded S. by the heights in which the Afrīn and Kara Su rise. These heights start from Euphrates near the mouth of the Sājūr, and run NW. to 'Ain Tāb; thence they bend sharply to the SW., rise in Kurd Dagh to 4500 ft., and are linked to Amanus by the Zinjirli sill. The hollow N. of them is divided into two basins by a low swell running N. from Kurd Dagh to Taurus. The W. basin drains W. by the Ak Su through a rift in Amanus to the Cilician Jihun (Pyramus), and is the territory of Mar'ash (Germaniceia): it communicates, as we have seen, with the rest of Syria readily by way of Zinjirli. The E. basin drains to the Euphrates, looks eastward, and communicates less readily with the lands to the S. This is the ancient Commagene proper (Assyr. Kummuḫ), of which Samosata (Sumeisāṭ) was capital. Two important crossings of Euphrates, at Samosata and Zeugma (Bīre jik), placed it in communication with N. Mesopotamia and especially Edessa (Urfa).

(c) The Euphratean plains.—To E. of the 'Āṣī basin lies the lean steppe-like plateau described above as sloping E. to Euphrates. It is one in formation with the Arabian desert which limits Palestine on the E., but more fertile by reason of higher latitude and greater precipitation. It must be reckoned therefore to habitable Syria. It is limited on the S. by the ridge already mentioned, which runs NE. to Euphrates from Antilibanus, and along whose S. foot lies a chain of oases, marking a natural route from Damascus to the E. Of these the chief are Ḳarietein (Nezala) and Tadmor (Palmyra), both just on the verge of Arabia. The rolling downs to the N. of this chain once contained a large number of villages, dependent on wells, whose ruins have been explored by De Vogüé, Burton, Drake, Ostrup and others. This region is now deserted owing to its 'nomadisation' by the migrant Anazeh Bedouins, who have been pressing N. from central Arabia since the thirteenth century. In the latitude of J. A'lā, whose E. slopes fall insensibly into it, the plateau is still steppe-like; but immediately N. of this point occur a series of pans, whose northern limit is the ridge which bounds Commagene on the S. These pans receive water draining S. from that ridge, and are all of more or less saline character. Of the two principal basins, that on the E. receives a watercourse (N. el-Dahab), which rises just S. of Membij (Hierapolis) and ends in the great sebakha (salt-pan) of Jabul. That on the W. is more fertile and better supplied with fresh springs. It receives the Kowaik, which rises near 'Ain Tāb, and ends in a tract of permanent saline inundation (Mat) near Ḳennisrīn. Fine pasturage surrounds it, and its lower lands are arable. This is the ancient district Chalybonitis, which now supports Aleppo (Ḥaleb; anc. Chalybon-Berœa), a town of 65,000 inhabitants and the successor of Antioch. Through it lie the directest route from Asia Minor to Baghdād, or Babylonia, which crosses the Euphrates at Raḳḳa (Thapsacus), and the easiest road from S. Syria to the same point or to the more northern crossing at Bīre jik (Zeugma).

[1] 'Āṣī in Arab. = 'rebel,' and the title is variously explained by the turbulence, the inaccessibility, or the anti-Meccan direction of this stream. But it is undoubtedly derived originally from the same ancient native name which the Greeks wrote Axios.

II. HISTORY

8. Idea of Syria. The region which we designate as Syria has never constituted a political unity; of itself a proof that it is not, like Egypt or the Euphrates-country, a single land held together by common conditions of living. There is no river to furnish a natural channel of inter-communication and bond of union. For the same reason, there has never been any such separate entity as a Syrian civilisation; in this respect also, precisely as in things political, the various districts gravitated towards the countries of the neighbouring great civilisations. If Syria as an idea has maintained its existence for millennia, it is possible to see in this also a proof of the tenacity of the ancient Babylonian conception of the world. For it is to the ancient geographical division associated with that conception that the idea of Syria owed its origin, and its revival upon the fall of Assyria, after the Assyrian ascendancy had well-nigh sent it to oblivion.

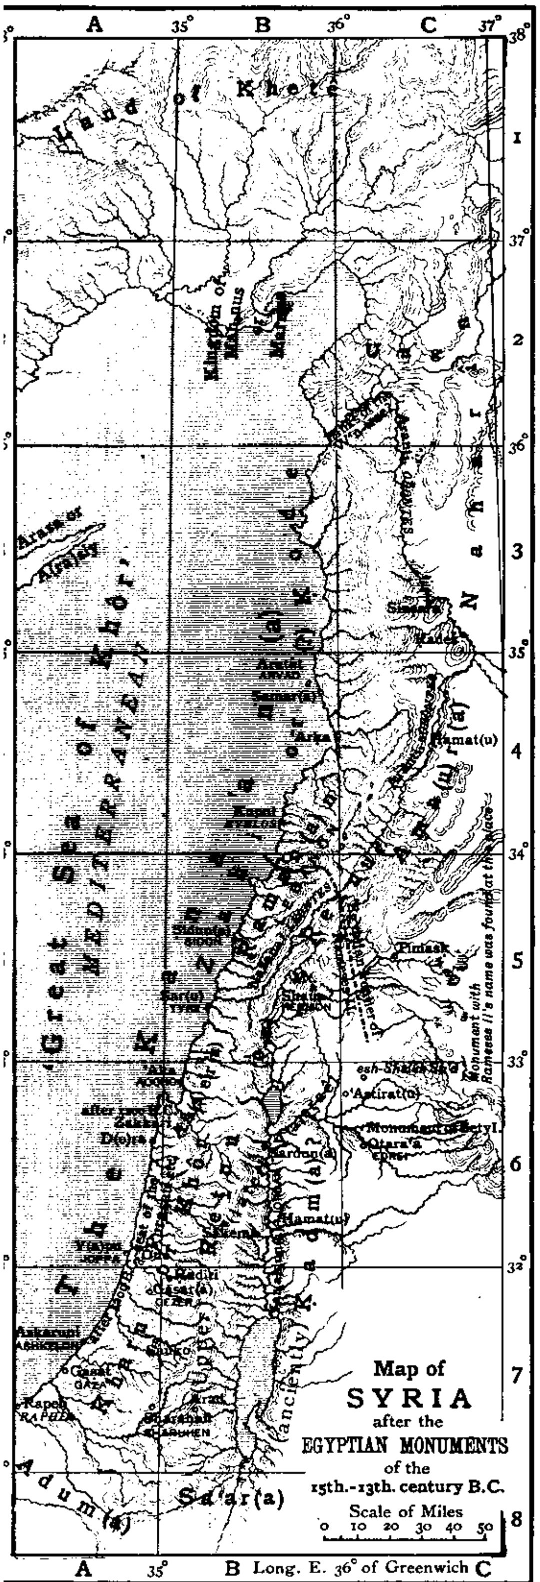
9. Relations. Suri-Syria is closed in by the two civilisation-areas of Babylonia and Asia Minor, and thus its development was determined by them. Being separated from the Egyptian area by Palestine, it was not so directly influenced from that side.

The movements of nations, the immigrations, to which it is exposed are, mainly, those from the S. (Arabia) and those from the N., by way of Armenia and Asia Minor. The first are those of the Semites; the second, those of the peoples whom we are accustomed to call Hittite because they stand to Asia Minor, the seat of the Ḫatti or Ḫeta, in a relation analogous to that of the Semitic immigrants to Babylonia. The natural consequence is that the population of Syria is in the main a mixture of both racial elements, and that in the course of the millennia and centuries representatives now of the one, now of the other, give the prevailing character to the whole.

10. Sources of information. For any knowledge of the conditions in detail we must turn, for the remoter antiquity exclusively, for later times chiefly, to the accounts we possess of the neighbouring peoples—primarily of the Assyrian-Babylonian, and then also of the Egyptian conquerors. The soil of the country itself has as yet yielded but few documents. Of these, for the older time, the monuments excavated at Zenjirli-Sam'al are of primary importance. The many monuments bearing Hittite inscriptions, which the soil of Syria, both in the narrower sense of that geographical expression (Hamath, Aleppo, Mar'aš, Carchemish) and in the wider (the eastern borderlands of Asia Minor), has yielded, still remain undeciphered.

11. Early Babylonia. The oldest Babylonian period shows Syria standing in the same relation to Babylonia as afterwards to Assyria. Sargon of Agade and Naram-Sin must have directed their armies thither precisely as was afterwards done by Tiglath-pileser I., Shalmaneser II., and the later Assyrian kings. That Sargon went forth to Amurru (Palestine) is repeatedly mentioned in the Omina, and 'Sargon subjugated and settled all Syria' is said of that monarch exactly as Shalmaneser II. and others might have had it said of them.

12. Later periods. In the time of Naram-Sin and the period that followed, at least down to that of the first dynasty of Babylon, the ascendancy in Syria is already held by that Semitic wave of immigration which we regard as the second and call the Canaanite. At that time, accordingly, Syria must, like Babylonia itself, have received a considerable influx of population of this race and language. The next Semitic wave consists of the Aramæans, whose lordship in Syria does not emerge until comparatively late. Until that event, accordingly, that is to say, during the second millennium B.C., and even later, 'Canaanite' dialects—i.e., languages like Hebrew and Phœnician—must have been spoken in Syria. Even as late as the eighth century B.C., we can learn from the inscriptions of Zenjirli-Sam'al that the influence of the Aramaic had still to struggle with the older Canaanite dialects. A fragment of an inscription of Ḫasan Beyli, not far from Zenjirli, and inscriptions of Zenjirli dating from the ninth century (of Kalammu bar [!] Ḫaja) show, indeed, that by that time the Semitic language of ordinary intercourse must already have become Aramaic, but at the same time exhibit purely Canaanite forms of speech, closely corresponding to Phœnician.



13. Hittite and Egyptian. In the middle of the second millennium we find a Hittite people, the Mitani, masters of Mesopotamia and N. Syria (Ḫanigalbat = Melitene). Though they are the first people of this race which we have as yet been able to discover on Syrian soil, we must not therefore conclude that they were the first to force their way thither. On the contrary, it seems as if we were able to trace, in the Amarna despatches, the existence of an older Hittite layer of population even in Palestine (such names as Sura-sar are unquestionably 'Hittite'). Both phenomena alike are to be interpreted as consequences of a larger Hittite migration into or conquest of Syria, advancing from N. to S., in other words, in the opposite direction to that of the Semitic immigration.

To the same period belong also the Egyptian conquests of the eighteenth and the nineteenth dynasty. How far the Egyptian lordship over Syria was in point of fact extended by these, hardly admits of ascertainment; but the princes to the N. of Aleppo, we may be sure, will hardly have accepted the Egyptian suzerainty for any longer period than that during which the Pharaoh was in a position at any time to despatch an army against them. Thus in N. Syria relations will have prevailed towards Egypt, similar to those which under Sargon and Sennacherib prevailed towards the adjacent border countries of Asia Minor (Tabal, Ḫilak).

In the Amarna letters in the fourteenth century, we find three powers keeping an eye upon Syria and Palestine: Babylonia (under the lordship of the Kassites), the Mitani, and the state of the Ḫatti or Ḫeta in Asia Minor. Of these the Ḫatti would seem to have been at that time the most dangerous to the influence of Egypt. Again and again mention is made of the advance of princes of Ḫeta into the Bekā'.

In the thirteenth-twelfth century Egypt is powerless, until under Ramses II. it again takes up a somewhat more vigorous foreign policy. During this interval Syria was naturally at the mercy of the other great powers, and it is in agreement with the picture presented in the Amarna letters that Ramses in the twelfth century comes into conflict with the Ḫeta in northern Palestine and Cœlesyria. In the interval the movement which we find already in existence in the fourteenth century must have been completed, and Syria have fallen in the main under the power of the Hittite state. The fourteenth-thirteenth century would thus be the time which witnessed a Hittite predominance in Syria and saw Syria drawn politically into closer connection with the Hittite empire. All the great Syrian cities from the N. to the S. were at this period governed by viceroys or vassal princes of the Hittite sovereign; from Commagene to the valley of the Orontes, in Malaṭia, Mar'aš, Aleppo, Hamath, and Kadesh on the Orontes the sovereignty of the Hittites was established. From this period, we may be sure, CARCHEMISH on the Euphrates also was reckoned a Hittite city. It must have been the principal seat of the Hittite rule in central Syria, for with the Assyrians later it passed as the capital of Syria, in so far as it was Hittite, and they called its king also, without qualifying phrase, the Hittite (Ḫatti) king.

The advance of the Ḫatti southwards over Cilicia must have occurred in connection with these movements. For if their power had its seat in Asia Minor and on the Halys, they would have needed first to overthrow the Mitani power in Ḫanigalbat, if they had wished to force their way through Melitene and Commagene. Struggles with this power were not wanting; the Amarna letters tell of a victory of Dušratta of Mitani over the Hittite king, but the overthrow of the Mitani was accomplished by Assyria.

The Mitani and their successors, accordingly, held northern Syria, whilst the advance proper of the Hittites upon Cilicia (the Ḳuë of the Assyrian inscriptions) appears to have been made through the 'Cilician Gates' and through Cilicia and over Amanus.

14. Appearance of Assyria.

At the same time we can learn also from the Amarna letters that Assyria under Ašur-uballiṭ is beginning to be dangerous to its overlord, the king of Babylon, and to arouse his jealousy as well as that of the king of the Mitani. Soon afterwards, under Rammān (Adad)-nirari I. and Shalmaneser I., Assyria broke the power of the Mitani, and thus subdued Mesopotamia, settling it in part with Assyrian colonists, as well as extending also westwards of the Euphrates. Shalmaneser I. took possession of the lands to the N. of the Taurus and subjugated Ḳumani as well as Muṣri—i.e., Cappadocia, at least between Taurus and Anti-taurus. In other words, he took possession of the whole area of the Mitani empire and brought that power to an end.

In doing so, Assyria at the same time stepped into the place that the Mitani had occupied over against the Ḫatti, and this new acquaintance thrust itself in almost like a wedge between the original land of the Ḫatti and their new acquisitions. The territory of the Ḫatti would in the event of any fresh advances of Assyria through Cilicia down to the sea be torn in two. The necessary consequence would then have been that the Assyrians would be compelled, as were the Mitani kings in the Amarna period, to go to war with the kings of the Ḫatti, in which all Syria from Commagene southward would have been involved.

15. Hittite and Egyptian.

The Ḫatti, however, were apparently spared this struggle by the sudden collapse of the Assyrian power at the death of Tukulti-Ninib I., and by his efforts to secure his position in Babylonia before pressing westward. This happened in the thirteenth century, and in this way the Ḫatti were enabled to develop and establish themselves in Syria undisturbed by the new and dangerous enemy.

The advance of Egypt under Rameses did not curtail this Hittite territory, for in spite of all alleged triumphs over the 'miserable Ḫeta' Rameses acknowledged their lordship over Syria, the mutually-recognised frontier having been possibly the Nahr el-Kelb near Beirūt, if not some river still more to the S.

By the peace concluded between the two powers, expressed in an offensive and defensive alliance between Ramses and Ḫetasar—an alliance rendered famous by the preservation of the terms of the treaty[1]—was effected a definition of political rights in Syria of great importance; the Pharaoh renounced his rights in Syria in favour of the Hittite king, and thus the country which hitherto had been in theory Egyptian now became Hittite.

[1] See WMM MVG 1902, no. 5 (Ḫ(e)-tà-sì-ra).

This theory was taken advantage of and zealously pressed by Assyria. If in the sequel Syria figures with the Assyrians as 'Ḫatti land,' they employ this designation because they come forward as lawful heirs to the Hittite claims.

16. Aramæans.

The same period which witnessed the subjugation of the Ḫatti saw also the gradual pressing forward of the Aramæans into Syria. Already in the Amarna letters we find mention of the aḫlamû, by which expression we are to understand the Aramaic bedouins. Rammān (Adad)-nirari I. and Shalmaneser I. fought with Aramæans mainly on Mesopotamian territory, and similarly also, about 1100, Tiglath-pileser I. speaks of struggles with Aramæan aḫlamû who had forced their way across the Euphrates into Mesopotamia.

17. Tiglath-pileser I.

The reign of Tiglath-pileser I. brought with it a renewed advance on the part of Assyria along the paths which had already been trodden by Shalmaneser I. Pressing across the Euphrates through Melitene to Ḳumani and Muṣri, Tiglath-pileser became master in the first instance of the former territory of the Mitani which belonged to him as lord of Mesopotamia. This was not possible without a previous clearing out of other invaders. For now also the 'Hittite' tribes of the N. were seeking to make their way into Mesopotamia and Syria, a counter-current to the Aramæan immigration. Tiglath-pileser names the peoples of the Ḳummuḫ—who thus, perhaps, at that time, gave their name to the country—of the Muski, and Kaska, as having been repelled by him from Mesopotamia. The people in question are racially of the same kindred as the then masters of Asia Minor and the Hittite empire. This empire was, of course, still more profoundly affected by this same movement of population, and in the reign of Sargon II. in the eighth century, it reappears still under the name of Muski.

These peoples thus, from the present period onward, constituted the population of the borderlands of Asia Minor and of Asia Minor itself. The Ḫatti empire also, accordingly, was the scene of new displacements of population. From a statement of Tiglath-pileser we learn, too, that the collision with the Ḫatti empire which had not yet occurred under Shalmaneser I., was no longer delayed. The Hittite king—this is our only reminder of the existence of a Hittite power at all at this period—was defeated by Tiglath-pileser, and the way to N. Phœnicia was once more open, and with it access to a port on the Mediterranean.

Tiglath-pileser I. pressed on as far as to Arvad, the most northern city of Phœnicia, and so found himself on territory which had formerly been recognised by Rameses as Hittite, and at the same time he had cut off the Hittite possessions in Syria from the mother country farther N. He tells us how (in Arvad) he received gifts from the 'king of Egypt'—amongst them a crocodile, apes, and the like. This means nothing either more or less than that the then Pharaoh—his name is not recorded—recognised him as conqueror of the Ḫatti and as heir of the rights which had been ceded to these by Rameses II. Assyria thus had become the rightful successor of Egypt in Syria.

Even Tiglath-pileser I. advanced by the most northerly route to N. Phœnicia. Though recognised by Egypt he had not yet gained the recognition of the Ḫatti nor, above all, that of the broken-up Syrian vassal-states or provinces themselves. We do not yet know what was the attitude of these states—Carchemish, Aleppo, and those further to the S. That matters would not have been settled without an appeal to arms may be taken for granted; but they do not seem to have come as far as that, for once more, as previously at the death of Tukulti-Ninib I., the Assyrian power speedily collapsed.

In this way Syria was rid at one and the same time of both its lords, for the Hittite power also must at that period have been severely shaken by the irruptions of the Muski and others, and so precluded from effective intervention in the affairs of Syria. Syria, therefore, exactly as Palestine, was in the eleventh and tenth centuries virtually left to itself and at liberty to follow its own political development independently of the great powers: as such at this date come into account not only Egypt and Assyria but also Babylonia. In Palestine and Phœnicia arose the kingdoms of David and of Hiram, in Syria a number of states with populations essentially of one and the same character, a mixture of Hittite and Aramæan. Needless to say, under these conditions the Aramæan immigration went on with much less impediment than would have been the case if a strong and great power had held sway. We have evidence for this Aramæan advance in occasional statements made by later Assyrian kings regarding the time in question. Thus Shalmaneser II. bears witness that under the Assyrian king Ašur-irbi the Aramæans had taken possession of Pitru (see PETHOR) on the Sagur.

18. Syria left to itself.

This movement will have been in the tenth century, for from the second half of that century onwards we are again able to follow the course of the Assyrian kings (from Tiglath-pileser II. onwards). In the ninth century Ašur-naṣir-pal begins anew to expand. He begins by subjugating the Aramæan states which had in the meantime sprung up in Mesopotamia (the most important of them was Bit-Adini which had its centre about Ḫarran), and next[1] he proceeds to cross the Euphrates. It is nevertheless worthy of remark that he did not follow quite the same route as had been taken by his two predecessors Shalmaneser I. and Tiglath-pileser I. Whilst they took possession of the territory which had belonged to the Mitani and from this base were thus able, after the conquest of the Ḫatti, to make their way to the sea, Ašur-naṣir-pal advanced direct through Syria proper. He already possessed legal claims to the 'Ḫatti land'—for as such Syria is now constantly represented by the Assyrians, whilst the Ḫatti land proper on the Halys is henceforward known as Muski. The development which had gone on in the interval appears from what Ašur-naṣir-pal tells us. In the N. it was Ḳummuḫ, on both banks of the Euphrates, that was always most fully exposed to the Assyrian influence, and it acknowledged the Assyrian sovereignty immediately upon the subjugation of the Aramæan states of Mesopotamia. The region to the S. of Ḳummuḫ embraced in Ašur-naṣir-pal's time the state of Carchemish, now called the capital of Ḫattiland (see above, § 13). Its king submitted in like manner without a struggle, thus recognising the claims of Assyria. Westward of this had grown up a state which included the northern portion of Syria proper (substantially Cyrrhestica) from the borders of Carchemish—let us say the Sagur—southwards to the mountains of the Noṣairi; its southern and eastern neighbour here may have been Hamath, of which Ašur-naṣir-pal for very good reasons says nothing. The new state was that of Patin (see PADDAN-ARAM), which had Liburna or Lubarna for its king, and Kunalua or Kinalia as its capital. Liburna did not submit until his capital had been besieged. In the southern Noṣairi range, that is in the mountains of North Phœnicia, Ašur-naṣir-pal founded an Assyrian colony in Aribua.[2] Of any further steps he took Ašur-naṣir-pal tells us nothing; but the state of affairs under his successor shows us what occurred in the immediately following years in this Aramæan state in the 'Amḳ.

19. Ašur-naṣir-pal.

Shalmaneser II. proceeded immediately in the first years of his reign to strengthen his hold on the territory which Ašur-naṣir-pal had subjugated in Mesopotamia and Syria. Ḳummuḫ, Bit-Adini, and Carchemish had to submit, or were overthrown. In place of the single state of Patin, however, Shalmaneser set up in the same area several smaller states. Liburna had thus to share his dominion with the various princes of the districts of his former territory—perhaps in virtue of an arrangement of Ašur-naṣir-pal's on the principle of divide et impera. Shalmaneser mentions by name Mutallu of Gurgum, Ḫani or Ḫayan bar Gabar of Sam'al, Sapalulme, and afterwards Kalparunda[1] of Patin in 853. Thus, on this first campaign which carried him to the Amanus, Shalmaneser kept himself practically within the limits of Patin, which had recognised the Assyrian overlordship. Some years later (in 854) he already names along with this the people or tribe of Gusi (or Agusi), which had its seat near Arpad under its prince Arame, and (in the N.) Lalli of Melitene.

20. Shalmaneser II.

The same expedition was destined to bring the whole of Syria or Ḫattiland under the Assyrian sway, and the course of it explains why formerly Ašur-naṣir-pal had advanced by the 'Amḳ-route. For the territory of Hamath, and that immediately adjoining it on the S., were at that time the seat of a greater power which possessed the ascendancy over Central Syria. Here in the tenth-ninth century DAMASCUS (q.v.) had developed into a principal state. Shalmaneser II. reckons up the 'allies' of Benhadad (Bir-'idri)—i.e., vassal states which had to render military service—in 854 B.C. and following years thus: Hamath, Ḳue, Muṣri, North Phœnicia, the 'Arabians,' Ammon.

The humiliation of Damascus was the task which henceforward confronted Syria. Shalmaneser grappled with it in vain. Even in 842 when Hazael was besieged in Damascus it was found impossible to force him to submit. On the other hand, from that year we hear no more of any 'allies.' Assyrian politics had drawn them all over to the Assyrian side. The question of adherence to Damascus or to Assyria is at this period the decisive one for every prince in Ḫatti-land, and it is accordingly the one of supreme importance for Israel also (see JEHU).

Towards the end of the reign of Shalmaneser (832) a revolt broke out in Patin; but it was quelled (Shalmaneser, Ob. 147 ff.). The troubles connected with the change of government and the reign of Šamši-Rammān (Adad) IV. left Syria, in particular Damascus, in much freedom. Rammān (Adad)-nirari III. was the first to get energetically to work again. Mari' of Damascus made submission to him, and thus all Ḫatti-land acknowledged Assyrian suzerainty. At the same time 'Amurri' also, down to its most southerly extremity Edom, was subjugated, and thus Assyria now went beyond the limits of the claims which could be inferred merely from the acknowledgment made by the Pharaoh under Tiglath-pileser I.[2] Henceforward, accordingly, Amurru also is included in the expression 'Ḫatti-land.' We are unable to say how far circumstances of the Amarna period were held to justify the claims made (cp § 13).

21. Later kings.

Next follows a period of decline of the Assyrian power, bringing along with it greater freedom for Syria and Palestine. Mention is made of risings in Damascus (773) and more particularly in Hadrak (Ḫatarikka) (772, 765, 755). The latter must thus at that period have been a town of importance in Syria. Probably Aramæan princes sought to establish a kingdom there

The powerlessness of Assyria had as one of its results that the northern part of Syria came under the influence of the Urarṭi, which at that time was strongly asserting itself. This is true specially of the states of a prevailingly 'Hittite' character,—Kummuḫ, Melitene, Carchemish. By conflict with the 'Ḫatti'—i.e., the Ḫatti properly so called, who are now designated as Muski by the Assyrians—the kings of Urarṭû had doubtless acquired like claims with those of Assyria. Under the changed conditions in Assyria, we see it now already designing to extend its influence also over Middle Syria. Sometimes the kings of Urarṭu take the title of 'king of Suri,' with the old-Babylonian meaning (cp § 8), and in opposition to their adversaries the kings of Assyria.

In Middle Syria Arpad was in the hands of Mati-el prince of Agusi (§ 20), and his subjugation, as well as the expulsion of the Urarṭû king Sarduris from Syria, was thus Tiglath-pileser III.'s first task. The reign of this monarch with its rapid increase of the Assyrian power, brought about in the end the subjugation of Syria and Palestine, and the prosperity of the Assyrian empire proper under the dynasty of Sargon. 'Ḫatti-land,' in the extended sense which includes Amurru and thus reaches to the Naḥal Muṣri, comes under the sway of Assyria as a province or vassal-state.

22. Tiglath-pileser III.

After the subjugation of Arpad and Urarṭû, the 'Amḳ was again overthrown in 738. Here Azriya'u of Ya'udi sought to make a stand. His capital Kulanî (see CALNO) became the chief city of an Assyrian province; the other districts of what had formerly been Patin (Sam'al, Gurgum) retained in the meantime their own princes. In Sam'al Tiglath-pileser mentions Panammû whom we know from the inscriptions of his son Bir-ṣur in Zenjirli. The king's next effort was directed against Damascus, which fell under Raṣôn in 732 B.C., and became an Assyrian province.

By avoiding collision, Hamath seems to have maintained a government of its own from the time of Shalmaneser II. It is not mentioned again after it had given up the 'alliance' with Benhadad to submit to the Assyrians (§ 20). By the formation of the province of Kulanî in 738 it had sustained a great loss of territory. The whole of the North Phœnician district which had belonged to it was—as belonging to Patin (cp end of § 19), and therefore rebellious—annexed by Tiglath-pileser as an Assyrian 'province Ṣimirra.' After the fall of Samaria in 722 B.C. an attempt was made in conjunction by Samaria, Damascus, and this 'province Ṣimirra' to cast off Assyrian sovereignty. Eni'il, the king, doubtless, of the old ruling house, had been set aside, and a certain Ilu-bi'di, 'a peasant,' called to the throne. The previous peasant condition of the new king shows that here there was a question of internal revolution which connected itself with similar movements in the adjoining countries and was somewhat belated. In Israel some fifteen or twenty years earlier Amos had in like manner spoken out in favour of a popular movement. The result naturally was that Hamath too lost its independence (720 B.C.).

23. Sargon II.

The same fate overtook Carchemish under its last king Pisiris in 717. He had vainly sought support from Mita of Muski (i.e., Midas of Phrygia[1]), the ruler of the old Ḫatti-land. Thus the whole of Middle Syria down to the borders of Judah had come under the provincial administration of Assyria.

In the 'Amḳ Sam'al had also in the meanwhile lost its independence, doubtless at the time of the rising of Hamath. The same fate befel Ḳumani (Kammanu) and Melitene in 712, Gurgum with its capital Marḳas (Mar'aš) in 711, Ḳummuḫ in 708, so that North Syria also was now once more under Assyrian administration.

Under Sennacherib Assyria made no progress; on the contrary, in Palestine repeated efforts were made, simultaneously with a like effort on the part of Babylonia in the rear, to shake off the Assyrian yoke. This applies, however, only to the self-ruling countries—Sidon-Tyre under Luli, and Judah under Hezekiah; the Assyrian provinces remained tranquil—perhaps because they felt themselves at all events better off under the Assyrian administration than they had been under rulers of their own.

24. Later kings.

[1] Wi. AOF, 2 136.

Under Esarhaddon and Ašur-bani-pal, in like manner, more of the Syrian territory changed hands; broadly, the conditions which had been established under Sargon continued, with the single exception that the territory of Tyre and Sidon (not the city of Tyre), also had become Assyrian.

On the fall of Assyria, Necho made the attempt again to establish the old rights of the Pharaohs over Ḫatti-land. He advanced to Carchemish where he was defeated by Nebuchadrezzar.[1] At this period he must like Nebuchadrezzar have had his headquarters in the Beḳâ'. Riblah seems then to have played an important part. The district of Hamath to which it belonged was very favourably situated for such purposes.

25. Babylonian supremacy.

By the victories of Nebuchadrezzar Ḫatti-land or êbir nâri (עבר הנהר)—for it is now again occasionally designated by its old name—came under the power of Babylonia, and there it remained. The rebellions of Judah which eventually led to the abolition of that kingdom, met with no support elsewhere in Syria. During the whole of this period the capitals of the former states of Syria figure as the administrative centres of an equivalent number of Assyrian (afterwards Babylonian) provinces.

The same position of affairs is still indicated by Nabuna'id in his third year (553), when this ruler once more summons the kings 'of Gaza and the Middle Sea, beyond the Euphrates' to take their part in the rebuilding of the temple in Harran. At that time, therefore, 'Ḫatti-land' in the widest sense of the word was still acknowledging the Babylonian supremacy. Fourteen years later the new king of Babylon was Cyrus the Persian.

Under Cyrus and Cambyses the government of the country seems in the first instance to have been carried on unchanged; thus the provinces remained under their pêḫas and šaknus as before. The internal revolution within the Persian empire and the rearrangement of the administration under Darius next brought about the division of the empire into satrapies. As a result of this the 'Ăbar Nahᵃrā (עבר נהרא), as it was now officially called in Aramaic (êbir nâri still in the Cuneiform inscriptions), became a separate satrapy. Its first satrap was Uštani (see TATNAI), who was also at the same time satrap of Babylonia and thus received the whole Chaldæan kingdom as his satrapy. At a later date the two satrapies were separated. The Macedonian Conquest brought about, in the kingdom of the Seleucidæ, a fresh revival of the kingdom of Babylon. Very soon, however, the capital was transferred to Syria (Antioch). Through the Roman and the Parthian ascendency Syria was severed from Babylon; its civilisation, through closer contact with that of the West, received new impulses, whilst the Babylonian came to ruin under the Parthian influence. The same state of things persisted under the Sasanian rule in Babylon, and the Byzantine in Syria. The two were again united by the Mohammedan conquest which once more brought together the whole of the east into one common area of civilisation. Even then, however, the contrast was marked. The seat of the caliphate is at first in Syria; not, however, in the Christian Antioch but on the borders of Arabia, in Damascus, where formerly Benhadad had sought to found an empire. On the other hand 'Ali found himself compelled to transfer his seat from the native land of Islam to the other region of Eastern civilisation, to Babylon (Irâḳ). By his overthrow Syria triumphed in the first instance, and continued for a century to be the seat of the caliphate under the Ommayyads. Then the East obtained the upper hand once more, and the Abbasids took up their residence in old Babylonia, in Baghdād. The Orient had its last period of prosperity, which came to an end in the overthrow of Baghdād by the Mongols, by which time Syria as well as Mesopotamia had already for long displayed the old tendency to break up into detached kingdoms or sultanates.

SYRTIS, AV QUICKSANDS (Η ϹΥΡΤΙϹ, Acts 27 17 Ti., WH). The Great and the Little Syrtis (Σύρτις μεγάλη καὶ μικρά, Ptol. 4 3) were the eastern and the western recess respectively of the great bay or indentation in the coast of northern Africa between Tunis and Tripoli. The Great Syrtis, the eastern recess (the modern Gulf of Sidra), extended from the promontory called Boreum on the E. to that of Cephalæ on the W. (Str. 835 f.). The Little Syrtis, the western recess (now the Gulf of Gabes), was included within the promontories Zeitha and Brachodes (Str. 834; Scyl. 48).

If a vessel became involved in them escape was regarded as almost hopeless (Str. 836, σπάνιον δ' εἶναι τὸ σωζόμενον σκάφος); consequently, ships kept far out to sea in passing between the eastern and the western Mediterranean (ibid., διόπερ πόρρωθεν τὸν παράπλουν ποιοῦνται φυλαττόμενοι μὴ ἐμπέσοιεν εἰς τοὺς κόλπους ὑπ' ἀνέμων ἀφύλακτοι ληφθέντες). Polybius (I 39) records how the consuls Gnæus Servilius and Gaius Sempronius were caught unawares in the Little Syrtis (253 B.C.), and had to jettison their stores in order to get off (cp Apoll. Rhod. 4 1235, Σύρτιν ὅθ' οὐκέτι νόστος ὀπίσσω | νηυσὶ πέλει, ὅτε τόν γε βιῴατο κόλπον ἱκέσθαι).

The danger was attributed not so much to the shallowness of the water and the treacherous bottom, as to the sudden and unaccountable action of the tides and consequent variations in the position of the banks (Pomp. Mela, 1 7; importuosus atque atrox et ob vadorum frequentium brevia, magisque etiam ob alternos motus pelagi affluentis ac refluentis infestus. Cp Str. 836; Apoll. Rhod. l.c.). It was from this action of the tides that the name Syrtis was derived (Sallust, B. Jug. 78: nomen ex re inditum . . . Syrtes ab tractu nominatæ. From the Greek σύρειν, 'to draw'). Nevertheless, masters with local experience found little difficulty in running along the coast (Str. 836). It is probable that the dangers of the two bays were exaggerated in the minds of those unfamiliar with the coast; exaggerated accounts were also given of the inhospitable character of the mainland, which was represented as a desert of sand full of dangers (Diod. Sic. 20 42; Sallust, op. cit. 79; Verg. Aen. 4 41, 'inhospita Syrtis'). As a matter of fact the coast of the Syrtes in ancient times was fringed with small towns (Str. 834 f.), and the territory was rich (Pol. 32 2).

From what has been said it is easy to understand the fear on the part of the crew of the Alexandrian grain-ship of finding themselves on a lee-shore—and that, the shore of the dreaded Syrtes. From the probable direction of the wind (ENE.; see Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 110 f.), which can be inferred from the bearings of the island of Clauda with reference to the region of the Syrtis, it is probable that the Great Syrtis was the immediate object of alarm, for a ship scudding before the wind (ἐπιδόντες ἐφερόμεθα, v. 15) must inevitably have found herself entangled in that bay ultimately. It was to check this course, and to lay the ship upon the starboard tack, that the operations described in v. 17 (χαλάσαντες τὸ σκεῦος, wrongly in AV, 'strake sail'; RV, 'lowered the gear.' See Smith, op. cit. 110 f.; Rams. St. Paul the Traveller, 329) were undertaken; with the result of throwing the ship ultimately upon the coast of Malta.

It is a question, however, whether in all the biblical passages the redactor has not, through a geographical misapprehension, substituted the northern city Taanach for a city in the Negeb called probably Beth-anak (Che.). See Crit. Bib.

TAANATH-SHILOH (תַּאֲנַת שִׁלֹה), a landmark on the frontier of Ephraim situated eastward of Micmethath (Josh. 16 6†, ΘΗΝΑϹΑ ΚΑΙ ϹΕΛΛΗϹΑ [B], ΤΗΝΑΘϹΗΛΩ [A], ΘΗΝΑΘΑϹ [L]). If 'Taanath' has the right vowels, we may identify with the mod. Ta'nā or 'Ain Ta'nā, N. from Yānūn, a ruined site with remains of large cisterns. The form given in 𝔊, however, favours a different pointing—תְּאֵנַת שׁ׳, 'fig-tree of Shiloh' (NAMES, § 103); cp θηνa[θ], OS(2) 261 76.

TABBAOTH (טַבָּעוֹת, § 71; '[signet] rings,' but see TABBATH; ΤΑΒΑΩΘ [BℵL]; cp HOTHAM), the family name of a company of (post-exilic) Nethinim: Ezra 2 43 (ταβωθ [B], ταββαωθ [A]) Neh. 7 46 (γαβαωθ [B], ταββ. [A]) = 1 Esd. 5 29 Tabaoth (ταβωθ [A]).

TABBATH (טַבָּת, with the retention of the old fem. ending, § 78; ΤΑΒΑΘ [BL], ΓΑ. [A]), mentioned only in the account of the defeat of the Midianites by Gideon, where it is probably a corruption of JOTBAH [q.v.] (Judg. 7 22). See GIDEON, col. 1720, n. 4, and note that this name, disguised as Tabbaoth, which comes from the Negeb, is borne by a family of Nethinim or Ethanites (?). See TABBAOTH, SOLOMON'S SERVANTS.

TABEEL, AV Tabeal (טָבְאֵל, in Is. pausal form טָבְאַל [see Kö., Lehrgeb. 2 537], 'God is good,' or [Wi. Alt. Unt. 74] 'God is wise,' cp Tab-rimmon; ΤΑΒΕΗΛ [BℵAQΓL]).

1. Ben-Tābeel (RV 'the son of Tabeel,' AV '. . . Tabeal') is the only name given by Isaiah to the person put forward by Rezin and Pekah as a substitute for Ahaz on the throne of Judah (Is. 7 6). 𝔊 regards the name as a compound, the second part of which is אֵל, 'God.' The points, however, imply the pronunciation Tābᵉal—i.e., 'good-for-nothing' (cp Nöld. ZDMG 33 330 [1879]); a jeu d'esprit in the old Jewish manner. Winckler (Alttest. Unt. 74) and Guthe (ISRAEL, § 32) take 'the son of Tabeel' (as is usually read) to be Rezin (Rezon). Most scholars suppose that an Aramæan or Syrian is meant, but not

Rezin himself, who is surely the chief speaker in Is. 7 5 f. Marti, however, suggests that the name of the father of Rezin's nominee may have been Ṭōbᵉ'el or Ṭōbi'el, so that he would have been a Judahite (but see TOBIAH); he declines, however, to speak positively. If, however, the view referred to elsewhere (REZIN, TIGLATH-PILESER) be correct, and the invaders of Judah were Rezin (Rezon), king of Aram, and Pir'ām (?), king of Ishmael, it becomes at once probable that the title of the pretender's father was Ben-Tūbal, TUBAL (q.v.) being an ethnic name of the N. Arabian border-land. According to this view, the invasion was from the S., and the news brought to Ahaz may have been 'Aram has encamped against Ephron'; Ephron (עפרון), corrupted in Is. (l.c.) into 'Ephraim' (אפרים), was the name of a town of Jeraḥmeel which became Judahite, according to 2 Ch. 13 19, under king Abijah; it may also have been Judahite under Ahaz, and if so have been on the frontier of Judahite territory towards the S. There are parallels enough in corrupt passages elsewhere to warrant our reading in Is. 7 6, 'Let us go up against Jerusalem . . . and let us appoint a king in the midst of it, namely, the son of Tubal (the Tubalite).'

2. A Persian official in Samaria, Ezra 4 7, who in 1 Esd. 2 16 is called Tabellius (ταβέλλιος [BAL]). It is very possible to read the name תֻּבַלִי, 'Tubalite' (i.e., a man of the N. Arabian Tubal). This is connected with a critical theory on the original narratives in Ezra, for which see Crit. Bib. It involves holding Shobal (Gen. 36 20, etc.) to be the original of Bishlam, and perhaps Ramathi (1 Ch. 27 27) of Mithredath in the same passage, the present readings being due to a later editor.

TABERAH (תַּבְעֵרָה, 'burning' of RVmg.; ΕΜΠΥΡΙΣΜΟΣ [BAFL]), a locality in the wilderness of Paran (presumably near Kibroth-hattaavah), which is said to have derived its name from the 'burning' which took place there (Nu. 11 3 Dt. 9 22†). See KIBROTH-HATTAAVAH, WANDERINGS, §§ 7, 10.

1. Traditional view. According to the traditional view, which goes as far back as to P, and even to the period of the exile, the temple in Jerusalem had its prototype in the portable sanctuary—the tabernacle—set up in the wilderness by Moses. In accordance with directions received on Mount Sinai (Ex. 26 1 ff., P) he constructed for Yahwè and the ark a sumptuous tent which accompanied the Israelites as their only sanctuary during their forty years' wandering in the wilderness. Though never anything but a 'tent,' a provisional and temporary house of God, designed for the journey from Sinai to Palestine, it continued long after the settlement in Canaan to be Israel's sole legitimate sanctuary—set up, now here now there, in various parts of Palestine until at last Solomon built his temple, to which the ark of Yahwè was finally transferred.

The most usual designation for this tabernacle in P is 'ōhel mō'ēd (אֹהֶל מוֹעֵד; e.g., Ex. 27 21 28 43 29 4 10 f., etc.; see ASSEMBLY, 2; col. 346). According to Ex. 29 42 f. Nu. 17 19 [4] this expression denotes the tabernacle as the place where Yahwè meets with Moses and the people and communicates to Moses from the kappōreth (see MERCY SEAT) between the cherubim his messages to the children of Israel. On this view the usual interpretation of the expression as meaning 'tabernacle of the assembly' or 'tabernacle of the congregation' (Bähr, 1 136 f., Ewald, 168) is incorrect; moreover in point of fact the sanctuaries of the Semites never were, primarily, places of meeting for the community; they were places where the deity dwelt and revealed himself (see TEMPLE, § 1). So also the tabernacle (see below, § 8).

The tabernacle is expressly spoken of (Lev. 17 4 [cp 15 31 mg. 'tabernacle'], Nu. 16 9 19 13 31 20 30 47 Josh. 22 19) as miškan Yhwh (מִשְׁכַּן יהוה)—a phrase which on the other hand, it is true, is also used to designate the holy of holies, the dwelling place proper of the deity as distinguished from the rest of the structure (Ex. 26 1 6 f. 35 11 36 13 f. 39 33 f. 40 19 f. Nu. 3 25; cp also Ex. 39 32 40 2 6 29). Another name for the tabernacle is 'ōhel hā-'ēdūth (אֹהֶל הָעֵדֻת; Nu. 9 15 17 22 f. [7 f.] 18 2), or miškan hā'ēdūth (מִשְׁכַּן הָעֵדֻת; Ex. 38 21 Nu. 1 50 53 10 11), 'tabernacle' or 'dwelling place' of the 'testimony' or 'witness' (cp ARK OF THE COVENANT, § 3). This after the analogy of 'ōhel mō'ēd is taken by Riehm and others as meaning 'the dwelling-place where God bears witness to himself and to his will,' in other words as equivalent to 'tent of revelation.' It seems more probable, however, that here as in the expression 'ark of the 'ēdūth' (Ex. 25 22 26 33) the word 'ēdūth means the two tables of the law, and the whole expression the tent in which the two tables are deposited (cp 𝔊 σκηνὴ τοῦ μαρτυρίου, Vg. tabernaculum testimonii or fœderis; cp also Ex. 31 18 34 29).[1]

2. Description in P. The details of the tabernacle and its furniture have been preserved to us in two-fold form—once in the form of a divine instruction to Moses in which all the measurements and specifications to the smallest detail are given (Ex. 25 10-27 19), and again in that of a narrative relating how this instruction was carried out, when practically everything is repeated (Ex. 36 8-38 31). These two sections belong to different strata of P.

The whole description leaves at first sight such an impression of painstaking precision that the reader might be tempted forthwith to take for granted its historical truth. As soon, however, as he begins to examine more closely, and on the basis of this description proceeds to attempt to form for himself a definite picture of what the tabernacle was, he finds that in spite of the multitude of data supplied, or rather precisely because of their multitude, it is impossible to arrive at any clearness on the subject. As Wellhausen very truly remarks (Prol.[(5)], 353, cp ET 348): 'without repeating the descriptions of the tabernacle in Ex. 25 ff. word for word, it is difficult to give an idea how circumstantial it is; we must go to the source to satisfy ourselves what the "narrator" can do in this line. One would imagine that he was giving specifications to measurers for estimates or that he was writing for weavers and cabinetmakers; but they could not proceed upon his information, for the incredibly matter-of-fact statements are fancy all the same.'

The tabernacle consists of two parts: (1) the 'dwelling-place' (miškān), and (2) the enclosing court (ḥāṣēr).

3. The tabernacle: its walls. 1. The 'dwelling-place' is spoken of in the narrative as a 'tent' or tabernacle ('ôhel). On closer examination, however, this accords very imperfectly with the detailed description.[2] For the so-called 'tent' forms an oblong with upright walls made of thick 'boards' (EV, קֶרֶשׁ, ḳéreš,

[1] [Other words rendered 'tabernacle' in EV, but only in the more general sense of that word, are: סֻכָּה, sukkāh, see TABERNACLES, FEAST OF; סֹךְ, sōk, Ps. 76 2 (RVmg. 'covert'), or שֹׂךְ, sōk, Lam. 2 6 (RVmg 'booth or hedge'); סִכּוּת, sikkūth, Am. 5 26, AV; RV 'Siccuth,' see CHIUN; σκηνή, Mt. 17 4 etc.; σκῆνος, 2 Cor. 5 14; σκήνωμα, Acts 7 46 2 Pet. 1 13. See TENT.]

[2] It is clear that the writer is at great pains to make it appear that the structure is a tent. Only in this way can we explain the surprising circumstance that in both cases—both when the instructions are being given and when the construction is being described—he begins with the roof. Plainly he feels that the walls, etc., as he is about to describe them, do not give the impression of a tent. Therefore he gives to the curtains—the roof—the place of chief importance, which of course they would have in the case of a tent, and treats all else, the walls, etc.—as secondary and merely as necessary accessories for the curtains just as tent-poles are.

𝔊 στύλοι, Philo and Josephus κιόνες). These boards are each 10 cubits[1] high (thus quite rightly designated in the Greek: 'pillars' or 'posts'), the wall itself somewhat more, as the 'feet' (see below) of the boards have to be added in. In all there are 48 boards, 20 on the N. and 20 on the S. side (the structure facing eastward) and 8 forming the western (rear) wall. The front has no such wall; it is closed merely by curtains.

The boards themselves are (as Ex. 26 16 ff. expressly states) each $1\frac{1}{2}$ cubits broad. From this, their arrangement and the thickness of each can be easily calculated.

The long side of the oblong (interior measurement) as is implied in Ex. 26 15 ff., is to be 30 cubits, and that of the rear wall (thus interior measurement also) is 10 cubits. This last measurement indeed is not expressly given, but it is clearly implied by the whole context; the holy of holies at the west end of the structure is conceived of as a cube of 10 cubits, just as that of the temple of Solomon is a cube of 20. This being so, the boards of the rear wall were so placed as to make it the exterior wall which covered the breadth of both the longitudinal walls. The eight boards of the rear wall together made a breadth of $8\times 1\frac{1}{2}=12$ cubits; as the interior measurement was only 10 cubits there remained a difference on each side of 1 cubit which could only have served to cover the ends of the side walls. These, therefore and the rear wall also were 1 cubit thick (so Bähr, Ewald, Kamphausen, and others).

Holzinger,[2] it is true, supposes that these dimensions (10 cubits and 30 cubits) are meant to be taken not as interior but as exterior measurements. In support of this he points to the measurement of the curtain of goats' hair which is calculated for a framework of $10\times 10\times 30$ cubits. This argument holds good, however, only if we ignore Ex. 26 12 (Holzinger eliminates it as a gloss) and double the curtain for 4 cubits in front while at the rear it comes down to the ground ($4+30+10=44$ cubits). The passage just referred to, on the other hand, clearly reckons 11 cubits as hanging down at the rear and 2 cubits in front as doubled; thus leaving 31 cubits to be accounted for (viz 30 cubits as length of the exterior and 1 cubit as thickness of rear wall). In Ex. 26 22, it is true, the two corner boards of the rear wall are distinguished from the others; and from this the inference has been drawn that they were of slenderer proportions and thus the boards altogether thinner than has been calculated above (so, for example, already Josephus, who gives their thickness as half a cubit). The motive for this is manifest; a structure formed of boards 2 ft. 7 in. broad and 20.67 in. thick can no longer in fairness be called a tent; beams of such a size are no longer mere supports for a curtain roof; they are substantial walls, and it is also hard to say where in the wilderness trees capable of yielding such massive timber are to be found. Hence the pains taken in the apologetic interest to reduce the beams. Thus, for example, Knobel cites Ezek. 27 6 where the same expression ḳéreš is used for panelling (EV, RVmg. 'deck'), thus plainly indicating thin boards, not thick beams. As already observed, however, the writer's manifest object is to make the structure appear as a tent, and therefore he may very well have deliberately chosen this word even although (or rather because) it elsewhere means only 'plank.' Keil maintains that the interpreter has no reason for magnifying mere planks into colossal beams such as can neither be obtained from the acacia tree nor be transported on wheels in the wilderness. Nevertheless there is no getting past the fact that in Ex. 26 15 ff. it is expressly stated of all the boards that they were alike. The text of Ex. 26 22 ff., however, is hopelessly corrupt and unintelligible. The numerous attempts at explanation that have been made at various times cannot be discussed here; some of them are in the highest degree artificial, as for example that of Riehm (HWB, s.v. 'Stiftshütte,' p. 1578 b). Cp, further, Dillmann and Holzinger, ad loc.; also Riggenbach, 23 ff., Keil, 85 f. [Starting from Stade's study of the construction of Solomon's lavers (1 K. 7 28 ff.) in ZATW, 1901, pp. 145 ff. where יְדוֹת and שְׁלַבִּים are shown to have had the technical sense of 'stays' and 'cross-rails' respectively, Prof. Kennedy holds that the קֶרֶשׁ of P—which is found elsewhere only in Ezek. 27 6 in the sense of 'panel'—is 'a frame of wood, such as builders in all countries have employed in the construction of light walls.' He renders vv. 15 ff. thus, taking the parenthesis last: 'And thou shalt make the frames for the dwelling of acacia wood, standing up, two uprights for each frame, joined to each other by cross-rails—ten cubits the height and a cubit and a half the breadth of the single frame.' The third dimension is not given, because a frame has, strictly speaking, no thickness.]

Further, all the boards are uniformly furnished each with two יָדוֹת, yādōth (EV 'tenons'), which are connected with one another by a slip of wood (Ex. 26 16 f.). Josephus understands by the expression 'pivots' (στρόφιγγες) at the foot of each board, and this is not

[1] [It is assumed throughout this article that the longer cubit of 20·67 in. is meant; see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 1.]

[2] So also A. R. S. Kennedy, 'Tabernacle,' in Hastings' DB 4 661 a.

improbably correct. For according to Ex. 26 19 two bases (אֲדָנִים, ădānîm, EV 'sockets,' βάσεις) are provided in each case for the two pivots. They are of silver, and each weighs a talent (95 lbs.); Ex. 38 27.[1] Interpreters differ widely as to the purpose and the form of these sockets. The most natural view seems to be that of Josephus, according to which the tenons and sockets were placed at the lower edge of the boards in such a way that the function of the tenons was to connect the boards with the sockets. For throughout the whole description no word is said as to the manner in which the boards were set up on or, as it may be, fastened into the ground. As to this, some interpreters think of the sockets as having been wedge-shaped and as being driven into the ground, the boards then being fitted into them by means of the tenons. Against such an explanation, however, must be urged the light weight of the silver; 95 lbs. of that metal (if the text be correct) are not enough for a wedge large enough to carry a pillar having a cross section of 30 × 20 in. and weighing something like half a ton. Moreover the use of silver for any such purpose at all would be very odd; silver and gold after all are best applied for the decoration of a structure and are not usually buried under ground. Other interpreters accordingly take the meaning to be that the yādōth (tenons), were designed for driving into the ground and that the ădānîm were merely quite shallow projecting bases of the boards through which the pivots passed. But not even thus is the object of fixing the boards in position attained, for simple pivots would have been insufficient, and the boards would have had to be driven into the ground (see below). Thus we are shut up to the view that the ădānîm were quite shallow bases of the boards serving more for ornament than for stability. By the pivots in that case these bases were attached to the boards. It will be enough merely to mention here the quite different explanation of Riehm (HWB, s.v. 'Stiftshütte,' 1578 f.) according to which each board consisted of two pieces which were held together by the tenons at the sides and by the feet below.

These boards were attached to one another by cross bars (EV 'bars'; בְּרִיחִם, bĕrîḥîm). Each board had on its outer side golden 'rings' (EV; טַבָּעוֹת, ṭabbā'ōth),[2] through which were passed strong bars of acacia wood. To be precise, there were five such bars on each side (Ex. 36 31 ff.). The middle bar, half-way up the boards,[3] ran all the way along and thus was in the case of the rear wall 12 cubits long, and in the case of each of the other two walls 30 cubits, or, let us say, 31 cubits, since doubtless we may safely assume that the boards of the rear wall which covered the ends of the longer walls, and thus the rear wall as a whole, were connected with the longer walls by these crossbars. From the statement about the middle bar that it went right along we must conclude that this was not the case with the others. These, accordingly, were shorter and we shall be justified perhaps in supposing that each bar joined together only one half of the total number of boards, and thus that each individual board had only three rings and bars. The position of the bars as given in the figure in Riehm (HWB 1579) is derived from the consideration that the narrator plainly has it in his mind that five bars could be at once distinguished by simple inspection, which would not so readily be the case if the upper and

[1] [This passage, however, belongs to a very late addition to P based on the census in Numbers.]

[2] It is not indeed expressly said in the text that the bars were upon the outer side; but this is the most natural and likely supposition. Ewald, however, amongst others, thinks of the rings and bars as on the inner side.

[3] Riggenbach and others take Ex. 26 28 as meaning that the middle bar went through the interior of the boards themselves and not through rings, but such a construction can hardly be put upon the expression בְּתוֹךְ הַקְּרָשִׁים, apart from the improbability of the whole idea.

lower bars had each run at a uniform level and each contiguous with the other.[1]

Finally, the boards and bars are, according to Ex. 26 29 ff., overlaid with gold, that is to say, with thin gold plate so that the inner and outer surface of the structure was golden.[2]

These walls formed a framework for the coverings—the roof, which, as already observed, was regarded by the narrator as the main thing, the essential part of the structure, as indeed it would be in the case of an actual tent. It has four coverings, laid successively the one upon the other.

4. The coverings.

(1) The innermost was of costly linen. It is described (Ex. 26 1 ff.) as the work of the cunning workman (ma'ăsēh ḥōšēb), of fine-twined linen (šēš; see LINEN, 7) violet purple and red purple (tĕkēleth and argāmān; see COLOURS, § 15, PURPLE) and scarlet (tōlā'ath šānī; see COLOURS, § 14, SCARLET). Cherubim were woven into it. How the colours were applied we are not more precisely informed. We can imagine either a patterned textile in four colours with inwoven cherubim or a white texture with cherubim inwoven in three colours. The latter appears the more likely supposition. The curtain of the enclosing wall of the court was also white (see below). The whole covering was made up of ten separate 'curtains' (EV; yĕrī'ōth); each of these strips was 28 cubits long and 4 cubits broad, and five of them were joined side by side to form one large covering. No particulars are given as to the mode of their attachment. The two large coverings thus composed, 28 cubits long and 20 cubits wide, had each of them along one of the longer sides fifty 'loops' (EV; lŭlāōth) of violet purple so placed that each of the loops was opposite a loop on the other curtain. In these loops were inserted fifty golden 'clasps' (RV, AV 'taches'; קְרָסִים, ḳĕrāsīm), by means of which the two large coverings were held together.[3] The whole of the great covering thus made up, 28 cubits by 40, was then laid over the wooden framework. On the outer side of each of the two longer walls it thus hung down to a distance of 8 cubits (the whole breadth of the structure, including the thickness of the walls, being, as we have seen, 12 cubits). To the rear, on the other hand, there were 9 cubits to spare, as of course the covering was not allowed to overhang in front. In this position of the covering, the joining of its two great sections, with its loops and clasps, ran exactly along the top of the hanging curtain which, 20 cubits from the front, separated the holy place from the holy of holies. This arrangement was certainly designed. Nothing is anywhere said as to any special attachment of this great covering to the walls; nor indeed was any such attachment required, its own weight combined with that of the two others superimposed upon it being amply sufficient to keep it in position. This inner covering constitutes the miškān properly so-called, the wooden walls being regarded merely as supports for it; and we find it accordingly in one place (Ex. 26 13) expressly so called.

a. Kurz, Keil, Bähr, and others (including Holzinger), take it that this covering hung down on the inner side of the structure, covering the wall as with a hanging of tapestry. The reason primarily alleged for this opinion—that otherwise the cherubs between the wall and the hair-covering would not have been shown—disappears on the assumption we propose to make that the hair-covering was drawn out (see below). Two other reasons, adduced by Holzinger, carry more weight. (i.) In the first place he urges that the fine linen fabric would have taken damage if stretched over the wooden wall in contact with the rough covering of goats' hair, would have been torn by the nails, and so forth. As against this, however, it has to be pointed out that the whole structure is a creation of the imagination, and that in any case the author has not thought out the details with such practicality and minuteness as criticism of this kind would imply. (ii.) Holzinger's other reason is that, in Nu. 4 5, when the tabernacle is being removed it is represented that the byssus covering can be applied as a covering for the ark without more ado; this certainly could be done most easily if it hung wholly within. The fact, however, that in striking an actual tent the first thing to be done is to take down the tent covering, is of course one that does not need to be particularly emphasised; and the implied oversight of the narrator thus becomes intelligible. b. On the other side there are preponderating considerations against the theory that the covering hung within. (i.) In the first place, had it done so, this would have rendered necessary special arrangements for the attachment of the covering to the upper edge of the wooden walls, but of any such, no mention is anywhere made. (ii.) Further, in the case supposed, the covering would have hung down 9 cubits on each of the side walls, and as many as 10 on the hinder wall, thus resting on the ground—an inequality which, in combination with the great protruding cornerpieces, would have greatly disfigured the Holy of Holies. (iii.) Finally, in Ex. 26 12 f. it is expressly said that the tent-covering proper which lay above this covering overlapped it in all directions; but this is meaningless unless the inner covering also hung down the outside of the wooden walls. This last passage, it is true, is regarded by Holzinger as a gloss; it shows, however, in any case at least that from a very early date this linen covering was thought of as an external hanging. Nor is it by any means necessary to treat the verses as a gloss. For on any construction it is impossible to give precision and accuracy to the description (see below). For all which reasons the majority of modern interpreters (Dillmann, Riehm, Nowack, Kennedy, and others) adopt the view that the covering was an external one. On this view, let it be added, the general effect was not impaired by the inequality of the hanging on the side walls (8 cubits), as compared with the hinder wall (9 cubits), nor yet by the corner folds coming down to the ground with 2 cubits to spare.

(2) Above this inner covering came, as a second 'roof,' a real tent covering (Ex. 26 7 ff.) like those in ordinary use, made of black or brown goats' hair,[1] a material that quickly felts in rain and allows no moisture to pass through. This covering is also spoken of, absolutely, as 'the tent.' Like the other, it also, naturally, is made up of separate strips; of which there are eleven, each of them 30 cubits by 4. Of these eleven, five and six respectively are fastened together so as to form two larger coverings. Uniformly with the linen covering both parts of the goats' hair covering have each on the longer side fifty loops exactly opposite one another and are fastened together by clasps; only here the clasps are made of copper—a less noble metal. The material and colour of the loops are not specified. It will be observed that if a covering of these dimensions were to be laid over the linen covering, it would overlap it all round by a cubit, and this is expressly stated in Ex. 26 13. On the hinder wall, on the other hand, the overlapping part was 2 cubits longer than the linen covering. For the hair covering was so adjusted that of the eleventh (extra) breadth of 4 cubits only the half hung over the back of the tabernacle (Ex. 26 12), that is to say, overlapped the linen covering.[2] The extra portion over the entrance in front, 2 cubits in width, was not allowed to overhang but was turned back so that in this way the first strip to the front was folded along the medial line and lay double. According to Josephus (Ant. iii. 6 4) there was thus made a sort of gable and portal. A simpler explanation perhaps will be that of Riehm and others, that the weight of the doubled front strip was intended to prevent the wind

[1] The circumstance that the middle bar ran right along and thus must have been 31 cubits in length naturally caused difficulty from very early times, and Josephus accordingly represents it as having been made up of several lengths of 5 cubits apiece, which were screwed together.

[2] Perhaps we ought with Holzinger to regard v. 29 as being in the main a gloss; in Nu. 4 careful packing of the gold-plated objects is enjoined, and this would certainly not be easy in the case of the boards of the tabernacle. Yet an oversight such as this, on the part of the narrator, is not difficult to imagine.

[3] Schick's supposition, that one curtain had loops and clasps, is contrary to the language of the text.

[1] Bähr thinks that this covering was entirely white. The text, however, does not say so, nor is the thing likely in itself. Ordinary tent-coverings are black or dark-brown, often having white stripes also (Cant. 1 5).

[2] Holzinger (ad loc.) it is true, holds this reckoning which brings out an excess to be a mistake, and considers 26 12 to be a gloss. The mistake arises according to him out of a false notion as to the manner in which the linen covering was placed (see above). [Kennedy (op. cit.) follows Holzinger in regarding v. 12 as a mistaken gloss, but holds that the whole of the eleventh curtain hung doubled over the edge of the roof in front, for which he claims the support of a Jewish treatise of the third century.]

from catching it too easily. Behind and at the sides the covering was protected against this by the fastening with tent pins (see below). The effect of the arrangement was that the joinings of the linen and of the goats'-hair coverings did not coincide; and this is evidently quite right. In like manner the places at which the separate strips were fastened together by the loops and clasps were not coincident as Bähr, and recently Holzinger and Kennedy, erroneously have held. In point of fact, since in the case of the goats'-hair covering the larger portion (of six strips) was put in front, the joining came to be over the holy of holies, 2 cubits farther back than the joining of the linen covering which as we have seen was exactly over the veil between the holy place and the holy of holies.

To this tent covering pertain the 'pins' (EV; yĕthēdōth) and 'cords' (EV; mēthārīm) of which recurring mention is made (Ex. 27 19 35 18 38 20 31 39 40). The pins, unlike the ordinary wooden tent peg, are of brass (38 31). From the mention of these pins and cords we must infer, although this is not expressly stated, that the hair-covering did not, like the under-covering, hang down over the outer walls, but, as would be the case with a regular tent, was fastened by means of ropes to the pins driven into the ground and thus spread out slantingly. Hence also it must in all directions have been longer than the linen covering. By this supposition we also get over the other difficulty, otherwise hard to meet, that at the rear this covering hung down 11 cubits (2 cubits more than the linen covering) and thus, since the wall was only 10 cubits high, would have had one whole cubit upon the ground unless thus drawn out.[1]

(3) Above this tent covering were placed—obviously for a protection from the weather—two additional coverings; one of rams' skins dyed red (מִכְסֵה עֹרֹת אֵלִים), and over this another of porpoise skins (מִכְסֵה עֹרֹת תְּחָשִׁים; but see BADGERS SKINS). As to the dimensions of these two coverings no details are given (see below, note 1). Riehm (HWB) and others have supposed that they served the purpose only of a roofing, and were not so large as the coverings properly so-called. This, however, cannot be deduced from the expression 'covering' (מִכְסֶה) nor yet from the 'above' (מִלְמַעְלָה) of Ex. 40 19 Nu. 4 25; and all further conjectures based upon this, such as that the roof ran to a point or to a ridge, and the like, are wholly without solid foundation (see § 10 end).

In front the structure was closed in, as has already been said, not by a wall of wood and a door, but only

5. The curtains. by a curtain (AV 'hanging,' RV 'screen'; מָסָךְ, māsāk, Ex. 27 16, etc.), which like the inner covering was a textile fabric woven in four colours: white spun linen, violet purple, red purple, and scarlet. This curtain formed a single piece 10 cubits square, and was held up by five pillars of acacia wood. Whether the pillars were placed between the first boards of the longer walls, or so that the two outermost were attached to the outer corners of these walls is not stated. The pillars have copper bases and according to Ex. 26 are overlaid with gold; according to 36 37, indeed, only the capitals were so. How the curtain was fastened to these pillars is not explained. Besides the golden pegs or 'hooks' (so EV; wāwīm, Ex. 26 37), rings (EV 'fillets'; ḥăšūkīm, Ex. 27 10) are also mentioned. By these some interpreters (Ewald, Dillmann) understand rings which formed a sort of garland under the capitals and thus served for ornament. Others (e.g. Riehm) explain them as rods which connected the hooks and on which the curtain was hung. At all events the wāwīm are not nails with which the curtain was nailed up—had this been so they would have to be pulled out every time the tabernacle was moved—but hooks to which the curtain was fastened somehow, with rings or otherwise.

[1] Holzinger (ad loc.) will have it that the cords and pins belonged to the upper coverings. In that case we should have to think of these as having been very large. The circumstance, however, that the hair-covering is actually called the tent ('ōhel; see above) permits the inference that just as in its material it resembled an ordinary tent, so also in its use it is thought of as such—that is to say was spread like an ordinary tent. [Kennedy, on the other hand, finds the 'cords' mentioned only in the latest strata of P, and thinks the hair-covering was pinned to the ground all round after the manner of the Ka'ba at Mecca.]

From this outer curtain the inner, by which the structure is divided into two parts, is distinguished only by its greater elaboration; the materials are the same, but, over and above, it is adorned with cherubim, the work of the skilled workman. The four pillars by which this inner curtain is supported, are of acacia wood completely overlaid with gold, and have silver bases, in this respect differing from the pillars of the outer apartment, which have bases of brass only, and only the capitals overlaid with gold. This inner curtain has its place directly underneath the row of clasps which fasten the two portions of the linen covering together, and thus is 10 cubits distant from the hinder wall. It divides the entire space into two apartments, the outer and larger being 20 cubits long and the inner only half as much, having thus the form of a cube of 10 cubits.

Nothing is said as to how this curtain is hung upon the golden nails. The curtain bears the designation of pārōketh (פָּרֹכֶת, Ex. 26 31, AV 'vail,' RV 'veil') or pārōketh hammāsāk (פָּרֹכֶת הַמָּסָךְ; Ex. 35 12 39 34 40 21 Nu. 4 5, AV 'the vail of the covering,' RV 'the veil of the screen'). The meaning of the word (𝔊 καταπέτασμα, Vg. velum) is uncertain. It is generally explained as 'parting,' 'separation.' More probably it is an original terminus technicus used in connection with worship, and denotes the boundary of the cella of a sanctuary (see below, and cp Ges.-Bu. and BDB, s.v. פרך, ii. also Dillmann, ad loc.; WRS, Journ. Phil. 13 283; Halévy, Mél. 187).

The outer and larger apartment was 'the Holy' (haḳḳōdeš, Ex. 26 33, EV 'the holy place'), the inner 'the Holy of Holies' (ḳōdeš haḳḳŏdāšīm, Ex. 26 33, EV 'the most holy'). The latter could be entered only once in the year on the great day of atonement, and that by the high priest alone (Lev. 16 2 ff.); the former was accessible to the priests only, in the discharge of their sacred duties.

The sanctuary was surrounded by an enclosed court 100 cubits long and 50 broad (Ex. 27 9-19 38 10-20).

6. The court. The enclosure was by means of curtains (EV 'hangings, ḳĕlā'īm) of white spun linen (EV 'fine twined linen,' šēš mošzār). This curtain-wall which was 5 cubits high was supported by pillars of wood; whether of acacia is not stated, but this is probably meant. The total compass of the enclosing wall was (100 + 100 + 50 + 50 =) 300 cubits. The number of pillars is given as 20 for each of the longer sides and 10 for each of the shorter. The view of the author plainly is that there were sixty pillars in all at a uniform distance from each other of 5 cubits.

The number given for the pillars on each side is obviously inexact if the total number is to be taken as 60. If we take the statement quite literally and reckon all the pillars on each side, then on the given data we get a total of fifty-six pillars only, for of course each corner pillar is counted twice—once as part of the longer side and again as part of the shorter. It is in this way that Lund, Bähr, Winer and others view the matter. It is not very probable, however; for in that case the distances of the pillars from one another on the shorter sides ($\frac{50}{9}$ cubits) would not be the same as those on the longer ($\frac{100}{19}$ cubits). For this reason other interpreters prefer to think that the describer in giving his figures for each side did not count the last pillar in each row (so Keil, Dillmann, Riehm, Nowack and others). This doubtless would be in itself quite possible if it did not so happen that we are able to reckon exactly with regard to one side—the eastern with the entrance—that it actually had only ten pillars, neither more nor fewer. For this side had in the middle four pillars which carried the curtain of the door, and if we are to assume symmetry at all in the structure, the door must have been in the middle, and thus to right and left there must have been an equal number of pillars—namely three, as is expressly stated in Ex. 27 14 f. Thus we shall doubtless be justified in assuming that the author has allowed himself to be guided simply by his scheme according to which the proportion of 2 : 1 is applied to the whole structure without caring very minutely about details.

Each pillar has a base of bronze and a capital overlaid with silver. The diminution in the value of the materials in proportion to the distance from the Holy of Holies is noteworthy. The curtains are fastened in their places by means of silver nails which here also, doubtless served as hooks for hanging (38 17 27 17). In the same connection mention is made also of silver ḥăšūḳīm).

The meaning of the word חֲשׁוּקִים is disputed. Many understand by it silver bars, or bars of wood overlaid with silver, which reached from one pillar capital to another and rested upon silver nails, and to them the curtains were attached either directly or by means of rings (so Lund, Keil, Riehm, Knobel, and others). According to Ex. 38 17 19, however, the ḥăšūḳīm seem to have been integral parts of the pillars themselves, and the expression mĕḥuššāḳīm késeph (מְחֻשָּׁקִים כֶּסֶף; Ex. 27 17 38 17, EV, 'filleted with silver,' can hardly mean 'fastened with silver crossbars.' Other interpreters therefore (such as Ewald, Dillmann, Kautzsch, Nowack, Kennedy) understand by the expression 'rings' or fillets which surrounded the pillars above, probably at the base of the capitals (𝔊 ψαλίδες, explained by Hesychius as ἁψῖδες τῶν στύλων; Tg. כִּיבּוּשׁ, a lacing or garland).

The E. front differed from the other sides (Ex. 27 13 f.). From each corner only 15 cubits were provided with an enclosing curtain, in each case having three pillars. The middle space of twenty cubits was left open for the entrance and had a special curtain of violet purple and red purple; scarlet and white linen in embroidered work (and thus exactly like the curtain at the entrance of the tabernacle itself) which was attached to four pillars.[1]

In connection with this enclosure of the court of the tabernacle, finally, are mentioned also tent-pins of brass and cords (Ex. 27 19 35 18 30 20 31 39 40, etc.). Here also we see accordingly that the bases of the pillars are not designed for fixing them into the ground but that the pillars are kept in position by pegs and ropes which of course are applied on both sides. On another view (Riehm, Nowack, and others), these ropes and pegs held the curtain itself taut and therefore close to the ground.

As for the position of the structure, the miškān, within the court we learn that the orientation of the whole was eastward. As the altar of burnt offering stood to the E. of the tabernacle and thus the most characteristic acts of worship, the sacrifices, were performed here whilst the space behind the tabernacle to the W. was set apart for no special purpose, we must suppose that the structure was not in the middle but stood more to the W. On this point we may take it that Philo (Vit. Mos. 3 7) hit upon the right conjecture when he supposed that the front of the tabernacle was 50 cubits from the enclosing wall facing it, thus giving a free space of 50 cubits square before the tabernacle.

According to P the portable sanctuary possessed already in the times before the settlement in Palestine the following sacred vessels:—

7. The furniture.

(1) In the Holy of Holies stood the ark of the covenant (אֲרוֹן הָעֵדוּת, 'ărōn hā 'ēdūth) with the mercy seat (כַּפֹּרֶת, kappōreth) and the cherubim. See ARK, MERCY SEAT, CHERUB.

(2) 'The Holy place' contained the table of shewbread, the golden candlestick and the altar of incense. The table of shewbread according to Ex. 26 35 stood on the N. side, and to it belonged various golden dishes (EV 'chargers,' ḳĕ'ārōth, Nu. 7 13 ff.) and bowls (EV 'spoons,' kappōth, Ex. 25 29 Nu. 7 14 ff.), pots or cups (AV 'covers, RV 'flagons,' ḳĕšōth) for the wine, and libation 'bowls' (so EV) for the wine offerings (mĕnakḳiyyōth, Ex. 25 23 ff. 37 19 ff.). For further details as to the table, see ALTAR, § 9, col. 126. Opposite the table, on the S. side of the sanctuary, stood the seven-branched golden candlestick (EV 'candlestick of pure gold,' mĕnōrath hazzā'āb ṭāhōr, Ex. 25 31 2 Ch. 13 11, or hammĕnōrāh haṭṭĕhōrāh [EV 'the pure candlestick'], Ex. 31 8 39 37 Lev. 24 4; see CANDLESTICK). As vessels pertaining to the candlestick are mentioned the snuffers (EV 'snuffdishes,' melḳāḥáyim) and little pans (EV 'censers'; maḥtōth), on which, according to some interpreters (Dillmann, Knobel, and others), lay the snuffers; according to others (Nowack, etc.) snuff dishes are meant (cp Ex. 25 31 ff. 37 17 ff.). On the form of the candlestick, see CANDLESTICK; on the custom of burning a light in the sanctuary, cp LAMP, and see TEMPLE, § 17. Between the shewbread table and the candlestick, facing the entrance and pretty far back, near the curtain shutting off the Holy of Holies stood the altar of incense (Ex. 30 1 [EV 'an altar to burn incense upon'], mizbaḥ miḳṭar ḳĕṭóreth, m.ḳ. hassammīm, Lev. 4 7 [EV 'the altar of sweet incense'], or mizbaḥ hazzāhāb, Ex. 39 38 [EV 'the golden altar']), with regard to which, and its absence from the older strata of P, see ALTAR, § 9.

(3) In the court stood 'the altar' κατ' ἐξοχήν (הַמִּזְבֵּחַ, hammizbēăḥ, Ex. 27 1 30 18 40 7, etc.), 'the altar of burnt offering' (mizbaḥ hā'ōlāh, Ex. 30 28 31 9, etc.) or 'the brazen altar' (mizbaḥ nĕḥóšeth, Ex. 38 30 39 39), on which see ALTAR, § 9 a; TEMPLE, § 18; and cp below, § 10). To the altar of burnt offering belonged a multitude of accessories: ash pans (AV 'pans,' RV 'pots,' sīrōth), 'shovels' (EV, yā'īm) for clearing the altar, bowls (EV 'basons,' mizrāḳōth) for sprinkling the blood, forks (EV 'fleshhooks,' mizlāgōth) for the sacrificial flesh, various sorts of 'firepans' (maḥtōth). The vessels, like the altar itself, were all of brass (Ex. 21 1 ff. 38 1 ff.), as also was the other main object in the court, the laver, used by the priests for washing their hands and feet; see SEA, BRAZEN.

As already mentioned above and as set forth fully under TEMPLE (§ 1 f.), the tabernacle, like all the sanctuaries of the Semites, has in the first instance the meaning not of a meeting-place for the community or congregation, but of a dwelling-place of the deity.

8. Significance of tabernacle in P.

It is the place where Yahwè dwells in the midst of his people (Ex. 25 8 29 45 f. Lev. 17 4 Nu. 16 9, etc.). When the tent is finished the cloud of Yahwè overshadows it and the glory (כָּבוֹד, kābōd) of Yahwè fills it; by day Yahwè's pillar of cloud and by night his pillar of fire overhangs it (Ex. 40 37 ff.). Thenceforward it is invariably from the holy of holies that Yahwè speaks to Moses. More precisely, the kappōreth (see MERCY SEAT) of the ark, beneath the cherubim, is the place where Yahwè establishes his abode. It is from here that Moses hears the voice of Yahwè (Nu. 7 89).

As Yahwè's dwelling-place the tabernacle naturally becomes also the place where he is worshipped, for the deity is worshipped in the place where he is (see TEMPLE; cp Ex. 27 42 Lev. 1 35); and, in point of fact, for P the tabernacle is the only legitimate place of worship. This follows inevitably from his standpoint throughout; for him it is a self-evident proposition that sacrifice can be offered and Yahwè approached only at the place where Yahwè has his abode. So much so that it is not found necessary in P expressly to say so; the centralisation of the worship is for him simply taken for granted.

Nor is the tabernacle in P the centre of the worship merely; it lies also at the foundation of the entire theocracy as the indispensable basis without which all else would simply hang in the air. The instructions regarding it constitute the main contents of the divine revelation at Sinai. Until it has come into existence the whole organisation of the rest of the divine commonwealth must remain in abeyance. In this respect there is an element of truth in the symbolical interpretation of many writers (such as Keil), that the tabernacle symbolises the kingdom of God, is the centre of the theocracy where the calling of Israel to be the people of God is realised. Its importance in this respect—as centre of the entire theocracy—finds its visible expression in the fact that in P the position assigned to it is exactly in the centre of the camp and of the people. The order of encampment detailed in Nu. 2 starts from the tabernacle, immediately around which are placed the Levites as a sort of bodyguard; then to the E. the tribes of Judah, Issachar, Zebulun pitch their camp; to the S. Reuben, Simeon, Gad; to the W. Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin; to the N., Dan,

[1] Here also, as in what is said as to the total number of pillars (see above), one observes that the author has not counted, or let us say drawn his plan, with exactness. He has simply assumed a regular interval of 5 cubits between the pillars, thus giving 20 cubits for 4, 15 cubits for 3. But this does not work out; the end pillar is forgotten. The whole side requires eleven pillars when such an interval is assumed; for the door five ought to have been reckoned or at any rate for each side of it to right and left four pillars. If we are to calculate with precision from the data he supplies, we shall have to reckon the distance from pillar to pillar of the doorway as $\frac{20}{3} = 6\frac{2}{3}$ cubits and that between the pillars at each side of the doorway as 5 cubits. [Cp Kennedy, Hastings' BD 4 657 b.]

Asher, Naphtali. This too gives the order on the march. Cp CAMP, § 2.

In this attribute as Yahwè's dwelling-place the whole arrangement of the tabernacle finds a ready explanation in so far as this is not to be found simply in its character as a portable sanctuary.

9. Symbolism.

The innermost chamber is the dwelling-place proper of the deity, the holiest part of the entire structure. Next come the holy place and the outer court in descending degrees of holiness, answering to the degrees of holiness attaching to high priest, priests, and laity in Israel, and to their respective rights of access to Yahwè. The holy of holies can be entered by the high priest alone, and that only once a year; the holy place is for the priesthood and the court for the people. This gradation of holiness finds expression also, as already said, in the material equipment: in the holy of holies everything is of gold; nought save the bases of the boards resting on the ground—though here an exception cannot well be justified—and the bases of the pillars which support the dividing veil and which perhaps stand rather in the holy place than in the holy of holies, is of silver. In the holy place only the furniture, and particularly those pieces which stand in the neighbourhood of the holy of holies—table of shewbread, altar of incense, candlestick—are provided with 'fine gold'; elsewhere it is simply ordinary gold that is used. The exterior pillars of the entrance-curtain, which doubtless are reckoned as belonging to the court, have but brazen bases. Similarly in the court itself we find brass only, save for the silver used in the nails and capitals of the pillars. In like manner the clasps of the goat-hair covering are of brass, whilst those of the inner covering are of gold. The interior covering which covers also the holy of holies, and the vail of the holy of holies are the workmanship of cunning workmen out of the four costly materials enumerated, with figured cherubim; the curtain at the door of the holy place is without cherubim and the curtains of the court are simply of white linen.

With these simple ideas, however, which find expression in the equipment of the tabernacle in the manner just indicated, the whole symbolism of the structure is by no means exhausted. A symbolical interpretation of the tabernacle that reaches much further is of ancient date. We find it already in Josephus (Ant. iii. 7 7) and Philo (De vit. Mos. 3 147 ff.), who interpret the tabernacle as an image of the universe; the holy of holies inaccessible to men is for them a figure of heaven, the holy place and the court represent the ocean, the four materials out of which the coverings and curtains were woven denote the four elements, the table of shewbread with its twelve loaves is the year with its twelve months, and so forth. And from their time onwards symbolical interpretation of this kind has persisted from century to century down to our own time. In the Christian church the typological view made its appearance very soon; cp Justin Martyr, Cohort. ad gent. 29; Clem. Alex. Strom. 562 ff.; Origen, Hom. 9 in Exod.; Theod. Mops. ad Hebr. 9 1; Athanasius, 'Orat. in assumt. Christi,' op. 25, col. 1686; Theodoret, Quæst. 60 in Exod.; Jerome, ep. 64 9 19 ff. ad Fabiolam. In modern times Bähr, Friedrich, Hengstenberg, Keil, Kurtz, Riehm have exercised great acumen upon the symbolical interpretation of the tabernacle and in particular upon the symbolism of the numbers and dimensions (the number 4 signifying the cosmos, 10 completeness and perfection), as also upon the significance of the colours of the coverings, and so forth. All such interpretations, however, are wanting in any solid basis in the OT; nowhere does the author hint even in the remotest way that behind these externalities he is searching for deeper thoughts. It is hardly worth while therefore to discuss the various attempted interpretations in any detail.

Can we now regard the structure thus described in P as historical? Very great difficulties confront us in the endeavour to do so, quite apart from the fact that the description occurs only in P, the latest source of the Pentateuch. They have long been urged—by Voltaire for example—and may be summed up under the following four heads:—(1) the imaginative character of the account itself; (2) the physical impossibility of such a structure in the wilderness; (3) the inconsistency with the older Pentateuch sources; (4) the want of evidence for any such tabernacle during historical times.

10. Unhistorical character of record.

(1) The description itself from the outset presents great difficulties, and raises in the mind of the reader the question whether any such structure can ever have really existed. It has already been pointed out how in stating the number of the pillars of the court the narrator is plainly not describing something of which he has any clear picture in his mind's eye, not calculating and planning with practical preciseness, but only filling in figures according to a scheme of his own. Yet another point has also been noted already—that the fabric bears indeed the name of 'tent' and the author takes great trouble to produce in the reader's mind the impression that the sanctuary was such in reality, but in this effort has succeeded (and could have succeeded) but ill. Beams some 21 inches thick and 2 ft. 6 in. wide cannot be fastened together so as to form a massive wall by means of mere tent pins, and they are purposeless if they are intended merely as supports for a light textile fabric. It is perfectly evident that the model for this structure was not supplied by a bedouin tent, a dwelling place made of (goats') hair, of which the essential part, the roof, is spread upon three rows of poles, usually three in each row, 5 or 6 ft. high and closed behind by a similar fabric of hair (see TENT). On the contrary, the model was quite clearly a solid house rendered portable only by the expedient of breaking up the walls into separate beams. In this respect the whole structure becomes a huge anachronism when regarded as the workmanship of nomad hordes.

This becomes specially prominent in the description of the altar. In view of the ancient practice of building altars of stone (Ex. 20 24 ff.) one reasonably asks how the narrator could have arrived at an altar of brass, and then one remembers that the temple of Solomon also had such an altar. That this latter was the real model for the altar of the tabernacle becomes still clearer from another point of view. The altar of the tabernacle is of acacia wood plated with brass, a construction which in itself considered must be characterised as utterly senseless if the explanation were not so manifest; the altar of Solomon must remain as it is, a brazen altar: but it must be made portable.

A further detail may be singled out in this connection: the whole fabric is internally pitch dark. The walls have no windows nor openings of any kind; the roof in like manner is unpierced. This may serve well enough in the holy of holies; the Holy of Holies in the temple was also quite dark (see TEMPLE, § 7); but in the holy place it is impossible; there the priests had their priestly duties to discharge—arrange the shewbread, offer incense, and the like. And it will not do to call attention to the seven-branched golden candlestick (see CANDLESTICK, § 1).

Finally, there is the fundamental question: Is a structure of this kind capable of standing at all? Simply as a technical question of architecture (see Schick, as below, § 14) this must be pronounced utterly impossible. Nor is the reason difficult to perceive. The weight of the heavy coverings and above all the pressure brought to bear by the spreading of the tent-covering by means of cords and pegs, must necessarily tend to make the walls lean inwards. No opposing pressure is anywhere present. Even if we suppose that the bars connected the side walls with the rear wall, only the boards of the side walls that were nearest the rear wall were thus supported; but in any case it was impossible that weak bars should support the entire wall, 30 cubits long, formed as it was of heavy beams. For this reason, and in order to relieve the walls of the weight of the coverings, Schick finds it to be absolutely indispensable to provide the tabernacle with a sloping roof. This he obtains by changing the middle bar into a ridge-pole, following the English architectural authority Fergusson, who first propounded this theory in the article 'Temple' in Smith's DB (1863). Such a construction, however, flatly contradicts the clear tenor of the text. The text knows nothing of such a sloping or pointed roof—which, furthermore, would be wholly inconsistent with the idea of a bedouin tent.

(2) Over and above the inherent impossibility of any such structure, account must be taken of the incidental impossibility of constructing and transporting such a fabric in the wilderness. The contrast between this sumptuous fabric—made of the costliest materials of the best workmanship in wood and in metals which the East could command—and the soil on which it is raised, the bare wilderness; the contrast too between this tabernacle and the people amongst whom it stands—primitive uncivilised nomads—is too great not to have excited doubts from a very early date as to the authenticity of the account. They were raised by Voltaire, and Colenso and Nowack (see below, § 14) have elaborately shown the impossibilities involved. First of all comes the difficulty as to the materials. According to Ex. 38 27 no fewer than 29 talents 730 shekels of gold, 100 talents 1775 shekels of silver and 70 talents 1400 shekels of copper are employed. To see what these figures mean, let the reader turn to the articles WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, SHEKEL. The amounts in themselves are not very great when compared with those which were applied in the great Babylonian sanctuaries; but for wilderness nomads, poor to beggary as regards gold and silver, they are impossible. It is indeed replied to this that the gold is simply the gold which had been obtained from the Egyptians; but such an answer becomes impossible in the case of the timber. Where on Sinai the cypresses grew from which beams over 17 ft. long, 2 ft. 7 in. wide, and 20 in. thick could be obtained no one has yet been able to say.[1] The working of the timber, moreover, presupposes a knowledge of arts which nomads do not possess; that Israel did not in point of fact possess this knowledge is clearly shown by the fact that even a Solomon had to go to Phœnicia for his temple and workmen. A word may be added as to the difficulties of transport. Four waggons with six oxen apiece are assigned to the Merarites for this, while each of the 48 beams weighs more than 10 cwt.

11. Impossible in the wilderness.

(3) Decisive on the question, finally, ought to be the observation, that the older sources of the Pentateuch, J and E, know nothing of a tabernacle of this sort. Not only is there no mention of this central sanctuary, but E in point of fact has a quite different sacred tent which completely excludes any possibility of the tabernacle of P.

12. The sacred tent in E.

The tabernacle of E is a tent which Moses pitched outside the camp (Ex. 33 7 ff.) and where Yahwè was wont to reveal himself to him in the pillar of cloud which descended for the purpose and stood at the door (Nu. 11 25 12 5 14 10); it is on this account called 'ōhel mō'ēd, 'the tent of tryst.' No description of it is given, nor is its origin spoken of; but part of the old narrative has obviously been lost before Ex. 33 7, in which what is now lacking was probably explained. It appears, however, that it was very different from the tabernacle described by the priestly narrator. It was not in the centre of the camp but stood some distance outside it, and it was not the seat of an elaborate organisation of priests and guarded by a host of Levites, but had a single minister and custodian—viz., Joshua, who was not a Levite at all but Moses' attendant (Ex. 33 11).

The existence of such a simple tent-sanctuary presents none of the difficulties that beset the priestly narrative. Portable shrines were familiar to Semitic antiquity, and tents as sanctuaries were known to the Israelites in much later times at the high places and in connection with irregular worships[2] (see TENT). Such idolatrous tabernacles were probably relics of the usages of the nomadic Semites, and it is only natural that Israel in its wanderings should have had the like. And it is noteworthy that the portable chapels of the heathen Semites were mainly used for divination (cp Journ. of Phil., 13 283 f.), just as the Mosaic tabernacle is described by the Elohist, not as a place of sacrifice (such as the tabernacle of the Priestly Code is) but as a place of oracle.

The heathen shrines of this sort contained portable idols or baetylia (see Selden, De Diis Syris, 16); but what the Mosaic tabernacle contained is not expressly stated. The ordinary, and at first sight the easiest, assumption is that the ark stood in it. But neither in Deuteronomy nor before it, are the ark and the tabernacle ever mentioned together, and of the two old narrators it is not clear that the Yahwist ever mentions the tabernacle or the Elohist the ark. The relation between the two calls for further investigation, especially as the ark retains its importance after the occupation of Canaan, whilst the 'tent of tryst' is not mentioned after the time of Moses, who, according to the Elohist (Ex. 12), enjoyed at it a privilege of direct access to the Deity not accorded to later prophets (cp also ARK OF COVENANT).

(4) Lastly, the whole historical tradition from the period immediately following the settlement down to the date of the building of Solomon's temple has no knowlege of any tabernacle.

13. The tabernacle non-existent in historical times.

True, apologists like Keil have succeeded in writing to their own satisfaction its complete history throughout the period of the judges and the first kings: at one time it was at Shiloh, at another at Nob, finally at Gibeon, whence it was removed to the temple. The Chronicler has indeed much to tell about it, proceeding as he does on the—to him self-evident—assumption that in every case where the older books made mention of sacrifice at all this must have been at the tabernacle (1 Ch. 16 39 21 29 2 Ch. 1 3 5 5). The older historical books, however (with exceptions to be mentioned immediately), know nothing of it. 1 K. 3 1 ff., in explicit contradiction of 2 Ch. 1 3, states that Solomon sacrificed on the great high place of Gibeon and excuses this proceeding, which from the redactor's point of view of course seemed illegal, on the ground that the temple was not yet in existence. But no temple was required for the purpose if the tabernacle was then at Gibeon. The sanctuary at Shiloh, on the other hand, was not a tent at all but a solid house EV 'temple of the Lord,' (הֵיכַל יהוה, hēkal Yahwè, 1 S. 1 9 3 3), with mĕzūzōth (AV 'door posts,' RV 'side posts') and dĕlāthōth (EV 'doors'); cp especially Jer. 7 12 ff. Moreover, the ark is spoken of in 1 S. 4-6 in such a manner as shows that there was no fixed place where it was kept, and thus no Tabernacle. After it has been recovered from the Philistines, for example, it does not come to its proper house but first to Beth-shemesh and next to Kirjath-jearim, to the house of a private individual, where it remains for years. Thence it is fetched by David, who, however, after the disaster to Uzzah brings it into the house of one of his generals, and that too a gentile, Obed-edom of Gath (2 S. 7). Not till later does he transfer it to his own city, where he sets up a tent for its reception plainly in remembrance of the fact that the ark had formerly also been so housed. This tent was in time removed by Solomon to the temple (1 K. 8 4), for if these verses are old and belong to the context it is only this tent that can be understood by the 'ōhel mō'ēd (more probably, however, the statement is of a later date; see Benzinger ad loc.). Thus the only remaining passage will be 1 S. 2 22, a passage which is already open to critical doubt owing to its absence from 𝔊. From all that has been urged we may safely conclude that the tabernacle of P is simply the temple of Solomon carried back into the older time by priestly fancy and modified accordingly. It was not the temple that was built on the model of the tabernacle; it was the tabernacle that took its shape, character, and importance for worship and the theocracy from the temple.

I. B.

TABERNACLES, FEAST OF. The Israelitic cycle of festivals came to a close, in autumn, with the feast of Tabernacles.

1. Agricultural character.

In the old legislation (Ex. 34 22 23 16) it is called ḥag hā'āsīph (חַג הָאָסִיף), 'the feast of ingathering,' and is to be celebrated 'at the turn of the year' (תְּקוּפַת הַשָּׁנָה). The very name shows quite clearly that the festival in its essential meaning is agricultural, a harvest feast; it is the autumn thanksgiving which no doubt has reference primarily to the fruit harvest and the vintage, but from the outset was regarded as the great thanksgiving for the whole produce of the year.

Hence the general expressions 'when thou gatherest in the produce of thy field' (Ex. 23 16, בְּאָסְפְּךָ אֶת־מַעֲשֶׂיךָ מִן־הַשָּׂדֶה), 'when thou gatherest in from thy threshing-floor and from thy press' (Deut. 16 13, בְּאָסְפְּךָ מִגָּרְנְךָ וּמִיִּקְבֶךָ).

Like the other harvest feasts, it is intimately connected with the possession of the land of Canaan, and was celebrated for the first time there by the Israelites, who in all probability took it over from the Canaanites. It is with regard to the autumn festival specially that our information as to its having been a Canaanite festival is explicit; of the people of Shechem we are told that they went out into the field, gathered their vineyards, trode the grapes, and held festival and went into the house of their god and did eat and drink (Judg. 9 27). Cp also FEASTS, § 4.

As the closing harvest thanksgiving, and probably the oldest of the three feasts of harvest (see PASSOVER, § 4; PENTECOST, § 6), the autumn festival excels both the other great annual festivals (ḥaggīm, חַגִּים) of the Israelites in importance.

2. The most important of the yearly festivals.

In the law of JE, it is true, all three are already found on the same plane as equally necessary and equally important; for all of them attendance at the sanctuary is enjoined (Ex. 34 22 23 16). Yet how great was the special importance assigned in practice to the autumn festival as compared with the others appears at once in its very designation as 'the feast' (הֶחָג, heḥāg) or 'the feast of Yahwè' (חַג יהוה, ḥag Yahwè) κατ' ἐξοχήν (1 K. 8 2 12 32 Judg. 21 19; and even as late as Lev. 23 39 41 Ezek. 45 25 Neh. 8 14). Even in Zechariah (14 16 ff.) it is to the feast of tabernacles that the remnant of the heathen go up year by year to Jerusalem to worship the King, Yahwè Ṣĕbā'ōth. In these circumstances it cannot be regarded as merely accidental that the feast of tabernacles and the feast of tabernacles alone is more than once mentioned in the historical books when dealing with the more ancient period, and its celebration thus attested from the earliest period after the settlement in Canaan. At Shiloh, for example, the maidens celebrate it by going forth to dance in the orchards and vineyards (Judg. 21 16).[1] So also we learn from the story of Samuel that in wide circles it was customary year by year at the 'revolution of the days' (לִתְקֻפוֹת הַיָּמִים, 1 S. 1 20; cp the same expression in Ex. 34 22) to go in pilgrimage with the whole family to the sanctuary at Shiloh, and there to sacrifice to Yahwè and hold a joyous sacrificial meal (1 S. 1 3 ff.). The high importance attached to the festival is shown also in the fact that Solomon dedicates his temple at the same date (1 K. 8 2 65, cp 2 Ch. 7 8 ff.; on the passage cp also below, § 3). Answering to the yearly observance of this feast at Jerusalem, Jeroboam, according to a thoroughly trustworthy statement in 1 K. 12 32[1] (cp Benzinger, ad loc.) instituted a similar solemnity in the northern kingdom; here the only error of the author is in supposing (from his Deuteronomistic point of view) that before Jeroboam's time such a feast was observed only at the temple of Jerusalem, and not also at the sanctuaries of the northern kingdom. Pilgrimages of the same sort as those to Shiloh were in use also in other parts of the country to the various famous sanctuaries. The passages just cited show also at the same time that this autumn festival from the very beginning was celebrated in common by wide circles of participants. This does not seem to have been the case in the olden time with the two other harvest feasts; if observed at all, it was enough that they should be observed in quite small local circles; at least the complete silence of the historical books on the subject would be most easily explained in this way. The special importance of the feast of tabernacles continues to show itself in the Deuteronomic legislation. In contrast to what is required at the two other ḥaggīm, it is enjoined that all the days of this festival are to be observed at the central sanctuary in Jerusalem (Dt. 16 15; cp v. 7).

In the older legislation no more precise details than those already indicated are given as to how and where the feast ought to be observed.

3. Original manner of celebration.

Elsewhere (FEASTS, § 10) it is shown that the olden time had no thought at all of fixing the three harvest festivals to any definite day. This lies in the nature of the case. The great autumn thanksgiving was held as soon as the corn-harvest, vintage, and ingathering were finished. This happened, of course, in the various districts, and in different years, at different dates. In the hill-country around Jerusalem the feast was held of old in the eighth month. The completion of the temple was in the month of Būl, the eighth month, and its dedication was at the time of the autumn festival (1 K. 6 38; cp 8 2).[2] It is evidently in order to bring it into accordance with the Jerusalem date of the feast on the fifteenth of the month that the autumn festival at Bethel was fixed for the same day by Jeroboam (1 K. 12 32).

For the observance of the festival the offering of gifts from the fruits that had been gathered and of animal sacrifices accompanied by a sacrificial meal were matters of course (cp 1 S. 1 3 ff.). In the olden time the gifts and offerings were left to the freewill of the worshipper according as his heart impelled him to show his thanks to Yahwè (cp TAXATION, § 8). So also it is matter of course that the feast was observed as a joyous occasion.

[1] The narratives in Judg. 19-21 are certainly in their present form late Midrash. Yet there need not be on that account any doubt as to the accuracy of this statement or of many other touches preserved in them See DANCE, § 6, and cp further, Budde, ad loc.

[1] [See also SHECHEM, and cp Crit. Bib.]

[2] In the present text of 1 K. 8 2 it is indeed said that the dedication was 'at the feast in the month Ēthānīm, which is the seventh month.' To reconcile this date with 1 K. 6 38, according to which the temple was finished in the eighth month, it would be necessary to suppose that after its completion the dedication of the temple was put off till the seventh month of the following year—that is to say, for eleven months. This is in the highest degree unlikely. Since, moreover, we learn from 1 K. 12 32 that at that period the festival was observed at Jerusalem in the eighth month, we must suppose the original text of 1 K. 8 2 to have read merely 'at the feast.' The name of the month Ēthānīm is a later insertion easily explained by the consideration that, on the one hand, the fixed tradition was that the temple had been dedicated at the feast of tabernacles, and, on the other hand, that this feast, at a later date, but before that of Deuteronomy (§ 4), had been assigned to this month. The explanation of the name of the month—'which is the seventh month'—is the addition of a still later hand, as is shown by its position; it is also wanting in 𝔊BL [𝔊A has a curious reading αὐτὸς ὁ μὴν ἑβδομηκοστὸς ἕβδομος]. Cp further, Benzinger, ad loc.

Compare what we read of the feast of the Shechemites (Judg. 9 27) or of the dances of the maidens (cp DANCE, § 6) at the feast of Shiloh (Judg. 21 19 ff.).

When, then, in Dt. the feast is for the first time designated (in our present texts) as the 'feast of tabernacles' (Dt. 16 13; see below, § 4) and the priestly law (Lev. 23 42) expressly enjoins living in booths as part of the ritual of its celebration, or when the Law of Holiness (Lev. 23 40) orders the participants to take 'the fruit of goodly trees, branches of palm trees,' and the like, we may be perfectly certain that these are not newly invented innovations, but that very ancient custom lay at the foundation of the practices thus prescribed. The living in booths and the name 'feast of tabernacles' or 'booths' are connected with the simple fact that at the time of the olive and grape harvest it was usual to spend days and nights in booths of this kind—a practice which still holds its ground in those parts (see Robinson, BR 2 717; cp Is. 1 8).[1] If these booths at a later date found a recognised place in the official ritual of the feast, this shows that, properly speaking, all these days of harvesting during which people lived in the open under booths were regarded as constituting a festal time, which was brought to a close in, let us say, the pilgrimage to the sanctuary. With this also we may connect the precept in Dt. (see below) to observe the feast for seven whole days at the sanctuary. The other injunction, referred to above, to furnish oneself with fruits of goodly trees, branches of palm trees, and so forth (if the reference be not simply to the branches needed for making the booths; see below) we may perhaps connect with what we read of the festal dances in Judg. 21 19 ff. It would be natural for those who took part in these to adorn themselves with sprigs and garlands.

4. In Dt.

In its festal legislation Dt. (16 13-15), as already remarked, designates the autumn festival by the name of ḥag has-sukkōth (חַג הַסֻּכּוֹת), 'feast of tabernacles' or 'booths'—a designation which, although not employed either in H or in P (see below, §§ 5, 6), it continued to retain.[2] As has already been said, it was not to any change in the significance of the festival or to any new ritual that this new designation was due; if Dt. had intended to introduce something that was new when it spoke of the celebration under booths, this piece of ritual would have been expressly prescribed. On the contrary, Dt. simply assumes both name and thing to be already familiar; thus the name also was already in use before the time of Dt. The duration of the feast is fixed at seven days, and in fact all the seven have to be observed at the sanctuary in Jerusalem (see above, § 3). The joyous character of the feast is also thoroughly preserved in Dt., as well as the idea of its being a harvest feast; and, in full agreement with the general spirit of solicitude shown in the Deuteronomic law for the welfare of the poor and the like, it is expressly enjoined that the bondman and the widow are all to take joyful part in the celebration (16 14).

[1] For evidence of the ancient practice of spending the festival under booths we cannot with confidence appeal to Hos. 12 10 [9]. The expression there made use of—מוֹעֵד, mō'ēd, instead of חַג, ḥag—is quite unusual. Still less suitable, it is true, is the interpretation which (so Wellhausen) refers it to the passover feast. In no other place do we read anything of a dwelling in tents during that feast. In the prophetic threatening 'I will yet again make thee to dwell in tents, as in the days of the (מוֹעֵד) solemn feast' no reference to any joyous festival, merely a reference to the wandering in the wilderness is required by the connection. Hence Kautzsch's rendering 'as in the day of the assembly [at Horeb]' seems the best. If the prophet is really intending the feast of tabernacles in this allusion, we shall then have our first distinct trace of an assumed parallel and connection between this 'dwelling in booths' at the feast of tabernacles and the dwelling in tents in the wilderness at the exodus from Egypt. Cp further, Wellhausen and Nowack, ad loc.

[2] In the NT and in Josephus it is accordingly spoken of as σκηνοπηγία, in 𝔊 as ἑορτὴ σκηνῶν, in Vg. as scenopagia, and in Philo (2 297) as σκηναί.

TABERNACLES, FEAST OF

It is shown elsewhere (FEASTS, § 10) how the centralisation of the cultus in Dt., even without any express intention on the part of the lawgiver, inevitably altered the character of the feasts. It became necessary that they should be observed at one common definitely fixed date, they lost their intimate connection with the life of the husbandman, and the tendency to change them into historical celebrations was greatly strengthened by this circumstance. No express reference to any historical event in connection with the feast of tabernacles is met with as yet in Dt. The bringing of the first-fruits at all is connected only in a quite general way with the historical fact that it is Yahwè who has delivered his people from the land of Egypt and given them the land of Canaan to possess. As thanks for the gift of the land the Israelite brings the first-fruits of its produce as a gift to Yahwè (Dt. 26 1-11). The bringing of the first-fruits enjoined in Dt. in conjunction with a liturgical formula of thanksgiving is not indeed in the law itself (Dt. 26 1-11) expressly connected with any definite time. It is, however, exceedingly natural to assume that the author of the injunction thought of it as to be carried out on the feast of tabernacles, for it deals with the offering of the first-fruits of the wine and oil-harvest as well as with the first-fruits of corn, and contemplates this as being done at Jerusalem. For this the feast of tabernacles was the convenient opportunity, unless one is to read the precept as implying a special pilgrimage to Jerusalem for the purpose. In this connection a quite general reference to the Exodus is implied for the feast of tabernacles. Lastly, in Dt. it is further laid down that every seventh year, the year of release, 'this law'—i.e., the Deuteronomic law—shall be read before all Israel at the feast of tabernacles (Dt. 31 10 ff.).

5. In Ezek. and H.

Ezekiel is the first to give to this feast—designated 'the feast' or 'the feast of Yahwè'—a definite date; it is to begin on the 15th day of the seventh month, and to last for seven days (Ezek. 45 25). He orders for it the same offerings as for the passover; every day seven bullocks and seven rams as a burnt-offering, a he-goat as a sin-offering, an ephah for every bullock and every ram, with a hin of oil to each ephah as a meal-offering. The Law of Holiness (Lev. 23 39-41) in its present form has no precept as to the offering. The date in v. 39 is hardly original.[1] On the other hand it is here prescribed that the Israelites on the first day of the feast are to take to them the fruit of goodly trees (פְּרִי עֵץ הָדָר; cp under APPLE, § 2 [3]), branches of palm trees and boughs of thick trees[2] and willows of the brook, and rejoice before Yahwè seven days. That the palm branches and the boughs are to be used for making booths is nowhere said. It is equally possible to suppose that they were carried by the participants in their hands (cp above, § 3). Such a custom is attested at any rate for the later post-exilic period (2 Macc. 10 6 ff.; Jos. Ant. iii. 10 4, § 245, xiii. 13 5, § 372). What could be the application of 'fruit of goodly trees' in the construction of booths is not easy to see, and it is more natural to suppose that the fruit formed part of the thyrsus which each participant carried in his hand (cp below, § 7).

The laws of P concerning the autumn festival are

[1] How much of Lev. 23 39 belongs to the original law of holiness is very questionable. As in what follows this verse mention is always made of only seven feast days, v. 39*b*, which speaks of an eighth day, may be presumed to be a later addition (see below, § 6). The same holds good of the time determination in v. 39*a*. The other festivals also are not yet assigned to a fixed day in H. On this question see further the various introductions, especially the tables in Holzinger.

[2] עֵץ עָבוֹת is explained by tradition as meaning 'myrtle.' Occurring as it does between 'palms' and 'willows,' the expression would certainly seem intended to denote some definite kind of tree.

TABERNACLES, FEAST OF

found in Lev. 23 33-36 42 f. Nu. 29 12-38. The name of the festival is there the same as in Dt.: feast of tabernacles or booths, ḥag has-sukkōth (חַג הַסֻּכּוֹת: Lev. 23 34). The preference of P for this designation is not a mere accident; it is intended to denote, not a part of the ritual merely, but the meaning of the entire festival; it conveys, not only that during the festival it is necessary to live in booths, but also that the festival commemorates the booths in which Israel lived at the exodus from Egypt. It is exactly to this that the peculiar usage of the feast is intended to point (Lev. 23 42 f.). The change of meaning, designed to give the feast a place in the history of redemption, has thus been fully accomplished; there is now no longer present any trace of a reference to husbandry—a reference which, indeed, is absent also from the Law of Holiness. As with all festivals in P, so also in the case of the feast of tabernacles, the chief emphasis is laid upon the public sacrifices which are offered with lavish abundance, no longer as in Dt. upon the voluntary gifts of individuals and the sacrificial meal arising from these. The public sacrifices consist, over and above the regular daily burnt-offering with the customary meal and drink-offerings, of a sin-offering of a he-goat to be offered on each of the seven days of the feast, with in addition a daily burnt-offering of two rams and fourteen lambs, and on the first day thirteen bullocks besides, on the second day twelve bullocks, and each succeeding day a bullock the less—thus, on the seventh day seven bullocks, two rams, fourteen lambs. In each case there are, of course, the appropriate meal-offerings of fine flour mingled with oil—three-tenths for every bullock and two-tenths for each of the two rams. As compared with the offerings prescribed for the other principal feasts, those here enjoined are enhanced to an extraordinary degree—in some instances being more than doubled. Thus down even to so late a date as that of P we can clearly trace the continued operation of that pre-eminent importance which attached to this feast above all the rest in the oldest times.

6. In P.

There is yet one other point in which P goes beyond Ezekiel and H; to the traditional seven days of the feast it adds yet an eighth as a closing festival, 'ăṣéreth (עֲצֶרֶת). As compared with the other seven days, this has an independent character of its own; it does not simply continue the sacrifices of the preceding days, but there are offered a he-goat as sin-offering, a bullock, a ram and seven lambs as a burnt-offering—in each case with the appropriate meal and drink-offerings, of course in addition to the regular daily burnt-offering. This day, however, as can readily be understood, is always reckoned as part of the main festival itself, and in later times it was customary to speak of an eight-days' feast (2 Macc. 10 6; Jos. Ant. iii. 10 4, § 245). This eighth day, like the first, is celebrated by a great assembly and by abstinence from every kind of work; for the intervening six days this is not demanded.

In post-exilic times, just as in pre-exilic, it is precisely of the feast of tabernacles that we most often hear; it always continued to be one of the most important festivals. Of the exiles after their return we forthwith read that when the seventh month came round they did not neglect the feast of tabernacles. And, as matter of fact, after the introduction of the law in 444 B.C., the feast was regularly observed in strict conformity with the legal prescriptions. This is expressly emphasised in Neh. 8 14 ff. It is, however, very noticeable that here the legal innovation is the revival of a custom which had passed out of use: not, as might be expected, the sacrifices, but the dwelling in booths. From this no other conclusion is possible than that this dwelling in booths was practised in the older time, not as a festal rite, but as a harvest custom. After Dt. had transferred the observance of the feast to Jerusalem, the practice had gone out of date; what had formerly been quite natural had now in the capital no meaning. When, however, the custom was brought into connection with history and judged to be a reminiscence of the tents of Israel in the wilderness, it received a new meaning which gave it fresh significance as a part of the ceremonial of the feast and recalled it to new life. From the account in Nehemiah (8 16) we learn further that in Jerusalem the booths were set upon the house roofs, in the house courts, in the courts of the temple (this last, of course, only for priests and Levites) and in the broad places of the city gates. Olive branches, branches of wild olives, myrtle branches, palm branches, and branches of thick trees (עֵץ עָבֹת, see above, § 5, n. 2) were employed for the purpose. The public reading of the book of the law, as required by Dt. (see above, § 4), was also a feature of the festival. The Chronicler's account of the feast of tabernacles at the dedication of the temple (2 Ch. 7 8 ff.) is evidence of the observance of the festival in accordance with P in the Chronicler's own time in so far as the seven days' feast of 1 K. 8 65 is altered into a feast of eight days. Finally, we read in the Maccabean period of the celebration of a feast resembling the feast of tabernacles, immediately after the purification of the temple (2 Macc. 10 6 ff.). This feast also lasts eight days; the participants carry in their hands 'wands wreathed with leaves, and fair boughs, and palms also.'

7 Later.

The custom here referred to (perhaps already an old one; see above, § 5) continued in use during the later period. The order of the feast is prescribed down to the minutest details in the Talmudic tractate entitled Sukka (cp MYRTLE). There the branches, etc., are not only used for making booths, but are also carried in the hands as the celebrants go to join in the worship. The 'fruit of goodly trees' (פְּרִי עֵץ הָדָר) was interpreted to mean the ethrōg (אֶתְרוֹג), apple of paradise, or Adam's apple, the 'ēṣ 'ābōth (עֵץ עָבוֹת) the myrtle. Accordingly, a palm branch still in its 'sceptre-like' condition, that is, not yet expanded (the so-called lūlāb, לוּלָב) was fastened up along with a myrtle and willow in such a manner that the myrtle was on the right and the willow on the left of the palm. This festal thyrsus (also called lūlāb) was held in the right hand whilst the left carried an ethrōg, and thus equipped the celebrants went in procession with hosannas and waving of thyrsi round the altar of burnt-offering, each day once, but on the seventh day seven times, to commemorate the seven days' encompassing of the walls of Jericho. Josephus calls the thyrsus (Ant. iii. 10 4, § 245) εἰρεσιώνη—which means properly the harvest wreath of olive or laurel wound round with wool and decorated with fruit which the Athenian singing boys carried about at the autumn feast of Pyanepsia. Another Greek designation employed is θύρσοι (thyrsi; 2 Macc. 10 7; Jos. Ant. xiii. 13 5, § 372), properly the Bacchic wand wreathed in ivy and vine-leaves with a fir-cone at the top which was carried by the worshippers at the feast of Dionysus. It is doubtless this whole custom that Plutarch has in his mind when he represents the Jewish feast of tabernacles as being a Dionysiac festival (Symp. 4 6: τῆς μεγίστης καὶ τελειοτάτης ἑορτῆς παρὰ Ἰουδαίοις ὁ καιρός ἐστι καὶ ὁ τρόπος Διονυσίῳ προσήκων . . . ἔστι δὲ καὶ κρατηροφορία τις ἑορτὴ καὶ θυρσοφορία παρ' αὐτοῖς, ἐν ᾗ θύρσους ἔχοντες εἰς τὸ ἱερὸν εἰσίασιν).

Another peculiar custom, with regard to the meaning and origin of which there is still great uncertainty (cp NATURE-WORSHIP, § 4), was in connection with the daily drink-offering which was offered during the seven days of the feast. For this the water was taken from Siloam. A priest drew it in a golden pitcher of a capacity of three logs, and brought it amid trumpet-blasts through the Water Gate into the outer court of the temple. There other priests received it from him with the words (Is. 12 3): 'Ye will draw water with joy from the founts of salvation,' in which words priests and people alike joined. The water was then mixed with wine, and, while the priests blew on the trumpets and the Levites chanted psalms, was poured into a silver basin standing at the south-western corner of the altar, from which it flowed by a pipe into a subterranean channel and thence to the Kidron. We may, perhaps, bring this practice into connection with the ancient custom of drawing water and pouring it out (cp 1 S. 7 6) which may possibly have been used and retained precisely at the feast. Tradition has it that abundant rain for the new seed-time and a fruitful year are symbolised in the act. In all probability the words of Jn. 7 37 f. are to be read in this connection.[1] Yet one other characteristic of the feast remains to be mentioned: the festal joy on the night between the first and the second day. In the court of the women four-branched golden candlesticks were erected and lighted up. With music, psalms, and trumpets, a torch dance was then performed by the most prominent priests and laymen. The offering of the festal sacrifices was accompanied, as in the case of the other great feasts, by trumpet-blowing by the priests, as also by the singing of the great hallēl—i.e., Pss. 113-118 (see HALLEL); when the Hosanna was reached in Ps. 118 25 the lūlābs were shaken.

Outside of Palestine the Jews observed the festival in like manner in booths. As the determination of the month's commencement and of the whole calendar connected with it depended on actual observation of the new moon, and thus was uncertain (see NEW MOON), it was customary for the Jews outside of Palestine to observe the first and eighth days of the feast twice over on consecutive days, so as to make sure of observing the common national feast quite simultaneously with their brethren in Palestine.

After the destruction of the second temple arose the custom of adding yet a ninth day—the 23rd of Tishri—to the festival, celebrated as the feast of 'the joy of the law' (שִׂמְחַת הַתּוֹרָה). On the Sabbath preceding this day the reading of the law as divided into 52 parashiyyōth or lessons in the synagogue service came to an end; on the following sabbath the reading was recommenced. 1. Physical characteristics.

[1] The words are spoken on the 'great' day of the feast—ἡ ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα ἡ μεγάλη τῆς ἑορτῆς. By this probably is meant the seventh day, on which procession was made seven times round the altar, which on this day was decorated with branches of willow. This day is in fact called by the rabbins the 'great' Hosanna day—יוֹם הוֹשַׁעְנָא רַבָּא, or also the 'willow' day—יוֹם עֲרָבָה. The eighth day, the 'ăṣéreth, is not strictly speaking to be reckoned to the feast of tabernacles; the special sacrifices and festal observances terminate on the seventh day (see above). This day, therefore, cannot be regarded as that intended in Jn. 7 37.

[2] Cp τοβιαθη (Wadd. 2155) and ταβιαθη, cited by Dussaud and Macler, Voy. Arch. 158 (Paris, 1901).

et-Ṭûr. Its dome-like shape as seen from the S. or SW. ('mira rotunditate,' Jer. OS 156 23), and its apparent isolation, make it a striking feature in the landscape of SE. Galilee. Hence it ranks with Carmel among conspicuous heights: e.g., in Jer. 46 18, and the Midrash, Ber. R., § 99, 'Tabor came from Beth-elim and Carmel from Aspamya to attend the law-giving at Sinai.' A psalmist even implies that what Hermon is on the E. of Jordan Tabor is on the W., Ps. 89 13 (but cp the commentators). It rises from the level of the Great Plain to a height of 1843 ft. (1312 ft. from the base); the summit is an extensive platform, 3000 ft. from E. to W., 1300 ft. at its greatest breadth, a peculiarity which did much to determine the associations which have gathered round the mountain.[1] Though from some aspects Tabor appears to stand alone, in reality it is a spur of the Nazareth group of heights, and is linked to them on its N. side. Its slopes, like the W. slopes of Carmel, are covered with vegetation and stunted trees, oak, ilex, terebinth, beech, carob, olive, etc., which afford cover to an unusual number of animals. From the top opens out a superb panorama, often, however, veiled with mists in the spring-time. The situation of the mountain, its imposing and prominent outline, explain at once the part which it has played in history. In all ages Tabor has been famous either for its sanctuary or for its stronghold. Commanding the NE. quarter of the Great Plain and one of the main outlets down to the Jordan, the W. esh-Sherār, it has considerable strategic value, whilst to the instinct of early religion it would seem to have been designed by nature for a holy place.

2. Sanctuary and stronghold.

The boundaries of Issachar, Zebulun, and Naphtali meet upon Tabor; Josh. 19 22 (Issachar), 12 CHISLOTH-TABOR—i.e. 'flanks of Tabor' (Zebulun), 34 'AZNOTH-TABOR—i.e. 'peaks (?) of Tabor' (Naphtali), 1 Ch. 6 62 [77] (Zebulun; 𝔊B θαχχεια). In the first and the last of these passages Tabor is the name of a town on or near the mountain. Long before the Israelite occupation Tabor was a holy place; it naturally became the common sanctuary of the three tribes whose portions met there. So we may infer from Dt. 33 19, 'they (i.e., Zebulun and Issachar) call peoples to the mountain.' Though Tabor is not expressly named, as it is the mountain in which both these tribes had an interest the allusion would be clear to early readers. The passage seems to refer to some kind of religious fair or gathering at the sanctuary of Tabor to which the neighbourhood was invited for worship and barter (Stade, GVI 1 171; Driver, Deut. 409; see also Herder, Geist d. Hebr. Poësie, 150 ff. ed. Suphan). In the days of Deborah and Barak these tribes had suffered most from the hostility of the Canaanites; accordingly upon Tabor, as the common rallying-point, Barak gathered his men for a descent upon the enemy in the plain below (Judg. 4 6 12 14). Perhaps there was another reason for the muster on Tabor besides the obvious advantages of the position; the holy war, as von Gall suggests, would probably begin with a sacrifice at the tribal sanctuary (Altisr. Kultstätten, 124 f.; cp 1 S. 13 9 12 Mi. 3 5, etc.). From one account it appears that the battle was fought at the foot of the mountain (Judg. 4 14 f.); the Song, however, does not mention Tabor, and places the battle farther off, by Taanach, along the left bank of the Kishon (5 18-20). By this victory Tabor was secured to Israel; and, as a stronghold commanding one of the main caravan routes across the Plain, it must have proved an invaluable possession during the times of conflict and slow consolidation which followed (Judg. 7 1 22 1 S. 28 4 ff. 29 1 31 1). Of its fortunes in the days when

[1] In Talm. B. the extent of Tabor is given as 4 parsa, Bāb. Bathr 73*b* (Zĕbāḥīm 113*b* reads 40 parsa); the figures of Jos., BJ iv. 1 (height 30 stadia, the πεδίον on the summit 26 stadia), are of course absurd.

Assyrian and Egyptian armies passed within sight of it we know nothing (Is. 8 23 [9 1] 2 K. 23 29 Zech. 12 11). The sanctuary continued to serve the district. By Hosea's time it had become associated with the idolatrous form of Yahwè-worship which was characteristic of the N. kingdom; hence it incurred the prophet's denunciation; its priesthood, like that of Mizpah, the other typical 'high place,' is 'a net spread out' to catch deluded worshippers (Hos. 5 1). Nevertheless the sacred character of the mountain was not forfeited; in the course of time no doubt it influenced the Christian tradition (§ 5); it never quite lost its hold upon Jewish memory. In a late Midrash we find the opinion that 'the Temple itself might well have been built in the portion of Issachar,' had it not been otherwise ordered (Yalkuṭ on Dt. 33 19 בית הבחירה ראוי לבנות בחלק של יששכר).

3. Judg. 8 18 and 1 S. 10 3. The Tabor of Judg. 8 18 can hardly be the mountain; it is too far from the seats of Gideon's clan; the scene of the murder was the neighbourhood of Shechem rather than the Plain of Jezreel (but cp GIDEON, § 2). It is simplest to suppose that there was another Tabor near Ophrah (Budde, Ri. Sa. 114; but see also Moore, Judges, 228). The 'terebinth [RV 'oak'] of Tabor' (1 S. 10 3; 𝔊ᴸ τῆς δρυὸς τῆς ἐκλεκτῆς) is probably to be placed, as the context seems to require, in Benjamin, between Rachel's Grave, on the N. border of Benjamin, and Gibeah (von Gall, l.c. 88 f.). Ewald's emendation אֱלוֹן דבורה (= אֱלוֹן בכות Gen. 35 8) is scarcely necessary; there must have been more than one such sacred tree in later Jewish history. See, further, RACHEL'S SEPULCHRE.

In later Jewish history Tabor was the scene of three memorable engagements.

4. Jewish history. The first occurred in the struggle between Antiochus III. the Great (223-187 B.C.) and Ptolemy IV. Philopator (222-205 B.C.) for the possession of Palestine (Polyb. v. 70). After the surrender of Philoteria (S. of Lake of Galilee) and Scythopolis, about 218 B.C., Antiochus marched into the hill-country and appeared before Atabyrium, 'which is situated upon a rounded hill (ἐπὶ λόφου μαστοειδοῦς), more than 15 stadia in ascent,' and captured the place by a stratagem. Polybius calls Atabyrium a πόλις standing on the top of the hill, and the account of its capture agrees with such a position.

In B.C. 53 the proconsul A. Gabinius, general of Pompey, fought Alexander, son of Aristobulus, at the foot of the mountain (περὶ τὸ Ἰταβύριον ὄρος), and 10,000 Jews fell in battle (Jos. Ant. xiv. 6 3).

The third episode is recorded in fuller detail. As governor of Galilee Josephus fortified Tabor against Vespasian in 67 A.D. Under pressure he built a wall round the summit in forty days, and supplied the fort with water from below, for the inhabitants (ἔποικοι) had been dependent upon rain. Vespasian sent Placidus with 600 horsemen to attack the Jews by enticing them down to the plain; they were unwise enough to leave their strong position in the hope of overwhelming the cavalry; it became impossible to retreat, and they were completely defeated. Want of water compelled those who were left in the fort (οἱ ἐπιχώριοι) to surrender the mountain to Placidus (Jos. BJ iv. 1 8 ii. 20 6, Vita 37). Remains of Josephus' wall were discovered in 1898.

Since the third century Tabor has been revered by Christian tradition as the scene of the Transfiguration.

5. The Transfiguration. The Gospels themselves do not give a name to the 'high mountain' (ὄρος ὑψηλόν); but it was more likely Hermon than Tabor (see HERMON, § 1, MOUNTAIN). The Transfiguration is dated six (Lk., eight) days after the confession of Peter at Cæsarea Philippi = Bāniās at the foot of Hermon. Nothing is said of a journey in the interval; the return to Galilee is placed after the Transfiguration (Mk. 9 30). Moreover, in Jesus' time, Tabor was hardly a place to which he could lead the three apostles 'apart by themselves' (κατ' ἰδίαν μόνους: Mk. 9 2)—κατ' ἰδίαν obviously refers to the apostles, not to the isolation of Tabor. The passages from Polybius and Josephus quoted above imply that the summit was inhabited and partially fortified.

Père Barnabé, who has written lately in support of the tradition, argues that there never was, and never could have been, a town upon the summit because of the absence of water and cultivable land sufficient to support a population (Le Mont Thabor, Paris, 1900). But the difficulty was overcome in other situations of a similar character; many remains of cisterns have been discovered on the summit; and monasteries have managed to live there. The passage in the Gospel according to the Hebrews quoted by Origen (Comment. in Joan. t. 26; Migne, PG 14 col. 132), where Jesus is made to say, 'Even now has my mother, the Holy Spirit, seized me by one of my hairs and borne me to the great mountain Tabor,' can hardly be said to support the Christian tradition; but it may have helped to give rise to it. The context of the quotation is lost, so that we cannot tell what event is alluded to; not improbably it was the temptation. Cp TEMPTATION, § 14, and see Moulton, Bibl. and Sem. Studies, Yale Univ., 1901, p. 161, with the references. At any rate Origen himself accepted the tradition (Comment. in Ps. 88 13 [89 12]; PG 12 1548), 'Tabor is the mountain of Galilee where Christ was transfigured.' In the fourth century it is held by Eusebius, who speaks of Hermon along with Tabor as 'mountains upon which the wonderful transfigurations and frequent sojourns of our Saviour took place' (Comment. in Ps. 88 13 [89 12]; PG 23 1092); by Cyril of Jerusalem, 'Moses . . . and Elias . . . were present with him when he was transfigured on Mt. Tabor' (Catech. 12 16; PG 33 744); by Jerome, 'Itabyrium et tabernacula Salvatoris,' '. . . montem Thabor in quo transfiguratus est Dominus' (Epp. 46 and 108; PL 22 491; ib. 889). Before the end of the fourth century, the tradition was widely current in the E., and pilgrims, such as Paula (Jerome, Ep. 46) and Sylvia of Aquitaine, began to venerate the spot. It is generally believed that the Empress Helena founded a basilica on Tabor about 326 A.D.; whether any remains of it can still be traced may be doubted. The church with three apses, excavated in recent years (plan given by Barnabé l.c. 136), is considered to show characteristics of fourth-, or fifth-century work (de Vogüé, Eglises de T. Sainte, 1860, 352 ff.); in 570 the three chapels were seen by Antoninus of Plaisance, and in 670 by Arculf, bishop of Eichstädt, the earliest travellers who refer to them; their narratives are published by the Société de l'Orient latin (1 94 and 185). The only dissentient voice in the early period is that of the Bordeaux Pilgrim (333 A.D.), who places the Transfiguration on the Mt. of Olives (Itinerarium [8th cent.], Soc. de l'Or. lat. 1 18); otherwise, down to the time of the Crusades the Christian tradition is unanimous and constantly repeated. It finds a place in the services of the Greek Church for Aug. 6th—e.g., Ἔφθασεν ἡ ἡμέρα τῆς ἐνθέου εὐφροσύνης· ἄνεισιν εἰς τὸ ὄρος τὸ Θαβὼρ ὁ Δεσπότης τῆς θεότητος αὐτοῦ ἀπαστράψαι τὴν ὡραιότητα (Ὡρολόγιον τὸ μέγα, Venice, 1876, 348); but in the Western service-books it does not seem to occur.[1]

In the history of the Frank kingdom Tabor maintained its associations with religious devotion and hard fighting.

6. The Crusaders. In 1099 Tancred occupied the mountain with European troops, and when he withdrew he endowed the church and entrusted it to the care of Benedictine monks, who restored the ancient basilica and built a monastery. Not long after, in 1113, the Turks under Malduk fought a battle with Baldwin I. on the plain below; the Crusaders were severely beaten, and the monks massacred. But fresh monks soon took their place; the abbey received new donations; the dignity of archbishop was conferred upon its Abbot Pons and his successors by a bull of Eugenius III. (1145). Then came the advance of Saladin in 1183; his troops ravaged the Greek convent; and in 1187, after the disaster at the Horns of Ḥaṭṭīn, the holy place of Tabor was reduced to ruins and abandoned by its Benedictines.

Early in the thirteenth century, Melik el-'Adil, in order to attack the headquarters of the Franks at Acre, fortified Tabor, using part of the ruined church for his towers. The fortifications were completed in 1213 by his son, Melik el-Mu'aẓẓam; several inscriptions commemorating the work have been found recently among the débris (Barnabé, l.c. 15, 100). It was this fortification of Tabor that occasioned the Fifth Crusade. In 1217 Andrew II., king of Hungary, and other Princes advanced against Tabor with a great host, and besieged the fort seventeen days; the first assault was boldly delivered and as boldly repulsed; delays and divisions in the Christian camp helped to make the second attack fruitless, and the Crusaders were forced to retreat. See the vivid narrative of Vincentius Bellovacensis, Soc. de l' Or. lat. série hist., 3 98; Kugler, Gesch. d. Kreuzzüge, 312 f.; Michaud, Hist. of Crusades, 2 226 ff. The fortress was afterwards dismantled by Melik el-'Ādil in the hope of restoring peace; and, in the years which followed, the church was rebuilt and served by monks from Hungary (1229); for a short time it passed into the possession of the Hospitallers of St. John. But Tabor was not left in peace for long. In 1263 Bibars, the Mameluke Sultan of Egypt, in the course of his campaign against Damascus, finally burnt and devastated the church, and the holy-place of Tabor was left a heap of ruins for 600 years. Franciscans from Nazareth conducted pilgrims to the summit from time to time, and celebrated, as well as they could, the Feast of the Transfiguration on 6th Aug. and the second Sunday in Lent. Not until 1858 did the Franciscans begin to undertake the care and excavation of the ruins; Greek monks followed soon after; and in 1873 was built the modest Latin convent which, with the Greek monastery close by, guards the ancient sanctuary. Napoleon's Syrian campaign brings Tabor into general history for the last time; in 1799 the French troops under Kléber, afterwards reinforced by Napoleon himself, encountered the vast army of Jezzâr, and the battle of Mt. Tabor ended in the complete discomfiture of the Turks; see Lanfrey, Hist. de Napoleon 1er, 1 399 f.

[1] In the fourteenth century the dogma of the Uncreated Light of Mt. Tabor was promoted by Gregory Palamas, Archbishop of Thessalonica (about 1349). He asserted that one light of Tabor was visible and comprehensible, the other invisible and incomprehensible; see Migne, PG 150 773 ff. Gregory became a patron of the curious sect of the ὀμφαλόψυχοι, drawn from the monks of Mt. Athos, who devoted themselves to the contemplation of the uncreated light of Tabor; Migne, ib. col. 899 f. Nilles, Kalendarium manuale, Innsbruck, 1896, s.v. Aug. 6.

7. Name. The derivation of the name Tabor is unknown. In spite of its triliteral form, Winckler considers that the name has survived, like 'Jordan,' from pre-Canaanite times, and therefore is not Semitic in origin. For a Semitic derivation he suggests the Eth. dabr 'mountain,' with d for t under influence of the liquid (AOF 1 423). This interchange of dentals is perhaps to be found in the name of the village at the NW. foot of Tabor, Debūriyeh = DABERATH (q.v.), possibly a formation from תבור; the Arab. form has preserved the long vowel in the second syllable. One is tempted to conjecture that the primitive form of תבור was דבור (cp דְּבִיר Josh. 11 21 13 26 Judg. 1 11).

Older etymologies have a certain interest; e.g. Syr.-Hex. mg. ad Θαβωρ Josh. 19 22 gives βηθωρ, and explains bēth 'ōr 'house of light': Jerome OS 31 2 49 6 'veniens lumen, veniat lux' (תבוא אור!).

Among the Arabs Tabor has long been known as Jebel eṭ-Ṭūr—i.e., 'the mountain'—a name given also to Gerizim, Olivet, and Sinai. Sometimes the Arabs call it Jebel Nūr, 'of the light,' in allusion to the Transfiguration, for the Christian tradition is accepted by Moslems; Guérin, Galilée, 1 143 ff. We should expect Tabor to be mentioned in Egyptian documents; but this is probably not the case. The 'Dapura' in the country of 'Amaura,' so called to distinguish it from another Dapura, among the towns conquered by Rameses II. (temple of Karnak), is to be looked for on the Orontes in N. Syria; the Depuru mentioned next to Ḳadesh in the papyrus Anastasi I. (22 4, Chabas, Voy. d'un Egyptien en Syrie, pp. 197, 313), if not the same place, belongs to the same region. The situation of Tapru in the Būlāḳ Papyrus is not specified. The equivalent of these names would probably be טַבּוּר, 'hill,' rather than תבור. See WMM, As. u. Eur. 220 ff. The name of the mountain has not been found in Assyrian records.

Pal.* 1 388 ff.; Robinson, BR(2), 2 351 ff.; GASm., HG 394 ff.; Buhl, Pal. § 68. Père Barnabé gives a full and valuable collection of material (the point of view is uncritical, and the references are not always to be trusted). It has been supposed by Ewald (Hist. 3 21) and Thenius (without ancient authority) to be identical with the 'palm tree of Deborah between Ramah and Bethel in mount Ephraim' (Judg. 4 5). This is certainly plausible. On the other hand the descriptions of the sites of the two trees cannot be said to agree. The city referred to in 1 S. 9 6 ff. is not said to be Ramah, and 'Bethel in mount of Ephraim' and 'Gibeah of God' cannot be identified. It is much more likely that the 'oak' (or rather, 'sacred tree') referred to in 1 S. 10 3 was unconnected with any biblical story except that of Saul, and that Tabor is a corruption of some other name, possibly Baḥurim (בחרים): cp 𝔊L's rendering (τῆς ἐκλεκτῆς), which presupposes בָּחוּר. TACHMONITE (תַּחְכְּמֹנִי) 2 S. 23 8, RV TAHCHEMONITE.

TADMOR (תַּדְמֹר; ΘΕΔΜΟΡ [AL], ΘΟΕΔΜΟΡ [B^b], ΘΟΕΙΔΟΜΗϹΕΝ ΤΗΝ ΘΟΕΔΟΜΟΡ [B* cum signo perversæ lect.], Palmiram [Vg.]) 'in the wilderness,' a name given (2 Ch. 8 4†) to a city built by Solomon by the Chronicler. This late historian doubtless had in view the great city in the Syrian desert between Damascus and the Euphrates (תדמור, תדמר of the Nabatæan inscr.) known to the Greeks and Romans as Palmyra (see WRS, s.v. 'Palmyra' EB(9)),[1] the mod. Tadmur, vulgarly Tudmir.[2] This appears from his bringing it into connection with Hamath and the N. He is, however, simply misquoting 1 K. 9 18, where the RV is certainly right in following the Kt. (תמר, i.e., Tāmār, not as some have supposed Tammōr) in preference to the harmonistic Ḳre 'Tadmor' (תַּדְמֹר) adopted by AV following the versions. For the context here clearly shows that not Palmyra, but some place in the S. of Judah is meant (see TAMAR), and we have no reason to think that the boundaries of Israel ever extended so far N. The name Tadmor occurs nowhere else in the OT, nor even in the cuneiform inscriptions, nor can Palmyra be traced in history till just before the Christian era, 42-41 B.C. (Appian, BC 5 9). At that date, however, Palmyra was a place of some importance (cp ARABIA, § 3), and it may very well have come into existence some centuries earlier—long enough for the real story of its founding to be quite unknown in Israel in the time of the Chronicler. TAHAN, TAHANITES (תַּחַן, תַּחֲנִי), Nu. 26 35. See below, TAHATH.

TAHAPANES (תַּחְפַּנְחֵס) Jer. 2 16, RV TAHPANHES.

TAHASH (תַּחַשׁ) Gen. 22 24, AV THAHASH.

TAHATH (תַּחַת), an Ephraimite name originating in the Negeb, see SHUTHELAH (1 Ch. 7 20 bis νοομε = נחם? [B only once], θααθ, νομεε [A], θααθ [L twice]). The name occurs again in v. 25 under the form TAHAN (תַּחַן, θαεν [B], -αν [L] κα. [A—i.e., καὶ θ.]), and similarly in Nu. 26 35 [P] (LXX v. 39 ταναχ), cp the family of the Tahanites (ib. תַּחֲנִי, ὁ ταναχ[ε]ι [BAFL]). In the priestly genealogies in 1 Ch. 6 which are intended to supply the great singers with a Levitical ancestry, Tahath is twice mentioned among the ancestors of Samuel and Heman (1 Ch. 6 24 [9] 37 [22], κααθ [B, but θ. v. 37], θ. [AL]), and it is only reasonable to identify Tahath or Tahan (= Nahath?) with TOHU [q.v.], which is also an Ephraimite name (cp EPHRAIM, § 12).

TAHATH (תַּחַת, note the 'priestly' name TAHATH above), a stage in the wandering in the wilderness; Nu. 33 26 f. (ΚΑΤΑΑΘ [BAL], ΚΑΤΘΑΑΘ [F]). The name stands between Makheloth and Terah, both of which are possibly corruptions of 'Jeraḥmeel' (Che.). See WANDERINGS, WILDERNESS OF.

[2] On the connection between the names tadmur and παλμυρα see Lag. (Übers. 125, note), who approves the conjecture of Schultens (Vita Saladina; see the Geog. Index under 'Tadmora,' where the form tatmur is cited), that the original was tatmur, with the meaning 'abounding in palms.'

TAHCHEMONITE, AV Tachmonite (תַּחְכְּמֹנִי, ο χανανaιος [BA], υιος θεκεμανει [L]), 2 S. 23 8. Probably miswritten, owing to the repetition of ת from the preceding word, for הכמני (note ὁ χαν. in BA)—i.e., הַכְּמֹנִי, 'the . . . -ite' (so Marq.). This is in accordance with the other descriptions of David's other heroes. But כמני can hardly be correct. Besides, הכמני is preceded (according to the emendation suggested under JASHOBEAM) by בית; בית־הכמני is analogous to בֵּית־הַלַּחְמִי. נ and ר being sometimes confounded, it is plausible to correct into בֵּית־הַכַּרְמִי—i.e., a man of Beth-cerem (see BETH-HACCEREM); ר and מ were transposed. Cp Carmi, the name of a son of Zabdi, Josh. 7 1, and note that in 1 Ch. 27 2 Jashobeam is called a son of Zabdiel; also that in 1 Ch. 4 1 Perez and Carmi are brothers, and that in 1 Ch. 27 3 Jashobeam is said to have belonged to the b'ne Perez. T. K. C.

TAHPANHES (תַּחְפַּנְחֵס, Jer. 43 7, etc.) or Tehaphnehes (תְּחַפְנְחֵס, Ezek. 30 18); Jer. 2 16 Kᵉthib תחפנס (EV Tahapanes), Judith 1 9 AV TAPHNES, RV TAHPANHES, a city of north-eastern Egypt. Ezek. 30 closes the long enumeration of Egyptian cities threatened by destruction, with Aven-Heliopolis and Pi-beseth-Bubastus, v. 17, and Tahpanhes, v. 18, all three belonging to the Eastern Delta. The long verse, devoted to Tahpanhes, where 'the yokes (better, as 𝔊, 'sceptres'; see Cornill) of Egypt' shall be broken, and 'the pride of her power shall cease in her' shows the wealth and importance of the place, as does the allusion to 'her daughters'—i.e., surrounding towns (Jer. 43 7 f.). Jeremiah, with many fugitives, fleeing from Palestine to Egypt, comes to Tahpanhes and settles there. This points again to the place being near the entrance from Palestine into Egypt—i.e., in the NE. In v. 9 the words 'the entry of Pharaoh's house in Tahpanhes' seem to indicate that the place had a royal palace which, even if used only on occasional visits of the king, would indicate an important city. In 44 1 46 14 Tahpanhes (which, however, is wanting in the good MSS of 𝔊 in 46 14), Migdol, and Noph are the three most important settlements of Jewish fugitives in N. Egypt, as distinguished from Pathros in the S. In Jer. 2 16, the Egyptians are called 'children of Noph (Memphis) and Tahpanhes.' Judith 1 9, enumerating Taphnas and Ramesse and the whole land of Goshen (Gesem), as far as Tanis and Memphis, etc., seems to be following those Jewish settlements.

𝔊 transcribes the name as Ταφνας (indeclinable) in Jer. and Judith; in Ezek. 𝔊ᴮ has Ταφναι; Vg. not Taphnæ, as is usually quoted, but Taphnis (indeclinable: the same form occurs as accusative in Jer. 43 7). It has always been concluded from these transcriptions that the reference is to a place which Herodotus, assimilating its name to the Greek word for 'laurels,' calls Δαφναι. According to him (2 30) Psammetik I. established a great camp of soldiers 'in Daphnæ near Pelusium' (ἐν Δάφνῃσι τῇσι Πελουσίῃσι), which the Persians still maintained. In 2 154, he reports that Sesostris, returning from his conquests, rested there. The It. Anton. places Dafno 16 R. m. inland from Pelusium; Steph. Byz. also mentions Δαφνη.[1] Already Wilkinson (Modern Eg. and Thebes, 1 447) identified this place with the modern Tel(l) Defenneh (about 25 English miles in a straight line SW. of the ruins of Pelusium), which was excavated by Flinders Petrie in 1886 (see Petrie, Tanis, 2). Petrie found traces of earlier buildings of the Ramesside period, a great camp, fortified, according to the foundation records, by Psammetichus I., maintained under Necho and Amasis, and evidently abandoned afterwards, the palace or citadel having been destroyed by fire. Many finds of arms, pottery, etc., showed that the garrison had consisted chiefly of Greek mercenaries. The position of this fortress, on the right bank of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile close to the old caravan-road to Syria, explains its great importance and agrees excellently with that of the biblical Tahpanhes as key to Egypt (cp Jer. 43 7); the expression in Jer. 2 16 would be explained by the strong garrison. Such a place would also be best adapted for a Jewish colony which, evidently, subsisted chiefly on trading. Wilkinson's identification may, therefore, be considered as very probable.[1] The Egyptian name of the city has, however, not yet been found, which is not surprising, if we consider that the city received its importance only under Psammetichus I. Such Egyptian etymologies as have been attempted so far are too improbable to be discussed here.

[On the theory that the reference in all the passages which mention 'Tahpanhes' is to N. Arabia (cp PROPHET, §§ 26 f. 40), 'Tahpanhes,' like the other traditional names, disappears from the text. For the underlying words see Crit. Bib. on Jer. 2 16 Ezek. 30 17 f.] W. M. M.

TAHPENES (תַּחְפְּנֵיס;[2] in 1 K. 11 20*b* defectively; θεκ [or χ]εμ[ε]ινα [BAL]; Vg. Taphnes; 1 K. 11 19 f. [twice]), the wife of Pharaoh, whose sister was given to Hadad, the Edomite, to wife. The name has a very Egyptian appearance, although no certain etymology could be given, except that the initial t would be the Egyptian article. The present vowel-points seem to follow the analogy of the city TAHPANHES (q.v.). See, however, HADAD, according to which article we should not expect an Egyptian name for a queen of Muṣri in N. Arabia which seems to be meant here instead of Egypt. The possibility remains open, at any rate, that at a later time, when the king of Muṣri in question had become a Pharaoh in the text, and the whole narrative was referred to Egypt, an Egyptian name was worked into the story. It would be futile to try to reconstruct the various short Egyptian words which could be found in the name, especially as 𝔊 differs somewhat from the Hebrew. [On the Heb. text cp Crit. Bib. on Jer. 46 15.] W. M. M.

TAHREA (תַּחְרֵעַ; θαρα[α] [AL], θαραχ [Bℵ]), a descendant of Meribbaal; 1 Ch. 9 41.

TAHTIM-HODSHI, LAND OF (אֶרֶץ תַּחְתִּים חָדְשִׁי, την θαβασων η εστιν ναδασαι [B], γην εθαων αδασαι [A], γην χεττιειμ καδης [L]; Pesh. om. vers.; terram inferiorem Hodshi [Vg.]), a district mentioned between Gilead and Dan-jaan in the account of the movements of Joab in taking the census of the people of Israel 'from Dan even to Beersheba,' 2 S. 24 6.

1. State of the problem.

That 'Tahtim-hodshi' is corrupt, is too obvious to be questioned. Several remedies have been offered, but not quite satisfactorily, owing to the want of a thorough textual criticism of the whole narrative of the census (vv. 1-9) in the light of parallel passages of geographical description.

1. Ewald (Hist. 3 162, n. 3) thought that for 'Hodshi (?)' we should read 'Hermon' (חרמון). Grätz changed, in addition, 'Taḥtim (?)' into 'taḥath' (תחת); cp Josh. 11 3, where Wellhausen, Buhl, Bennett (SBOT,

[1] The form Ταφνας in the Coptic version, of course, proves nothing, being taken mechanically from the Septuagint.

[1] No significance, however, should be attached to the fact that the Arabs called a part of the ruins 'the castle of the Jew's daughter' (kaṣr bint el-Yehûdi), which has induced Petrie even to find the alleged 'brick-kiln' of Jer. 43 9 (see BRICK-KILN). It may be mentioned here that Erman (in his review, Berliner Philologische Wochenschrift, 1890, p. 959) has warned us against laying stress on the similarity of the names Defenneh (?) and Daphnæ. The best Arabic form is Tel(l) Defeineh or Defineh (others give the plural Defne)—i.e., 'treasure-hill,' evidently from finds made here by Arabs, not from an old name of the locality.

[2] E.g., Lagarde once tried to find in Tahpenes the goddess Soḥme(t), worshipped especially at Memphis. A ta-Soḥme(t) 'the one belonging to S.' would, however, require quite a number of violent emendations

'Joshua'), and Steuernagel (but not Di.), read 'the Hittites (הַחִתִּי) under Mt. Hermon.' But in this case we require to prefix הַחִתִּי, thus producing 'the land of the Hittites under Hermon.' H. P. Smith prefers 'the land of the Hittites to Hermon.' But are not Hermon and Dan somewhat too near together?

2. Wellhausen (TBS 217), following Hitzig (for 'חת) and partly Thenius (for 'חד), reads הַחִתִּים קָדֵשָׁה, '(to the land of) the Hittites towards Kadesh.' This is confirmed by 𝔊^L (see above), and is adopted by Steuernagel, Driver, Buhl (SBOT). But is not Kadesh on the Orontes too far N.? Wellhausen has to suppose that the boundary line is traced to Kadesh, and that it then comes back (SW.) to Dan. And had David really conquered the northern Kadesh, and even completely incorporated it into the territory of Israel? Cp Buhl, Pal. 69.

3. Klostermann (ad loc.) and Guthe (Gesch. 94) would read נַפְתָּלִי קֶדְשָׁה, '(to the land of) Naphtali towards Kedesh'; cp Dt. 34 1 f. (where, in the description of the prospect from Mt. Nebo, Naphtali is introduced after 'the land of Gilead as far as Dan'), and 2 K. 15 29, where Kedesh is mentioned with Ijon (the name which, according to Klostermann, lurks in the second part of DAN-JAAN [q.v.]) and Gilead, as representing together the far N. of the land of Israel. This is plausible, but involves a somewhat bold emendation of תחתים.

A more secure solution of the problem can, as has been said above, only be reached in the course of a radical correction of the text. (On Dt. 34 1 f., one of the passages referred to by Klostermann, see NEBO, MOUNT.)

2. Progress possible.

According to the present writer's emended text of 2 S. 8 1 f. (in a section which Budde, quite independently, places very near 2 S. 24 1-9, which it precedes), David had recently conquered the parts of N. Arabia nearest to the land of Judah, viz., Miṣṣur and Jeraḥmeel (the region from which the Israelites appear to have come). That David treated his new subjects with the cruelty asserted in the MT of 2 S. 8 2, may be confidently denied (see Crit. Bib.).

A study of the ways of the scribes suggests that the true text of that passage (omitting a number of corrupt dittograms of ירחמאל) is, וַיַּךְ מִצּוּר וירחמאלים וַיִּכְבֹּשׁ את־צרפתים ותהי מִצּוּר וגו׳, 'and he smote Miṣṣur and the Jeraḥmeelites, and subdued the Zarephathites, and Miṣṣur became' etc.

What David did next is shown us in 2 S. 24 1-9.

The thought came to him, 'Go, number Miṣṣur and Jerahmeel' (v. 1), or, as David puts it in his command to Joab, 'Go to and fro throughout all Zarephath-miṣṣur, from Dan (? Miṣran) even to Beer-sheba,[1] and number ye the people' (v. 2). Verses 5-7 describe Joab's proceedings.

'And they passed through Judah, and began from Aroer-jerahmeel, the city that is in the midst of the valley of [Jerahmeel] Jizreel, and they came to Jerahmeel,[2] and to the land of the Rehobothites to Kadesh, and they turned round to the city of Miṣran. And they came to Miṣṣur (or, to the fortress of Miṣṣur), and to all the cities of the Horites (Jerahmeelites) and the Kenites; and they came out to the Negeb of Judah, to Beer-sheba.' According to v. 9 (originally), Joab gave the number of the men of Miṣṣur as 8000, and of the men of Jerahmeel as 5000.

Thus 'Tahtim-hodshi' becomes 'the Rehobothites to Kadesh.' The Rehobothite warriors in David's bodyguard are known to us in the present text as 'Cherethites.' See REHOBOTH. T. K. C.

TALENT (כִּכָּר, Ex. 25 39, etc.; ταλαντον, Mt. 25 24, etc.). See SHEKEL, and WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

[1] We now see the original signification of the literary expression 'from Dan even to Beersheba.' There was a southern Dan. Possibly, however, 'from Dan' (מִדָּן) may be an early scribe's error (ממצרן), and the original coiner of the phrase wrote 'from Miṣran (מִמִּצְרָן). In either case the extent of the Negeb is thus defined. In the lapse of time this was forgotten.

[2] Rabbah of the bne Jeraḥmeel, miscalled in the text of 2 S. 12 26, etc., 'Rabbah of the bne Ammon.'

TALITHA CUMI (ταλιθα [Ti., -ει. WH] κουμ), two Aramaic words in Mk. 5 41 (see JAIRUS), correctly interpreted by τὸ κοράσιον (σοὶ λέγω) ἔγειρε: 'little maid (I say unto thee) arise!' The most important variants are (1) ταβιτα, etc. (with b for l), and κουμι (see Ti.). Ταβιτα, if not purely an error, suggests TABITHA [q.v.]; κουμι is of purely grammatical interest; see Dalman's useful note, Gram. d. Jüd.-Paläst. Aram. 266, n. 1. Talitha, properly 'young one,' used very frequently of lambs (in Aramaic more especially of the gazelle), would be represented in Aram. either by ṭalyĕthā or (cp Dalm. op. cit. 118, n. 6) ṭĕlīthā.

2. A king of Geshur b. AMMIHUR (i.e., probably Jeraḥmeel [Che.]) whose daughter (Maacah) was one of David's wives, and mother of Absalom. (2 S. 3 3: θομμει [B]; 13 37: θολμαιλημ [B], θολομαι [A]; 1 Ch. 3 2: θοαμαι [B], θολμει [A], θολομι [L]).

TAMAH (תֶּמַח), Neh. 7 55 AV = Ezra 2 53, TEMAH.

TAMAR (תָּמָר, 'date-palm'), a place on the SE. border of Judah, mentioned by Ezekiel (47 18 [𝔊² φοιν[ε]ικωνος BAQ] 19 [𝔊 θαιμαν κ. φ., θ being a dittograph both of תימנה and תמר] 48 28 [𝔊 θαιμαν], ܬܐܡܢ [Pesh.], for MT תָּמֹדּוּ, 'ye shall measure' [metiemini, Vg.]), and, as is usually held, one of the cities fortified by Solomon (1 K. 9 18 Kt. and RV; AV, however, gives TADMOR [q.v.] θερμαθ [A, om. BL], ιεθερμαθ [B at 10 23, om. A], θοδμορ [L ib.]; Palmiram; ܬܕܡܘܪ [Pesh.]). Knobel among critics, and Robinson and Wetzstein among geographers (cp TRADE, § 50), have identified Tamar (1) with the Thamara of Eusebius and Jerome (= the military station Thamaro of Ptol. 4 16 and the Peutinger Tables), a village which is a day's journey from Mapsis[3] (OS 210 86 85 3) between Hebron and Elath, and further (2) with the ruin called Kurnub, on an elevated site SE. of 'Ar'āra (AROER, 3).[4] This, however, does not suit the passages in Ezekiel. It appears that some point near the SW. point of the Dead Sea must be meant. ZOAR [q.v.] was called 'villa palmarum' in the times of the Crusaders, and Zoar was probably not the only place in the district which rejoiced in its stately palms. Engedi, however, is too far N.

The TAMAR of 1 K. 9 18, which has generally been

[1] Cp TOI, where it is inquired whether 'תֹּעִי, king of חמת,' is not miswritten for 'תַּלְמַי, king of מעכה' (Talmai, king of Maacah).

[2] Reading, 'from HAZAR-AENON [in the NE.] . . . the Jordan forms the boundary (𝔊 διορίζει = מגביל) as far as the eastern sea (going along) unto Tamar (תמרה).' So Smend, Cornill, Davidson, Toy, etc.

[3] See Buhl, Pal. 184, n. 545. The origin of the form 'Mapsis' is not clear. Hommel (Exp. T. 12 288 [1901]) has identified with it the Μαψ of Ptolemy v. 16 10, and the obscure ממשת on pottery stamps from the Shĕphēlah district (PEF Mem., 1902, pp. 106 ff.).

[4] See Van de Velde, Syria and Pal. 2 130 ff. (more judicious than Robinson [BR 2 616], who did not actually visit Kurnub), who sees that Kurnub cannot be the 'Tamar' of Ezek., and cp Buhl, l.c. and Del. Gen.(4) 581.

identified with that of Ezekiel, requires separate treatment. It is credible that Solomon's fortress was for the protection of the commercial road from Ezion-geber to Jerusalem; but it is not less possible that it was to guard the Negeb towards the land of Muṣri (see SOLOMON, § 7). 'Tamar,' both here and elsewhere, is therefore probably miswritten for רמת (Ramath), which is a corruption of 'Jerahmeel' (see TAMAR ii.). 'In the wilderness, in the land' (במדבר בארץ) should probably be 'in Arabia, in Miṣṣur' (בַּעֲרָב בְּמִצֻּר) (Che.; see Crit. Bib.).

TAMAR (תָּמָר, as if 'date palm,' § 69; θαμαρ [BℵADEL]). The name, in the sense of 'date palm,' is of course suitable enough for a woman (cp Cant. 7 7 f. [8 f.]). But it also occurs as a place-name, and we have to find an explanation which will fit both the personal name and the place-name. Winckler (GI 2 98 f. 104 f. 227) offers such an explanation. Tamar, he thinks, is the Canaanite Ištar; the myth of Tammuz and Ištar was doubtless transplanted into Canaan (cp Stucken, Astralmythen, 14-16). BAAL-TAMAR was the place where the men of Benjamin had their tribal sanctuary, and dedicated to the [female] goddess Ištar. Cp KIRJATH-JEARIM, SAUL. 'Baalath and Tamar,' 1 K. 9 18, should rather be Baalath-tamar (a less original form of Baal-tamar). All this is set forth with great force and learning; but there is a doubt whether the relics of mythology can be so easily traced, and whether textual criticism, methodically applied, does not here, as often elsewhere, suggest a better explanation.

Proper names in the OT are even more frequently corrupt than has been supposed, and need very careful emendation, and it so happens that תמר, both as an appellative and as a proper name, is specially liable to corruption. The passage 1 K. 9 18 is treated separately (see TAMAR i.); we are here only considering the passages in which 'Tamar' occurs as the name of a woman. A careful study of this group of passages suggests that 'Tamar' has here most probably arisen out of one of the popular distortions of 'Jeraḥme'elith'; another such corruption is MAACAH, and a third is MAHALATH. We may add that איתמר, ITHAMAR (the name of a son of Aaron) very possibly came from ירחמאל, Jeraḥme'el (ת from ח); cp JEREMOTH.

1. The wife of Judah's son Er, who subsequently, through her father-in-law, became the mother of PEREZ and ZERAH [qq.v.] (Gen. 38 6 ff. [J] 1 Ch. 2 4 Mt. 1 3 [AV here THAMAR]). The story is referred to in Ruth (4 12) as furnishing a parallel to Ruth's marriage with Boaz. According to Winckler it is a Canaanitish development of the myth of Ištar (see above). For another and a preferable view of the significance of the story, see JUDAH, col. 2617 f.

2. Sister of Absalom (2 S. 13 1 ff. 1 Ch. 3 9 [B always θημαρ and so A in 1 Ch.]), and probably daughter of the same mother (cp Jos. Ant. vii. 8 1); see MAACAH, 2. According to Winckler (GI 2 227 f.), not only has this Tamar's name mythological affinities, but the whole story of her being outraged by her half-brother Amnon is mythological. An old myth respecting Tamar, the Canaanitish Ištar, and her relation to her brother (to whom TAMMUZ corresponds) has been transformed by the people into a quasi-historical narrative. Note especially Tamar's cake, which reminds Winckler of the cakes of Ashtoreth (Jer. 44 19). See, however, above, and cp ABSALOM, DAVID, col. 1033.

3. (θημαρ [B], Thamar, but μααχα [L]), a daughter of Absalom, 2 S. 14 27† (vv. 25-27 late; see Bu. SBOT, 'Sam.'). Elsewhere we hear of a daughter of Absalom and wife of king Rehoboam called Maacah, and 𝔊[BA] in 2 S. 14 27 identifies Absalom's daughter Tamar with the wife of king Rehoboam; 𝔊[L], indeed, goes further and reads, not Tamar, but Maacah. If the addition in 𝔊, 2 S. 14 27, relative to the marriage of Absalom's daughter with Rehoboam is correct, one would be inclined to follow 𝔊[L]'s reading 'Maacah.' But perhaps the difficulty is not really existent. 'Tamar' and 'Maacah' may both be corruptions of Jeraḥme'elith ('a Jeraḥmeelite'). For the rest see MAACAH, 3. Thus two of the cases of the recurrence of a name in the same family would disappear (see also MEPHIBOSHETH, and cp Gray, HPN 6 f.). T. K. C.

TAMARISK TREE is the rendering in RV of 'ēšel, אֵשֶׁל, for which AV has in Gen. 21 33 'grove,' mg. 'tree'; in 1 S. 22 6 'tree,' mg. 'grove'; and in 1 S. 31 13 'tree.' The variety of rendering suggests that the Heb. word has an interesting history, and though it has become traditional to render 'tamarisk,' the critical tradition needs periodical revision at the hands of critics.[1]

1. Apart from 𝔊, whose rendering ἄρουρα Wellhausen (Sam. 124) pronounces unintelligible, the ancients took the word in a general sense, translating sometimes 'grove' or 'plantation' (Aq. δενδρών and δένδρωμα[2] (?); Sym. φυτεία, Vg. nemus, פרדים Tg. Jer. 1 and 2, and Ber. rab. 54, end), sometimes 'tree' (Sym. φυτόν; so Onk. Pesh.) or 'oak tree' (Theod. [τὰς] δρῦς; 1 Ch. 10 12 אֵלָה, instead of the אֵשֶׁל of 1 S. 31 13). Such a view of the meaning is supported by the Rabbis, and even by Celsius (1 535 ff.); but the rendering 'tree' would be excusable only as a protest against the cultus of some special sacred tree (cp OAK)—philologically it is of course untenable.

2. The tendency to explain obscure Heb. words from the Arabic has led to the identification of 'ēšel, אֵשֶׁל, with the Arab. 'athl, which corresponds phonetically, and means 'tamarisk.' Of this tree perhaps as many as half a dozen species are found in Pal. (Tristram, FFP, 250): our common tamarisk is not one of them. The common riverside species is T. Pallasii, Desc. The tamarisk 'is a very graceful tree, with long feathery branches and tufts, closely clad with the minutest of leaves, and surmounted in spring with spikes of beautiful pink blossom.' 'Though it is often a mere bush,' some of the Palestinian tamarisks 'reach such a size as to afford dense shade . . . Beersheba is well suited for the growth of the tamarisk; and we observed large numbers of the Eastern tamarisk on the banks below the site of Jabesh Gilead' (Tristram, l.c.). It is also common in Egypt, where it was anciently consecrated to Osiris, and bore the (Semitic?) name of asari.[3]

3. It may be doubted, however, whether this is really the correct explanation. It will be noticed that Tristram says nothing about tamarisks at Gibeah of Saul. The tree referred to in 1 S. 22 6 was no doubt a sacred tree (see HIGH PLACE, § 3 and n. 6). In 1 S. 14 2 we read apparently of a pomegranate tree under which Saul sat (see MIGRON). There is no probability in the view that the tree on the high place at Gibeah was a tamarisk. But if we give up 'ēšel in 1 S. 22 6, we can hardly defend it in Gen. 21 33 and 1 S. 31 13; the presumption is that the same word is meant in all these passages, and that in all three it is corrupt. Now let us turn to 𝔊's ἄρουρα (thrice). At first sight this looks like an orthodox substitute for a word liable to be misused (cp the Vss. on Gen. 12 6, and see OAK). But how can 𝔊 possibly have understood the phrase ἐφύτευσεν ἄρουραν, if ἄρουρα means 'tilled land'? Clearly ἄρουρα must cover some tree-name, and it has been suggested that ἄρουρα may come from עַרְעָר or עֲרוֹעֵר, which 𝔊, like Tg. and Vg., understood to mean 'tamarisk.' Thus the harder part of 𝔊's riddle is explained. It remains to account for 𝔊's reading ערער or ערוער in lieu of אשל—it is no mere interpretation but a genuine reading that 𝔊 gives us. There is only one hypothesis which will do this; ערער or ערוער is a corruption of אֲשֵׁרָה, ashērāh (Che.). This, then, is the true reading in all three places:—Abraham built an ashērah at

[1] H. P. Smith sounds a note of warning. Though he renders אֵשֶׁל 'tamarisk,' he remarks, 'As the word only occurs three times, the species is uncertain.'

[2] δένδρωμα seems to be an error for δενδρῶνα (see Schleusner, Lex. in VT, s.v.).

Beersheba; Saul sat under the asherah at Gibeah; the bones of Saul and his sons were buried under the asherah at Jabesh.[1]

אשרה was corrupted in one important MS. into ערער or ערוער; in another into אשל. The idea of the latter hypothesis was suggested by Klo., who supposes אֵשֶׁל to be a deliberate distortion of אשרה,[2] in order to discourage Asherah-worship. 𝔊's ἄρουρα, acc. to him, is אֲרֻרָה, 'the cursed (tree)'—again a protest against tree-worship.

2. 'ar'ār, עַרְעָר, Jer. 17 6 48 6† RV^mg., EV HEATH.

TAMMUZ (תַּמּוּז), whose worship is supposed, on doubtful grounds, to be alluded to in Ezek. 8 14 (θαμμουζ [BA], αδωνι [Q^mg.], Adonis [Vg.]), derives his name from the Bab. Dumuzi[3] (4 R. 28, 50 a)—i.e., 'son of life,' which, according to G. A. Barton, refers to Tammuz as the child of the goddess of fertility, or perhaps 'a true divine child' (=Ass. aplu kênu; so Frd. Del.).

1. Personality and cult.

He is variously described as the youthful husband of the goddess Ištar, as her son, and as the first in the series of her rejected husbands. Every year, in the fourth month (Dûzu, see below)—i.e., July—he descended to Hades, and remained there till the next spring. His disappearance gave occasion to drink-offerings and a great bikītu or 'weeping.' The 'motives' of his legend and the meaning of his cultus can be found in the Babylonian myth of the Descent of Ištar. There is also an illustrative passage in the Gilgameš-epic, Tab. 6, where, among other lovers of the goddess who have encountered a sad fate,[4] Tammuz (Dumuzi) is mentioned, 'Tammuz, the spouse of thy youth, thou compellest to weep year after year.'[5] The discovery of Friedrich Delitzsch and Jensen (Kosmol. 197) that 4 R. 30, no. 2 contains a song of lamentation for Tammuz is not less suggestive. This is how the song runs, as translated by A. Jeremias.[6]

'He went down (?) to meet the nether world, he has sated himself, the sun-god caused him to perish (passing) to the land of the dead, with mourning was he filled on the day when he fell into great sorrow.'

The word rendered 'sorrow' (idirtum) occurs again in 5 R. 48, col. 44, where, on the name of the month Tammuz, stands the note—idirtum, 'sorrow.' The Tammuz festival was in fact the idealisation of human sorrow—a kind of 'All Souls' Day.' Hence partly the strong hold which it obtained upon the masses. 'Dirges were sung by the wailing women to the accompaniment of musical instruments; offerings were made to the dead, and it is plausible to assume that visits were paid to the graves.' It is probable that, to gratify the general sentiment, specially important national mournings were placed in the month Tammuz (see below). 'The calendar of the Jewish Church still marks the 17th day of Tammuz as a fast, and Houtsma has shown that the association of the day with the capture of Jerusalem by the Romans represents merely the attempt to give an ancient festival a worthier interpretation. The day was originally connected with the Tammuz cult.'[7]

The month devoted to Tammuz in the later Jewish Calendar (Mĕg. Ta'ănīth, 4 5 6) was the Babylonian month Du'uzu or

1 It is assumed here that the Asherah was originally a sacred tree. But cp ASHERAH.

2 Siegfr.-Sta. agree, so far as Gen. l.c. is concerned.

3 The form Tamûzu has also been found in the personal name Ur (?)-(ilu) Tamuzu (Jensen, in Kraetzschmar's note on Ezek. 8 14). Dûzu, which was assigned to Ninib, the god of the hot mid-day sun, as regent. See MONTH, § 2.

Originally and properly Du'uzu or Dumuzu, is the spirit or god of the spring vegetation;[1] also, by a natural sequence, he is the lord, and his sister Bilili (see BELIAL, § 2) is the lady, of the underworld, the region of growth, though also the place of the dead.[2] But it was not possible to keep this conception in its purity; it was natural to identify the vegetation spirit with the sun, and to treat Du'uzu as a manifestation of the solar deity (Ninib). For the drama of the sun is similar to that of plant-life; after the summer solstice the sun seems gradually to lose its strength, and at length to die, till at the winter solstice it is born again. Originally too, the Du'uzu story was distinct from the Adonis and the Osiris stories; but at an early date the distinction was forgotten (ADONIS, § 2). The identity of Tammuz and Adonis is asserted by Jerome[3] and other fathers (see ASHTORETH, § 2, with n. 3).

According to Robertson Smith the wailing for Tammuz was not originally connected with the death of vegetation, but was a ceremony of mourning for some sacrificial victim, such as is performed among the Todas of S. India to this day. Later, a different explanation was sought for the wailing—one more in harmony with advancing civilisation—and the rite was projected into the myth of the death of Tammuz. Robertson Smith also thinks that the yearly mourning for Tammuz-Adonis is the closest parallel in form to the humiliation of the Hebrew Day of Atonement (Rel. Sem.(2), 411, cp 414).

To this view G. A. Barton (Sem. Or. 114) assents. The story of Adapa, however (KB 6 1, p. 97; cp Jastrow, Rel. Bab. Ass. 549), discloses an earlier form of the Tammuz-myth according to which Tammuz did not go into the death-world on leaving the earth, but ascended to the gate of Anu, where he was stationed ('as door-keeper') with another solar god or vegetation god called Gišzrida. According to Jensen (TLZ, 1896, col. 70) another ancient belief made Tammuz, the god of vernal vegetation, the son of abzu (the primæval ocean). Certainly Gudea (about 3000 B.C.) mentions Tamūzi-abzu (zuaba), i.e., Tammūz of the ocean, beside Ningišzida (identical with Geszida, mentioned above); compare, however, Jastrow (RBA 96), who deprecates fusing the two Tammūz-deities, and Barton (Sem. Or. 211 f.), who makes this deity a goddess.

We now turn to the single express reference to Tammuz in the MT. It occurs in the description of heathen rites practised in the temple, which Ezekiel in his captivity professes to have seen when in the ecstatic state.

2. OT traces.

First among these rites—according to Toy's explanation of chap. 8—comes (perhaps) an Asherah-image (v. 5). Next, the secret worship of reptiles and beasts, probably forms of old-Israelitish worship (v. 10). Next, the women weeping for Tammuz (v. 14). Next, twenty-five men worshipping the sun in the east (v. 16). The last form of heathenism (as most explain v. 17) is not recognised as such by Toy, but we have to mention it here for completeness; it is 'stretching out the branch to the nose.'[4] According to Toy, the sun-worship of the 1 See Jensen, Kosmol. 197, 227, but especially Frazer, GB(2) 2 115 ff. Barton thinks that the goddess Ištar was originally connected with some never-failing spring, and that some sacred tree near it represented her son (Sem. Or. 86).

2 Jensen, Kosmol. 225; cp Jastrow, RBA 575. Bilili is the world-principle of generation and growth.

3 There is a remarkable statement of Jerome (ed. Vallarsi, 1 321), 'Bethlehem nunc nostram . . . lucus inumbrabat Thamus, id est Adonidis.' Just before, he tells us that this cult of Adonis has lasted about 180 years, from the times of Hadrian to the empire of Constantine. Evidently he regarded the Adonis cult practised in the reputed grove of the Nativity as a deliberate profanation. It is not probable, however, that any such profanation would have been committed in the time of Hadrian; it was the Jews, not the Christians, who were at that time the objects of heathen persecution. And we may assume that the predominant element in the cultus in the cave at Bethlehem was not connected with Tammuz-Adonis, but rather with Isis and Sarapis, just as at Byblus the legend of Astarte and Adonis became fused with that of Isis and Osiris (cp Conradi, Kindheitsgeschichte Jesus', 315 f.; Usener, Rel.-gesch. Untersuch. 1 202).

4 Toy takes ומורה (v. 17) in the sense of 'stench,' and renders, 'they are sending a stench to my nostrils' (אֶל־אַפִּי). Kraetz-

Jews was probably borrowed from Assyria, so that Tammuz-worship and sun-worship would naturally be mentioned together.

Plausible as this is, a critical scepticism appears justifiable. It is strange that החמן should occur nowhere else in the OT. In Ezek. 8 5 הקנאה is certainly corrupt; this may reasonably make us suspect החמן. First of all, however, the whole context should be critically examined. The most obvious corrections (if we presuppose some very constant types of corruption) are those in v. 10, on which see SHAPHAN. From the probably true text of this verse we may divine that the whole description of which it forms part relates to heathen rites of Jerahmeelite or N. Arabian origin. Elsewhere (see Crit. Bib.) the text of v. 14 is corrected, and a reference to the cult of the N. Arabian goddess is supposed. See, however, also HADAD-RIMMON, where a reference to Tammuz-worship is suspected to exist both here and in Zech. 12 11. For a generally supposed reference to the parallel cult of Adonis, see GARDEN, § 8; and cp NAAMAN. According to Ewald, the 'desire of women' mentioned in Dan. 11 37 is Tammuz-Adonis.
